The bride, whose present felicity was so greatly in contrast with her late expectations, was observed to be in remarkably high spirits, making no affectation of concealing the happiness which pervaded her. After the ball had continued for some time, and all satisfaction and pleasure, two persons, masked and dressed in the costume of peasants of the country, entered the principal saloon and instantly began dancing, throwing themselves, with garlands which they held in their hands, into a variety of attitudes: it was observed that they both acquitted themselves surprisingly well, but one, from the contour of figure and lightness of movement, was suspected, though both were dressed in male attire, to be a woman. It is requisite to remark that the ball was not in mask, and that it is customary in Italy and Sicily for masks, when they join a company, to make themselves known to the master of the house, as a security against the introduction of improper or unwelcome persons. This etiquette was not observed on the present occasion, but the masks entering with gestures expressive of a request for admission, they were received without difficulty, it being probably looked upon as some device for adding to the amusement of the party. Their performance exciting the admiration of the company, the grace and ease of their movements became the subject of conversation. It then appearing that they were unknown, some of the guests, curious to discover them, hinted that it was time that they should unmask in order to take some refreshment; this, they with signs—for they spoke not—at first declined, but being pressed, signified in the same manner that they would only discover themselves to the master of the house. The bridegroom was accordingly called from the side of his bride for the purpose: good humoredly joining his friends in soliciting the strangers to make themselves known, they gave him to understand, always in pantomime, that since such was his desire, they were willing to gratify him, and that if he would retire with them for a moment, they would unmask, but to him alone as they wished to preserve their incognito from the rest of the company.

The count and the masks withdrew together. In the meantime, the music, the dancing, and all the pleasures of the joyous scene went on. The absence of the bridegroom was scarcely noticed by any one except the bride, who, with eyes wandering in search of him, more than once testified her surprise at his stay. In about twenty minutes, the same two persons, as was evident from their figure lately masked as peasants, re-entered the ball-room, but their dress was changed; they were now in complete mourning. Between them, one supporting the head, the other the feet, they carried a third so carefully and entirely enveloped in a large black vest, that neither his form nor features were distinguishable. As they moved slowly on with measured pace, they pretended by signs to express their grief for the death of the person they carried. An appearance so ominous on a nuptial night, excited sensations of an unpleasant nature; but no one thought proper to interfere in a pantomime which strange and ill-chosen as it was, they conceived permitted by the master of the house. The masks having reached the middle of the room, deposited their burthen there, and began to dance round it in a variety of grotesque attitudes, caricaturing sorrow. At this ill-boding and unaccountable scene, the high spirits of the bride instantaneously forsook her, and were succeeded by an almost preternatural sensation of dejection and horror. Looking anxiously round, she again, in a faltering voice, inquired for her husband. The sister of Rizzari, one of the bridesmaids, struck by her sudden paleness and ill-suppressed agitation, asked if she was indisposed. She replied, that she felt oppressed by a sense of anxiety and alarm, of which she could not conceive the origin. Her sister-in-law told her, that it was nothing but the evaporation of her late unusual high spirits, which, as is often the case, were succeeded by a causeless depression. Just then, the masks having finished their feigned funeral dance advanced to the bride; and one of them, the male, drawing her by the sleeve, spoke for the first time loud enough to be heard by those around, "Venite a piangere le nostre e le vostre miserie"—"Come and and weep for your own misery and ours.")

A chill went to the heart of the bride at these ill-omened words. She drew shudderingly back, and fell almost insensible in the arms of her sister-in-law. A murmur ran round—it was manifest that the cause of the bride's alarm was owing to the extraordinary proceeding of the persons in mask, who, perceiving the impression they had excited, hastily withdrew. In an instant they had disappeared; but wither they went or what became of them afterwards, was known to no one.

In the meantime, the bystanders remarked in surprise how well the person lying on the floor performed his part of a dead man: not a limb stirred, not a muscle moved, nor was he perceived to breathe. Curiosity prompted them to touch him, and lift his arms—they fell heavy and motionless by his side; his hands too was cold to the touch—cold as that of a corpse. Surprise led them farther—they uncovered his face—O God! it was that of a corpse, and that corpse was the bridegroom!

Who shall paint the dreadful scene that ensued? Exclamations of surprise, shrieks of horror, cries for the mask—here females swooning in terror there men running to and fro with drawn swords—thus inquiring the cause of the sudden disturbance—then denouncing vengeance on the murderers!—all was distraction and confusion! Her terrified friends instantly hurried away the trembling bride, anticipating some horrible event, as yet unconscious of the whole extent of her misfortune. As they bore her off, the name of her husband, dead, murdered, strangled, fell on her ears; insensibility for a few moments relieved her from the exquisite agony of her situation. They carried her to the bridal chamber—in that chamber had the accursed deed been perpetrated; the disordered furniture showed signs of a struggle; the instruments of death lay on the floor, and on the nuptial couch the infernal assassins had cast a branch of funeral cypress, the token of their premeditated and accomplished vengeance.

The duke, in whose bosom rage and anguish predominated by turns, stationed himself with a party of friends, with drawn swords, at the doors of the palace, whilst a strict but ineffectual search was carried on within. In a few minutes, the party, late so joyous broke up in consternation; hundreds instantly went off by different roads in search of the murderers, but all pursuit was unavailing. The police subsequently lent its aid: every angle of the country, for leagues round, was explored in vain. The perpetrators of the atrocious crime had escaped; nor, indeed, were they ever satisfactorily discovered.

Suspicion fell on the cavaliere; but though the most rigid search was made, he was not to be found. Some time after, it was discovered that he had left Sicily, to which he never returned, and was residing at Vienna.

It was rumoured, but the truth was never clearly ascertained, that he subsequently confessed himself the author and actor of this horrid tragedy, and gloried in the daring and fiend-like stratagem by which he had so signally accomplished it.

The widowed bride never recovered the shock. Her life was for some time despaired of. As soon as her strength enabled her, she retired into her convent, where death, the best friend of the wretched, ere long put an end to her sufferings.

MISCELLANY.

DR. FRANCIA.

The N. Y. Evening Tattler sketches the important events in the history of Paraguay, and gives the following summary glance at the character and events in the life of Don Jose Gaspar Rodriguez de Francia, lately deceased, one of the most extraordinary men of this or any age.

At this epoch rose the star of Dr. Francia. His life and character show how circumstances may make the man, and disappoint all calculations of his future course in new circumstances, when such calculations are made on his early character. Dr. Francia was the son of a French emigrant. He was intended for the church, and pursued his preparatory studies in the institutions founded by the Jesuits at Assumption and Cordova. In the reign of the Jesuits, it had been their policy in Paraguay and Uruguay, to exclude all foreigners; in those institutions it was, that he learned probably, the same policy, which afterwards governed him. He went no farther in theology, however, than through the canon law, and that diverted his attention to jurisprudence to which he turned his study.

He became a highly successful advocate, and was distinguished for generosity, disinterestedness, ability, and decision. He was chosen one of the cabildo, or council of Assumption, and afterwards alcalde, or municipal judge. No man was more popular and widely esteemed than Francia; and when, in 1811, the provisional government was erected, D. Fulgencio de Yegros was chosen President, and De Francia, Secretary. As he happened, however to be the only man of any brains in the government, he soon became the government. If his colleagues disputed his wishes, he still insisted; and if they would not give way to him, he would retire into the country, protesting he would have nothing more to do with the administration of public affairs. As his colleagues could do nothing without him, he was of course always called back, and begged to take his own way.

In 1813, Dr. Francia, induced his colleagues to call a second political convention. He wishes a more acknowledged participation in public business, and as he was the only member of the convention versed in business and books, he easily arranged matters as he chose, and procured the choice of two consuls, himself and De Yegros, to manage the government, instead of the old form of a President. His next move was to persuade Yegros that the better way was for them to reign separately, four months and four months and by taking the first four months himself, he got eight of the year for which they were chosen. When Congress came together again, at the end of the Consular year, he brought Rollin's Ancient History forward, and offered it as a standard, for the names and character of the officers, and induced that body to make still another change, and establish a Dictatorship.

So little was Francia's real character and ambitious views suspected, that the Congress made no difficulty in making this change, and agreed to elect Yegros to the Dictatorship. This did not answer; and Francia, by serving the sapient legislators in a way which can only be described by the euphonious modern term 'humbugging,' actually twice deterred the balloting; and in the meanwhile so set his creatures to work, that he was chosen Dictator for three years. Yegros, who had felt sure of the election, kicked a little, but Francia managed to elude and quiet him, took possession of the old Spanish Government House, and busied himself so successfully in the three years, to lay a good foundation, that he was in 1837, without any difficulty chosen Dictator for life.

He had marked his enemies; and his first study was to watch them. He discovered their conspiracies, frustrated them, and executed some hundreds as an opening sacrifice to his reign. He had secured the attachment of a small army of about 5,000; with whom and his spies, he put down every shadow of resistance. He concentrated all the functions of state in himself, and made his word law. He cut off all communication with the neighboring countries, and from his position had none with countries off the continent. Until about ten years ago, no individual, native or foreign was allowed to leave Paraguay, and the means and success with which he enforced this prohibition were truly wonderful. During the latter ten years of his reign, his policy has been more liberal; and he has uniformly favored the arts, industry, &c. among his people. One thing is certain, that though at his accession the noble families hated him, and though he broke down all aristocracy but himself, the one aristocrat in his dominions, the common people appear to have been attached to him.

His people consisted, of Creoles seven-tenths, Indians one-tenth, black, mixed, and old Spaniards, one-fifth. Out of these he raised a militia of 20,000, with which he so successfully repelled the invasion of the Buenos Ayreans, when they sought to force him into their confederacy, that they were content to let him alone ever after; and he as uniformly repulsed attempts at peaceful intercourse, as he did demonstrations of warlike approach.

Among the instances of his detentions were two Swiss travellers, Rengger and Longchamps, whom he caught botanizing and mineralizing in his territories in 1819, and detained six years, till 1825. These gentlemen published afterward a narrative of their experience in his Dictatorship's dominions, which was republished in London, 1830. His most illustrious prisoner was, however, the Chevaliere Aime Bonpland, the associate traveller with Alexander Van Humboldt. Bonpland went, in 1818, to Buenos Ayres, as Professor of Natural History. In 1820, he undertook to follow up the river Arana, in Paraguay called the Paraguay. On the banks of this river, while still in the Buenos Ayrean limits, he founded a colony of Indians for the culture of the herb used in South America as tea. This tea is called matte, and tastes worse to a Yankee than Matty himself does to a whig—as we can bear witness from proof on the spot. Good or bad, it is used all over the continent, and is a staple of Paraguay. Like Mehemet Ali, Francia was personally interested in the trade of his dominions, and did not choose that Paraguay tea should be raised any where else, if he could help it.

So one fine morning, the Chevalier Bonpland found himself in difficulty. A detachment of 800 of the Dictator's troops destroyed his plantations, and carried him and a large number of his Indians, prisoners to Paraguay. Francia made him, at first, physician to a garrison, then employed him to survey roads, but did not release him until the poor botanist had been a prisoner nine years. The early friend of Bonpland, Humboldt the British Minister, Canning, the British and French Consuls at Buenos Ayres, and the French Government applied to Francia for the release of the unlucky naturalist, but it was not granted till 1831.

Of latter years, other travellers have penetrated into the "enchanted commonwealth" with better success. They represent the Dictator as having been exceedingly plain and active in his habits. Usually unsocial, he could nevertheless try a practical joke.—He helped himself sans ceremonie to one trader's stock—making such selections as he liked; and when the poor fellow requested payment, he found he had waked up the wrong passenger, and was fain to pocket his loss.

To sum his character, he was no worse than most men would be in the possession of absolute power, and better than most. His crimes were steps of cruelty, necessary to confirm his usurpation. His public acts were for the good of his country as he understood it; and he certainly deserves some credit, for the freedom of Paraguay from the anarchy which has unsettled other South American Republics. Naturally shrewd, he took advantage of the loyalty of the inhabitants, and professed to acknowledge Spain's authority till 1826, when the old stock had died off. Then he declared Paraguay independent, and in 1827, Don Pedro of Brazil recognized the Dictatorate of Paraguay. This was the only recognition he coveted, and, so far as we know, the only formal recognition he ever received. In a word, he was an able despot; and we doubt whether any succeeding ruler will govern so quietly. We do not know to whom the succession falls; and have no idea that the integrity and independence of the Dictatorate will be continued.

PERILOUS EXPLOIT—A CHILD CARRIED OFF BY AN EAGLE.

An infant, in the care of Charles Stewart, a boy ten years old, has been carried off by an eagle to his nest in the mountains. The distracted mother, with a boy and a feeble old man followed it. Having reached the summit of a crag by a circuitous path, they could now descry the two eagles to which the nest belonged, soaring aloft at a great distance. They looked over the cliff as far as they could stretch with safety; but Peter was so well acquainted with the place where the nest was built, as at once to fix on the very spot whence the descent ought to be made, the verge of the rock there projected itself so far over the ledge where the nest rested, as to render it quite invisible from above. They could only perceive the thick sea of pine foliage that rose up the slope below, and clustered closely against the base of the precipice. A few small stunted fir trees grew scattered upon the otherwise bare summit where they stood. Old Peter sat himself down behind one of these, and placed a ledge on each side of it so as to secure himself from all chance of being pulled over the precipice by any sudden jerk, whilst Charley's little fingers were actively employed in undoing the great bundle of hair line, and tying one end of it round his body and under his arm-pits. The unhappy mother was now assisting the boy, and now moving restlessly about, in doubtful hesitation whether she should yet allow him to go down. When all was ready Charley Stewart slipped the skain dhu into his hoe, and went bodily, but cautiously over the edge of the cliff. He was no sooner fairly swung into the air than the hair rope stretched to a degree so alarming that Bessy Mac Dermot stood upon the giddy verge, gnawing her very fingers, from the horrible dread that possessed her, that she was to see it give way and divide. Peter sat astride against the root of the tree, carefully eyeing every inch of the line ere he allowed it to pass through his hands, and every now and then pausing, hesitating, shaking his head most ominously, at certain portions of it, here and there, appeared to him of doubtful strength. Meanwhile, Charley felt himself gradually descending, and turning round at the end of the rope, by his own weight, his brave little heart beating, and his brain whirling, from the novelty and danger of his daring attempt—the scream of the young eagles sounding harshly in his ears, and growing louder and louder as he slowly neared them. He reached the slanting surface of the ledge, and found the child between two eagles. Fearing that it would be worse than hazardous to trust the hair line with the weight of the child in addition to his own, he undid it from his body. Approaching the nest, he gently lifted the crying infant from between his two screeching and somewhat pugnacious companions. The moment he had done so, the little innocent became quiet, and instantly recognising him, held out her hands and smiled and chuckled to him, at once oblivious of all her miseries.

Charley kissed his little favorite over and again, and then he proceeded to tie the rope carefully around and across her, so as to guard against all possibility of its slipping. Having accomplished this, he shouted to Peter to pull away—kissed the little Rosa once more, and then committed her to the vacant air. Nothing could equal the anxiety he endured as he beheld her slowly rising upwards. And when he beheld the mother's hand appear over the edge of the rock and snatch her from his sight, nothing could match the shout of delight which he gave. The maternal screams of joy which followed, and which came faintly down to his ears, were to him a full reward for all the terrors of his desperate enterprise. For that instant he forgot the perilous situation in which he then stood, and the risk he had to run ere he could hope to be extricated from it.—Sir Thomas Dick Lauder's Tales of the Highlands.

Jan. 16, 5841.

BIOGRAPHICAL ANNUAL.—This book, which was promised the public some time previous to the holidays, has at length come to hand, and in so worthy a style, that we think the editor Mr. Griswold, or whoever may have been the cause of the delay, will be forgiven. We esteem biography as a class of literature calculated to produce the best results; it has all the beauty of history without any of its tediousness; it is superior to fiction, as it deals in facts. It gives to those who are pursuing the 'bubble reputation,' an opportunity to see and avoid the follies of others, while at the same moment it displays to them examples of virtue and perseverance, that will give to their desires such fervor and energy as time cannot efface. The finely modded notice of the much neglected Van Schaick, does great credit to the head as well as the heart of its writer, Mr. Bloodgood. It is what we have a right to expect from one related to the deceased, by ties of companionship and affection. Professor Dean has displayed the characteristics of our old employer, he much lamented Judge Buel, in a style of simplicity and truth well suited to the subject. Any one who reads this notice will scarcely fail to become convinced of the fact so well established, that perseverance meets no obstacle which may not be overcome. Mr. Buel has given to the cause of agriculture in our country an impetus that must long be felt. There are a number of other biographies contained in this beautiful volume, which if our limits would permit, we should be glad to mention. At this time we cannot do better than recommend its purchase by our readers. We would, however, remark that we think Col. Stone, in giving an excellent outline of his father, expends rather more words in apologising for so doing, than there appears any necessity for. We discover no reason why affection should not have united with it integrity enough to give an honest as well as a warm history of the character subjected to its examination.

MARVIN, BEFORE THE YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION.—We were among those of a crowded audience who listened to the lecture a short time since at the hall of the Association; and we feel confident in saying that the same gratification we experienced was enjoyed by all who had the good fortune to be present. A kind of pride steals over us, when we think of Mr. Marvin as a townsman, and look at the path so gayly strewn with the flowers of fame, he has pursued for the last few years. His efforts for temperance, his odes and his addresses have endeared his reputation to us, and we plead guilty to the charge of being a strongly prejudiced friend. This last lecture upon the attainments of youth, was rich with thought and nervous expression—a specimen of chaste and elevated composition—and a volume of truth. The grand doctrine that experience is of little value unaccompanied with philosophic reflection was strenuously maintained, the importance of care in the selection of reading, earnestly commended, and the whole enforced by a luminous exposition of the consequences which follow in the train of inattention and neglect of those great governing principles to the student. The style of elocution was of the highest order, and without uttering a whisper that should rise for the sake of elevation, we feel bound to say in justice, that we have never been regaled to an equal extent from the same desk. There may have been a single point or two in which we differ from our friend, but we feel no disposition to bathe our pen in censure.

☞ The communication of our friend in Louisville, has been received, and we duly appreciate the spirit which dictated it. We respond to the sentiments expressed, most heartily, and we have made up our minds, some months since, to entirely remove the objection hinted. The claims heretofore made on our columns, have been met more in good nature, than of a sense of their propriety. Our friend can make such use of the fact, as he thinks proper.

AN APALLING PROSPECT.—The Montreal Transcript, says a hundred thousand American lives will be sacrificed for every hair of M'Leod's head if any harm befall him. According to this estimate, unless Mc. has a bald pate, some thousands of millions of American lives will have to be destroyed before the anger of Mr. Bull will be appeased!! What a tremendous long tail our cat has got.

The Amherst (N. H.) Farmers' Cabinet says that during the recent freshet a drove of eighty-two sheep was carried away in attempting to cross the Souhegan river, and all but eighteen drowned.

The widow of the late celebrated statesman, Charles James Fox, is still living at St. Anne's Hill, Chertsey, England. She is near her hundredth year.

Colored Voters.—Mr. Culver stated in the House, that there were about 51,000 colored inhabitants in the state. Several petitions have been presented praying a further extension of the right of suffrage to them. Should the prayer of the petitions now before the legislature be granted, some 12,500 would be voters.—Albany Atlas.

[One would suppose "the balance of power" full objectionable enough in this state, without placing it in the hands of 12,500 colored voters, of the "good, bad, and indifferent" kind. Take us as a nation, at present we appear to be fast approaching that grand climacteric of our destiny, which has been the subject of political prophecy. We once supposed that we were one of the Simon Pure democrats; but an examination of our hearts, with but an occasional squint at the times, satisfies us of our Aristocracy. We should not dare say so, if we expected an office.]

LIABILITY OF TENANTS.—In the Marine Court, on Monday, (says the N. Y. Sun,) Justice Randall charged the jury that a tenant occupying premises that were destroyed by fire was exonerated from the date thereof. This is important, if good law, as a different opinion has generally prevailed upon that subject.

☞ We are requested to say, that Mr. Buxton will in a few days repeat his lecture (which owing to adverse circumstances was thinly attended) on "Analogy out Analogised." It is certainly ingenious, and if viewed as one of the humbug of the day, it has the merit of being quite amusing.

It appears by report of the State treasurer, that there was paid to the Adjutant General and the acting Quartermaster, for the expenses of the militia, called out to the Helderbergh campaign, $21,500!

David Leavitt, esq., of Brooklyn, has subscribed $5,000 towards increasing the permanent fund of New York theological seminary.

CLAIMS UPON MEXICO.—The Secretary of State has given notice to persons having claims upon the Mexican Government to present the necessary evidence at the Department in Washington.

Intelligence.

The case of McLeod.—A general impression prevails, and we acknowledge having aided to produce it, that McLeod has been indicted and is now awaiting his trial. Immediately after the destruction of the Caroline, the grand jury of Niagara county found bills of indictment against McNab, Drew and others, but not against McLeod. He is now in confinement simply by virtue of a magistrate's mittimus, and his case will be laid before the grand jury at its next sitting. There is no doubt that an indictment will be found, and the trial will probably come on at the April term of the general sessions of Niagara county.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

THE METHODISTS.—It appears that the number of members belonging to the Wesleyan body of Methodists is now as follows: Under the care of the British and Irish Conferences, 428,729, namely—in Great Britain, 323,178; in Ireland, 27,047; in foreign stations, 78,504; under the care of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Upper Canada, (in 1840) 16,384; under the care of the American Conferences, in 1828, the date of the last returns, 692,341: total number of members; 1,137,424. The number of preachers, regular and supernumerary, was, in Great Britain, 1,078; in Ireland, (including 25 missionaries,) 159; in the foreign stations, (including assistant missionaries,) 315; in Upper Canada, 127; in the American connexion, 3,322, total number of ministers, 5,021. Grand total of members and ministers throughout the world, 1,142,465.

From Florida.—The Savannah Georgian of the 18th inst., says the steamer Newbern arrived from Pilatka brings intelligence that some five or six hundred Indians had presented themselves at the different posts a few at each, but whether to leave the country, is not known. It was also reported that an attack had been made on Fort Walker, but no particulars were given.

The National Intelligencer of Monday says:—"In conformity to usage, we learn the Senate of the United States has been summoned by the Executive to meet in this city on the 4th of March next, for the transaction of business (being of course of an Executive character, connected with the commencement of a new Administration, the formation of a new Cabinet, &c.")

A horrid occurrence took place on Christmas morning at the Roman Catholic Chapel, Francis street, Dublin. One of the planks upon which the people are accustomed to kneel, owing to the pressure of the people standing on, broke. This created an alarm, and a rush was made for the door, and so great was the crowd that more than a hundred people were thrown down and trampled upon. Three persons were killed, and several more severely injured.

New method of Perforating Glass.—The Annales des Mines says—Put a drop of spirit of turpentine on the spot where the hole is to be made, and in the middle of this drop a small piece of camphor. The hole can be then made without difficulty, by means of a well-tempered borer, or triangular file. Solid turpentine answers as well as the spirit and camphor.

Three Legacies.—A lady recently died in Massachusetts, leaving three important legacies, viz.; $500 to a Society, $500 to a congregation, and several poor relations to the community.

The Pittsfield Sun states that a young man, named Wm. Ward, while riding with a young lady named Martha Williams, in that village, on Sunday evening last, missed the road and drove off a precipice fifteen feet high on to the track of a railway. He had an arm broken and his head injured, and the young lady's ankle was broken, and a comb driven so deeply into her head that it could not be removed with the fingers. She is now in a very critical situation but is expected to recover.

A Man killed by a Bear.—A St. Albans Vt., correspondence of the Boston Mail, writes that two men John C. Clark and Jas. Owen, while chopping wood about 2 miles from St. Albans, was attacked by four large bears. Mr. Owen was squeezed to death by one of them. Mr. Clark escaped uninjured, after having despatched two weighing about 500 pounds each.—Daily Adv.

DUELLING.—The St. Augustine Herald states that Dr. Pelot, of Jacksonville, died last week of the wound he received by him in the duel fought with Mr. Babcock, a lawyer from New York, a short time since.—They met at Cumberland Island—duelling rifles—half ounce balls—distance 35 yards. All the business, we understand, was from the commencement conducted according to the established usage.

Whaling in the Pacific.—The whale ships alone in the Pacific ocean number 460 sail, amounting to nearly 300,000 tons and manned by 12,000 seamen. Not less than $12,000,000 of capital has been invested in and actively employed by, one branch of the whale fishery alone; and in the whole trade is directly involved not less than from 50 to 70 millions of property.

GERMANY.—The reigning Duke of Brunswick, whilst out on an excursion with the King of Hanover, shot himself in the head with his own gun.

FROZEN TO DEATH.—The frozen body of Henry L. Wheeler, was found on Tuesday afternoon last, in a field belonging to Warren Chaffe, in Cambria, Niagara county.

Destructive Fire and loss of Life in Philadelphia.—At one o'clock on Saturday morning, a fire broke out in the umbrella manufactory of Wright & Brothers, 125 Market street, above Third street. The rear building, with its contents, and the upper part of the front building, were entirely destroyed. The loss in goods is estimated at one hundred thousand dollars, which is only partially covered by insurance. No. 123 occupied by Wilmer & Brothers as a fancy goods store, and No. 127, by Wood & Abbot, dry goods dealers, were considerably damaged, with a loss of merchandise in the premises of about thirty thousand dollars, which is covered by insurance. Thomas R. Evans, shoemaker, No. 129, had about $200 worth of goods damaged by water. Several other buildings were slightly injured.

About two hours after the commencement of the fire the wall fell. Oscar Douglas, aged 27, and Mark S. Rink, aged 22, two firemen, were killed, and David Orick, also a fireman so severely injured that he is not expected to survive.

Erasing an endorsement is Forgery.—The supreme Court of Ohio decided, recently that an endorsement on a note purporting that a partial payment had been made, and which endorsement was written by the maker in the presence, with the concurrence, and by the direction of the payee, is a receipt, the alteration of erasure of which by the payee will be forgery.

The destruction of property by the late freshet, on the Lehigh coal and Navigation company's works, appears by correct account, to be between two and three hundred thousand dollars.

A heavy draft.—We are told in several of our exchange papers, that Mr. Van Buren has not drawn one farthing of his salary since he was installed, and intends to set in his bill on the 4th of March next for $190,000

The legislature of Kentucky have refused to repeal the law prohibiting the importation of slaves into that state.

The whole number of newspapers published in Great Britain in 1840 was 519—London 125, provincial 240, Scotch 64, Irish 90

A dancing master was taken up in Natchez, recently, for robbing a fellow boarder. He said he commenced cheating a printer, and after that, every thing rascally seemed to come easy to him.

Cream may be frozen by simply putting it into a glass vessel, and then placing the whole in an old bachelor's bosom.—Detroit Free Press.

MARRIED.

On Tuesday evening, by J. N. Wyckoff D. D., Mr. G. C. Davidson, to Miss E. Humphrey, daughter of William Humphrey esq.

Last evening, by the Rev. Dr. Mayer, James A. Strickland, to Miss Eliza A. daughter of Volkert D. Jewell, both of this city.

In this city on Wednesday, the 20th inst, by the Rev. Noah Levings, Mr. Oliver Boutwell, of Troy, to Miss Phebe Ann Ogden of Albany.

At Troy, on the 26th inst., by the Rev. Dr. Beman, Mr. R. M. Pease, to Miss Abby E., daughter of Mr. Granville Slack, all of this city.

In this city, on the 21st inst., by the Rev. Dr. Sprague, Mr. Edward R. Brown, to Miss Mary A. Doyle, daughter of the late Dennis Doyle, all of this city.

BYRON AND NAPOLEON.

The Boston Courier says, that the removal of the remains of the Emperor Napoleon, from the Island of St. Helena, to Paris, by the government of France, was predicted by Lord Byron, in the subjoined extract, and is but another verification of the wonderful prescience of truly great minds :

"But where is he, the modern, mightier far.
Who, born no king, made monarchs draw his car;
Yes! where is he, the champion and the child
Of all that's great or little, wise or wild?
Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones;

Whose table, earth; whose dice were human bones?
Behold the grand result is yon lone isle,
And as thy nature urges, weep or smile,
Smile, for the fettered eagle breaks his chain,
And higher worlds than this are his again.
How must he smile, and turn to yon lone grave,
The proudest sea-mark that o'ertops the wave!
His name shall hallow the ignoble shore,
A talisman to all save him who bore.
The fleet; that sweep before the eastern blast
Shall hear their sea-boys hail it from the mast.

Can glory's lust
Touch the freed spirit of the fettered dust?
Small care hath he of what his tomb consists;
Naught if he sleeps—nor more if he exists;
He wants not this; but France shall feel the want
Of this last consolation, though so scant;
Her honor, fame, and faith, demand his bones,
To rear above a pyramid of thrones;
Or carried onward, in the battle's van.
To form, like Guesclin's* dust, her talisman,
But be it as it is, the time may come,
His name shall beat the alarm like Ziska's drum.†"

(a) A celebrated warrior, and Constable of France in the 14th century.

(b) Ziska was a General of Bohemia, and having gained many victories over the Emperor Sigismund, he was seized with the plague, and directed his skin to be tanned, after his death, and used as a drum head, to animate his soldiers in battle.

TO A GROUP OF CHILDREN.

BY R. HOWITT.

How glad, how beautiful! you steal
Our hearts into your play,
And with a sweet delusion chase
Life's weariness away.
We gaze, until we fondly deem
You thus will ever be,
A little race, distinct from us,
From man's disquiet free.

We are not light as playful winds,
Nor graceful as the flowers;
And gladness flashes from your eyes,
Whilst sorrow is in ours.
Boys! can you ever grow to men,
War's horrid game to learn?
Girls! must you lonely women be,
Their distant doom to mourn?

A blessed life, a blessed lot,
Should yours be evermore;
The light which gathers round you now,
You send far on before.
Coloured from this your future life
In fancy is as fair;
Alas, alas! ye know it not—
Glad pilgrims unto care.

ANOTHER YEAR.

Another year is gone, and numbered
To mingle with eternity—
Another year with all its record,
Of good or ill my soul for thee.

How is it, say thou trembling spirit;
Speaks conscience in approving tone?
Or with a voice above the thunder,
Condemning in the year that's flown,

How is it, say that retrospection,
Comes back the season sweet to thee—
In cheering spots of recollection,
Green islands on a summer sea.

How is it, say hath wisdom led thee,
In all the ways the step hath gone,
Or hath the Syren's song of pleasure,
Led thee still to lead thee on.

Then think how swift the hours are winging,
That measures out life's narrow span,
And then how great that little moment,
Its last importance unto man.

Eternity, the shore we'er nearing,
And Heaven's unfading joys the prize,
With harps of gold and crowns of glory,
Forever in the upper skies. J. M. L.

A MOTHER.

There's music in a mother's voice,
More sweet than breezes sighing;
There's kindness in a mother's glance,
Too pure for ever dying.

There's love within a mother's breast
So deep, 'tis still o'erflowing;
And care for those she calls her own,
That's ever overgrowing.

There's anguish in a mother's tear,
When farewell fondly taking,
That so the heart of pity moves
It scarcely keeps from breaking.

And when a mother kneels to Heaven,
And for her child is praying,
Oh! who can half the fervor tell;
That burns in all she's saying?

A mother! how her tender arts
Can soothe the breath of sadness,
And through the gloom of life once more
Bid shine the sun of gladness.

A mother! when like evening's star,
Her course has ceased before us,
From higher worlds regards us still,
And watches fondly o'er us.

KISSING.

AIR—"Good morrow to your nightcap."

"Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk,
And dinna be sae rude to me,
As kiss me sae before folk.
"It wadna gie me meikle pain,
Gin we were seen and heard by name,
'To tak' a kiss, or grant you aye;
But, gude sake! no before folk.
Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk,
Whate'er ye do, when out o' view,
Be cautious aye before folk.

"Consider, lad, how folk will crack,
And what a great affair they'll mak'
O' naething but a simple smack,
That's gien or taen before folk.
Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk:
Nor gie the tongue o' auld or young
Occasion to come o'er folk.

"It's no through hatred o' a kiss,
That I sae plainly tell you this.
But, loch; I tak' it sair amiss
To be so teased before folk,
Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk;
When we'er alane ye may tak aye,
But fient a nane before folk.

"I'm sure wi' you I've been as free
As any modest lass should be;
But yet, it doesna do to see
Sic freedom used before folk.

Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk;
I'll ne'er submit again to it—
So mind you that—before folk.

"Ye tell me that my face is fair;
It may be sae—I dinna care—
But ne'er again gar't blush so sair
As ye hae done before folk,
Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk:
Nor heat my cheeks wi' your mad freaks,
But ay be dounce before folk.

"Ye tell me that my lips are sweet,
Sic tales, I doubt, are a' deceit;
At any rate, it's hardly meet
To prie their sweets before folk.
Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk;
Gin that's the case, there's time and place,
But surely no before folk.

"But gin ye really do insist
That I should suffer to be kissed,
Gae, get a license frae the priest,
And mak' me yours before folk.
Behave yourself before folk,
Behave yourself before folk:
And when we'er ane, baith flesh and bane,
Ye may tak' ten—before folk."

MASONIC.

ORATION.

Masonry had its origin in an early age, when architecture was less known than at present, and when those skilled in it, formed a more distinct and important class of society, than they now do. Assembled in vast numbers whilst rearing the stupendous edifices of antiquity they became by the pursuit of one common object, more closely united as individuals. A knowledge of their own art, in which each part is dependent on others, for beauty, symmetry and strength, applied to man in his relations to his fellow men, suggested the plan of our present society, and induced the attempt to rear a moral edifice, in which the weak and apparently discordant parts, should be united in one strong and beautiful whole. To accomplish this, they blended with their mechanical pursuits, the cultivation of the most sublime morality, and the practice, of what are now esteemed, the most exalted christian virtues. They were then, as they now are, possessed of secrets that were necessarily shrouded from the world; and rendered their meetings mysterious to the uninitiated.—Curiosity induced some, and a discovery of the beneficial effects of the institution, led others, who were not operative Masons, to seek admission into the society, until the limits that originally circumscribed it were entirely passed, the individual pursuits of its members wholly disregarded, the practice of its moral virtues only required, and speculative masonry, as it now exists, and has existed for ages, was established.

Antiquity has always been the boast of every human institution; and when united with the continued affection of its members, has been, and ever must be regarded, as evidence of inherent excellence, and of the basis on which it has been established. This is true, as well of civil, as religious institutions. Governments that have long withstood the assaults of foreign and domestic violence, that remain unsubdued by war, and unshaken by faction, are regarded with reverence, and studied with attention. We discover in their organization some peculiar merit, and thus bind their subjects together, and enables them to withstand the influence of time, and the violence of man's ever mutable passions.

We will not now attempt to ascertain, whether Solomon, or any other man is entitled to the appellation of founder. It cannot be expected that we will point to the page of history, and shew when and where the society commenced. Had it been organized for political purposes, used as the means of overturning governments, arming itself in warlike panoply, and hedding the blood of its opponents; history would have shewn its rise and progress. But as instead of surrounding itself with terrors, exhibiting the cruelty of religious fanaticism, or the ensanguined glory of martial achievement, we find it in the still and silent walks of private life, operating on man individually, and seeking alone his moral perfection; we should search in vain through the blood stained pages of ancient history, for any notice of its existence. Let us then rest satisfied with the latest date, that even the enemies of the society may be pleased to assign it; and we shall have more of antiquity to boast, than any other institution now in existence. The breath of the destroyer has swept from the earth generation after generation of mankind, empires have risen, flourished, fallen and been forgotten; the monuments of human wisdom, greatness, and power, vainly deemed imperishable; have crumbled into dust, under the mouldering hand of time, whilst Masonry still survives, her splendor, her usefulness, and the number of her votaries, still undiminished. Nor has persecution conquered the affections of her followers. Tho' threatened by the imperial edict of an Alexander, openly assailed by a cruel and bloody Ferdinand, besieged by ignorance and superstition; the battlements of her fortress still rear themselves proudly to view, and her banner floats broadly on the breeze.

The temple of Masonry is open to all who approach its portals with proper recommendations. There is here no distinction made, in country, language, manners or religion. The Laplander and Hotentot, the Indian and Parisian, the Christian and Mahomedan, may each find ready entrance; and participate freely, in the rites, ceremonies, enjoyments, benefits, and duties common to all. The barriers that divide nation from nation, the distinctions that obtain in different grades of civilization, the antipathies engendered by religious differences, must all be disregarded in a society that professes to view the whole species as one family, descended from the same stock, enjoying the same rights, owing the same duties, subject to the same calamities, liable to the same errors, and advancing to the same common end. There are duties which man owes to his fellow man, of whatever kindred or tongue he may be; and which our common creator alike requires of all. To ensure the discharge of these duties, to break down the prejudices common to the human mind and soften our feelings toward each other; Masonry was originally established, without reference to any particular faith, and therefore cannot now peremptorily require any other religious qualification than belief in a God. Let none be startled at this declaration, or suppose there is any thing in the tenets of the society, inimical to christianity, or that encourages a disbelief in that religion. What it leaves every member free in the profession of any faith subordinate to the belief in a Deity, its precepts and injunctions have an intimate connexion with the Holy Scriptures, and foster and cherish the feeling, that are there particularly recommended. But why should I say more, when the presence of our reverend brethren on this occasion, should satisfy even the scrupulous.

But the principles of the society deserve and demand a more attentive consideration.

Brotherly love and charity are the two main pillars, on which the whole fabric rests. Had a selection been made from the moral virtues inculcated by the word of God, of such as should form the basis of an institution established for the security of man's happiness here; none could have been found so eminently calculated to attain the end, as brotherly love and charity.

Man is not formed by nature to exist in a separate and isolated state, living by and for himself alone; but is, and must be dependent, on the affections of others, on their sympathy in the hour of distress, and their rejoicing in his prosperity, for half his happiness here below. The path we have to tread through life, is rough and barren of enjoyment; but Providence has kindly planted here and there a flower, whose beauty and fragrance, cheer us onward in the way. Brotherly love is one of the brightest and richest colors. By a wise organization of the human mind, its joys are increased, and its sorrows diminished by participation. Does an occasion of unusual or unexpected rejoicing occur? We instantly hasten to him, whom nature by a congeniality of feeling and sentiment, has marked for our brother, and in the gladness that brightens his countenance find our joy redoubled. But if our fortunes shall be overcast with gloom; if the world shall frown on us in adversity, the sympathizing pity that beams from the eye of fraternal love, shall heal our wounded spirits, and animate us to renewed exertion, by the consciousness that our lives, our happiness, and our welfare still interest those who are connected with us, by the ties of blood, or the bonds of the Masonic union. The want of this sympathy, has borne down many, whose spirits were of the noblest cast, and who were fitted to walk this earth proudly erect, dispensing joy and happiness around them; and if Masonry has saved one such, from the gloom of despair, or the darkness of the grave, her name should be hallowed, now, and forever.

But charity is the most brilliant jewel with which

Masonry adorns herself. This stands pre-eminent among the virtues that God in his holy word, calls on man practice. It assimilates him more nearly to that perfection possessed only by the Deity, and united with faith, qualifies him for admission into that happy throng, that surrounds the throne of the Eternal God. What sight can man behold, so calculated to excite his admiration and elevate his opinion of his species, as a fellow being, blessed with all his largest wishes can embrace, overcoming all temptation to sensual indulgence; seeking those who are poor, distressed and broken-hearted; dispensing liberally of the abundance committed to his care; raising up those whom misfortune has prostrated, and binding up the wounds an unkind world has made. Or by what does man attain so nearly to moral perfection, as by regarding the faults errors and imprudences of his fellow man with pity and charity, casting over them a veil, to screen them from public gaze; remembering that all are liable to error, and all need from God, the exercise of his attribute of mercy. In vain should I descant on the beauty of this ennobling virtue, or point to the high destiny of its unostentatious follower, since it has employed the pen of inspiration, and its value has been fixed by the impress of the Almighty's seal. The necessity of practising it, is visible every day. We are all subject to reverses and casualties, and even the most prudent, may by a continued series of misfortunes be reduced from affluence, to the greatest depth of indigence. No one can be exempt from the influence of those changes that are daily taking place, and when in the varying scenes of life, he who a little before, was in the enjoyment of ease, comfort and contentment, shall be overtaken by poverty, plunged in distress, and oppressed by afflictions almost beyond his endurance; he must seek relief in the pitying eye outstretched hand of "Heaven-born charity." And man has been betrayed into errors and faults, he will find claimors raised against him by the world that would drive him to despair, but for the interference of angelic charity, who soothes his troubled spirits, and sweetly wins him back to the path of virtue.

Do misfortunes befall a brother of our order? Charity that might be slow in advancing to his relief, is roused by Masonry, and urged to a prompt and effectual discharge of her duty. His brethren freely and cheerfully contribute the assistance that his necessities require, and their abilities admit. He now tries the brotherly love that others have professed for him, and finds himself borne by it above the gloom that surrounded him, and enjoys the bright prospect of better, and happier days.

Has a deceased brother left behind him a distressed family? Masonry will seek them out in the hovel to which they have retired, to conceal their sufferings from the world, and bring charity with her, will gladden the lowly spot with their presence, wiping the tear from the widow's eye, consoling and sustaining the bereaved orphan.

Has a brother committed a fault? It will not be blazoned to the world, for its harsh and clamorous censure; but will receive the secret, gentle, but no less effectual strictures of the brethren; and thus may a fellow man be saved from utter ruin and desolation. This is the charity of masonry—this is the charity of christianity.

Beside these grand distinguishing characteristics, masonry has other moral features, that must please the philanthropist, and command the respect of mankind. Whilst she in an especial manner requires the discharge of duties between the brethren, she forgets not those that each individual owes to himself, and the country in which he lives. It is therefore necessary, that each brother shall "so demean himself, as to bring no disgrace on the fraternity at large;" that in all his relations with other men, he preserves his integrity unsullied; and that through life, he continue "to square his actions by the rule of virtue."

When we consider the principles of the society, a difficulty presents itself, in overcoming the almost natural tendency of the human heart, to a contrary practice, and in binding in close union, men, whose feelings, and passions, and principles, and conduct, are so widely dissimilar. The means are most happily adapted to the end. No one can gain admission into the fraternity, to whom any brother objects, or with whom any of us are unable to associate, on terms of the most cordial friendship. No one can be admitted, until the brethren by a strict investigation, are satisfied that his character is unblemished, and that he will faithfully discharge all his masonic duties. When entrance is thus gained by the unanimous consent of the Lodge, the frequent meetings enjoined by the rules of the society, and the free interchange of feelings and sentiments, develop the qualities and dispositions of all, strengthen the bonds of friendship and interest, each in the welfare of mass, firmly resisting the boisterous waves of life's tempestuous sea. But if any one after admission, shall by crime or misconduct, show himself unworthy of enjoying the high privileges of membership, he may be expelled, with infamy more indelible than results from the sentence of the law; and it becomes at once the privilege and duty of all, to preserve the character of the whole body, by lopping off the offending member. These regulations must of necessity exist, where the duties are reciprocal, and can only be terminated by death or expulsion; or the affections of all would be quickly alienated from a society where they were bound to assume, or constantly to sustain the relation, of brother, with persons they could not respect as individuals.

Whilst Masonry is pursuing its noiseless course, offering "peace on earth, and good will to men," it is strange that it should be opposed by men, whose known character, gives to their opposition too imposing an appearance, to be entirely disregarded. That despots, who see danger in every secret meeting, where their emissaries cannot gain admission, should endeavor by threats, and by actual death, to crush the society, is not astonishing; but that it should be opposed by any in this enlightened country, can proceed only from a misconception of its tendencies.

Some more suspicious than well informed, suppose our secret meetings, are used for political purposes. This is not the case. The only single injunction that has any relation to our political duties, is that we be quiet and peaceable citizens, paying proper obedience to the government under which we live. Our Lodges are not places, where the disturber of the public peace, and the plotter against government, can find willing ears into which he can insinuate his poison. Party spirit has no place here. Though the world without may be torn with political faction and strife, though son be arrayed against father, and brother against brother, and the wild roar of discord be heard, even to the walls of the lodge; within, all is peace and quietness, and tranquility. It is true, that those who display talents there, whose deportment is such as to create respect and win esteem, must and will possess influence; and it is equally true, that the attachment there existing between the brethren, will extend itself to all their social relations; but if any, through the medium of that friendship, should endeavor to involve his brethren in political cabal, he would not only find disappointment in the attempt, but would quickly lose the influence by which he hoped to succeed.

Many really good men suppose there is some concealed evil in an institution, wheresome of its members depart so far in practice, from the principles they publicly confess. But is it candid thus to judge of a society, from the fault and errors of particular members? Would it not shock the reason and feelings of every person in this assembly, to pronounce christianity an imposture, or assert there is any thing in the system, to make a man vicious? And yet if you subject it to this test, and decide on its merits, by the conduct of some of its professors, it is liable to the same objection; for I appeal to any experienced christian here present, to say, whether, he has not seen, even at the communion table of his Savior, some, who required the utmost stretch of charity, to be judged worthy of such exalted distinction. Away then with an objection that applies equally to the religion established by Heaven, and to our society of human origin, and which must apply to every moral institution, as long as man remains the fallible and erring creature that God has made him.

It has been urged, that if the society is possessed of any knowledge, or any secret that would be beneficial to mankind, it should be revealed. Surely we might be permitted to enjoy the privilege accorded to all, from the inventor of harmless medical compounds, to the mighty statesman, who wields the destiny of nations. The very existence of the order, and the only security for beneficial results, depends on the inviolable preservation of these secrets. That they are harmless, no one can doubt, that they are of importance to ourselves, we know and assert; and that they will never be disclosed to the world, we are entirely confident.

It has been usual to point to the names of Washington, and other illustrious men, inscribed on the roll of masonry; as an answer to all objections, and proving conclusively, that the society deserves general approbation; and I confess I cannot understand how any American, whether he be a christian or not, can distrust the moral or political tendency of an institution, that has been in an especial manner, patronised by the "father of his country." But if any such then be here, we ask him to apply to the only remaining source of information, to satisfy himself by reading the volumes published on this subject, by the conversation of enlightened masons, and by the closest examination of the lives and conduct of those, who are acknowledged by all, most perfectly to perform all their masonic duties. To a judgment thus formed, we are entirely willing to submit, and with the utmost confidence, that it will be favorable to masonry.

We feel assured, that when thus understood, it will become a favorite with all classes. It will be so with the benevolent man, because its design like his, is to render the ills of life more supportable, to parry the stroke of adversity, or heal the wound it inflicts,—it will be so with the christian, because it is auxiliary to the religion he professes, and does all that human means unaided by divine influence, can do, to render man perfect as a moral being,—it will be so with men, because it is established chiefly for his moral and worldly benefit,—and it will be so with our fair friends, because its grand object, is to engrain on the hard nature of man, those principles and feelings, that are their peculiar and adorning characteristics.

VARIETY.

AN OLD CUSTOM.

In olden time, it is said that the inhabitants of a certain town in New Hampshire, consisting chiefly of Irish or Scotch presbyterians, adopted the following custom. As soon as their fields were planted and sown, their priest, accompanied by the elders, deacons and farmers, went from field to field, offering up a short prayer over each, that they might receive the fruits of their labors in a plentiful harvest. One day while engaged in this pious perambulation, they arrived at a field, where the priest stopped, took a keen eyed survey, and after some hesitation, addressed his flock to the following purport:—"My friends and brethren, it will be of no use to pray over this field till there is more manure spread upon it; for otherwise, even the prayer of a righteous man, however fervent, can not be effectual."

Squeezing of the hand.—Squeezing the hand with some persons is entirely equivalent to a declaration of love; this is truly surprising. We must take hold of a lady's hand as we should a hot potatoe; afraid to give it a squeeze lest we should burn our fingers.—Very fine, truly! Now it was our ancient custom to squeeze every hand we got in clutches, especially of a fair one; and the ladies may rest assured of this, that a man who will not squeeze their hand when he gets hold of it, does not deserve to have such a hand in his possession—and that he has a heart one hundred times smaller than the eye of a cambric needle.

A fellow in Philadelphia was summarily punished the other evening. He was following a gentleman and lady along the street and annoying them, by singing a vulgar song. A sailor walking the same direction, and observing the fellow's conduct, knooked him down, bowed to the gentleman, and passed on.

NO. 6.

Hogarth's a line of beauty considered, and a new theory advanced by the "Seven;" whereby they show how the world may become seventimes happier than it ever was before.

Start not, gentle reader, at what may seem the boldness and novelty of our declaration. We cannot so far prove recreant to the trust confided to us, as to mince matters in the least. We must tell you honestly, that the world, as yet, has known nothing of real happiness. To us however, it is given to put it on the right track. Atlas like, we have it resting upon our shoulders, and from its tendency downward, we are impressed with the conviction that it needs reform.—Cheerly we enter upon our task. But first, that we may not fall out by the way, let us have a perfect understanding, with each other;—let every switch in our mental rail roads be secured and set that, so far from running off the track, we may together roll up the incline plain of our friendly journey with even more than modern improvement rapidity.

REFORM then is our watch-word. Upon this, we shall bring all our energies to bear; and to accomplish it, we shall take the liberty to cast about us to the right hand and left—we shall poke into many a forbidden corner of this fair creation. Error and folly whenever found, must be subjected to our scrutiny and correction. What is low in the past, we shall raise up—what is too high in the present, bring to its proper level.

We respect antiquity, but not for "antiquity's sake." Like a certain nameless class of the fair ones, she even saught wedlock with happiness, and yet died in a state of "single blessedness." We love her for her honest efforts; but her wise men were not true philosophers. They could never find; as we have, the armor of Vulcan, the Panacea, the Catholicon and the Philosopher's Stone. They were ignorant of the Elements—the principles of true happiness. And without these, of what use are all the fine arts and learning of the ancients—of what use, the steam boats and rail roads—the balloon and submarine vessels of the moderns? Happiness is, after all the sine qua non of every individual—old bachelors alone excepted.—"Surely! and who can be so stupid as to deny your position, and yet who is happy?" Not too hasty, gentle reader! Follow us patiently a step or two farther, and our word for it, we shall fairly demonstrate to you that,—though there is but little of it about among the present "purse proud" generation—its elements have for a time been practically known, and that to us is left the business of fully developing them, and thus rendering the world seven times happier than it ever was before.

Hogarth! who has not heard of the immortal Hogarth! He has but just passed from the stage of existence. Still the eager, anxious throng of his admirers are gazing after him as if, with their short sight, they would penetrate the curtain that separates him from them. But what means that shout that echoes from pit to gallery—"Hogarth's line of beauty!" What means it? Ah! we have it now. This noble artist was, doubtless, the first to say that the curve or waving line was more pleasing to the eye than the straight or right line. How plain—how almost self-evident his dictum when once announced; and yet who but Hogarth would er-er have discovered the fact on which so much of our happiness depends? Unlike the majority of those who preceded him, he studied nature. He saw that she was consistent with herself—that the whole, harmonised with each part—each part with the whole.—He also saw that she delights in curves, and thence concluded that the eye of man—her noblest production—was so constructed as to receive its highest pleasure from the observation of curves and circles and wavering lines.

How beautiful his reasoning, and how legitimate his conclusion, allowing the correctness of his premises! and this, we are confident, the slightest observer cannot deny. Whether we contemplate the vast concave of heaven, or the bold and beautiful arches of a nutshell. Whether we follow along the graceful windings of the majestic river, or the equally delightful ones of a pumpkin vine—whether we ascend to the mountain top, or go down into the deepest well.—Every where, above, below, around us, nature starts to view, rich in all the delicate pencilings of "Hogarth's line of beauty." "But why then is not man as completely happy now, as he ever can be?"

Student, merchant, mechanic and lamp-lighter yours is not the shepherd's lot. You see—you know nothing of nature arrayed in her glory. Surrounded with the rubbish of your own imperfect combinations, her volume is to you a dead letter. But despair not. You observe her predilections for rotundity. You see that happiness is measured out to man, in proportion as it abounds. Take your hint from these facts. Suffer not so important a lesson to be lost upon you. Abandon at once the square and "square rule" and take to circles. Instead of surrounding yourselves with sharp corners and obtuse angles, let every thing that comes from your hand bear the impress of rotundity. Never go straight to the object you would attain. Take a zig zag course. True! you will be a little longer in securing it, but think of the happiness that is to follow. It will be increased seven fold, and sex, you know, is the acme of perfection.

Patient reader, having now, as we conceive, fully redeemed our promise, we would take a friendly leave of you by throwing out a few suggestions as to the practical application of our theory. Are you a legislator, ambitious of an imperishable name, make laws at once that hereafter all public works—such as railroads, canals and rivers—shall consist of a concatenated series of consecutive circles. See to it, however, that in doing this, you do not cause some of our majestic rivers to run up hill. Are you a seafaring man, adapt your vessel to the model of those of our dutch ancestors. Let them be a perfect circle. You may not sail quite as fast you now do, but, as the saying is, you will "go on swimmingly." Depend upon it your comforts will be increased. Are you a lean, hungry, snarling, snappish specimen of humanity, court the society of our aldermen. A single glance at their fair round proportion, will dissipate your bile, and make you love yourself and all your kind. Are you a legal gentleman, abandon your straight forward course with your client. Lead him about in a mazy round of circles. He will be mystified and amused, you made happy—provided he has enough of the "where-with-all." Are you a parent, blessed with a mischievous lazy son, make yourself and your neighbor happy, and him smart by giving him a yard or two of the waving line. And last though not least, should our noble theory receive the honor of a perusal from the fairer portion of creation, to them we would say, increase your prospects for a "favorable hit," by drawing around that delicate spot of rouge on either cheek, seven concentric circles, and your conquests will be complete.

Thus we might run through all the occupations and professions in which our race are engaged, and show how, in each, the pleasures of its duties would be enhanced by the introduction of the circle; but as the ingenious mind needs nothing more than a fair start on the right track, we leave this hasty out-line with the world. If it has discrimination enough to see its consistency and usefulness, well and good. If not, rest the evil upon its own head. Our skirts at least are clean.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Man was made for society. The dungeon inspires a chill but little inferior to that of death, and hopeless solitude is sublimely terrible. The savage derives enjoyment from the reflection that he is not alone, and the congregated brutes demonstrate the fact, that they even were formed for society. In order to preserve the social compact and enjoy its benefits it is necessary to establish laws and regulations by which it must be governed. Every member of the community, must yield up some of his natural rights for the general good and the collective body has the power and is bound to take measures to protect and defend itself. And when the compact has once been formed, when the government becomes established, and can exert itself with energy, every individual, however humble he may be, can claim protection, and feel himself secure. All have recognized the right which man possesses of defending himself. It is a law of his nature to protect himself and family, and not only this, he is bound to render assistance even to the stranger. But we cannot argue from this that it is right for a community of men to visit the criminal with capital punishment, for though society may be treated, in many respects, as an individual; yet it possesses not the particular characteristic that gives to the individual his only right of defence. It is not called upon to act at the moment, for that would be the destruction of all Law and Society, and mobocracy and lynching would be the order of the day, while the individual's only excuse for taking the life of the assassin that assaults him is, that should he wait for the Law it would be too late.—The fatal deed would be accomplished and justice might never overtake the criminal. Again, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, exclaims the advocate for capital punishment, as if that, being taken from scripture, would silence every objection; but where we ask, is the justice of the law of retaliation. Is the life of the poor, debased and inhuman wretch who murders the innocent and noble, to be put in comparison with that of his victim? No! and well did the sagacious Solon decree that the man who put out the eye of an one eyed man should lose both of his; and further, shall we steal of the thief and swear false against the perjurer, or, burn the house of him who has committed arson? All perceive the folly of such a course, yet it is the Law of retaliation, and we might as well apply it to those as to murder. The object of the criminal Law is not that of expiation, it seeks not revenge, nor is justice as powerful an attribute as mercy; its aim is to prevent crime, either by reforming the criminal, or deterring others from the commission of the same offence, and the great question would seem to be, how can this be best accomplished. Shall we execute the murderer, or shall we inflict some milder punishment? If we execute, there is little chance of reform; and the prevention of crime, then would seem to be the only thing in its favor. We are inclined to think that it is not the severity, but certainty of punishment that prevents crime. The criminal looks not at the few who suffer the penalty but the many who go clear. He therefore boldly launches into crime, and if perchance the Law does reach him he feels that he has fallen a sacrifice, and attributes it to his ill fortune. Let the punishment be mild, and inflict it invariably. Then the community would feel no sympathy. Jurors would not forget their oaths and clear the guilty, nor would the Judges recommend the criminal to the mercy of the executive. We should not hear of the annual commission of eighteen murders in one city, nor would petition, after petition, go up to pardon the criminal, or commute his punishment.

MISCELLANY.

TEARS.

There is a sacredness in tears. They are not the mark of weakness but of power. They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues. They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition of unspeakable love. If there were wanting any argument to prove, that man is not mortal, I would look for it in the strong conclusive emotion of the breast, when the soul has been deeply agitated, when the fountains of feeling are rising, and tears are gushing forth in crystal streams. Oh, speak not harshly of the stricken one—weeping in silence. Break not the solemnity by rude laughter, or intrusive footsteps.—Despise not woman's tears—they are what make her an angel. Scoff not if the stern heart of manhood is sometimes melted to tears of sympathy—they are what help to elevate him above the brute. I love to see the tears of affection. They are painful tokens, but still most holy. There is a pleasure in tears—an awful pleasure! If there were none on earth to shed a tear for me, I should be loth to live; and if not one might weep over my grave, I could never die in peace.

Some things are much easier than others. A young man who has recently taken a wife, says he did not find it half so hard to get married as he did to buy the furniture.

The Lancaster Gazette offers a new remedy for the tooth-ache, which is, to boil the head and shake the bones out.

ANECDOTE.

Every body recollects the story about Sam Rodgers, the poet and punster, being announced, at a party in Paris, as Mons. le Mort, by a servant who mistook him for Tom Moore. We heard a gentleman tell a story of himself some years ago, quite as good.

He arrived in Paris at noon one day, in the year 18—: he found all his countrymen prepared to attend a splendid party at Versailles; they were loud in expressing their regrets that he could not accompany them; they were very sorry—but the thing was impossible—full court dresses alone where admissible, and to obtain one then—'twas vain to think of it. He listened patiently—told them to leave him to himself—he was sure he could find amusement some where.

No sooner were they gone, than he began to dress, and in an hour, he was on the road to Versailles, fully equipt, blue coat, white vest, nankeen pantaloons. At the door of the splendid mansion, in which the company were assembled, his further progress was opposed by a servant whose livery was far more showy than his own costume. He affected the utmost astonishment at the interruption, and would have again passed on. The servant pointed to his dress, and by word and sign, signified that it was not comme il faut, and he must retire. "Dress—dress," exclaimed the traveller, "not pass not enter—why it is the same dress that is worn in the General Court at Boston." No sooner were the words uttered, than the doors flew open, and the obsequious valet "booming and booming" preceded him, and with a loud voice announced, Mons. le General Court, de Boston; to the infinite amazement of the Americans in the group, and the exceeding delight of the new made General.

THE LEGENDARY.

NAPOLEON'S THREE WARNINGS.

The celebrated Fouché, Duke of Otranto, was retained but a short time, it is well known, in the service of the Bourbons, after their restoration to the throne of France. He retired to the town of Aix, in Provence, and there lived in affluent ease upon the gains of his long and busy career. Curiosity attracted many visitors around this remarkable man, and he was habitually free in communicating his reminiscences of the great events which it had been his lot to witness. On one occasion the company assembled in his saloon heard from his lips the following story.

By degrees, as Napoleon assumed the power and authority of a king, every thing about him, even in the days of the consulate, began to wear a court-like appearance. All the old monarchical habitudes were revived one by one. Among other revivals of this kind, the custom of attending mass previous to the hour of audience, was restored by Bonaparte, and he himself was punctual in his appearances at the chapel of Saint Cloud on such occasions. Nothing could be more mundane than the mode of performing these religious services. The actresses of the opera were the choirists, and great crowds of busy talkative people were in the habit of frequenting the gallery of the chapel, from the windows of which the First Consul and Josephine could be seen, with their suites and friends. The whole formed merely a daily exhibition of the consular court to the people.

At one particular time the punctuality of Bonaparte in his attendance on mass was rather distressing to his wife. The quick and jealous Josephine had discovered that the eye of her husband was too much directed to a window in the gallery, where there regularly appeared the form and face of a young girl of uncommon beauty. The chestnut tresses, brilliant eyes, and graceful figure of this personage, caused the more uneasiness to the Consul's wife, as the stranger's glances were bent not less upon Bonaparte than his were upon her. "Who is that young girl?" said Josephine one day at the close of the service; "what can she seek from the First Consul? I observed her to drop a billet just now at his feet. He picked it up; I saw him." No one could tell Josephine who the object of her notice precisely was, though there were some who declared her to be an emigrant lately returned, and one who probably was desirous of the intervention of the First Consul in favor of her family. With such guesses as this, the Consul's wife was obliged to rest satisfied for the time.

After the audience of that same day had passed, Bonaparte expressed a wish for a drive in the park, and accordingly went out, attended by his wife, his brother Joseph, Duroc, Cambaceres, and Hortense Beauharnois, wife of Louis Bonaparte. The King of Prussia had just presented Napoleon with a superb set of horses, four in number, and these were harnessed to an open chariot for the party. The Consul took it into his head to drive in person, and mounted into the coachman's place. The chariot set off, but just as it was turning into the park, it went crash against a stone at the gate, and the First Consul was thrown to the ground. He attempted to rise, but again fell prostrate in a stunned or insensible condition. Meanwhile, the horses sprung forward with the chariot, and were only stopped when Duroc, at the risk of his life, threw himself out and seized the loose reins. Josephine was taken out in a swooning state. The rest of the party speedily returned to the First Consul, and carried him back to his apartments. On recovering his senses fully, the first thing which he did was to put his hand into his pocket and pull out the slip of paper dropped at his feet in the chapel. Leaning over his shoulder, Josephine read upon it these words—"Do not drive out in your carriage to-day."

"This can have no allusion to our late accident," said Bonaparte. "No one could foresee that I was to play the part of a coachman to-day, or that I should be awkward enough to drive against a stone. Go Duroc, and examine the chariot."

Duroc obeyed. Soon after he returned very pale, and took the First Consul aside. "Citizen-Consul," said he, "had you not struck the stone and stopped our drive, we had all been lost!" "How so?" was the reply. "There was in the carriage, concealed behind the back seat, a bomb—a real, massive bomb, charged with ragged pieces of iron, and with a slow match attached to it—kindled! Things had been so arranged, that in a quarter of an hour, we should have been scattered among the trees of the park of Saint Cloud. Fouché must be told of this—Dubois must be warned!" "Not a word to them!" replied Bonaparte; "the knowledge of one plot but engenders a second. Let Josephine remain ignorant of the danger she has escaped. Hortense, Joseph, Cambaceres—tell none of them; and let the government journals say not a word about my fall."

The First Consul was then silent for some time. "Duroc," you will come to-morrow to mass in the chapel, and examine with attention a young girl whom I shall point out to you. She will occupy the fourth window in the gallery on the right; follow her home, or cause her to be followed, and bring me intelligence of her name, her abode, and her circumstances. It will be better to do this yourself; I would not have the police to interfere. Have you taken care of the bomb and removed it?" "I have, Citizen-Consul." Come, then let us again drive in the park," said Bonaparte. The drive was resumed, but on this occasion the coachman was allowed to fulfil his own duties.

On the morrow, the eyes of more than one person were turned to the window in the gallery. But the jealous Josephine sought in vain for the elegant figure of the young girl. She was not there. The impatient First Consul, with his confident Duroc, were greatly annoyed at her non-appearance, and small was the attention paid by them to the service that day. Their anxiety was fruitless. The girl was seen at mass no more.

The summers of Napoleon were chiefly spent at Malmaison, the winters at Saint Cloud and the Tuileries. Winter had come on, and the First Consul had been holding court in the great apartments of the last of these palaces. It was the third of the month, which the republicans well called nirose, and, in the evening, Bonaparte entered his carriage to go to the opera, accompanied by his aid-de-camp Lauriston, the Generals Lannes and Benthier. The vehicle was about to start, when a female, wrapped in a black mantle, rushed out upon the Place Carrousel, made her way into the middle of the guards about to accompany Napoleon, and held forth a paper to the latter, crying, "Citizen-Consul! Citizen-Consul! read—read!" Bonaparte, with that smile which Bourrienne describes as so irresistible, saluted the petitioner, and stretched out his hand for the missive. "A petition, Madam?" said he inquiringly; and then continued, "Fear nothing; I shall peruse it, and see justice done." "Citizen Consul!" cried the woman, imploringly joining her hands. What she would have further said was lost. The coachman, who, it was afterward said, was intoxicated, gave the lash to his horses, and they sprang off with the speed of lightning. The First Consul, throwing into his hat the paper he had received, remarked to his companions, "I could not well see her figure, but I think the poor woman is young."

"The carriage dashed rapidly along. It was but issuing from the street of Saint Nicholas, when a frightful detonation was heard, mingling with and followed by the crash of broken windows, and the cries of the injured passers-by. The infernal machine had exploded? Uninjured, the carriage of the Consul and its inmates were whirled with undiminished rapidity to the opera. Bonaparte entered his box with serene brow and unruffled deportment. He saluted, as usual, the assembled spectators, to whom the news of the explosion came with all the speed which rumor exercises upon such occasions. All were stunned and stupefied: Bonaparte was only perfectly calm. He stood with crossed arms, listening attentively to the oratorio of Haydn, which was executed on that evening. Suddenly, however, he remembered the paper put into his hands. He took it out, and read these lines: "In the name of heaven, Citizen Consul, do not go to the opera to-night, or, if you do go, pass not through the street Saint Nicholas!" The warning came in some respects too late.

On reading these words, the Consul chanced to raise his eyes. Exactly opposite to him, in a box in the third tier, sat the young girl of the chapel of Saint Cloud, who, with joined hands, seemed to utter prayers of gratitude for the escape which had taken place. Her head had no covering but her flowing and beautiful chestnut hair, and her person was wrapped in a dark mantle, which the Consul recognised as identical with that worn by the woman who had delivered the paper to him at the carriage door. "Go," said he quietly but quickly to Lannes; "go to the box exactly opposite to us, on the third tier. You will find a young girl in a black mantle. Bring her to the Tuileries: I must see her, and without delay." Bonaparte spoke thus without raising his eyes, but, to make Lannes certain of the person, he took the general's arm, and said, pointing upwards, "See there—look!"

Bonaparte stopped suddenly. The girl was gone: no black mantle was to be seen. Annoyed at this beyond measure, he hurriedly sent off Lannes to intercept her. It was in vain. The box-keeper had seen such an individual, but knew nothing about her. Bonaparte applied to Fouché and Dubois; but all the zeal of these functionaries failed in discovering her.

Years ran on after the explosion of the infernal machine, and the strange accompanying circumstances which tended to make the occurrence more remarkable in the eyes of Bonaparte. To the consulate succeeded the empire, and victory after victory marked the career of the great Corsican. At length the hour of change came. Allied Europe poured its troops into France, and compelled the emperor to lay down the sceptre which had been so long shaken in terror over half the civilized earth. The isle of Elbe became for a day the most remarkable spot on the globe: and, finally the resuscitated empire fell to pieces anew on the field of Waterloo.

Bonaparte was about to quit France. The moment had come for him to set foot in the bark which was to convey him to the English vessel. Friends, who had followed their fallen chief were standing by to give him a final adieu. He waved his hand to those around, and a smile was on the lip which had lately given the farewell kiss to the imperial eagle. At this instant a woman broke through the band that stood before Napoleon. She was in the prime of woman's life; not agirl, yet young enough to have retained unimpaired that beauty for which she would have been remarkable among a crowd of beauties. Her features were full of anxiety and sadness, adding interest even to her appearance at that moment. "Sire! sire!" said she, presenting a paper hurriedly; "read! read!"

She emperor took the paper presented to him, but kept his eye upon the presenter. He seemed, it may be, to feel at that instant the perfumed breeze in the park of Saint Cloud, or to hear the choristers chanting melodiously in the chapel, as he had heard them in other days. Josephine, Duroc, and all his friends, came haply before him, and among them the face which he was wont to see at the fourth window in the gallery. His eye was now on that countenance in reality, altered, yet the same. These illusory recollections were of brief duration. Napoleon shook his head and held the paper up to his eye. After perusing its contents, he took it between his hands, and tore it to pieces, scattering the fragments in the air.

"Stop, sire!" cried the woman, "follow the advice! Be warned; it is yet time!"

"No," replied he; and taking from his finger a beautiful oriental ruby, a valuable souvenir of his Egyptian campaigns, he held it out to the woman. She took it, kneeling and kissing the hand which presented it. Turning her head, Napoleon then stepped into the boat, which waited to take him to the vessel. Not long afterward, he was pining on the rock of St. Helena.

Thus, of three warnings, two were useless because neglected until the danger had occurred, and the third—which prognosticated the fate of Napoleon if once in the power of his adversaries—the third was rejected.

"But who was this woman, Duke of Otranto?"

"Oh," replied Fouché, "I know not with certainty. The Emperor, if he knew ultimately, seems to have kept the secret."

All that is known respecting the matter is, that a female, related to Saint Regent, one of the authors of the explosion of the street Saint Nicholas, died at the hospital of Hotel-Dieu, in 1837, and that around her neck was suspended, by a silk ribbon, the exquisite oriental ruby of Napoleon.

SCARCITY OF BOOKS IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

The Romans wrote these Books which they wished to endure, either on parchment, vellum or paper, made of the Egyptians Papyrus. The latter, being the cheapest, was most commonly used. But after the Saracens conquered Egypt, in the seventh century, the communication between that country and the people settled in Italy, and in other parts of Europe, was almost entirely obstructed, and the Papyrus was no longer in use amongst them. They were, therefore, obliged, on that account, to write their books on parchment, or vellum; and, as the price of that was high, books became extremely rare, and of great value.—We may judge of the scarcity of the materials for writing from one circumstance: there still remains several MSS. of the eighth, ninth, tenth, and following centuries, written on parchment, from which former writing, had been erased, in order to substitute a new composition, perhaps not worth a cent. In this manner, it is not improbable, that many valuable books of the ancients perished through the ignorance of the monks and others, who were not acquainted with their real worth. A volume of Livy, Virgil, Tacitus, or other good author, might have been erased to make room for the legendary account of a pretended Saint, some account of a Tournament, or other worthless Tale.—Montfaucon affirms; that the greater part of the MSS. which he had seen (those of a later date excepted,) were written on parchment, from which some former writing had been erased. Many of these are to be seen at the Radcliff Library, Oxford. It has however, been lately asserted, that a method of restoring the erased letters to that degree, that they may be legible, has been discovered by an application of Ammonia.

As the want of materials for writing is a great reason why so many of the works of the ancients have perished, it accounts likewise for the small number of MSS. previous to the eleventh century. Many circumstances prove the scarcity of books during these ages. Private persons seldom possessed any books whatever. Even monasteries of considerable note, had only one Missal. Lupus, Abbot of Ferrières, in a letter to the Pope, A. D. 855, beseeches him to lend him a copy of Cicero de Oratore, and Quintilian's Institution, "for" says he, "although we have parts of those books, there is no complete copy of them in all France." The price of books became so high, that persons of a moderate fortune could not afford to purchase them. The Countess of Anjou paid for a copy of the Homilies of Ilainon, Bishop of Abberstadt, two hundred sheep, five quarters of wheat, and the same quantity of rye and millet. Even so late as the year 1471, Louis XI, borrowed the works of Rasis, the Arabian physician, for the Faculty of Medicine, in Paris; and he not only deposited in pledge, a considerable quantity of Plate, but was obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him, as surety in a deed, under a considerable penalty to restore it.

Anthony Panormita, offered to sell an estate that he might be enabled to purchase a copy of Livy. Of this circumstance, we have a curious account, in a letter by Panormita himself to Alphonsus, King of Naples, to whom he was Secretary: "Sire—You have informed me from Florence, that the books of Livy, written in a poor hand, are to be sold, and that they ask for them 100 crowns" [a considerable sum at that time] "I beseech your majesty to cause to be sent to me this King of Books, and I will not fail to send the money for it. I beseech your prudence to let me know, whether Paggins, or I do better—he who to purchase a farm, near Florence, sells Livy; or I to purchase the Book, sells my land? Your goodness and modesty induce me to put the familiar question to you. Farewell and triumph."

History does not record the fact; but it is sincerely hoped that the King sent him Livy, without subjecting the Scholar to sell his land.

Commodore T. H. Stevens of the navy died at Washington on the 21st inst. At the age of twenty he commanded one of the vessels engaged in Perry's ever memorable battle on Lake Erie.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

MASQUERADING IN ITALY AND SICILY.

The carnival is very gay in Sicily; all classes seem at this season to relinquish every serious thought and occupation, and to give themselves up entirely to diversion. I have spent the carnival in most of the great cities in Italy, but in none have I found it more brilliant and lively than in Catania. The Italians, in general, do not understand the assuming and supporting a character so well as the English; but their masquerades have, notwithstanding, infinitely more spirit than ours. Their object is entirely different. We seek little more than to go respectably through some role we have assigned ourselves; our assemblies in mask are therefore only a species of play in patchwork. We come to see and be seen—they to see, but not to be seen; to discover the motions of others, yet conceal their own. We strive to divert others, they to satisfy themselves, and to do a thousand things which they cannot accomplish at any other season. The women are especially fond of the carnival, and as soon as one is terminated, look forward to the next with impatience. At Florence they have a not inappropriate saying: Il carnevale e il paradiso delle donne ed il purgatorio degli uomini. The carnival is the paradise of women and the purgatory of men. Indeed, I have known many a husband and lover not quite so pleased at its approach as his wife or mistress. It is nowhere carried on with greater spirit than in Catania; towards the conclusion, it becomes one incessant round of extravagance and diversion. The rich drive through the streets from morning to night, disguising themselves, their domestics, their carriages and horses, so as not to be recognizable. In this condition they form parties, drawing up in battle array, and come to fierce engagements, using sugar-plums and comfits as their missiles, sacks of which are carried in their vehicles for the purpose, and which, if they strike the face, as I often experienced, give no contemptible blow. Ladies, whilst under the sharp and incessant fire, whilst the populace also masked, and formed into a thousand ludicrous groups, eagerly pick up the scattered ammunition.

All-night there are masked balls at theatres, which are attended by all classes; nor do people of rank disdain to leave their boxes and mix in the festivities of the pleata, or pit. Throughout Italy and Sicily, all who tender their money, and are decently habited, are admitted without distinction, from the shoemaker to the prince; yet instances of improper or unbecoming conduct rarely or never take place, as the slightest breach of decorum is instantly punished by the cavaliere d'ispezione, or inspector, who is always a nobleman, and has the right of imprisoning offenders. I have seen in Florence the Grand Duke and Duchess mix without any reserve in the crowd at the Pergola or Opera House, on the night of the Gran Vegliata, when not less than six thousand people of all ranks and descriptions have been present. In Catania they are somewhat more particular; all are admitted and mix together, but there the nobility, only, enjoy the privilege of taking off their masks, or keeping them on at pleasure; an infringement of this rule would inevitably consign any non-noble to prison, for at least the remainder of the carnival.

At one of these assemblies, a genteel looking, well dressed man, invited the Princess of R—— to dance with him; fancying she recognized him as an acquaintance, she politely consented. As the gentleman reconducted her to her seat, he took the opportunity of thanking her for the high honor conferred upon him, and removing his mask, discovered to the surprised princess, that she had been dancing with her hair-dresser. The aspiring tinsler, however, paid dearly for his ambition, with a month's imprisonment, and the loss of the lady's custom.

In England, where people affect an equality, and where Sir Archy Mac Sarcasm says, the greater part of the nobles spring from sugar hogsheads, butter firkins, and wine casks, there is no instance in which the different orders thus join for a moment in any thing resembling free intercourse. We have no saturnalia of this description. We have no slaves, John Bull will sturdily reply. This peculiarity, which, it must be owned, does not say much for the urbanity of our character, arises from the real distinction of classes, lying in England, not between noble and plebeian, but in the far wider and more obvious separation of rich and poor. Which nation is, in this respect, most worthy of applause, I leave to the decision of my readers, for my own part,

"Homo sum, humani nil a me alienum puto."

THE GATHERER.

SUBELTY OF LUNATICS.

The subelty of lunatics, in avoiding the exposure of their weakness, is illustrated as follows. It is told by Erskine, in lord Mansfield's own words:—"A man of the name of Wood had indicted Dr. Monro for keeping him as a prisoner when he was sane. He underwent the most severe examination by the defendant's counsel, without exposing his complaint; but Dr. Bailie having come upon the bench by me, (lord Mansfield,) and having desired me to ask him what was become of the princess, with whom he had corresponded in cherry-juice, he showed in a moment what he was. He answered, that there was nothing at all in that; because having been (as every body knew) imprisoned in a high tower, and being debarred the use of ink, he had no other means of correspondence, but by writing his letters in cherry-juice, and throwing them into the river which surrounded the tower, where the princess received them in a boat. There existed, of course, no tower, no imprisonment, no writing in cherry-juice, no river, no boat the whole was the inveterate fancy of a morbid imagination. I immediately" continued lord Mansfield, "directed Dr. Monro to be acquitted; but this man, Wood, being a merchant in Pilpot-lane, and having been carried through the city on his way to the madhouse, indicted Dr. Monro over again for the trespass and imprisonment in London, knowing that he had lost his cause by speaking of the princess at Westminster; and such," said lord Mansfield, "is the extraordinary subelty and cunning of mad-men, that when he was cross-examined on the trial in London, as he had successfully been before, in order to expose his madness, all the ingenuity of the bar, and all the authority of the court, failed to draw from him a single syllable upon that topic, which had put an end to the indictment before, although he had still the same indelible impression upon his mind, as he had signified to those who were near him; but conscious that the delusion had occasioned his defeat at Westminster, he obstinately persisted in holding it back."—Law Magazine.

THE CHOICE OF A WIFE.—The whole secret of choosing well in matrimony may be taught in three words—EXPLORE THE CHARACTER. A violent love fit is always the result of ignorance; for there is not a daughter of Eve that has merit enough to justify a romantic love, though thousands may reasonably inspire that gentle esteem, which is infinitely better. A woman-worshipper and a woman-hater both derive their mistakes from ignorance of the female world; for, if the characters of women were thoroughly understood, they would be found too good to be hated, and yet not good enough to be idolized.

CROMWELL'S ENERGY.

Professor Limbroch, (says Mr. Rutt, in his recent valuable publication of the diary of Thomas Buxton, Esq.) relates a noble instance given by Oliver Cromwell, Protector of England, of interferences with the "unrighteous practices" of the Holy Office. "Thos. Maynard, Consul of the English nation at Lisbon, was thrown into the prison of the Inquisition, under pretence that he had said or done something against the Roman religion. Mr. Meadows, who was then resident at Lisbon, advised Cromwell of the affair; and, after having received an express from him, went to the king of Portugal, and in the name of Cromwell, demanded the liberty of Consul Maynard. The king told him it was not in his power—that the consul was detained by the Inquisition, over which he had no authority. The resident sent this answer to Cromwell and having soon after received new instructions from him, had again audience of the king, and told him that, since his majesty declared he had no power over the Inquisition, he was commanded by Cromwell to declare war against the Inquisition? This so terrified the King and the Inquisition, that they immediately freed the consul from prison."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR, ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 if in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

THE GRAND CHAPTER OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—met in this city, on Tuesday last, and continued in session for two days. The Grand Chapter was well attended, and its proceedings were, in comparison with late years, unusually interesting. From the information obtained through the representatives of the subordinate Chapters, in various sections of the state, it would appear, that Masonry is gradually, and wholesomely recovering from the shock which it sustained from the effects of Anti-masonry. In several places, where, six or eight years ago, Lodges and Chapters had entirely ceased from labor, the truly "blessed spirit" has again shown itself, and both Lodges and Chapters have resumed their business under the most favorable auspices. There is evidently a returning sense of reason among our opponents, who in many instances regret their violence; and there appears to be a corresponding disposition on the part of our brethren to meet the remnant of such opposition as may still exist, in that spirit which is so strongly inculcated by the rule of action laid down for us; but at the same time to pursue the "even tenor of our way," in that which will resuscitate and add stimulus to the efforts of the order, in the legitimate sphere, which as Masons and Freemen, we are authorised to move, without calling any man "master."

By a vote of the Grand Chapter, the Grand Sec'y, was directed to furnish for publication such an abstract of the proceedings, as may be expedient, and which will be of interest to the masonic body, which we will endeavor to obtain for our next paper.

On the motion of M. E. Comp. Herring, after an interesting discussion, the Grand Chapter, appointed a committee of five Companions in the city of New York, to receive and welcome the General Grand Encampment, and the General Grand Chapter of the United States, who will, convene in that city during the ensuing summer. As there will undoubtedly be committees appointed, with direct reference to this object, from the other two Grand Bodies of this State, the occasion and event will be one which will vie with any similar Masonic Jubilee, and we anticipate the happiest results from it.

The following Grand officers were elected for the ensuing year.

M. E. Richard Ellis, of New York, G. H. P.
 " Benjamin Enos of Madison co. D. G. H. P.
 " Joseph Cuyler, of Fulton co. G. K.
 " E. S. Barnum, of Oneida co. G. S.
 " John O. Cole, of Albany, G. Sec'y.
 " Gerrit W. Ryckman, of New York, G. Treas.
 " John Bull, of Columbia, G. Marshal;
 Ebenezer Wadsworth, and Joseph Enos, Grand Visitors, Abram Sickles, of Albany, G. Sentinel.

The Abolition of Horse-Racing in New Jersey is engaging the attention of the legislature of that state and an earnest effort is making for the passage of a law to prevent all horse-racing in the state,

THE BRIDGE.—It is a matter of much wonder with us that Albanians, with the sad evidence which the last six weeks have given of the great necessity of some certain communication with the opposite counties, can, for a moment, hesitate in giving the petition before the present legislature for a bridge, their undivided support. It cannot be but well known that our commercial pursuits have suffered in many respects, from the lack of this necessary appendage. We have been informed by one of our merchants, that since this freshet commenced, that the extra cost, to him, in getting a team twice across the river, excluding loss of time, was $30. On one occasion they crossed at Catskill, and the other at Troy. Besides these individual instances, which must be numerous, there are others which materially affect the interests of the public. Our mails have been delayed—the trade between this and the places opposite, which is not inconsiderable, has been for the time effectually suspended—"last, though not least" the obstacle which the freshet offers to the crossing of milk-men, has caused such an excitement in the domestic circles, that we fear nothing but a bridge, will subdue either the wrath of the women, or the tea-less looking visages of the men.

But not to trifle with grave affairs. The repeated effort to carry this necessary project into effect, has been as repeatedly defeated by the fear which our citizens have been continually manifesting relative to Trojan opposition. We know of no claim that Troy has upon us, that we should be continually subjected to her views of what is best for ourselves. Has she not been sufficiently often the recipient of our liberality, to allow us, without interference, to secure this natural right? Did not the Rail Road which she is at present laying from Schenectady, and which directly opposes the interest of our own from the same place, receive, sans remonstrance, the sanction of the Senator from our city. But if we are only true to ourselves, Troy cannot prevent our receiving this grant. Opposition will be as nothing in the scale, if we but unite; and that we do so, and at once, convenience, future prosperity, and the safety of life demand.

The meeting held in the rotunda of the Exchange, on Saturday evening last, displayed spirit, which if properly seconded by the action of the people, must eventuate in securing the charter. Mr. Stevens in an able address, could not have failed to convince all present, that we have the power, if we will determine to use it. Our necessities never called for the aid of all our energies more than now. When the eastern R. Road shall be completed, let us be prepared with a bridge, so as to be able to bring its train of cars, where the charter requires they should be brought—into our city. Stopping at Greenbush, which must be the case providing the bridge is not made would make this road to us of but little avail. Its charter was secured by our citizens, and our stocks are predicated for its building—where then is the reason that our city should not receive some of the benefits thereof?

The Pennsylvania legislature are about passing a law imposing a fine of $500 on any gentleman who may marry a colored lady and likewise imposing a heavy penalty on the clergyman, who may lend himself for the occasion. We look upon this as an unwarrantable interference with a certain two of the five senses of man.

Arrangements are being made in New York to receive the Governor of New Jersey, on his arrival at that city from Washington.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—One of our correspondents of the "7" has devoted an article to this subject; and perhaps argues as reasonably as can be expected on an unreasonable subject. There are always two sides to a question, and we are ever willing to hear any man talk, provided we have the liberty of talking back.—We shall answer some of his objections at some future day.

A NEW PAPER.—Mr. James Duffey, late of the Albany Bee, presents the public with a well filled and interesting sheet, to be published once a week, in this city at $2. per annum, entitled "The Examiner." Mr. D. is a fellow-townsmen, a practical printer, and a young man of fair talent, and character. We wish him every success in his laudable efforts.

Invasion of Texas.—The latest New Orleans papers state that no further doubt is entertained at Galveston, of the design of the Mexicans to make a descent upon Texas. About fifteen hundred Mexicans are already concentrated at San Patricio, on the Nueces, under the joint Command of Vasquez, Roderiquez, and Bradburn.

Mr. Buxton, will repeat his lecture on Analogy out Analogised, on Monday evening, at Knickerbocker Hall.

LAND Sales.—Public sales of government land, will take place at the land office in GENESEE, Michigan, on Monday 10th day of May next; at IOWA on Monday the 24th of the same month.

Intelligence.

As the case of M'Leod, now imprisoned at Lockport, is one of much consequence, we shall from time to time keep our readers apprised of the situation of his case. A short time since, an attempt was made to bail M'Leod, which was partially successful. The following extract from the proceedings of a public meeting, at Lockport, will show how the matter stands.

Whereas, the case of Alexander M'Leod, arrested and held to bail for a capital offence, has become a matter of serious importance, and to which the attention of our fellow-citizens in every part of the country is directed, we as citizens of the village of Lockport, and county of Niagara, feeling anxious that such steps should be taken in the matter, as shall be consistent with our rights, the supremacy of our laws, and a vindication of our national honor, disavow all intention of prejudging the case of said Alexander M'Leod or to do ought that shall have a tendency to prevent said M'Leod from having a fair and impartial trial acting on the legal maxim, that the accused should be presumed innocent until proved guilty. Therefore,

Resolved, That we are highly gratified that Capt. Wm. Buel has seen fit to place M'Leod again in custody, especially as it is but a few days before the sitting of our Court, when the Grand Jury will pass upon his case, under the direction of the Court.

Resolved, That we highly approve the recent answer of Mr. Forsyth to the unjust demand of Mr. Fox for the discharge of said M'Leod, and the sentiments of Messrs. Fillmore, Cushing, and Alford, delivered in Congress, fully meet our approbation, and are such as the exigency of the case, and the honor of the nation called for.

Important from Montreal—Union of the Canadas—First Parliament.—We learn from Montreal, that Governor General Thompson will issue his proclamation on the 8th inst. declaring the union of the two Provinces, and for the assembling of the new Parliament at Kingston in May next.

Kingston, the new capital of the United Province, is situated at the lower end of Lake Ontario, nearly opposite Oswego and Sackett's Harbor.—[N. Y. Herald.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Friday evening last the dwelling of Mr. J. Starr, of Henderson, in this county, was consumed and three children, the eldest 6 years, the youngest 18 months perished in the flames. It appears that Mrs. Starr was absent on a visit to one of her neighbors and that Mr. Starr was also a short distance from the house—on an errand—when the house took fire. Previous to leaving the house the parents placed the two eldest children in a bed, and the youngest in a cradle, designing to be from home but a very short space of time; they returned, but to witness the awful destruction of their hopes. The remains of the three were found lying together, proving that the youngest had sought the company for the eldest but to share with them a most horrible death. Watertown Jeffersonian.

Sugar from Beet Root.—In Bohemia the manufacture of sugar from beet root is very great. Of 52 manufactories, there are at present 46 at work, not to mention many refining houses. There are also nine manufactories for syrup from potato meal. During the last working season, 35,000 quintals of sugar were made. A great part of this goes to Austria.—N. Y. Standard.

Canadian Tobacco.—Upper Canada tobacco, raised between Niagara and Detroit rivers, is an important article of export from Quebec. The runaway slaves and free blacks of Virginia, Kentucky and elsewhere, who have settled there, have carried with them a practical knowledge of its cultivation.—Id.

Peace between England and China.—By the packet ship North America, Capt. Lowber, we have London papers of the evening of the 6th and Liverpool of the 7th.

The chief news of importance is from China and India. Great Britain seems to be sweeping all Asia before her arms.

The Chinese question is settled—the War in Cahool is terminated—and Mehemet Ali is thoroughly and effectually subdued.

Our advices are from Bombay to the 1st ult., Alexandria to the 24th ult., and Malta to the 28th.

Shortly after the capture of Chusan, Admiral Elliott, in proceeding to the Pecho river, was met by a mandarin of the third rank of the Chinese Empire, though some accounts say by the Emperor himself, while others affirm that Admiral Elliot had arrived at Peking, and had an audience of the Emperor.

The Emperor had agreed to pay 3,000,000 for the expenses incurred by the British in making war; other authorities state 2,000,000 sterling as indemnity for the opium seized, and 1,000,000 for the expenses of the war.

The Emperor, either himself or through his officers, has expressed pacific intentions to the Admiral, and he disavows the actions of his Commissioner Lin. This latter indeed, has fallen into disgrace, and the Emperor offers to surrender him into the hands of the English, to be dealt with as they think proper.

Chusan is not to be given up until the treaty is signed.

The death of Rear Admiral Sir Philip B. Vere-Brooke, the officer who commanded the Shannon in her engagement with the Chesapeake during the last war, on which occasion he was severely wounded, and for which he was made a Baronet, is announced in the last London papers.

Explosion.—An explosion of the steam boiler in the India Rubber Factory, Providence, R. I., took place on the 29th inst., killing several persons.

Terrible.—A Mrs. Mair, of Freedom township, Ill., on the 1st inst., in a fit of insanity, threw her infant into the fire, by which it was burnt to a crisp. The little sufferer made frequent attempts to escape the flames but as often did the insane mother thrust it in again, until it perished amid the embers. Mrs. M. has heretofore been subject to fits of mental aberration.

A man of gentlemanly appearance dropped dead in Cambridge street Boston, on Friday evening last.—He proved to be Judge Butler of Augusta Maine.

Shocking Calamity.—The Kalamazoo Gazette says on Tuesday evening last, while Elder Mack and his wife of Prairie Ronde, were from home, their house with five persons in it, was entirely consumed by fire.—Buff. Com. Adv.

A Harrisburgh paper gives a case of absence of mind thus:—A girl who was of our first love, was one night lighting us out, after having passed a delightful evening, and in a bashful repudiation she blew us out of the door, and drew the candlestick behind the door and kissed it.

MARRIED.

On Thursday, the 28th ult., by the Rev. Mr. Wyckoff, Mr. Evert J. Lansing, merchant, to Miss Harriet Maria, daughter of William Gladding, all of this city.

On Saturday morning, the 30th ult., by the Rev. A. R. Speers, Mr. William A. Fitch, to Miss Jane Brown all of this city.

On Thursday, the 28th ult., by the Rev. Mr. Crounce, of Guilderland, Mr. Samuel Rankin, of this city, to Miss Mary, daughter of Wm. Merrifield of Guilderland.

POETRY.

STANZAS.

BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

The sun is warm, the sky is clear,
The waves are dancing fast and bright,
Blue isles and snowy mountains wear
The purple noon's transparent light:
Around are unexampled buds;
Like many a voice of one delight,
The winds, the birds, the ocean floods,
The city's voice itself is soft, like Solitude's.

I see the deep's untrampled floor
With green and purple sea-weeds strown,
I see the waves upon the shore,
Like light dissolves in star showers thrown;
I sit upon the sands alone,
The lightning of the noontide ocean
Is flashing round me—and a tone
Arises from its measured motion;
How sweet! did any heart now share in my emotion.

Alas! I have not hope nor health,
Nor peace within, nor calm around,
Nor that content, surpassing wealth,
The sage in meditation found,
Who walked with inward glory crowned;
Nor fame, nor power, nor love, nor leisure;
Others I see whom these surround—
Smiling they live, and call life pleasure;
To me that cup has been dealt in another measure.

Yet now despair itself is mild,
Even as the winds and waters are;
I could lie down like a tired child,
And weep away my life of care,
Which I have borne, and yet must bear,
Till death, like sleep, might steal on me,
And I might feel in the warm air
My cheek grow cold, and the sea
Breathe o'er my dying brain its last monotony.

Some might lament that I were cold,
As I when this sweet day is gone,
Which my lost heart, too soon grown old,
Insults with this untimely moan;
They might lament—for I am one
Whom men love not—and yet regret,
Unlike this day, which when the sun
Shall on its stainless glory set,
Will linger, though enjoyed, like joy in memory yet.

THE LAST DAY.

From the "Omnipresence of the Deity." by Robert Montgomery

Ages has awful Time been travelling on,
And all his children to one tomb have gone;
The varied wonders of the peopled earth,
In equal turn have gloried in their birth:
We live and toil—and triumph and decay—
Thus age on age rolls unperceived away;
And thus 'twill be, till heaven's last thunders roar,
And Time and Nature shall exist no more!

O! say what Fancy, though endowed sublime,
Can picture truly that tremendous time,
When the last sun shall blaze upon the sea,
And earth be dashed into eternity!
A cloudy mantle will enwrap that sun
Whose face so many worlds have gazed upon!
The placid moon, beneath whose pensive beam
We all have loved to wander and to dream,
Dyed into blood, shall glare from pole to pole,
And light the airy tempests as they roll!
And those sweet stars, that like familiar eyes,
Are wont to smile a welcome from the skies,
Thick as the hail drops, from their depths will bound,
And far terrific meteors flash around!
But while the skies are shattered by the war
Of planet, moon, rent cloud, and down-shot star—
Stupendous wreck below!—a burning world!
As if the flames of hell were on the winds unfurled!

Around the horizon wheels one furnace blaze,
Streaking the black heavens with gigantic rays;
Now bursting into wizard phantoms bright,

And now immingled in a sea of light!
Till romping hurricanes unroll on high,
And whirl the fire clouds quivering through the sky;
Like sea foam pashed upon a mountain side,
When the mad winds upon the surges ride.

And lo! the sea: along her ruined shore
The white waves gallop with delirious roar!
Till Ocean, in her agonizing throes,
Bounds, swells and sinks, like leaping hills of snow!
While downward tumbling crags and torrents sweep,
And wildly mingle with the blaze-lit deep.

And now, while shadowy worlds career around,
While mountains tremble and while earthquakes sound,
While waves and winds rush roaring to the fray,
Who shall abide the horrors of the day?
How shall we turn our horror-stricken eye,
To gaze upon the fire-throned Deity?

Hark! from the deep of heaven, a trumpet-sound
Thunders the dizzy universe around!
From north to south, from east to west, it rolls,
A blast that summons all created souls!
And swift as ripples rise upon the deep,
The dead awaken from their dismal sleep:
The Sea has heard it!—coiling up with dread,
Myriads of mortals flash from out her bed!
The graves fly open, and awful strife,
The dust of ages startles into life!

All who have breathed, or moved, or seen, or felt
All they around whose cradles kingdoms knelt;
Tyrants and warriors, who careered in blood;
The great and mean, the glorious and the good,
Are plucked from every isle and land and tomb
To hear their changeless and eternal doom!

Now while the universe is wrapped in fire,
Ere yet the splendid ruin shall expire,
Beneath the canopy of flame, behold
With glittering banners at his feet unrolled
Earth's Judge!—around seraphic minstrels throng
Breathing o'er golden harps celestial song:
While melodies aerial and sublime
Weave a wild death dirge o'er departing Time!

Imagination! furl thy wings of fire,
And on eternity's dread brink expire;
Fain would thy red and raging eye behold
Visions of Immortality unrolled.
The last the fiery chaos hath begun
Quenched is the moon! and blackened is the sun!
The stars have bounded mid the airy roar;
Crushed lie the rocks and mountains are no more:
The deep unbosomed with tremendous gloom
Yawns on the ruin like creation's tomb!

And lo! the living harvest of the earth,
Reaped from the grave to share a second birth;
Millions of eyes, with one deep dreadful stare,
Gaze upward through the burning realms of air;
While shapes, and shrouds, and ghastly features gleam,
Like lurid snow flakes in the moonlight beam.

And see! amid the skies' terrific glare,
Like a wild planet wheeling through the air,
The Eternal Spirit, on a fiery car,
Cleaves through the clouds, and blazes from afar!
And, like an ocean vollied from his throne,
Roars the deep thunder of his judgement tone!—
Winged on the wind, and warbling hymns of love,
Behold the blessed soar to realms above;
The cursed, with hell uncovered to their eye,
Shake, shrink, and vanish in a whirlwind cry!
Creation shudders with sublime dismay,
And in a blazing tempest whirls away!

THE RECALL.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Alas! the kind, the playful, and the gay,
They who have gladdened their domestic board,
And cheered the winter hearth—do they return?
Joanna Baillie.

Come home! there is a sorrowing breath,
In music since ye went;
And the early flower-scents wander by
With mournful memories blent:

The sounds of every household voice
Are grown more sad and deep,
And the sweet word—Brother—wakes a wish
To turn aside and weep.

O ye beloved, come home!—the hour
Of many a greeting tone,
The time of hearth-light and of song
Returns—and ye are gone!
And darkly, heavily it falls
On the forsaken room,
Burdening the heart with tenderness,
That deepens midst the gloom.

Where finds it you, our wandering ones?
With all your boyhood's glee
Untamed, beneath the desert's palm,
Or on the lone mid sea?
Mid stormy hills of battles old,
Or where dark rivers foam?
Oh! Life is dim where ye are not—
Back, ye beloved! come home!

Come with the leaves and winds of spring;
And swift birds o'er the mind!
Our love is grown too sorrowful,
Bring us its youth again!
Bring the glad tones to music back—
—Still, your home is fair;
The spirit of your sunny life
Alone is wanting there!

GATHER RIPE FRUITS, O DEATH!

BY THOMAS RAGO.

Gather ripe fruits, O Death!
Strew not the pathway of the tomb with flowers,
Invade not childhood with thy withering breath,
Pass on, and touch not youth's bright sunny bowers,

There are enough for thee
Of hearts that long for thy serene repose,
That fain among the lowly-laid would be,
Pierced deep with festering wounds that will not close.

Go to the desolate,
Whom thou hast robbed of every star-bright thing,
On whom the smiles of hope no longer wait,
Whose loves have passed upon the morning's wing.

Go to the wearied frame,
That seeks to slumber on the grave's cold breast,
That finds life's pleasures but an empty name,
And longs to flee away and be at rest.

Go to the saints of God,
Whose souls are weary of the world and sin,
Who fain would tread the path their Saviour trod,
And greet the tomb that lets heaven's glories in.

Take these, take these to rest,
But smite not childhood in its mirthful play,
Snatch not the infant from its mother's breast,
Steal not the loved and loving ones away!

Gather ripe fruits, O Death!
Strew not the pathway of the tomb with flowers,
Invade not childhood with thy withering breath,
Pass on, and touch not youth's bright fragrant bowers

MASONIC.

A GENERAL CHARGE TO MASONS.

Delivered at Christ church at Boston on the 28th of December, 1749.

BY THE REV. CHARLES BROCKWELL, A. M.

The principal intention in forming societies is undoubtedly the uniting men in the strictest bonds of love; for men, considered as social creatures, must derive their happiness from each other: every man being designed by providence to promote the good of others as he leaders his own advantage: and by that intercourse to secure their good offices, by being, as occasion may offer, serviceable unto them.

Christianity in general (for I now enter not upon the melancholy divisions so rife among us) never circumscribes our benevolence within the narrow confines of nature, fortune, profit, or personal obligation. What I would advance is this: That we restrain not our love to our next neighbor only, this being merely a point of convenience,—nor to our acquaintance solely, this being the effect of inclination purely to gratify ourselves. We are not to caress our friends only, because gratitude and common justice require even that at our hands. Nor yet those especially from whom we expect to receive benefit, for this interest and policy will prompt us to—nor our relations only, for this the ties of blood and mere nature dictate. Nor is our love and charity limited to them particularly who are of the same church or opinion with us; for by the very same reason that we are induced to believe ourselves in the right, they may imagine themselves so too: and what we may judge to be a perfection among ourselves, they may condemn as a blemish. Be it so then, that in some points, or rather modes of worship, we may differ or dissent from each other, yet still the LOVE reconciles even these. There we all meet amicably, and converse sociably together. There we harmonize in principles, though we vary in punctilios. There we join in conversation, and intermingle interests. There we discover no estrangement of behaviour, nor alienation of affection. We serve one another most readily in all the offices of a cordial friendship. Thus are we united, though distinguished; united in the same grand Christian fundamentals, though distinguished by some circumstantials: united in one important band of brotherly love, though distinguished by some peculiarities of sentiment.

Freedom of opinion thus indulged, but its points never discussed, is the happy influence under which the unity of this truly ancient and honorable society, has been preserved from time immemorial. And whoever is an upright mason, can neither be an Atheist, Deist, or Libertine. For he is under the strictest obligation, to be a good man, a true christian, and to act with honor and honesty, however distinguished by different opinions in the circumstantials of religion. Upon which account MASONRY is become the centre of union, and the means of conciliating friendship among men, that have otherwise remained at perpetual distance: causing them to love as brethren, as heirs of the same hope, partakers of the same promises, children of the same God, and candidates of the same heaven.

We read, that when Tertullus pleaded against St. Paul, the chief accusation whereon he founded his plea; was his being ring leader of the sect of the Nazarenes—and this sect (said the Jews) we know that everywhere it is spoken against. And wherefore was this sect so spoken against? Was it from any evil they knew of its professors? Or from mere ignorance or blind prejudice? We find nothing of the former, but undoubted proof of the latter. And this I take to be pretty much one case, in respect to masonry as flowing from the same corrupted principles. I have had the honor of being a member of this ancient and honorable society many years, have sustained many of its offices, and can, and do aver, in this sacred place and before the grand ARCHITECT of the world, that I never could observe ought therein, but what was justifiable and commendable according to the strictest rules of society; this being founded on the rules of the gospel, doing the will of God, and the subduing the passions, and highly conducing to every sacred and social virtue. But not to insist on my own experience, the very antiquity of the constitution furnishes a sufficient argument to confute all gainsayers. For no combination of wicked men, for a wicked purpose, ever lasted long. The want of virtue, on which mutual trust and confidence is founded, soon divides and breaks them to pieces. Nor would men of unquestionable wisdom, known integrity, strict honor, undoubted veracity, and good sense, (though they might be tree panned into a foolish or ridiculous society, which could pretend to nothing valuable) ever continue in it, (as all the world may see they have done, and now do) or contribute towards supporting and propagating it to posterity.

As to any objections that have been raised against this society, they are as ridiculous as they are groundless:—for what can discover more egregious folly in any man, than to attempt to vilify what he knows nothing of? At that rate, he may with equal justice abuse or calumniate any thing else that he is unacquainted with—but there are some peculiar customs among us; surely these can be liable to no censure: hath not every society some peculiarities which are not to be revealed to men of different communities?—But some among us behave not so well as might be expected: We fear this to be too true, and are heartily sorry for it: let us therefore every one try to mend one another. But even this objection is of no weight with a man of ingenuity and candor. For if the unworthiness of a professor casts a reflection upon the profession, it may be inferred, by parity of reason, that the misconduct of a christian is an argument against Christianity. But this is a conclusion which I presume no more than what he must subscribe to, who is so unreasonable as to insist on the other.

Upon the whole, then, it appears, that the rules of this society have a direct tendency to render conversation agreeable, as well as innocent; and so to influence our practice, as to be useful to others, and profitable to ourselves; for to continue in amity and maintain a fair correspondence, to be disposed reciprocally to all offices of humanity and to act upon mutual terms of benevolence, which are the characteristics of christianity, are likewise the cement of this society.—And how good it is to assist, comfort, and to relieve the oppressed, I need not now observe. Nor is it less obvious, how pleasant it is to contribute to the innocent delight, and promote the lawful advantage of one another; and always to converse with security without any, the least suspicion of fraudulent, injurious, or malicious practices.

Now, in order to cherish and promote this harmony within doors and without, let us first lay hold on the surest means to stop the mouth of detraction, by endeavoring to lead a pure and unblemishable life.—Let us consider my brethren, that not the reputation of one only, but that of the whole society is affected by a brother's misbehavior. Invested as we are with that distinguished BADEX, which at this day is the glory of the greatest potentates upon earth, we should scorn to act beneath the dignity of our profession.—Let us then walk worthy of our vocation, and do honor to our profession.

Let us rejoice in every opportunity of serving and obliging each other; for then, and only then, are we answering the great end of our institution. Brotherly love, relief, and truth, oblige us not only to be compassionate and benevolent, but to administer that relief and comfort which the condition of any member requires, and we can bestow, without manifest inconvenience to ourselves. No artful dissimulation of affection can ever be allowed among those who are upon a level: nor can persons who live within compass, act otherwise than upon the square, consistently with the golden rule doing as they would be done by. For among us, every one is, or should be, another self; so that he that hates another, must necessarily abhor himself also; he that prejudices another, injures his own nature; and he that doth not relieve a distressed brother, starves a member of his own body. But this relief is not to be bestowed upon the idle, indolent, and extravagant; but upon the unfortunate, industrious, successful brother.

Let us next remember the regulations of this society are calculated, not only for the prevention of enmity, wrath, and dissention, but for the promotion of love, peace and friendship; then here surely conversation must be attended with mutual confidence, freedom and complacency. He who neither contrives mischief himself against others, nor suspects any against himself, has his mind always serene, and his affections composed. All the human faculties rejoice in order, harmony, and proportion; by this our society subsists, and upon this depends its wisdom, strength, and beauty:—Let therefore no narrow distinctions discompose this goodly frame or disturb it symmetry; but when good and worthy men offer themselves, let them ever have the first place in our esteem; but as for the abettors of Atheism, irreligion, libertinism, infidelity, let us, in the words of the prophet, shake our hands from them just as a person would do, who happens to have burning coals or some venomous creature fastening upon his flesh. In such a case none would stand a moment to consider; none would debate with himself the expediency of the thing; but instantly fling off the pernicious incumbrance; instantly endeavor to disengage himself from the clinging mischief: so should every upright mason from such perilous false brethren.

There is one essential property which belongs to our craft, which had liked to have slipped me, and which however condemned, is highly worthy of all applause; and that is secrecy. All that should be disclosed of a lodge is this, that in our meetings, we are all good-natured, loving, and cheerful one with another. But what are these secrets? Why, if a brother in necessity seeks relief, it is an inviolable secret, because true charity vaunteth not itself. If an overtaken brother be admonished, it is in secret; because charity is kind. If possibly little indifference, feuds, or animosities should invade our peaceful walls, they are still kept secret; for charity suffereth long, is not easily provoked, thinking no evil. These and many more (would time permit) which I could name, are the embellishments which emblazon the mason's escutcheon. And as a further ornament, let us add that aromatic spig of cassia, of letting our light so shine before men, that they may see our good-works; and that whereas they speak against us as evil-doers, they may, by our good works, which they shall behold, glorify God.

EXTRACTS FROM A MASONIC DISCOURSE.

BY GILES F. YATES, ESQ. OF SCHENECTADY.

The object of Freemasonry has ever been to promote the best interests of mankind. It has patronized the arts and sciences, and particularly architecture, and its concomitant sciences, geometry, which is synonymous with Masonry, and of heavenly birth. In fact, we have reason to believe, that one of the primary designs of the Masonic institution, was to improve in architectural science by the mutual communication of knowledge connected therewith, and that ancient geometry was in part what now exists under the appellation of Freemasonry. Even at the present day, the latter has much to do with angles, triangles, circles, squares, and perpendiculars.

It may be proper here to observe, that originally the craft consisted mostly of operative masons, and that no regular Lodges were constituted until the erection of king Solomon's temple. According to holy writ, upwards of one hundred and thirteen thousand craftsmen, besides seventy thousand laborers and bearers of burdens, all under the superintendence of three grand officers, were employed in that glorious undertaking. These, after the cap stone was laid, dispersed to different parts of the globe, widely disseminating the principles of the craft. From the connection and intercourse between the Hebrews and the inhabitants of Tyre and Egypt, and the attachment of the latter to hieroglyphic symbols, we can readily account for the introduction of those principles into the last named countries. The sun of masonry which arose in the east, soon enlightened the west; and soon the north and south were favoured with the benignant influence of its beams. We are informed, that several hundred years before the christian era in Asia, associations of Freemasons under the name of "Dionysian artificers," made great improvements in architecture, and were distinguished for their science. And in the fourteenth century in Europe, an itinerant association of operative Freemasons, consisting of men of different countries, erected many public buildings which have excited the admiration of the world. Their lodges have been emphatically termed "seminaries of instruction in the sciences and polite arts."

Among the numerous durable structures and magnificent edifices, erected under the auspices of masonry, I shall only point you to the stupendous pyramids of Egypt, the lofty temples of Damascus and Ephesus, the city of Alexandria, the tower of Pharos; and in later days, St. Peter's church at Rome, St. Sophia's at Constantinople, St. James's Palace, St. Paul's Cathedral, the palace of Elysium at Paris, the palace of Loo in Holland, the palace and hall of Westminster, the London bridge, & the masonic hall in Philadelphia.

And if masonry has been a patron it has been a preserver of the arts. In those ages of the world when the dismal cloud of barbarism, pregnant with ignorance and superstition, overshadowed the earth, then a knowledge of the most valuable arts, was with danger and difficulty preserved by our ancient brethren, which having been transmitted to posterity, has contributed, in no small degree, to refine and civilize the world.

During that dark period too, masonry was the only institution which had for its object the alleviation of human misery. Since the advent of the prince of peace, christianity and masonry, like twin sisters, have gone hand in hand in the blessed work of charity and love. Before that happy epoch, as a writer has observed, alms houses and eleemosinary institutions were unknown. Poverty (except among the masons) was without a friend, and the humble supplications of distress, were lost amid the proud pursuits of ambition, the wild and terrible slaughter of arms and the sweeping desolations and cruelties of persecution, anarchy and despotism.

'Twas thou, blest masonry, that brought
The choicest gift to man;
And thou it was the lesson taught,
E'er since the world began:

That charity can sooth each pain,
Relieve mankind from woe;
That masonry hath power to gain

The ligaments of affection, which bind the heart of one mason to another, must from several circumstances peculiar to the masonic institution, be more strong and endearing than the ordinary ties of humanity.—Hence some our brethren have often, in cheerful compliance with their obligations, and influenced solely by the zeal which masonry inspires, assisted their fellow brethren, oppressed by the chilling hand of poverty.—Although such charitable acts may not always be dictated by love to the Deity, yet, to say the least, we cannot be blamed for using adventitious aids to urge to virtuous actions.

Do you ask for examples of our charity? Go to yonder widow, bereaved by the unrelenting king of terrors of the dear partner of her bosom, her only support in life: who revives her hopes, and soothe the keen wound of her afflictions? 'Tis the genius of masonry! Go to yonder helpless orphans; who supply their wants and snatch them from the vortex of destruction? 'Tis the genius of masonry! Go to yonder mendicants of Eastern hemisphere, craving from stinted wealth the bread of charity in vain: who cheers, comforts and supports them? and the answer again will be, the benign genius of masonry! Lo! who enters the dark and cheerless abodes of yonder loathsome prison; wipes the scalding tear from the cheek of its inmate, a poor unfortunate debtor prostrated by the hand of an unforgiving creditor?—who?—'Tis the guardian spirit of masonry! These, my friends, are not pictures drawn by fancy, but by the sober pencil of truth. I can point to living instances in proof of my assertions—instances too, independent of those accounts of benevolence contained in the records of the Lodges; accounts which we trust, will be found duly posted to their credit in the grand ledger of eternity.

GRINDING POETRY.

This is truly an age of invention. It has been called an age of discovery, and an age of improvement; and there are those who speak of it as the age of steam;—but without entering seriously into the discussion of the superior claims of any one of these titles to the honor of being prefixed to the age in which we and our contemporaries live, we think it may justly be considered the age of invention. We might give the reasons which have led to this conclusion in which we conscientiously confide, but it is of no importance to the subject before us, and may therefore be passed over.

Instruments have been planned and constructed for every department of labor, to such an extent as to render the use of the human hand of little consequence, and there may almost be seen a gradual tapering and reduction in size of the fingers and palm, as if the world had entered upon that millenium to which the indolent look forward with such yearning. Were this beyond all question true, and stalwart hands no longer to be found among us, it is not certain that it would surprise the world, more, than the naming of an invention, to which the reader's attention is now solicited.

We remember to have met not long since in the random roaming of an eye over the Association rooms, or elsewhere, a description of an important machine for grinding poetry. The caption excited a smile, for it revived the tale of a nameless manufacturing establishment, where, if brambles of hemlock were furnished at one extreme, white ash rakes would appear at the other; and of a 'factory' in which if a full grown sheep be driven in, the course of a few moments, shell combs, mould candles, morocco shoes, knife handles, roast mutton, and broadcloth coats, each deposited in its own apartment, would be the product; and of a 'mill,' which converted old bachelors into spruce young beaux, and maids of three score, into blooming damsels of seventeen. But this has nothing to do, or very little, to be scrupulous, about these things, with the grand piece of machinery to which our attention was directed by the title of the article.

As nearly as we can remember, for in matters of this kind, the memory is usually called from home upon urgent business, the article went on to say, that the instrument was to be supplied with scattering leaves from Shakspeare, Campbell, Hemans, and other poets to any extent that might be desired, a two feet rule, a few hundred compasses, every one went off as fast as the dictionary, containing all carry him. After riding in emendations and improvement miles with the rest of the tion, beside a copious synopsis, where a lane diverged, I thought I recognised springs were attached to one end, and through in my be adjusted to the kind of poetry to cut, I turned Pathetic, Sentimental, Didactic or any to save which the fancy of the experimenter might suggest. In the interior were wheels, which were moved by a weight after the manner of a family clock,—that does not go by a spring, of course.

Upon winding it up one mealy afternoon, and setting the springs to the Sentimental, the following appeared:

Wearied of the world and all its busy scenes,
I went into the garden and hid among the beans;

An important pin seemed here to have given away, and some derangement attended it, for nothing but a deluge of hiatuses under the escort of the two feet rule came through. These were restored, and the springs set to the didactic.

At the close of the day when the hamlet was still,
And nothing was heard but the soft murmuring rill,
A cricket came forth from his nest in the wall,
And opened his speech with a terrible squall.

Not knowing precisely what the insect might say, and feeling anxious to guard the ears against painful sounds, that might blunt their acuteness, and prevent them from hearing distinctly all the music of the poetry, the weight was instantly arrested and the springs changed to the pathetic.

On a log, there sat a frog,
Crying for his daughter,
Tears he shed till his eyes were red,
And then jumped into the water, and drowned himself. This needed completion with the pen, but it was quite satisfactory, when the melting nature of the subject was taken into consideration—which might itself alone have so expanded the last line as to produce it beyond the use of the two feet rule. The springs were set again to the sentimental;

When life's last evening shall draw near,
And care's deep shadows lengthen round,
Oh, may I be lighted to my bier, [pound.
With hope's dipped candles, say sixteen to the

For the sake of seeing what would be the result, the springs were set midway between the sublime and the worldly—and the following appeared.

When wrapt in flames the realms of ether glow,
And heaven's red lightnings melt the harmless snow,
It will not be strange if sleighs are laid aside,
And people take a wheel coach when they wish to ride.

A breath of air from an adjoining apartment whirled a leaf from Virgil and a page of the Iliad to hand, and they were cast into the machine. After a repose of a few moments, and an adjustment of the springs to the lugubrious, the following appeared—

Senex Grimes, that agathos old anthropos, est mortuus
We shall nunquam see him plus,
He used to habere an old blue togam.
All buttoned down ante.

This unintelligible jargon was arrested by a seizure of the weights in the manner adopted once before.—Without pondering a moment upon the meaning of the stanza, the verse was cut short and the springs arranged anew.

They were set to the heroic, and after a protracted grumbling among the wheels there came forth in successive explosions, as if discharged from a field piece—the following;

Remember, remember the twelfth of December,
'Twas the birth of a glorious plot,
A deep toned rumble! and your walls will crumble
!—and the "7" will all be forgot.

Here we stopped and drew down the paper with

POPULAR TALES.

DICK DENNETT; OR THE SANGUINE MAN.

"I who was once a happy wight,
And high in fortune's grace,
And did spend my golden prime,
In running pleasure's race;
Am now enforced of late
Contrariwise to mourn,
Since Fortune's joys
Into annoy,
My former state to turn."

OLD CAMBRIDGE SONG.

Dick Dennett was an ancient chum of mine; we were bosom friends in those halcyon days when sea-saw, or a turn out to cricket on Wednesdays, was bliss supreme; he was a rattle-pated, harum-scarum, merry fellow, always plotting, and always failing—a piece of human wildfire—a sample of fleshly champagne. Dick's father was a wealthy merchant, and allowed him lots of pocket money, yet did Dick ever eschew the pastry man the fruit woman, and the vender of scented soap, and all the other providers on their periodical visits, for he had an everlasting score with each, and his fate so willed it, that so certainly as any one of these personages appeared, so surely was Dick found to have just rid himself of his last "persuader" with the other. A Welsh workhouse might have been supported on his expenditure, and a half-pay captain would have committed suicide on a tithe of Dick's dunning. I quitted our scholastic abode some time before him, and as he was never much given to pen and ink, I heard nothing of him for some few years, although, during that period, I addressed more than one letter to him, and I had ceased to think of ever meeting him again, when sauntering down Rotten Row one afternoon, my attention, in common with that of others about me, was taken by a splendid phaeton, which was going down the drive at what is technically called "no rate at all." Now, although I admit it is one of the pomps and vanities of this sinful world, I must own, I do love a handsome turn out, and commend me, when a horse is in question, to a slapping pace. I always had a yearning that way. When a boy, the best translation, I ever made, was the fall of the chariot of the sun, from Ovid; and in older days I have foresworn bright eyes, and suffered billets to plead in vain, that I might occupy the box with Harry Stevenson, and do London to Brighton in five hours. Even at this, my eleventh hour, I sustain myself on the hope that I may drive four before I die. O it's an occupation to my taste! there's excitement in it; and then the smirks and smiles that hedge in the gentleman coachman along the road, and the dear little delightful companions—that are sure to go by a coach that's driven by "such a nice man." And it's so easy and so innocent to make up a lie to oust any fellow who pollutes the box, when a feminine temptation comes across. But, Lord, how I wander! women, wine, and horses, are my weak points. Prythee, excuse me, reader; if you are a politician, think I have been discoursing of the national debt; if you are a lover, think I have been laudatory of your mistress; if you have ever conducted a drag, think of the ribbons, and I shall be forgiven.

But to return. I stopped to admire the phaeton, and was leaning over the rail to see it pass, when suddenly the driver, a young and fashionable drest man, pulled short up, within a foot of me, and thrusting his body forward, in eclipse of his companion, surveyed me with a hurried and eager look, which I rather at a loss to account for, returned with an imperturbable stare, and without altering my position, till a simultaneous note of recognition burst from each other, and the next moment Dick Dennett and I clutched hands with all the warmth that old associations and surprise give to friendship. That night I dined with him at the Clarendon—for he was in full feather; his father had become a contractor, (conviction in a word, as Cooley says,) and had amassed an immense fortune, out of which he made his son a superb allowance; and in order to get through it, Dick had purchased a commission in a crack regiment of cavalry. Before we parted, he pressed me much to dine with the mess next day, at Hounslow, but as I had booked my place by the Edinburgh mail, I was obliged to decline; and so, with many assurances of mutual friendship, and a provisional appointment for another meeting, we separated as happy as good will and good fellowship could make us.

On my return I found Dick's regiment had gone to Ireland, and I again lost sight of him. And although I wrote him twice, I got no answer; but I knew him for an Idler, and a procrastinator, and suffered no astonishment from his silence. About a year after this, I found a card on my table, "Mr. Richard Dennett—th Hussars, and next day I shook hands with Dick in propria persona.

"You've heard the news?" he said, after some small conversation.

"No; what news? I answered.

"Have you heard nothing," he continued, "within the last three months, bearing on my family?"

"Not a word."

"Then I must tell you," he said; "it's all up with my father."

"Surely not! I hope not," I said.

"A fact, my dear fellow; too true a hard cut on me."

"I regret it Dick, from the bottom of my soul."

"I knew you would," he replied, "or I should not have told you; but my father's affair is not the whole—or the worst. On the 4th of last month I attained the age of twenty-three years, at which period my grandfather was pleased to prophesy in his last will and testament, that I should arrive at discretion to use 23,000*l*. Now the fact is, I became discretionary long before; and, in order to preserve my body intact from the profane hands of Mr. Levy and his brethren, I gave warrants of attorney, to fall due simultaneously with my legacy, to the amount of some 500*l*. or 600*l*. over it; and to pay that, I sold my commission, knowing it would be madness to attempt to stay in the regiment without either fortune or allowance."

"Good heavens, Dick! I exclaimed; how did you manage to spend 23,000*l*. at your age?"

"The simplest thing in the world, my dear fellow. I was a man of taste."

"And you reckoned upon your father's liberality, while you spent your own money."

"Precisely so. But, come," he added, "il me reste encore mes beaux yeux, and a marriage de raison may retrieve all. I have not lost time lately. I have a charming woman in my eye, and I fancy I am in hers, and in a tenderer part. Rather aged, but lots of brads: to-morrow I'm off again to Cheltenham, where she resides; keeps a capital place there. In a fortnight or so I expect all will be right. I have only been up just now for a day or two, to speak to Elmore about a couple of hunters, and something for a cab, and to consult with Palmer on a dressing case. You shall hear from me on the happy occasion—adieu."

"But you'll dine with me, Dick?"

"Not to-night. I shall be in town shortly again, and then we'll fraternize for a night—good bye."

"Well, good bye," I said, "and luck attend you in your speculation!"

"Au revoir, my dear boy," said Dick; "excuse my haste. By-the-by, if you hear of a box at Melton, here is my card—just drop me a line."

And so, with a repetition of good wishes and adieus, we parted. It was shortly after this that I left England, to make tour on the continent, where my stay was unexpectedly eked out two years, and during that time I had no opportunity of gathering any tidings of Dick. On my return I accidentally learnt from a person who had some slight acquaintance with him, and who saw him shortly after my departure, that he had married a rich widow at Cheltenham—the same, I presumed, that he had mentioned to me, and that he was then residing in some eclet near Oxford. There accordingly, while on a short stay with a college friend, I inquired after him, but could only ascertain that he had quitted his establishment there about a year before, and was then rusticated somewhere near Malvern.

In the course of the ensuing summer I was with my sisters at Hereford, from which we made a short visit to Malvern, and in the course of our stay here a party of men was got up to visit. The day, which was clear and beautiful at setting out, became gloomy and overcast in the afternoon, and as we were breaking up to return, the storm commenced, the wind rose fiercely, and the rain fell in sheets; sauve qui peut became the order of the day, and every one went off as fast as he could persuade his nag to carry him. After riding in this way some three or four miles with the rest of the cavalcade, I came to a place where a lane diverged from the main road. This lane I thought I recognized as one I had occasionally passed through in my rambles, and thinking to make a near cut, I turned down it, and, as generally happens in trying to save distance, I lost my way. The night was coming on; it was then almost perfectly dark; my horse was jaded, for we had been racing during the day; the rain poured, and I was thoroughly drenched and bewildered in a labyrinth of lanes and cross roads, beyond the possibility of self-extrication. In the midst of my perplexities I fell in with a servant mounted on a donkey, with a couple of panniers, who was bearing home the remnants of our repast, and who, being a stranger to the country, had involved himself in the same predicament as myself, and from a similar cause. This man I immediately enlisted into my service, sending him on exploratory excursions down every path that intersected our way; but all in vain, not a house was to be found, or sound indicative of habitation to be heard. At last, on the confines of a bleak common, stuck down in the corner of a half cultivated garden, with a ragged shrubbery, and some effort at undulation of path, I espied by the light of the rising moon, a hybrid kind of habitation, something between a small farm-house, and a cottage ornee in decay. Its stuccoed front had lost half its substance; one or two panes in the lower windows were patched with paper—a rickety porch straggled round the door, and the garden gate hung on one hinge. Leaving my horse with the man, I walked to the door, which, lacking a knocker, I tapped smartly with my whip. A long silence ensued. I knocked again, and presently heard a window above me very gently pushed up, and a man's voice, after a pause, inquiring what I wanted. I told him I had lost my way, and begged he would have the goodness to direct me on the road to Malvern. This he briefly did, and was about wishing me good night, when recollecting that it was somewhere in this neighborhood that I had been told Dennett resided, I requested he would inform me whether he could tell me where Richard Dennett resided!

"O, Lord!" cried the voice, to my surprise, and the head vanished at the same moment. I heard a quick run on the stairs, the door was lugged open, and, to my utter astonishment, Dick himself caught me by the hand; but O quantum mutatus ab illo! the cavalry man and the charioteer were sunk in the figure before me. He wore an old and greasy figured silk dressing gown, a regimental chaco, bright with use, begirt his brows, and his sether parts were adorned with cord small clothes, blue worsted stockings, and high-lows, that seemed never to have made an acquaintance with blacking, and which were both unlaced. Dick put my horse into a back shed, that had been a stable, and then led me into a small back room, where he had been indulging a cold collation, by the light of a small tin lamp, stuck in a candlestick, and smelling villanously of coarse oil. Poor Dick! I saw him falter and I heard him stammer as he ushered me in. I saw the fates had not been propitious, and I would have saved his feelings.

"You are engaged, perhaps; if so, pray make no apology," I said; "I'll drop in some other time; family men, you know, are privileged."

"No, no," said Dick, "you see, I've grown so domesticated; the fact is, Mrs. Dennett's on a visit, and the woman is gone with her, and my fellow has got a holiday to see his grandmother, and I'm alone; so my dear fellow you'll excuse all that's amiss. Is it not Pliny, or Livy, or Horace, or some other old heathen, who says the study of antiquity makes the mind antique? Well, so it is with me; I've rusticated so long among the boors here, that I've got as boorish as them myself at last; but sit down," he added, "while I get some candles." And so saying, he quitted the room.

During his absence I made a survey of the room; it was small, and had a latticed window: a dirty paper covered the walls, which many rents displayed to be as dirty as itself; over the fire-place was a gun a fox's brush, and two peacock's feathers, branching over an oval mirror, which the damp had rubbed off half its quicksilver. On either side of the mantel-piece hung a pair of spurs, a Mussulman pipe, a tobacco pouch, a bridle, and a regulation cavalry sword; a table was in the centre of the apartment, and on it, without a cloth, was laid a cold ox-cheek, a saucer of pickles, a blue plate, a black horn-handled knife and fork, and two jugs of ale; a worn and smeared carpet of a gaudy pattern, half screened the black boards; opposite the fire-place was another old table, with flaps, bearing Pierce Egan's Life in London, and a well thumbed volume of Tom Jones; over it was suspended an oil painting, (wanting a frame,) exhibiting a portrait of a red-faced, thin old shrew, and on the chimney-piece lay a razor, a shaving-box, a broken dressing case glass, a pocket-comb, a pincushion, and a pack of cards—a pill box, and a China bottle, with dead flowers. I had advanced thus far in my inspection, when Dick re-appeared with a couple of "lights," the one in a tall brass, the other in a japanned bed-room, candlestick. "You see, my old friend," said he, "what poor helpless wretches we are without women. And now fall to. This is but sorry fare, but the air here, and exercise, make these plain dishes savory; and faith, I find they agree with me better than what may be called cookery. By-the-by, your Sanco Panza, the man with the ass—is that the style of attendants in London now?—desires me to inquire what is your will regarding him; he says he has a wife and nine small children, and he's anxious to get safe to quarters. You stay here to-night, that's settled—and that I insist upon."

Now I had wholly forgotten my stray squire, in contemplating Dick's boudoir, so I mentioned at once to Dick our ramble, and the chance that had guided me to his door! and having accepted his invitation being anxious to hear of his adventures, I asked him if he could direct the man to Malvern, by any road that would enable him to reach it in an hour or two. Dick undertook to do this, and the fellow having been summoned to the presence, and admonished aside, by me, to leave his hampers behind him, was gladdened with one of the jugs of ale, and dismissed with a message from me, and instructions for his guidance on the way.

"It happens most unfortunately," said Dick, "that you should pop in just now, when Mrs. D. is away; for I've grown so temperate of late, that I did not miss it before, but really, I find she has taken the key of my cellar with her, or mislaid it, and there's not a blacksmith within a day's march."

"Don't mention it, my good fellow," I answered; "but by-the-by, although for myself nothing can be better than this excellent string of yours, but in those hampers, if the man has not gone yet, there is some brandy and Madeira. We'll just see after him." And so saying, I caught up a light and sallied forth to the stable, whither Dick followed. "He's gone," said I; "but he has left his hampers, I find, and taking a handle, while Dick took the other, one of them was soon encamped by the side of the supper table."

I perceived Dick was a little more silent during this performance than previously, and I felt all the delicacy of the operation. "The fact is," I said, "I have given over wining, especially when home brewed like yours is to be had; but I know you of old, and that the habit is strong with you; and as I shall stay tomorrow, and shall want your company, and you will consequently have no opportunity of riding over to Mrs. Dennett for her keys, I can't allow my intrusion to rob you of your enjoyments; so you must be content to put up with the contents of this basket, and forego your own cellar till I become moveable—lo here, imprimis, is some brandy, next three bottles of Madeira, and lastly, two of port." This quieted Dick's mind, and having accounted myself in some of my friend's habiliments, my own being wet as sponge bags, I sat down, and committed havoc that would have done no discredit to a "bloody and devouring boar," on Dennett's ox-cheek, after which we broached the Madeira, I depreciating it, however, as poor stuff, while I was loud in the praises of his simple fare.

Our repast ended, we assailed the port, and eke the brandy, until Dick became first jolly, then garrulous, and then sad. "I am sorry, Dennett," I said, "that I was not fortunate enough to effect an introduction to Mrs. Dennett."

"D—n her," responded Dick, "you're better without it."

"Petty treason," I exclaimed.

"Do you see that old brimstone," he continued, pointing to the painting I have mentioned; "that's a flattering likeness of her—she's ten times older and uglier, and her tongue is infernal and eternal in its workings."

"But how came you to make such a match?" I asked.

"I was mad blind, my dear fellow," he said; "and I was poor, and she professed herself rich."

"And was she not?"

"Need you ask that? look round you; the cursed old Tartar, she did me there; but fill up, while I drink the cholera to her, and then I'll tell you how I was bit."

"You know that after my father's affair, I was on the look-out to mend my fortunes. You also know that I had set my eye upon a widow. Well might Sir Rodger de Coverley warn all men against the set: only make me free from this one, and if ever I touch my hat to another, may I have such another life as I have led with this one. She has brought envy, hatred strife, and all uncharitableness into my breast. The last time I was in London incog., I watched a work-house slave, yoked to a watering truck. An old companion accosted him, 'What, Wiggins, my boy, you reduced to this?' 'Ah!' said Wiggins; 'but never mind that, I've had one piece of luck lately howsoever—I've lost that old widow I married.' Lord, how I envied him his luck, and his loss, even with the truck to boot. And only last week I was so struck with the squalid wretchedness of a woman who was tramping down the road with six or seven children, that I had rummaged out all my loose coppers to bestow on her, when, seeing my intention, she began to propitiate me, muttering out, 'A poor widow woman sir.' My bile almost choked me at the words, and I buttoned up my pockets, threatening to take her up for a vagrant. But, however, to return to my story, the old woman, for she dates coeval with my grandmama, seeing me once or twice in full fig, and hearing that I had belonged to the Hussars, and was a fellow of monstrous possessions, arrayed herself forthwith against me. I was asked to dinners, and family parties, and I, like an ass that I was, believing the old crazy skeleton was enamoured of my fleshy appearance, was close and punctual in my attendance on her, until at length, one night—be it ever marked with a black stone, having overcome with brandy the nausea that the contemplation of my task occasioned, I avowed myself, knelt, swore, hugged, and was accepted. I was all haste to fix the happy day, while her passion was in its ardor, lest cooler moments might bring some word of a settlement of the dust on the dowager. I pressed for what the happier wretches at the Old Bailey call a short day—it was granted; the day but one succeeding my declaration was appointed. Not a whisper of a settlement. And upon that day I converted her into Mrs. Dennett. As I handed her from the carriage, on our return from the church, an acquaintance passed, and nodded with a smile, and I shrank within myself, as I saw him leer jestingly at the waddling anatomy. And that is Mrs. Dennett, said I; and it is for this that I have drest and driven these four years, and spent—but no, not exactly for this; I must dress and drive yet, and madam's ducats must pay the reckoning—allons, we must eat olives to Rediote wine. Well, our honey moon passed without any remarkable event, except that I learned to blush; and I had been married about six weeks, when, on entering the dinner-room one day, I found the table only laid for two. I forgot to tell you Mrs. D. had a fine family of daughters. How is this, Mrs. D?" said I; "don't the girls dine with us to day?" "No, my dear," she answered. "Where do they dine?" I asked. "O, not with us," she said. "Pray, where, then, may I inquire—is there any secret?" "O no," she replied. "Then where are they?" "They are gone." "Gone—where? what on earth do you mean?" "They are gone to London, my dear."

"What the devil are they gone for?" I exclaimed. "I am sure I don't know," said Mrs. D. "Not know?" I cried; "Did they go without your consent?" "Yes." "Then you've had some quarrel?" "No." "Pray madam, have the goodness to explain yourself. Where are the girls?" "Well, my dear," she said, "you are so violent. I told you they were gone to London." "But on what errand?" "O my dear Richard," said the old Jezebel; "Matilda was of age to day, and then she burst out into a loud bellow, and applied her handkerchief to her eyes. Well," said I, "that was to be expected, in the course of time. What has that to do with her going to London?" "Every thing—O every thing," she sobbed. "You know she was the youngest!" "Yes." "And according," she continued, "to poor dear Mr. Ramsbottom's will, all my control over the girls and the property was to cease when she attained twenty one. 'Mr. Ramsbottom's will,' I cried; "O what a fool—what an idiot I have been! And do you then mean to tell me that your daughters and your income have gone together?" "Not all," she spluttered out. "And pray, madam, how much remains?" "All my own marriage portion in the funds, settled on myself." "On your-self—hum; and how much may that be?" "Why, it is not so much as it was before the funds were reduced." "Will you have the goodness to answer my questions without more of this prevarication?" "I ask you, what is the yearly amount of your present income?" "O dear Richard," she answered, with a strong effort at effect, "I am sorry for your sake, to say it is only seventy five pounds." "Seventy-five pounds—seventy five pounds!" I repeated again. "And have I yoked myself to an almost putrescent carcass, for seventy-five pounds a year, when I paid my valet a hundred?" "O you ungrateful wretch, cried the beldame, dropping the handkerchief and the pathetic. "O you brute! is this your love? did you not vow to me that your motives were pure and disinterested? is this all the return for my bestowing my hand upon you, and refusing so many good offers? Wasn't there Drumpington—?" "Of the West Middlesex Militia," said I; "and a half-pay ensign of the line." "Ah," said she, "but he was a captain somehow. And did not I dismiss Dr. Mackillabody—?" "A quondam apothecary's errand boy, and now an Aberdeen M. D.," I rejoined. "The short and the long of all this is, madam, that you have practised a dead swindle upon me, and we are a couple of beggars." "Beggars!" she exclaimed. "Why where is your property?" "Neither here nor there, madam," I answered; "I'm not worth the price of a potatoe in the world."

VARIETY.

USEFUL HINTS.

Pork may be salted, particularly for Bacon, without barrels. Nearly all the western pork is salted in bulk, that is, piled up in one corner of the room like a pile of bricks, and sprinkled with dry salt. It is well to overhaul it once, to see that the salt touches all parts. I never eat better bacon than that made in this way, without a drop of pickle.

To keep bacon hams in summer.—Pack them in a flour barrel, in clean dry ashes of charcoal; head up the barrel and put it up stairs, where it is as dry and cool as possible.

Pickled Beef and Pork, in the South and West, is apt to sour. Take it out and smoke it dry—throw away the old pickle or cleanse it by boiling. Smoke the barrel thoroughly and repack the meat.

Don't throw away the Udder of your beef Cow.—Salted, smoked and dried, it is rich and delicious eating. Boil and eat it cold like tongue. Try it.

Lard never spoils in warm weather if it is cooked enough in frying out.

Wash your butter thoroughly in cold water, and work out all the buttermilk.—pack it in a stone jar and stop the mouth air-tight, and it will keep sweet forever.

Tomatoes are an excellent preserve.

Sweet or Olive Oil is the certain cure for the bite of a rattlesnake. Apply it internally and externally.

To cure scratches on a horse, wash the legs with warm strong soap-suds, and then with beef brine.—Two applications will cure the worst case.

Corn meal should never be ground very fine. It injures the richness of it. Try it coarse. This is the secret why Western "dodgers" are so good.

Rice is often over boiled. It never should be boiled in more water than it will absorb while boiling.—Put two cups of rice in three cups of water, and in eight minutes after it commences boiling, it is done.

"Whosoever discovereth secrets, loseth his credit, and shall never find a friend to his mind. Love thy friend and be faithful unto him."

SPLENDID VIADUCT.

Last week was completed the greatest work, of its kind, ever executed in this country. This is the Stockport Viaduct. The contractors being Liverpool men (John Tompkinson and Samuel and James Holme, builders,) hundreds of people went from this place, on Dec. 21st to view its completion. The Manchester and Birmingham direct line of railway now runs over not through, the town of Stockport. The arches literally stride over that large town. Standing in a valley in Cheshire, the town of Stockport is too low for the level of the railroad. Mr. Buck, the engineer, had the first stone laid on the 10th of March, 1839, and the last, or capstone, on the 21st of December, 1840. Thus, in 21 months was completed a viaduct, based on the solid rock, of 26 arches—22 of 63 feet span and 4 of 20 feet span. The length is 1786 feet. It stands 111 feet above the Mersey, which flows beneath, and is thus 6 feet higher than the Menai Bridge. The foundation, in the sand stone, is 6 feet deep, and 9 feet of stone work above ground. From thence to the springing of the arches, the piers are of brickwork, and the huge bonds of the same material. Brick was used as less likely, when well made, to chip, splinter, or decay. The quantity of bricks used amounted to 11,000,000, there were also used 400,000 cubic feet of stone, and the whole cost £70,000. The utmost settling in the whole work, after taking the wooden supporters from the arches, is half an inch.

A great saving has been effected by raising this viaduct to such a height, as it reduces the works on each side of the valley, and lessens the expense £50,000.—It has been made 1786 feet long, because they had to span all the streets. It is the first time that, for such a work, brick has been chiefly employed. This great world will long be a matter of wonder to the world.—English paper.

COMING THE DELICATE.

We saw a couple of yellow darkies on Sunday, a stout boy and his sweetheart, and the way they tortured the Queen's English would have given Dr. Johnson the hysterics. They were returning from church, and as we passed them the 'fair nigger,' who was resting languishingly upon Sambo's arm exclaimed: 'Dar! look; dar! de berry ossifier whar de gentleman detracted one of my teef.'

"Whoop! you doesn't say so, Miss Rossetta."

"Yes, but I does though."

"Poor ting! didn't de operation gib you uncommon acruciation!"

"Not berry. I only fainted three times, and de doctor gib me camfire and sitch me too. You eber hab any ob your teef sacrificed, Sambo?"

"Yes dear, seberal."

"And didn't you swoon like me did?"

"Neber de fuss time."

"Dat's bekos you belongs to the hard sec. If you was soft, like I is, you would have fainted shua."

"Oh, Miss Rossetta, believes you speaks de truf.—When I comes to distract your soft tenderness wid my hard disabilities, den I make stravagant spressions.—But if you'll allow me dat sollicitous pleasure ob presenting dis buckay to you, we'll block de painful subjeck on which we's been talkin for a more lubly teem?"

MCLEOD INDICTED.

Correspondence of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

LOCKPORT, Feb. 6, 1841.

The Grand Jury of the county came into court this forenoon, with a bill of indictment against ALEXANDER MCLEOD for the murder of AMOS DUFFEE, at the time burning of the steamboat Caroline. The case had engaged the attention of the jury since Wednesday morning; and the testimony of a large number of citizens was given in. Of the twenty jurors present, nineteen it is understood, were for the indictment of murder.

The prisoner was brought before the court this afternoon, and after being apprized by the District Attorney of the finding of the jury, he was remanded to jail by an order of the court, until the next term of the Oyer and Terminer, which commences on the 4th Monday of March next, when his trial in all probability will take place.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR, ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

PORTRAIT GALLERY OF EMINENT MASONS.—We take great pleasure in presenting the prospectus of Comp. Herring, in another column, to which we invite the attention of our Masonic friends. Mr Herring is the present Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of this State; and from his acknowledged ability, both as an artist and a scholar, there can be doubt but that the forthcoming work, will be worthy of his high attainments, as well as the exalted subject which will engage his attention. The publication of the "Portrait Gallery," in Numbers, on the days proposed, will bring it within the reach of almost every mason, and the completion of the work, will place in the hands of the subscriber (with but little inconvenient expense, because scarcely perceptible) a splendid work, worthy of being transmitted to the children of every mason. Comp. Herring has requested us to act as his agent in this city in the collection of subscriptions and monies, as well as in the distribution of the Nos. as they may arrive, which we will cheerfully do. All orders from abroad, can be sent to Comp. Herring at New York direct.

THE APOLLO ASSOCIATION.—We have received a copy of the transactions of this flourishing exhibition, and are pleased to learn that the object for which it was established, i. e., the promotion of the arts, of design—has been to a remarkable degree attained. It was formed about two years since, under the direction and patronage of several gentlemen of taste and wealth. It is so happily organised that all the members, which are now about 1000 in number, are directly interested in its results. It makes a depot where Artists can place those productions which have not been ordered in continual public exhibition. The subscription of members is, after current expenses have been met, given to the purchase of such pictures, stationary, &c. belonging to the exhibition as a committee of taste, previously appointed by the Association, shall find possessing real merit. The efforts thus collected, are afterwards by lot distributed among the members. By this means our readers will perceive artists sell their productions, and the members, besides enjoying the advantages of at all times visiting the exhibition, by having good efforts placed in their possession receive a practical knowledge of art. Another, and no mean inducement to persons joining this Association, is the engraving which is yearly sent them. This engraving is made at the express direction of the society, from a painting selected from their own exhibition, each of which copy is supposed to be worth $5. Five dollars is the price of membership.

GRIMES is delivering a course of lectures upon his favorite theme, phrenology, at the united solicitation of members of the legislature and students of the Medical College, in the Assembly Chamber. A call from so high a source Mr. S. has a right to esteem as a great compliment. We have on several occasions heard him, and do not hesitate in saying that he is a man of great genius and acquirement. The most creditable part of the matter is his being entirely a self made man.

ALBANY APPRENTICES LIBRARY.—By reference to another column, our readers will perceive, that Mr. Nichols has offered the use of the Amphitheatre on next Friday evening, for the benefit of the Apprentices Library. This institution is at present laboring under pecuniary embarrassments, which materially affect its usefulness, and the trustees are unable to devise any more feasible means of raising funds to meet the present exigency, than the one so generously offered by Mr. N. This Library was instituted in 1821, for the benefit mainly of young mechanics, and it may be emphatically termed their institution. It contains several thousand volumes—has a respectable class of readers of both sexes, and if the Benefit now sought for, shall realise the just expectation of the trustees, means will be immediately obtained to defray the incidental expenses, as well as to add a liberal addition of new books to the shelves. The bill of Fare, on the occasion, will be new and attractive, and we trust that the mechanics of the city, and particularly the young men, will take this BENEFIT in their own hands and fill the house to overflowing.

Those gentlemen desirous of assisting in the disposal of tickets, for the occasion, will be furnished, on application to either of the trustees.

ORATORY AND MUSIC.—Professor Brouson, who is highly celebrated as a lecturer on Oratory and Music, gives a regular course of lectures the ensuing week, at the chapel of the Female Academy, assisted by Christian, a German vocalist, of great repute. Prof. B. brings with him the most satisfactory testimonials and references; and there is no doubt, but a large auditory, will welcome his arrival among us. See Advertisement.

A distressing fire occurred at Quebec, on the third of this month in the destruction of a house occupied by Mr. James Smilie, a silversmith: Mr. Smilie and his wife, a servant maid, and an apprentice were burned to death.

The Rev. Comp. Salem Town, of Cayuga co. was unanimously elected Grand Chaplain of the Grand Chapter of this State, at its recent convocation. We inadvertently omitted his name in the list of Grand officers, published.

RHEUMATISM.

Mr. Hoffman.—As your journal appears to be a good family paper, in which I often find useful receipts, permit me to pay you back again, by the following, which I have tested in more than a hundred instances, with entire success, in the cure of Chronic Rheumatism, and impurities of the blood. Take one oz. of the chips or shavings of lignum vitæ wood, three oz. of rheubarb root, twelve oz. of sarsaparilla, 1 oz. of Soda, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. orange peel, and $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. of liquorice root; bruised up, put the whole in a vessel with eight quarts of water, place it on a slow fire, and simmer down to four quarts, then carefully strain it, adding $\frac{1}{2}$ pound of clarified brown sugar, and if made in summer, keep it in a cool place, to prevent souring. For an adult take a wine glass, before eating, three times a day. The patient will find it a pleasant beverage, operating as a gentle purge. It must be taken from ten to twenty days faithfully and the patient, must eat and drink temperately.

N. B. If any of your readers will take my prescription, I desire to be informed through you, when a cure is effected; this being the only "fee," expected by the Doctor.

U. S. Bank shares sold at 23 $\frac{1}{2}$ in New York on Tuesday. The bank refuses all paper but its own in payment of debts.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Albany Feb'y. 9. 1841.

Sir, The undersigned, Trustees of the Apprentices Library in Albany, take the liberty of introducing it to your notice.

This Library was raised for the laudable purpose of disseminating useful and practical knowledge, among all classes of Apprentices. A class hitherto too much overlooked and neglected midst our philanthropy. This institution is now destitute of funds to support and sustain it, and give it interest to its numerous readers. If it should meet your approbation and prove consistent with your interest and other engagements, to set apart the avails of one evening of your Amphitheatre, (which from its propriety of management offers a source of pleasure to our citizens) to give a benefit to this laudable institution. We can only express our best wishes that a generous public will not be backward in rewarding you suitably for your disinterested generosity, towards the mechanics and apprentices of Albany.

Albany, Feb'y. 10th 1841.

Gentlemen,

Your favor of the 9th inst. is duly received, and I take the earliest opportunity of informing you of my sincere attachment, to all charitable Institutions, which are designed to promote the welfare and happiness of the rising generation; and it affords me much pleasure to have it in my power to be able (in a small degree) to join with my fellow citizens in promoting that which all good citizens duly appreciate, useful and practical knowledge amongst all.

To your request I cheerfully tender you the use of my Amphitheatre, for Friday evening, February, 19th, 1841, for you to select such a bill of attraction as will promote your laudable object.

Yours respectfully,

S. H. NICHOLS.

To John Taylor, Jas. Robinson and others.

A CARD.

The Trustees of the Apprentices Library would beg leave again to present for the favorable consideration of the public the wants of this institution, which they have in charge. Some three years ago they were induced to appeal to the public generosity, by the institution of a fair, to extricate the Library from the debts which were then hanging over it, as well as to meet the necessary incidental expenses, as also to enable the trustees, to make such additions to the Library as its interests demanded. The result of that Appeal to our citizens was attended with success. A sufficient amount of money was then obtained, to free the institution from debt—to pay the incidental expenses, for a considerable length of time, as well as to make several valuable additions to the shelves of the Library.

It is now upwards of three years since the Library has made any claims to the benefactions of the public, which can be supported in no other way, and the Trustees encouraged by the generosity of their fellow citizens, would make another earnest appeal to their kindness by asking their assistance to relieve the Library from its pecuniary embarrassments; in the manner they now propose, which will be within the reach of almost every individual.

Mr. S. H. NICHOLS, the proprietor of the Albany Amphitheatre, in reference to the embarrassments, under which the Library at present rests, has, in the kindest manner, offered to set apart one night of the use of his splendid and well conducted establishment, for the benefit of the Library, with the privilege on the part of the Trustees of selecting such bill of fare, as will be appropriate to the occasion, and at the same time meet with the approbation of all classes of their fellow citizens.

In order to remove any objections which might be entertained of this mode of raising money for the Library, the Trustees are happy to say, that the objectionable features which have formerly been urged against amusements of a similar kind, are in the present instance entirely removed,—no improper person being permitted to visit the amphitheatre, and the use of ardent spirits, being entirely driven from its walls. Mr. Nichols deserves well of the community in the good order and character which he has given to his establishment, and his recompense is to be found, in the worth and respectability of his patrons. These remarks are made in justice to the proprietor, as well as in reference to the views of the Trustees, in making this selection for the public approval and patronage; and they trust that this their appeal to the public bounty, in behalf of a useful institution will be met by a corresponding effort to sustain the Library.

Young Henry, the Midshipman who was murdered by the Cannibals at one of the Feejee Islands, was a son of the late John V. Henry, of this city.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY IN THE UNITED STATES.—Brethren.—We have been witnesses of the effects of one of the most extraordinary delusions in regard to our Institution, which in any land or age have tried its strength or durability.

That jealousies and fear of an Institution every where conducted on liberal principles, should have excited a spirit of opposition in arbitrary or tyrannical governments have never surprised us; but when our Order was attacked in our own land, and the people our own neighbors and friends, were excited by false, malicious, and absurd accusations against it; when we saw families disturbed, societies convulsed, and individuals of eminent virtue and station denounced and persecuted, we deplored the folly and fanaticism of our enemies, and sought by patience, and quiet and orderly deportment to assuage the bitterness of our revilers, and to turn the hearts of our misguided accusers. We knew that our Institution was devised in wisdom for the improvement of society in every land, and could not long be left as a mark for the scorn and derision of demagogues and fanatics, nor remain an object of terror to the well disposed.

The delusion has passed away—there has been a redeeming spirit in the midst of the storm—a spirit of inquiry after truth, which has wrought out for us a vindication, and fixed it in the popular mind. Once more our Order has free course, and has resumed its place as the medium of union, friendship, and kind offices amongst 'good men' of every rank, station, party, sect, and profession in the land. What we could not do when compelled to defend ourselves against the inglorious assaults of an organized and reckless faction, we can now do: we can take high ground; we can place our Institution in its true position; we can openly declare its principles to attentive hearers, and verify our declarations by the testimony of the greatest, the purest, the best beloved and venerated men, whose names adorn the brightest pages of our country's history. We have it in our power to shew, that so far as Freemasonry from having a tendency to corrupt the morals, weaken the faith, impede the justice, contract the soul, or relax the patriotism of its votaries, our country stands indebted for a large portion of its welfare, honor, and security to the members of our Fraternity.

This high position it is my intention to maintain by a work which I propose to publish, if sustained by the approbation and aid of the Fraternity to the necessary extent.

To test this, I offer the following plan for the publication of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States.

To place the work within the reach of every member of the Fraternity, it will be published in numbers, in the imperial Octavo form, at periods of one or two months, at 50 cents a number, payable on delivery, and will extend as is supposed, to about fifty numbers, forming five large volumes. Each number will contain three Portraits engraved on steel, and occasionally other illustrations, with biographies written expressly with reference to the Masonic character and acts of each subject, (so far as materials can be obtained,) as well as to his private life. For the fidelity, accuracy and beauty of the work, the responsibility will rest alone on the editor and proprietor.

Extract from the minutes of the Grand Lodge, of the State of New York, Dec. 1st, A. L. 5840.

"The Grand Secretary then asked permission to present the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing, under the title of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States. The proposed Address to the Fraternity and the prospectus were then read; whereupon the following Resolution was unanimously adopted."

"Resolved.—That this Grand Lodge highly approve of the proposed work of the Rt. W. G. Secretary, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons,' and recommend it to the patronage of the Fraternity."

In Grand Chapter, of the State of New York, Feb. 3d, 5841.

"Resolved.—That the Grand Chapter of the State of N. York, do approve of the work proposed by our M. E. Companion James Herring, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons,' and while they commend it to the support of the Fraternity, to give to the author free access to the Records and Archives of this Grand Chapter, for such information on our Masonic History as may be necessary for his work."

LECTURES ON ORATORY AND MUSIC.—Professor BRONSON, (assisted by Mr. CHRISTIAN, a German vocalist,) commences a Popular Course of Lectures on these subjects. (condensing his text into six,) Tuesday evening, Feb. 16th, at eight o'clock, and continues each succeeding Friday and Tuesday evening, in the chapel of the Female Academy, Pearl street; interspersed with singing, and reading and recitations, from some of our principal poets and orators—descriptive, sentimental, patriotic, moral, amusing and trivial. The object of these Lectures are, to present an entirely new mode of developing and training the Voice for reading, speaking and singing; greatly extending its compass, increasing its power and music; a new method of learning the letters; of spelling, and teaching reading without a book, and then with a book; the causes and remedies of hoarseness and excitation; of the bronchitis and certain pulmonary diseases; and a new how almost any one can read, speak and sing for hours, without injury; disclosing the supposed mysteries of polyphony, (or ventriloquism,) showing how filmist how any can acquire it; commencing a new system of mental and vocal philosophy.

Single season tickets for the course, $2; trip's do. do. for a lady and gentleman, $3; family do. do. for 5 of its members, $5; single admission for one evening, 50 cents; triple do. do. $1. Programmes, testimonials, and references, at the principal book and music stores; where season tickets are for sale.

N. B. Mr. Bronson will give practical instruction in mental and vocal philosophy to individuals and classes of ladies and gentlemen in the day time, at Concert Hall, 46 State st. 2d story; where he may be generally found.

POETRY.

THE FALSE ONE.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY.

I knew him not,—I sought him not,—
He was my father's guest;
I gave him not one smile more kind
Than those I gave the rest:
He sat beside me at the board,
The choice was not my own,
But oh! I never heard a voice
With half so sweet a tone.

And at the dance again we met,
Again I was his choice,
Again I heard the gentle tone
Of that beguiling voice:
I sought him not,—he led me forth
From all the fairest there,
And told me he had never seen
A face he thought so fair.

Ah! wherefore did he tell me this?
His praises made me vain:
And when he left me, how I longed
To hear that voice again!
I wondered why my old pursuits
Had lost their wonted charm,
And why the path was dull, unless
I leant upon his arm.

Alas! I might have guessed the cause;
For what could make me shun
My parents' cheerful dwelling-place
To wander all alone?
And what could make me braid my hair,
And study to improve
The form that he had deigned to praise?
What could it be—but love?

Oh! little knew I of the word,
And less of man's career;
I thought each smile was kindly meant,
Each word of praise sincere.
His sweet voice spoke of endless love—
I listened and believed,
And little dreamt how oft before
That sweet voice had deceived.

He smiles upon another now,
And in the same sweet tone
He breathes to her those winning words
I once thought all my own.
Oh! why is she so beautiful?—
I cannot blame his choice,
Nor can I doubt she will be won
By that beguiling voice.

THE LAND OF OUR BIRTH.

There is not a spot in this wide peopled earth
So dear to the heart as the land of our birth:
'Tis the home of our childhood! the beautiful spot
Which mem'ry retains when all else is forgot.

May the blessings of God,
Ever hallow the sod,

And its valleys and hills by our children be trod.

Can the language of strangers, in accents unknown,
Send a thrill to our bosom like that of our own?
The face may be fair, and the smile may be bland,
But it breathes not the tones of our dear native land!

There's no spot on earth
Like the land of our birth.

Where heroes keep guards o'er the altar and hearth!

How sweet is the language which taught us to blend
The dear names of parent, husband and friend;
Which taught us to lip on our mother's soft breast,
The ballads she sung as she rock'd us to rest.

May the blessings of God
Ever hallow the sod,

And its valleys and hills by our children be trod!

May Columbia long lift her white crest o'er the wave,
The birth-place of science, the home of the brave;
In her cities may peace and prosperity dwell,
May her daughters in beauty and virtue excel;
May their beauty and worth
Bless the land of their birth,
And heroes keep guard o'er the altar and hearth!

THE DEAD SOLDIER.

Wreck of a warrior passed away.
Thou form without a name!
Which thought and felt but yesterday,
And dreamt of future fame.
Stripped of thy garments, who shall guess
Thy rank, thy lineage, and race?
If haughty chieftain, holding sway,
Or lowlier, destined to obey!

The light of that fixed eye is set,
And all is moveless now.
But Passion's traces linger yet,
And lower upon that brow;
Expression has not yet waxed weak,
The lips seem e'en in act to speak.
And clenched the cold and lifeless hand,
As if it grasped the battle brand.

Though from that head, late towering high,
The waving plume is torn,
And low in dust that form doth lie,
Dishonored and forlorn,
Yet Death's dark shadow cannot hide
The graven characters of pride,
That on the lip and brow reveal
The impress of the spirit's seal.

Lives there a mother to deplore
The son she ne'er shall see?
Or maiden, on some distant shore,
To break her heart for thee?
Perchance to roam a maniac there,
With wild flower wreaths to deck her hair,
And through the weary night to wait
Thy footsteps at the lonely gate.

Long shall she linger there, in vain
The evening fire shall trim,
And gazing on the darkening main,
Shall often call on him
Who hears her not—who cannot hear—
Oh! deaf forever is the ear
That once in listening rapture hung
Upon the music of her tongue!

Long may she dream—to wake is wo;
Ne'er may remembrance tell
Its tale to bid her sorrows flow,
And hope to sigh farewell;
The heart bereaving of its stay,
Quenching the beam that cheers her way
Along the waste of life, till she Shall lay her down and sleep like thee!

CHINESE POETRY.

From "Wang Kequo Lwan Pih Neen Chang Han: or, The lasting Resentment of Miss Kequo Lwan Wang," we take the following specimens of Chinese poetry. Here's a poetical assignation:

"In secret I take these words and send them to my lord,

But do not inconsiderately open your lips to other people!

This night the door of the fragrant apartment will not be locked,

And when the moon changes the shadows of the flowers, let my lover come."

And here is a Chinese lady in a passion, because her lover has deceived her:

"As I lean against my door-post, and in grief and silence meditate on by-gone scenes,

I sigh; alas! my dream of wedded bliss has now vanished like a smile!

Love in early life stirred up the rambling fibres of passion, and dragged the green and tender buds of my heart astray,—

Rage now follows like a torrent, and shrinks these green buds to the withered red of resentment!

Then, I said, My lord will return true to his promise, as Spring to her revolving period;—

But now, alas! full well I know that 'all is vanity!'
I turn my head, and lean against the railing, the painful spot of our long farewell—

And all my sorrows, for ten thousand years, I lay at the door of the false and cruel east wind!"

TO MY MOTHER.

BY W. D. GALLAGHER.

Thy cheek—it is pale my mother,
And the light of thine eye is dim—
And the gushings of gladness that used to fill
Thy cup of joy to its brim,
Come, like the visits of angels,
So 'few and far between.'
That I feel the reed is a broken one
On which thou art doomed to lean.

'Tis a bitter thing, my mother,
To look on a parent's decay—
To behold the Spoiler's ravages,
As he tears life's bloom away:
'Tis bitter to look on the furrows
He ploughs in thy godlike brow—
To weep o'er the gems of intellect
That are rayless, and sheenless now.

But there is a thought, my mother,
That is balm to the wounded heart—
Though the gift of life is a frail one,
And from it we soon must part,
There is a haven of gladness,
For the weary heart a home—
Where the sight of joy is never dim,
And sorrow never come.

On that blissful home, my mother,
Thine eye is often bent,
Like a tiny child's on a wished-for thing—
So longing—so intent.
O, how pure in the eye of Heaven
Must the heart of the Christian be—
So entirely fixed on that home above,
From earthliness so free.

At the Quarterly meeting of the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York, in December, a communication was read from the Rt. W. G. Lodge of Hamburg, constituting the W. Fredorik Liese, Past Master of Independent Royal Arch Lodge, No. 2, the Representative of the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, in the Grand Lodge of the State of New York. The W. Brother Liese being in attendance, clothed in the peculiar costume of the G. L. he represented, the Grand Lodge was raised, as a token of respect to the G. L. of Hamburg, and the W. Brother was introduced by the Grand Secretary, and conducted by the Grand Deacons to the East, where he was addressed by the Grand Master as follows:—

W. BR. LIESE,

It is with great pleasure I receive you as the Representative of the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of Hamburg, in the Grand Lodge of the State of New York.

The representative system which has recently been adopted by this Grand Lodge promises great and general usefulness. An increasing desire for information is manifesting itself throughout the whole Masonic fraternity, and I know of no plan so well calculated to effect the desired object, as that which makes it the duty of the Representative to communicate to his constituents, all useful and interesting information, that may come to his knowledge. With the adoption of this system commences a new era in the history of this Grand Lodge, and I hope to see it carried out to its fullest extent, not only for the interest and gratification of our own members, but because its benefits will be participated by the whole fraternity.

I congratulate you on the high honor which has been conferred on you as the first Representative of a Continental Grand Lodge in the United States. To your hands has been committed a great trust and responsibility, which for the honor of this body, as well as for your own representation, will require the exercise of discretion, industry and talent.

In communicating with the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of Hamburg, you will please convey to them the assurances of our highest esteem and respect, and that we most cordially greet them, in the presence of their Representative with the right hand of Fellowship.

The W. Brother Liese made the following reply.

RT. W. DEPUTY GRAND MASTER,

The distinguished honor which has been conferred on me by the R. W. Grand Lodge of Hamburg, I am fully sensible of; and while I hold the commission of Representative of that Masonic government, which is the most ancient in Germany, I shall neither forget the responsibilities which rest upon me as such, nor the duties which I owe to this Grand Lodge.

I anticipate the happiest results, from the friendly intercourse now opened between the Fraternity in the State of New York and in Germany, and shall be gratified by rendering every facility to the other Grand Lodges of the United States, which desire to establish an intercourse with the Grand Lodge of Hamburg.

The representative system has been long established in Europe, and is the means of preserving union and harmony amongst the various branches of the GREAT FRATERNITY. The intercourse between this country and Europe is now so constant, that every embarrassment to Masonic intercourse ought to be removed, and I shall be ready to aid every worthy Brother departing from this country to, or arriving from my FATHERLAND.

I shall not fail, Rt. W. Brother, to make known to the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, the fraternal sentiments you have expressed, and the cordial welcome you have given to their Representative. I accept and grasp your right hand of fellowship, in the name of the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, most affectionately and sincerely.

At the close of this address the W. Br. Liese, and the Grand Master gave the right hand of Fellowship, in token of the friendship and union between the two Grand Lodges.

The Grand Master then delivered the following Address to the Grand Lodge.

BRETHREN,

The interesting ceremony of receiving this evening the first representative of a Masonic Government on the Continent of Europe in this Grand Lodge offers me the earliest opportunity of addressing you on the subject, and of presenting my views of the necessity and importance of the system which is now in operation to unite the great Masonic Family in an intimate correspondence and harmonious action. This Grand Lodge and the Grand Lodges of the several States and Territories of this Republic, are to all intents and purposes independent Masonic Governments exercising, according to the fundamental constitutions of the Order, supreme and unquestionable jurisdiction over the institution and its members within their several boundaries: enacting laws for their guidance, distributing honors and rewards to the deserving, and punishments to evil doers. Every member of the Order is, therefore, equally interested in the acts of the masonic government as he is in those of the civil government under which he resides, and has an equal right to be informed on one as on the other. Each Masonic Government regularly established, and recognised by its peers, is but a part of one great institution, spread over the whole earth, and bound together by one fundamental constitution. Administered by each government, not only for the advantage of its own people, but for the interest of the whole fraternity, and these governments are in fact in their limited spheres, what the governments of nations would be if administered, not for their own little section of this wide world alone, but for the benefit of the great family of man.

The duties of the masonic governments correspond with those of the civil governments of States; they are to promote the peace, security, prosperity and happiness of the People: in times of danger to afford protection, by the wise application of their own powers, or by the powers of their allies; in periods of prosperity, to give the best direction to the current of popular activity, by the elevation of the standard of knowledge of virtue, by cultivating foreign relations and internal improvements. Such has been the course pursued by this Grand Lodge, steadily and undeviatingly through the whole period of the present Grand Mastership. Amongst the means which have been adopted to strengthen and secure the union, integrity, and purity of the Order is the system which is now gradually going into operation, and which when fully developed, will concentrate in this body every facility for the communication and reception of intelligence, and for the cultivation of those fraternal relations throughout the world which constitute the unity, usefulness and glory of our institution.

The information we shall have a right to expect from our representatives in foreign Grand Lodges, while it will enlarge our knowledge, will undoubtedly elevate the standard by which the importance of our Order is to be estimated by ourselves, these are a part of the effects anticipated from the system.

The Foreign correspondence of the Grand Lodges was formerly limited, except on some extraordinary occasions, to an annual pamphlet from each; these were received by the G. Secretary, and placed in the hands of a committee for examination, during the annual communication, and by them usually reported on in the briefest possible terms. To the fraternity at large, little, if any information found its way through the committee of foreign correspondence, on the legislation of the Masonic Governments, or the important movements every where made in relation to our Order. But the attention of the Fraternity has within a few years been drawn to these subjects. Every where within this jurisdiction, there exists a strong desire for information, not only as to what this Grand Lodge is doing, but what all other Grand Lodges are doing.—This desire after information on all subjects relating to the progress and state of the Order, affords a sure evidence that the spirit of the Institution is vigorous and active; and it is the duty, and has been the determination of the Grand Officers to afford every encouragement to the increase and diffusion of useful knowledge. Our foreign correspondence has been largely extended, and is still advancing in extent and interest, and the result has been an increased demand for the publications of this Grand Lodge, so that the very large editions of the transactions usually printed, will now scarcely suffice; and the committee on foreign correspondence, at the last annual meeting reported their inability to get through the examination satisfactorily during the three days of the session. Our foreign correspondence has now commenced in a form, new on this continent, but, long approved in Europe, and the system now only awaits the action of the Grand Officers of several of the Grand Lodges of America, to bring new laborers into the field. We are informed that the Grand Lodge of New Jersey has instructed their Representative to invite the co-operation of the Foreign representatives in this great work, which will no doubt be cheerfully complied with, and I will add that any assistance in the power of the Grand Officers will be willingly afforded.

HUSBANDRY.

CARE OF STOCK.

From December until April, in our northern climate, and in a greater or less degree in more southern ones, the great business of the farmer consists in the care of his domestic animals. One of the great sources of loss to the farmer is the wretched condition in which his animals are frequently kept; their wool, their milk, and their ability to labor, are in a great measure determined by their keeping during the winter. Without shelter, without water, without food, or with at best an irregular and partial supply, it must be expected that disease will invade his flocks and herds, and occasion losses that months of labor will be required to counterbalance.

Domestic animals must have shelter; it is as necessary for them as it is for man, and one may as well talk of comfort without it as the other. Few things are more trying to the man who has a soul, than to see a flock of sheep crouching in a corner of the fence half buried in the snow; a few lean cows, their feet so drawn together by cold and hunger that all might stand in a half bushel; half a dozen swine of the alligator breed, squealing, and their noses imploringly turned to the place where the trough should be; and the same air of discomfort pervading every thing on the premises. Where animals are kept in this way we instinctively expect to find the windows of the house stuffed with cloaks and old hats, and the owner at the fire-side of the nearest tavern or grog shop—and rarely will such expectations be disappointed.

Animals should be salted in the winter with great attention and regularity. Farmers are too careless about it this in summer, and are apt to neglect it altogether in winter; a course which requires reformation at once. It is necessary for their health, gives an appetite; and, summer or winter, they should always have access to salt.

Feed your cattle regularly, whatever may be the kind of food. This half starving animals, feeding them as it suits your convenience, keeping them without salt or water, and thinking they can get along without shelter, is bad policy, and should be repudiated at once by every man who would be merciful to his beast, or find in his pocket satisfactory evidence that keeping stock is not a losing business.—Cultivator.

BIOGRAPHY.

ARCHIMEDES.

Archimedes was born at Syracuse, and related to Hiero, king of Sicily: he was remarkable for his extraordinary application to mathematical studies, but more so for his skill and surprising invention in Mechanics. He excelled likewise in Hydrostatics, Astronomy, Optics, and almost every other science; he exhibited the motions of the heavenly bodies in a pleasing and intrusive manner, within a sphere of glass of his own contrivance and workmanship; he likewise contrived curious and powerful machines and engines for raising weights, hurling stones, darts &c. launching ships, and for exhausting the water out of them, draining marshes, &c. When the Roman Consul, Marcellus, besieged Syracuse, the machines of Archimedes were employed; these showered upon the enemy a cloud of destructive darts, and stones of vast weight and in great quantities; their ships were lifted into the air by his cranes, levers, hooks, &c. and dashed against the rocks or precipitated to the bottom of the sea; nor could they find safety in retreat; his powerful burning glasses reflected the condensed rays of the sun upon them with such effect, that many of them were burned. Syracuse was however at last taken by storm, and Archimedes, too deeply engaged in some geometrical speculations to be conscious of what had happened, was slain by a Roman soldier. Marcellus was grieved at his death, which happened A. C. 210, and took care of his funeral. Cicero, when he was Questor of Sicily, discovered the tomb of Archimedes overgrown with bushes and weeds, having the sphere and cylinder engraved on it, with an inscription which time had rendered illegible.

His reply to Hiero, who was one day admiring and praising his machines, can be regarded only as empty boast. "Give me," said the exulting philosopher, "a place to stand on, and I will lift the earth." This, however, may be easily proved to be impossible; for granting him a place, with the simplest machine, it would require a man to move swifter than a cannon shot during the space of 100 years, to lift the earth only one inch in all that time. Hiero ordered a golden crown to be made, but suspecting that the artists had purloined some of the gold and substituted base metal in its stead, he employed our philosopher to detect the cheat; Archimedes tried for some time in vain, but one day as he went into the bath, he observed that his body excluded just as much water as was equal to its bulk; the thought immediately struck him that this discovery had furnished ample data for solving his difficulty; upon which he leaped out of the bath, and ran through the streets homewards, crying out, I have found it! I have found it! The best edition of his works is that of Torrelli, edited at the Clarendon Press, Oxford, fol. 1792, by Dr. Robertson, Savilian Professor of Astronomy.

VARIETY.

THE OBSTINATE SAINT.

In all Sicilian cities the number of churches is very great, every church has its patron saint, and every saint has his procession; that of St. Sebastian, in Catania is not the least remarkable; he is a favorite in all Catholic countries. Perhaps not one in the long catalogue of saints has so often exercised the genius of painters;—in any extensive collection you are sure to see his martyrdom a dozen times repeated. He is in great estimation in Catania, and deservedly so, having been known, even in these degenerate days to give proofs of no common sagacity. A tradesman was some time since taken ill, and having more confidence in the saint than in the doctors, vowed, if he recovered, to make him an offering of a certain sum. His prayers were heard and accepted; but according to the proverb, Passato il pericolo, gabbato il santo.

which may be translated,

By danger scar'd, in sickness faint
We vow whole thousands to the saint:
But for his pains, the peril past,
The simple saint gets chous'd at last.

Maestro Guiseppe, for such was his name, forgo his promise; but it was not easy to cheat St. Sebastian. The day of his festival came round, and in the course of his profession he had to pass by the habitation of his short memoried devotee. Wonderful to relate, when he came opposite to the door, though borne on the shoulders of twenty stout porters, he made a dead stop; nor could all the efforts of his bearers, nor all the prayers of the priests, induce him to stir a single step. Many were the attempts of his brawny supporters to move him: in vain, they might as soon have moved mount Etna; in vain they lagged and tugged from before, and pushed and shoved from behind; in vain the populace wept, the priest prayed the porters swore, the saint would have seen them severally blind, hoarse, and broken-winded, before he would have bugged. The contest was plainly unequal and the reinforcement of twenty broad back Capuchins advanced to put their herculean shoulders to the task; but the saint, more indignant than ever, as if to show his contempt at this assistance, now absolutely retrograded, stern foremost, on the procession which followed at his heels, overthrowing and rolling porters, priests and populace, men, women, and children, promiscuous in the mire. How long matters would have continued in this state there is no saying; the pertinacious saint resolutely maintained his ground, and would probably have kept it to this day, had not one of the priests shrewdly conjectured that the saint was displeased with some one in the neighborhood, when another fortunately recollected the vow of Maestro Guiseppe. Great was the clamour and indignation of the pious populace; St. Sebastian was allowed on all hands to have reason on his side; a thousand tongues called at once on Maestro Guiseppe to pay the saint his due, and his door was already yielded to the hands and feet of a zealous multitude, when the dismayed and astonished votary came trembling forth with a bag of money in his hand, which, having first demanded pardon of his offended patron for the shortness of his memory, he reverently consigned to the priest. The effect was instantaneous and wonderful; the saint a moment before heavier than lead, became at once light as a feather, and to make up for lost time was observed to move down the street at double his ordinary pace, smiling, as many spectators are ready to swear, as he went; whilst the applauding populace followed shouting. "A miracle! a miracle!"

RATIONALE OF PROPERTY.

Why, it has been asked, should man be allowed to appropriate more than is necessary for his support? We ask what support is meant? The momentary satisfying of his hunger by shooting a deer or plucking a fruit? Is he allowed to shoot several deer and dry the meat for the winter? Is he not allowed to cultivate a tree which shall give him fruit for certainty, so that he may not be exposed again to hunger, the pain of which he knows already? May he not cultivate a patch of land to have corn for his children? If he has slain a buck to satisfy his hunger, is he allowed to appropriate the skin to himself and call it his own? If the industrious fisherman sails to the bank of Newfoundland to appropriate to himself the unappropriated codfish, has he no right to catch as many as he thinks he and his children shall want for the whole year?—But they cannot live upon codfish alone: may he not take so many codfish as to exchange part of them for other food, for clothing? Does supporting his family not include the sending of his children to school?—May he not catch some more to save the money he may obtain for it, that, should he perish at sea, his wife and children may not suffer from want or become a burthen to others? Where does the meaning of support stop? Why should it apply to the satisfying of physical wants only? There are wants far higher than these, the wants of civilization? We want accumulated property; without it, no ease, without ease no leisure; without leisure, no earnest and persevering pursuit of knowledge, no high degree of national civilization. Aristotle already lays it down as the basis of high civilization to be free and have leisure.—Lieber's Manual of Political Ethics.

WORKS OF FICTION.

There are many subjects of great importance upon which the opinions of thinking men have always been widely different, and in regard to none perhaps, more so than the propriety of reading works of fiction, and especially that portion of them commonly styled novels. While some insist, not only, that their influence is harmless, but also that they are necessary and productive of many good effects, others with equal sincerity and zeal, are disposed to maintain that effects the most deleterious and melancholy are to be ascribed to the perusal of them. As the practice of reading these works is very general, and seems to be so firmly persisted in, notwithstanding the many admonitions which have been blazoned abroad from the most respectable sources against it, and as the question in itself has therefore become an important and interesting one, we may be pardoned for inquiring into the cause of this diversity of sentiment, and attempting to discover on which side the mistake lies, if either party be wholly wrong, or (which would be the more pleasant task) endeavoring to show how the opinions of both of these classes may be reconciled. And here, in view of this last object, we may remark, that it will go far in attaining it, if we keep in mind the important fact, the absurdity of reasoning upon the influence of any thing from its abuse solely. It is true that if by some strange tendency in our nature, sound things were always abused, in a greater degree than they were used, it would be wise, if no means of remedying it were discovered, to forego the advantage derivable from the latter, in order to avoid the evils flowing from the former. But this would not in many instances be the part of wisdom, and we are inclined to think that we are not called upon, by the existence of such unusual circumstances, in the case of works of fiction, to adopt a course of this kind, the propriety of which in any case is at the best, problematical. We are to remember that there is scarcely a faculty or source of enjoyment given to man, which is not more or less abused, and they who see the injurious consequences of this course, and desire to prevent them, would seem to attain their object best, not by withdrawing that source of enjoyment, or destroying that faculty, or preventing its exercise, but by teaching and inculcating the manner of using them as they were naturally intended to be used. Much of the difference of sentiment on this subject to which we have alluded, has undoubtedly arisen from the views of those who are opposed to the reading of works of fiction, being based upon the effects of the abuse of them, and from their mistaking the remedy to be applied.

This remark will however only apply to the more moderate of this class; there are others who take higher ground and maintain and attempt to prove the baleful tendency of all works of fiction, because they are fiction, and also on account of their general light and imaginative character. To such we are willing to give a fair hearing, and carefully to consider all they have to advance, although we are free to admit that however substantial their arguments may be, however convincing to our reason, our hearts would heave many a sigh when we were compelled forever to abandon our Shakespeares, our Scotts, our Miltons, and many more, and forget too forever, the many sweet and endearing lessons which we had imbibed from their glowing and eternal pages.

Of this latter kind of opponents there are two classes; one, who are incapable from their very nature of appreciating the use of fictitious works; who, having no imaginations themselves, are unable to understand its developements in others. They are mere matter of fact men, who rank a supposition with a falsehood, and condemn the most beautiful fable or creation of the imagination, as a deliberately formed tissue of untruths. With such men it is idle to reason; their intellect may be strong and clear enough, but they want the appropriate faculties to which such works are principally addressed. Nor are such men to be despised. They are useful in many departments of physical or mental exertion for which the possession of these faculties would render them less fit.

PAUL AT LYSTRA.

Iconium had heard and felt

The sifting, heart revealing call,
In meek submission numbers knelt

Receiving Jesus as their all.
But Jewish pride and Gentile spite
Resist and banish Gospel light.

"O Lystra hear the word of life!

The God that made the world is one.

Forsake this vanity and strife,

And find a Savior in His Son."

The speaker needs no artful gloss,

He tells of Jesus and the cross.

His beaming eye and earnest tone

Collect the gazing crowd to hear;

The manner meets their sense alone,

Attracts with love and awes with fear.

Their impious praise with grief he meets,

Then stoned, his blood bedews their streets.

Such the perverseness of the heart;

The man who brings the Lord's command

Is forced in sadness to depart,

Or hell's seductive arts withstand;

Is marked with persecution's rod,

Or, worshiped as himself a God.

FULTON.

Fulton possessed genius. It was not to be confined by the impediments that poverty might cast in its way, or overcome by the persecution of the ignorant! For though he was born in obscurity, and possessed but few advantages, yet his genius burst every barrier that would feign have held it fast, left far in the rear every envious competitor,—rose to the summit of the temple of fame, and there inscribed his name; a name that will live as long as time shall be—a name that will echo upon our ears as long as our mighty rivers are navigated by the majestic steamboat, or our extended railroads traversed by the rapid car.

Mankind are indebted to no individual more than to the distinguished Fulton—no single person has accomplished more, or is there any one the products of whose genius confer a greater benefit upon the human race.

Like him who tamed the wild lightning, was he destined by a wise providence to be a blessing to the world, and acting on principles as noble as his genius, he could not be swayed by private interest, or bribed by the gold of the British aristocracy; for while England was desirous of maintaining the empire of the Ocean, she could not look with composure at the inventions of an individual, whose object was to restore to all nations the liberty of the seas.

For years did he labor with assiduity and perseverance, to bring into use his sub-marine ships, and with these he hoped to render the highway of nations open to all. He was not to be discouraged by vexatious disappointment—but opposition seemed only to add ardor to his lofty mind, and increase his confidence in the utility of his noble designs. Conscious of the rectitude of his own conduct, and the advantages the world would derive from his inventions, he proudly persevered amid the jeers and scoffs of the community, and accomplished more than he anticipated. Intense must have been the emotions of his bosom, when the first steamboat was to proceed up the beautiful Hudson; he could hear the whispers of his most intimate friends rejoicing that their fortunes and reputations were not engaged in so fruitless an enterprise, and he knew, that not thirty persons in the city of New York, believed that she would be of the least service. Imagine his anxiety as she proceeded from the wharf, and glided majestically even against the rapid current of the river. All he had was engaged in the enterprise, and all his future hopes were centered there.—And what a spectacle must she have presented to the astonished multitude who thronged the banks of the river, and who described her as bidding defiance to the winds and waves and spouting a galaxy of flame to light her on the passage,—there was it clearly demonstrated that "knowledge is power"—there was it satisfactorily proved that fear is the offspring of ignorance—for there was genius triumphant.

But however great may have been the genius of Fulton by nature, however much above the common level of mankind were his talents, yet he never would have been distinguished, had they not been cultivated by the severest discipline. Deep did he drink at the fountain of abstract science, and close was the application of thought upon any thing that would bear on the glorious design of benefitting the world. Nothing seemed too arduous to be undertaken, or too difficult to be overcome. You might see him with a countenance pale with unremitting thought, investigating perhaps some important truth at noon of night, and then arising from his sleepless couch, to note some new formed plan, or follow out the chain of thought, regardless of the passing hour, or failing nature's slow decay. And the requiem that was sung over the infuriated Kirke White can equally be applied to the lamented Fulton.

"O what a noble heart was here undone,
When science's self destroyed her favorite son?
Yes she too much indulged thy fond pursuit;
She sowed the seeds, but death has reaped the fruit.

And he fell in the prime of life a victim to intense application, and the world has been deprived of the benefit of his unfinished inventions. Never, at the death of a private individual has the community manifested greater signs of bereavement, and well it might for a more disinterested patriot never lived. Often was it declared by him that he never would hold a public trust, and wealth was of no use, only as far as it was subservient to benevolent purposes.

We pass over the pages of history and find recorded there the names of Alexander, Caesar, and Napoleon, and they will continue to be recorded. But when their exploits are contrasted with the doings of such men as Fulton, they sink in the estimation of an enlightened community, and tend only to add lustre to his glorious career. They were the destroyers of millions to satisfy their own insatiable ambition, and to aggrandize themselves. But his ambition was more holy, it sought to ameliorate the condition of mankind, even at the expense of his own. And well may the nation that gave birth to such a son, grieve at his loss; and ever should she hold in remembrance a name so sacred, and show her gratitude even if she be free, for gratitude is not incompatible with freedom.

POPULAR TALES.

DICK DENNETT; OR THE SANGUINE MAN.

At these words she turned pale, white, black, blue, and settling at a livid purple, she assailed me like a hunted tigress. "O you wicked, nasty, good-for-nothing, insinuating, swindling rascal!" she exclaimed; "this is how you entrapped me, is it? And I, thinking you such a good match!" "Ay, there it is, you see, old lady, I said, 'that we have both been done. I thought the same of you.' 'I ought to have asked for a settlement,' she cried. 'Ah, but you knew better, for in that case you must have exposed your own poverty before you could have discovered mine; but come,' said I, cool in my despair, 'I have most cause to complain; but I'm forgiving, let us part friends, and trouble each other no more.' 'Part!' she screamed. 'What, you supposed you've got one of your nasty, trolloping trulls, do you, that march from one town to another with you, and then go back to their own beats? No, sir; I'm a virtuous woman, and your betters. I don't choose to have my character open to remarks; and please God, I'll stick to you as long as I live.' 'Then here's a speedy release,' I said to her, as I swallowed a bumper of brandy. 'Ah, you unnatural wretch!' she answered, eyeing me with fury; 'it's a wonder it did not choke you; but I'll live to worry you every day of your life.'

"And faith, she seems likely to keep her word—the old hag promises to be immortal: leave her I can't, for I have not a sou. And she is such a desperate old catamaram, that she'd follow at my heels to the land's end, and have me advertised by the way. And then to appear such as I am, when I have been what I have. And where but in London can I hope for any thing? In vain I have tried all my former friends, to employ their interest for me, in any way. One fellow offered to get me made marker at a billiard-table. I husband that hunting-whip for his especial service. But damn despair and all regrets—nunc est bibendum—hold your tongue, and fill your glass, I hate condolence, and there may be a bright morrow for me yet. In fact, I don't mind telling you, there is an old gentleman in the neighborhood, as rich as Tippoo, who has lately taken a monstrous liking to me; he is very old, and ailing, and moreover he talks of consulting me on an alteration in his will. He has not a child or a relative in the world, and he always calls me his dear boy, and says I'm the image of a little friend of his of the other sex, who died thirty years ago. And now," said he, "let's drop the subject of my fortunes, it's a painful one to me, as you may suppose; and tell me what you've been doing. There, there, spare me your commiseration."

"By-the-by," said I, after, in my turn, I had satisfied Dick's curiosity, "if you have that I. O. U. of mine at hand, I'll discharge it now. I've thought of it a hundred times lately, when I could not find you."

"What I. O. U.?" said Dick.

"Why the one I gave you at the Clarendon."

"I remember none," he replied.

"What not," said I, "when I lost ten pounds to you? You were rather sprung to be sure, but you must recollect it; however I'll pay it now, while I have the opportunity, and you can put the note behind the fire when you find it." And so saying, I handed him over the amount.

"Well, upon my soul," he said, "I've quite forgotten all about it."

"But I had not, I assure you," I answered; "see," added, showing him in my pocket-book, an entry in German, which he could not read, of the height of the tans des Vaches, "here is a memorandum I made of in Switzerland, a twelvemonth ago, when it occurred to my mind. I am convinced Dick did not scent the use, for I must do him the justice to say, that his ride has kept pace with his poverty, and that in his ant he has never degenerated into a sponge."

The next morning early I took leave of Dick, who could fain have had me make a stay with him, but I had engagements pending, in London, which were of peremptory nature, and which obliged me to decline his invitation. At parting he shook me heartily by the hand, promised I should hear from him soon, and that we should have another night at the Clarendon as soon as the old gentleman, his patron, should slip his wind.

Some considerable time from this visit had elapsed, when I received a letter of exultation from Dick, informing me of his wife's death. He would not write me, he said, till he had seen her fairly earthed, for fear of accidents; but that pleasurable task has fallen to him the day before the date of his letter. He also told me, that the old general, for such his patron was, was very ill, and that I might expect to see him in town in a month or two, with his windfall, adding, in the meantime, "I'm working devilish hard with the old boy, being nurse, valet, steward, butler, and secretary to him."

It was about six months after this that Dick was announced to me in the privacy of my sanctum. After a hearty greeting, I perceived he was in black, and presuming he would not long wear the willow for his spouse, I immediately conjectured that the general was dead. Dick confirmed my surmises.

"And you are come up," I said, "to enjoy the girls of fortune?" at this he cackinnated, but very feebly, "well, I wish you joy, with all my heart."

"Thank you," said Dick, "but the truth is, my dear fellow, you are rather premature."

"How so?" I asked, "the general is dead."

"O yes; he is dead."

"Well?"

"Well," responded Dick, "he is dead, certainly, but I am nothing benefited by that."

"Indeed," I said.

"No," said Dick. "The old sinner had me in constant attendance on him for the last nine months: I made his tea and toasted his muffins in the morning; read the paper to him; gave him his tiffin and his pills; measured out his medicines by a stop watch; aired his linen; kept the key of his cellar; paid his bills; rowed the servants; stuffed him at dinner, and listened nightly to his prosings about the storming of Seringapatam; laughed at all the standard jokes of the old service, and slept in his room, upon chairs, to be handy. That deserved something. Well, the old hypocrite grew worse, always professing the warmest feelings for me. 'O my boy, Denmet,' he would say, 'how shall I repay for all your kindness, but it will soon be all over with me, and then—' put out the light, and then the life,' thought I. At length the case grew critical, he knew it himself, and told me he thought it time he should see to his will. I, of course, commonplace it as usual—hoped he had many years yet to live, and so forth; but he desired me to send for the lawyer and the parson, which I accordingly did. On their arrival they were closetted with him, and on their departure the former grinned a smile at me, which left me no doubt of my place in the testament. When myself and the doctor re-entered the room, the patient was approaching at last to his dissolution. He beckoned me to the bed-side, and taking my hand which he pressed between both his, he muttered something, out of which I could only distinguish the words—will—left you—value—nearest my heart—gratitude—reparation—conscience? and, with this last word upon his lips, he sank down exhausted and expired. Of course I equipped myself with black—what could the expectant sole legatee do less? I sealed up the drawers, and cupboards, and desks; had the house put in order; arranged the funeral; called on Mr. Doublesides, the attorney, who received me so graciously that I did not think it worth a moment's while to even hint at an infringement on professional etiquette, in any intimation of the general's bequests, and desired him to attend after the funeral with the will, and to do generally whatever might be usual in such cases, or requisite in this. Then, don't laugh at me—I had the horses physicked, and turned out; ascertained how much it would cost, and how long it would take, to stucco the front of the house, and build a new lodge, better stables, and a billiard-room; and prepared an advertisement for the sale of the timber on the estate."

"At last the day of the funeral arrived, and after seeing the old gentleman comfortably housed in his last habitation, the mourners returned to the house, where Mr. Doublesides awaited me, and intimated in the will, that if they would attend him in an inner room it should be read. Whereupon ensued a solemn kind of rush, and we, the chosen ones, were speedily found seated or standing around the little squinting harbingers. Mr. Doublesides sat at the end of a table, and having read a list of names, in which I was contented to hear my own, without further attending to the others, and having ascertained that all were present, he rose with a stiff and studied air from his seat, thrust out his puny chest, coughed three times, and thrust his right hand in his prudent coat-pocket, and having dived it to the bottom, withdrew it slowly, and produced—his handkerchief; then, having deliberately towelled his face and forehead, and replaced the cotton instrument, he buttoned his coat to the chin, plunged his left hand into another, and slowly drew forth the desiderated document: then there was a platoon coughing and hemming, and blowing of noses, and sentimental sighing, after which succeeded a dead and sudden silence, which Mr. Doublesides broke, by snuffling out from the will, 'In the name of God, Amen.' But to cut matters short, some half dozen or dozen bequests of ten pounds, or rings, or mourning, were announced when the reader raised his voice, and read, 'as to that excellent young man, my worthy and most esteemed friend, Richard Dennett, Esq.' 'I see how it is,' I thought, 'I am residuary legatee, I must throw those poor people something in.' Snuffle continued, 'he having evinced a most filial regard for me and for my reputation, and ever, in all his kind attentions to me, professed and acted on the most disinterested motives.'—here I felt ropy in the throat—I bequeath to him all," Snuffle paused and I fidgeted—all my manuscript memoirs to enable him to compile a history of my services, especially in the East, to be published for the benefit of my residuary legatee." As these words fell from the fellow's lips, a cold dew came over me—I bit my lips—I shook—I reddened—I scorched—I chilled again, and the room went round with me, and when I came to myself again, I heard the whole of the defunct's real and personal estate given to Mrs. Margaret Mac Tab, whom I then, for the first time espied sewed in black, and seconced among curtains in the window seat, at the back of Mr. Doubleside's chair. Twenty years back she had been the general's blanchisseuse, and had then met with a misfortune, which ended in adding another scholar to the parish school, and half-a-crown a week to the parish treasury, the latter, subtracted from the testator's ways and means. Since then he had never seen, and perhaps thought as little of her, till the parson, I fancy, put in his head that as he had no relation, the safety of his soul required that he should be unjust to all to be more than just to Mrs. Mac Tab.

"When the reading was finished, and Mr. Doublesides, with a most tender respect, had led Mrs. Mac Tab into another room, I walked slowly away in a stupor, which was taken for indifference, and left the house without stopping to make any inquiries concerning my legacy;—and here I am, poor and unfortunate as ever."

"Well, Dick," I said, "I really do regret your untoward fate most sincerely; I thought to have seen you well provided for, and I need not tell you it would have given me the greatest pleasure to find that you were raised above the frowns of the fortune that has lately pursued you."

"My dear fellow," he answered, "I know too well the interest your kind heart has ever taken in my welfare, to doubt that you have sympathy with me in this as in my other reverse; but don't let this misadventure affect you. I am not so wholly unfortunate as you think."

"I shall be rejoiced to hear of your better luck," I answered.

"Well, then," said Dick, "you know, and I feel it myself, that with some of the remains of my old habits about me, had the old chap abandoned all his possessions, or even a part to me, I should have been very likely to have melted them; but the fates, in sparing me the opportunity, have provided for me in a manner, if not so suitable to my wishes, at least more beneficial to my interests."

"Indeed," said I, "I am glad to hear that."

"Yes," said he, "and when I tell you the fact, you will agree with me; truth is, I am appointed to a treasury office, the present occupier vacates and retires next week, and then I'm to enter on my duties, for which purpose I have come to town."

"And is it all secure," I said.
"Perfectly so," said Dick; "I have seen Lord—the minister, this morning. My appointment is made out, but as my predecessor, has some returns to make, he cannot give in before next Thursday; it cannot be filled up till the next day, when the situation will be vacant."

Alas! alas! for poor Dick! Thursday came—that night the Opposition had a majority. On Wednesday the ministry resigned, and Dick's interest was gone. On Thursday the occupant of his post, gave in, and on Friday the new premier gave it to his attorney's son.

His next adventure of which I am cognizant was one of love. "Such a girl, my dear fellow! such a shape, such a face, and then she's all heart," said Dick.

Now, that's a very commendable quality in a cabbage, but I never knew a woman the better for it; and accordingly he discovered, after 9 month's suit and 9 month's debts incurred in the course of it, that his lady had so much heart, that she bestowed a portion of it more than she thought necessary for Dick's use, on a slim young man, who wrote verses and wore no shirt collar, and Dick was indebted to a squib on the fifth of November, for bringing about a crisis, which in the very nick of time, saved him from the honors of premature paternity. "This was a sad blow for Dick; he renounced his love, and the world too, and for a time I again wholly lost sight of him."

When he emerged from his retirement, he pounced upon me as an author. In his solitude (I did not venture to inquire where he had rusticated) he had written a tragedy. Do not smile reader, volatile men always write tragedies, when they do write; it is only ascetics who write farces. And the very morning he called upon me he had received a note from the manager of one of the great theatres, informing him his piece was accepted, and requesting his attendance at the theatre to arrange as to production. "I will call on to-morrow," he said, "and give you a box for the first night." A day or two he again appeared, we talked of the weather—the court—the new ministry, and new measures, the corn laws, and a hundred other things—yet no word of the tragedy. "But your play, Dick," said I, "your literary grandees require so much drawing out; when am I to lend you a hand?"

"O curse the play!" said Dick.

"Why, my dear fellow," I answered, "I thought it was accepted."

"Why yes," said he, "I thought so too; but you know I was going to the theatre when I called on you the other day."

"Yes."

"Well—but by heaven it's too bad—I hardly like to tell it."

"O come, come," said I, "it's too late to keep any secret from me."

"True; said he, "well, I went and saw the manager, a most sweet-spoken gentleman; he bowed me into a chair, and forthwith broached the subject. But now respect my feelings, and when I tell you the rest, don't at least outrage my vanity."

"You're growing strangely modest, Dick."

"O to the devil with that," he answered; "well—the manager began—a very excellent thing, sir, that of your's; thing, thought I, what a beast—it will certainly make a hit, and I should be proud to produce it. That's as it should be, said I, to myself.—We shall have a very strong cast, sir; very strong, indeed, you may rely upon it's receiving every assistance from the management." I bowed my gratitude. "But you'll excuse me, sir," he continued, "if I venture to offer some hints by way of amendment; the art of pleasing the public, is one which we professional men study all our lives, and may, therefore, be supposed to know something of." I interrupted him, said Dick, "to say how proud I should be to profit by his suggestions." He nodded approbation, and resumed. "The public, sir, just now, have a taste which has grown exceedingly of late years, and it is part to resign ourselves, to a certain degree, to their will.—We have just now, sir, in our company, a very—a most attractive performer, and I should be glad, on your account, if he could be introduced, as his introduction must infallibly insure your success." "Now, sir, if you could leave out your leading character, and substitute a part for our bear, and bring in a comic song for his keeper—"What," I exclaimed, "a bear and a comic song in a five act tragedy, founded on the unities." "A tragedy!" cried the manager, I beg your pardon—your name is Dennett? Richard Dennett Esq.?" Precisely, so, I answered. "And your piece is entitled, Double and Single, or the Don in the Dumps." "No, sir, I said, indignantly, "my play is called the Orphans of Arranjuez." "My dear," said the manager, handing down a pile of papers, and casting his eye rapidly over them, "I have ten thousand apologies to make; the fact is, the Orphans and the Don, I see, were presented on the same day, and in the hurry of business, I perceive the authors' names were each written on the other's piece. It was the burletta that was accepted, sir, and there can be no doubt the merit of your piece would have commanded the acceptance, but unfortunately, I regret to say, an accident has occurred to the manuscript, though the inadvertence of the man who lights the fires, and the title and cover are all that remain of it." And thus, to cut a long story short, said Dick, "have all my hopes of tragic fame departed."

His next speculation was more profitably; in return for having rescued at some risk an old gentleman, who had missed his footing in stepping from a boat, and was fast hurried down the river by the tide, he received, under a codicil to his will, three months after, a thousand pounds. But Dick could not be at rest; he longed to multiply his ducats, and purchased, as a monstrous bargain, a reversionary interest, expectant on the death of an old lady then in her eightieth year, who was afflicted with a severe asthma. "She can't last a month," said Dick, "impossible—touched in the wind—a regular roarer, and then I shall receive 1,500*l*. Don't you think it a capital plan of mine, purchasing these interests? I have a notion I shall get a fortune by it. As soon as this old duchess hops the twig, I shall lay out my whole capital in another venture of the same kind, and so continue, always taking care to buy of dying people, till I have got 10,000*l*.; then I shall go quietly into Wales, keep a hack, and one hunter." Ten years have elapsed since Dick's first purchase, and the old lady had given him no opportunity yet to try his hand at a second, while he in the meantime subsists on hope, and reads the cholera returns and the bills of mortality, with a gusto indescribable.

The last time I saw him he was hurrying, he said, to an appointment with a charming woman, whose moral physical, and pecuniary charms he had begun to enlarge on, when Radford the sheriff's officer turned the corner of the street, and Dick in a twinkling vanished in a contrary direction.

Dick's life like a swallows, has been a series of migrations; and as their places of retreat and mode of subsistence are unknown, so too are Dick's. Alas, alas! there are too many Dick Denbets spread over the surface of this cold wide world.

MISCELLANY.

THE WINTER FIRESIDE.

Spring, summer and autumn have each their appropriate delights, and these are mostly enjoyed under the blue heavens, and the balmy air, but winter cheerful winter, is the time for in-door comforts, the quest of knowledge and the flow of affection. They may talk of May,—but who does not know that the mutual attachments of young hearts put forth their clasping tendrils most lustily between thanksgiving day and the return of the blue bird?—Now when ruddy fires begin to throw their dancing flames over the snug sitting room; when the piping of the wind tells how close the house is; when Jack Frost drives the rosy children to wanton about the father's knee, or roll half asleep upon the rug; now is the time when the working man, who has the best of earthly gifts a wife and abundance of little olive branches about his table, learns fully what is meant by the happy syllable Home.

The rivals of our Home are many and fearful.—Among the direst is the drinking place, whether known as porter house, grog shop or tavern. The man who spends his evenings in tygian fumes soon grovels, and wallows away half his civilization. Where ought he to be put by his own warm fireside, reward his wife for the solitary labours and vexations of the day, and receiving on his own part those cheap but invaluable pleasures, which are as much above the delirium and ribaldry of the bar room, as the light of the day is above the glimmer of a dipped candle. To the young men, beginning life—especially to newly married men the counsel is seasonable. REVERENCE THE FIRESIDE. Admit no rival here. Let your chief joys be shared by her who has forsaken all other hearts and hopes for you,—by those who must inherit honour or disgrace by your course of life. Shun the bar room purities of intoxication. It is to thousands the avenue to infamy. Help to aid those industrious men who preside over public houses, and succumb to the sad necessity of leading sober men into darkness, and drunkards into despair—help to rid them of this unpleasant part of their office. They protest their grief for these results—Help them to wash their hands of the horrible stain!

TASTE OF ARSENIC.

At the trial of Mrs. Smith, for poisoning her servant, in February last, the professional gentlemen who were examined, differed as to the taste of arsenic. It is singular that a difference of opinion should exist on a fact of so much importance, and apparently, so easy to settle. On referring to systematic authors in chemistry and medical jurisprudence, it will be found that arsenic is invariably said to have an acid taste. But it is well known, that systematic writers are to apt, especially on points apparently so simple and trivial, to quote from one another without personal experiment; and accordingly, when a reference is made such medico legal authors as have written specially on arsenic, or to the evidence of persons who have taken it when administered with articles of food, we find that some say the taste is sweetish and then acid, and others that it has no taste at all. The natural inference is, that the taste, whatever it actually is, must be weak; so that in fact, the poison may be swallowed without any taste being perceived. We have been informed by Dr. Christison, Professor of medical jurisprudence in this University, that in reference to the evidence on Mrs. Smith's trial, he has recently made some experiments on the subject, and that others have been made at his request, by Dr. Duncan and Dr. Turner, and the following is the general result—the quantity of the solid poison tasted varied, from two to four grains; and the duration of the tasting, from half a minute to 1 and a half. They perceived, towards the end, a very faint sweetish taste. As to the solution, its taste appeared to be sweetish. What may be its taste when allowed to pass to the root of the tongue, is not easy to determine, as the experiment, made with a sufficient quantity, would be unsafe;—but it has certainly been swallowed without the person remarking any particular taste at the time, and the most common account has been that it tasted sweetish.—Edinburgh Philosophical Journal.

CONJUGAL LOGIC.

"My dear, did you not buy a handsome shawl for fifty dollars?" "Yes, my love, 'So I thought.' Well, it is lying on the floor in the other room. As the times are hard, and I can scarcely pay my notes, I hope you will be a little careful of your fine clothing." "Oh, that is of no consequence for the shawl must be cleaned before it is used again." "My dear, one of the children has just thrown your handsome shawl down the cistern." "Indeed I am really sorry, but it needed washing, and I will have it taken out presently." On the next day, the husband desiring his lady to accompany him a short distance into the country, she dressed for the purpose. "My dear, why don't you wear your new shawl?" "It is not taken out of the cistern yet; I will attend to it the first thing when we come home. You know I could not wear it all dripping wet." A week afterwards, a servant hooked up the shawl by accident with a cistern pole. This elegant article was now transformed into a dirty rag, full of holes. "My dear, if you had taken it out when I first mentioned it, all would have been well." "Oh no, my love, it would never have fit to wear, after being put into the muddy cistern." "But my dear, if you picked it off the floor when I first mentioned it, it would never have got into the cistern." "I suppose it dropped from the table where it was laid, which I am sure could not be helped'—'But, my dear, if you had put it in its proper place, when you first took it off, it would never have fallen from table.'—'And if I had kept myself in my proper place, I never should have been the companion of such a wretched, miserably busy-body as yourself.' 'My dear you are always too dilatory. If you had not deferred that speech until after our marriage, you never would have been taken from the arms of your beggarly old father. Then I never should have gone from under the protection of a gentleman to shelter under the roof of a fellow.' 'I wonder my dear, how a lady of your refined and exalted notions can continue under the roof of a fellow.' 'You will give me time for the horses to be put in the carriage.' She rings and orders the carriage, puts on her things, and moves slowly towards the door. 'My dear, are you really going?' 'Yes, but why do you speak so kindly, if you hate me?' 'I did not say I hated you, my dear.' 'Did you not?—But the shawl.' Let that go, my dear. It is not worth a thought.' 'Now you speak like yourself.' 'What a dear love.' They kissed affectionately. After this little scene, the lady always did as she pleased with her shawl; and her 'dear love,' compounded with his creditors in a few months, while his loving wife ran off with a Colonel.—Sunday Morning Atlas.

Danger of Female Society.—I cannot look in a pretty gal's face all flashing so without being kinder dazzled and scorched. It wakens me up this cold weather and kindles such a pulse in my heart, that the blood runs through it as hot as if it had run through a steam-boat pipe. And then the all-fired things have so many sly ways of coming it over a fellow with them ere circum crancum of them, that I don't think much of a fellow that can see their purty mouths work and not feel his own work too. If they sidle up, I can't help sidlin' up too if I died; and when their eyes fall flash on me, I fall right down under 'em as cut grass in Weathersfield of a hot summer day. Its nature all this and I can't help it no how.—Jonathan Slick.

ELECTION BRIBERY.

The first instance that occurs of this practice was so early as 13 Eliz., when one Thomas Longe, being a simple man of small capacity to serve in parliament, acknowledged that he had given the returning officer and others of the borough for which he was chosen, £4, to be returned member, and was for that premium elected. But for this offence the borough was amerced, the member was removed, and the officer was fined and imprisoned.—Hone's table Book.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR, ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

THE ALBANY BRIDGE.

Our citizens are at work in right earnest for a Bridge across the Hudson river. It is hoped their efforts will be successful. Albany boasting in the independence and wealth of its citizens, has been the subject of reproach for its want of public spirit, and we must confess, until a few years past, justly so: but within that time a spirit has arisen which bids fair to make it second to but few cities in the Union. The city of Troy, the rival of Albany, has always maintained a reputation for Enterprise and spirit, and her citizens in order to sustain it, have closely identified their interest with that of the city—hence the unanimity and zeal in all things touching the prosperity of the place.

The question of a Bridge at Albany, as we expected, is now agitating their minds. They have held meetings, and adopted resolutions of a violent character. Their prominent men are active in denouncing the measure, and appealing to all who value the interest of the city, to exert themselves to the utmost to defeat the project. Committees have been appointed who are actively engaged at home and abroad, exciting opposition. Remonstrances against the bridge from one of the northern counties have already been presented to our legislature, and some of the New York press have been induced to join them in the opposition. In fact every effort is making by them to prevent the construction of the bridge. The reasons urged against the measure, as well as the means used by the Trojans, must operate on unprejudiced minds otherwise than favorable. The idea that a Bridge at Albany will injure Troy they know to be untrue; unless it be that they count upon the travel which is forced that way at certain seasons of the year, owing to the impossibility of Ferrying at Albany. That it will obstruct the navigation, the report of the committee on the application for a bridge at Troy, remonstrated against by the inhabitants of Lansingburgh and Waterford, sufficiently disproves. One of the resolutions passed at a meeting of theirs, plainly shows a selfish spirit, and proves that it is the particular interest of Troy they seek to advance, to the prejudice of Albany.—The resolution says, "On the ground of public convenience, Troy already having a bridge across the Hudson River by means of a rail road from Greenbush, connecting with the Schenectady road, will when the great Eastern rail road is completed, offer every facility to travellers." The citizens of Albany have loaned the credit of their city for the construction of the West Stockbridge rail road. Troy by defeating the bridge and connecting with the road is determined to enjoy the benefit of our enterprise. Is it right—is it just?

ELOCUTION.—We heard Prof. Bronson at the Hall of the Female Academy deliver to a crowded audience his first lecture upon this much neglected science; and we certainly think that the world owes him much for the fine manifestations which he personally gives, as to the great flexibility, as well as perfectability of which the voice is capable. When we say we have never listened to his equal as a reader, we esteem it no slight compliment, it having been ours to hear many of the most reputable that our country has either reared or encouraged. The satisfaction we received from his distinct enunciation of not only every syllable but every letter, showed how indispensable is a proper study of elocution to the production of fine oratory.—There was no dropping or slurring of sounds—no affectation of look or gesture—his utterance was clear, emphatic and musical; his gestures appropriate and daring without being labored. After witnessing such excellent results of study and genius upon forming the orator, we can no longer wonder that Cicero did, and to come nearer home—our own Henry Clay does devote daily hours to the practice of this element of their arduous profession.

Mr. B's. charge for the course of six lectures is $2; which item we presume will not prevent as many of our citizens as can conveniently occupy the Hall, from hearing probably the most perfect elocutionist living. He is assisted and relieved by Mr. Christian—a german vocalist of extraordinary merit.

SHIP BUILDING IN MAINE.—The tonnage of new vessels built in Maine last year was 27,705 tons being more than any other state in the Union—consisting of 26 ships, 48 brigs, 68 schooners, and 3 steamboats.

ERRATA.—An artistical friend informs us that in our notice of the Apollo Association, the word which should have been statuary was made "stationary."—Finding nowhere in the constitution of that excellent society, that dealing in quills, paper, &c.—as this blunder would intimate—is one of its objects, we have to request that our readers will oblige both ourselves and the Association, by making this requisite substitution.

Dr. Eldridge's counsel have demanded the money found on him at the time of his arrest, amounting to about $6000.

The proceedings of the Grand Chapter, of this State, together with the Address of the Rev. Br. Bottomley, shall have an insertion next week.

We have received the first No. of the Mohawk Mirror, published semi-monthly, at Little Falls, Herkimer co. by Edward M. Griffing Esq. at $1. per annum. The Mirror is published in the Quarto form, for binding; and the No. before us exhibits talent and industry. Mr. G. has served a 'regular apprenticeship' in catering for the public taste, and as a good workman, his readers will so doubt give him a "permanent situation."

ITEMS.—We are to have another Steamboat on the Hudson, on the opening of navigation. She is called the Telegraph, and is to be commanded by Captain Whilliden, of Philadelphia.

A wrought iron shaft, weighing 18,000 pounds, has been manufactured for the Russian steam frigate, at the works of Messrs. Abbott & Co. It is 22 feet 8 inches, long, and 18½ inches diameter.

There are 3319 miles of rail road in use in the United States, constructed at a cost of $86,000,000, and yielding an average of about 5½ per cent.

The corner stone of the first Episcopal church, was laid in Texas, on the 14th Oct. last.

Preparations on an extensive scale, are making in New York, for the reception of Mr. Van Buren, on his return to this State.

The Harpers have sold 30,000 copies of "Three years before the mast," at a profit of upwards of 5,000 dollars. The copyright, they purchased at $200.

The following gentleman, it is said, will compose the Cabinet, under Gen. Harrison. Mr. Webster, Secretary of State. Mr. Ewing, Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Bell, Secretary of War. Mr. Crittenden, Attorney General. Mr. Granger, Post Master General. Mr. E. Badger, Secretary of the Navy.

The Catholics of New York, have had a large meeting in reference to the School Fund question, and we believe they intend to petition the legislature on the subject. Those who are favorable to have the common School fund devoted to sectarian purposes will assist them, and those who believe that church matters should regulate themselves, will remonstrate to any legislative interference. Stick a pin there.

The report of the destruction of Howard & Ryckman's extensive brewery, in New York, is not true.—It was a distillery in the same street.

The Oneida Indians, located in the western part of the state now number near 400, and are yearly increasing in numbers, industry and wealth.

Sylvester's Reporter publishes a list of 152 banks which have failed, and swindled the community out of at least $38,000,000.

The Troy Whig, in its daily billingsgate against our citizens, for urging our local interests on the public consideration, which is certainly done by them in gentlemanly moderation, speaks of what it terms the "manufacture of public opinion," thus:—

"With the desperation of Gamblers, who have staked their last guinea at the hazard of the die, there is no meanness so despicable to which they will not descend."

The gentlemanly editor of the Whig, is likely to "manufacture" all the "public opinion" the Albanians want, without our going abroad for it.

M'LEOD.—The Batavia Times says that an unusual number of witnesses were in attendance, and examined in this case—some of them from a great distance. The unanimity which characterized the proceedings of the jury, shows conclusively, that taken ex parte, the case is a strong one. There were twenty jurors present, nineteen of whom were for the indictment of murder.

Will the editor of the Daily Advertiser, tell us in what part of Albany the Masonic Mirror is published? We can forgive the New York Standard; but to be "called out of name" by a fellow townsman, is too bad.

LOOK OUT.—A man named G. Kiffen, was arrested in N. York, a day or two since, and held to bail in $200 for stealing a newspaper, from the door of a subscriber. Carriers are often censured for negligence; when the fault should be laid at the door of some petty thief.

MR. L. S. BACKUS, the Editor of the Canajoharie Radii, whose all was destroyed by fire, and whose case excited universal sympathy, has we are happy to perceive, been enabled to resume his paper again, which comes to us in a new dress. The Radii has been merged in the Phoenix, and it is to be published at Fort Plain. We again welcome Mr. B. to the editorial field, and in common with every brother of the "space box" throughout the land, extend to him the right hand of fellowship, with our sincere wishes for his success. Mr. B. assigns the following reasons for the change of the name of his paper.

THE PHOENIX.—As we may be asked meaning of the name we have adopted, and why it is applicable to our case, it may be proper to give a few words in explanation. To many this may be superfluous but we wish to be understood by all.

The Phoenix is a fabled bird, which lived precisely one hundred years, and was invulnerable, or free from the dangers and calamities of life, hence the name is taken by Insurance Companies, Banks, &c. to impress the supposition of less liability to danger.

The Phoenix was supposed to be of neutre gender, and after living one hundred years, it built a nest on some inaccessible rock, and while sitting on it, a spontaneous combustion takes place which consumes the bird and the nest. From the dying embers of this funeral pyre arises a young Phoenix at full growth, to live a century and perform the same act of imolation as its predecessors.

There are several allegories which the ancients are said to have attached to this fable, but the name only has descended to us.

Its allegorical uses are taken not only for names to denote extraordinary security, but that which rises on its former ruin, is aptly applied, especially where fire has been the agent of destruction.

New Species of Tomato.—The botanists of the Exploring Squadron discovered at the Fijis a new species of the Tomato. Its flavor is said to be much superior to that growing here, being very palatable when eaten raw, and it promises to become a valuable addition to our list of vegetables. It will be introduced here.

RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

[Correspondence of the Journal of Commerce.]

Washington, Saturday, Feb. 13th.

Mr. Pickens from the committee on foreign relations, made a report in the house to day, on the subject of the correspondence referred to that committee, relative to the burning of the Caroline and the arrest of McLeod.

The report produced a deep, immediate, and universal sensation. It fell on the house, as Mr. Adams afterwards said, like a clap of thunder, in a summer's day. Still there is nothing in the report, which, on careful perusal, will be found untenable in fact, or gratuitous in position. The truth seems to be, that we have wrapt ourselves up in false security, and now shudder at the light of truth. The report tells a plain tale, which he who runs may read;—but it lifts a veil, and discloses a dark and inauspicious future.

If war should arrive between the United States and Great Britain, it would be no common war;—it would necessarily be a war of great destruction;—there would never be a peace until one or the other party was subdued, exhausted, desolated.

The report warns us of the grasping ambition of England—of her power—her commercial rivalry, &c. In the debate that followed on the motion to print, Mr. Granger, of New York, took a prominent and the leading part. He stated that the report had not his concurrence in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and he denounced it as a "Declaration of War." He said it made an issue upon which Great Britain might take us up, and go to war at once. He would not abide the issue as presented. There were many things presented in the report as causes of complaint against Great Britain, as to which he had no information, and in which he had no concern. He was not for taking up all these gratuitous issues.

Mr. Pickens, in his reply contended that the report had a tendency to the preservation of peace. It stated facts, boldly and plainly. Could we secure peace by deceiving ourselves as to facts? He was for peace. He happened to represent a State whose interests were peculiarly pacific. He only looked to a war of defence when it might be necessary. He did not desire a debate on the report;—his wish was that it might be laid on the table and printed. But the object in making it, was, in part, to call the attention of Congress and the American people to the necessity of preparations for the national defence. He stated that the report had the concurrence of a bare majority of the committee, and he was sorry for it. He thought it proper to place the true state of the facts before the people. He had made no new issues—he had brought in subjects of complaint and irritation by way of incidental illustration.

Mr. Adams, in the course of his remarks, said that he was sorry that the report was of a strict party character. What would be its effect on the American people?—on the world? Would it not be thought that it was the malice of a defeated enemy, setting fire to a tenement that he was forced to abandon? He enjoined upon the country the necessity of union in any war that we should undertake. It would not do to go into war with a "bare majority."

He would not dispute the positions of the report. But he would insist that a "bare majority" and a party majority of a committee, should not commit the country to any issue on this subject. This report, if it was sent out, would be read in England as an official expose of the views and determinations of this government. But who had made up this issue? He had nothing to do with it. No one had been consulted about it. It came upon us suddenly. But, in it was the issue of war. There were some questions pending between the two nations, as to which we might be wrong and Great Britain right. He would not therefore put the question of peace or war on this report.

After further debate, the report was ordered to be printed, and was then laid on the table.

Mr. Everett moved to print the documents connected with all the subjects of controversy with Great Britain, but the motion was lost.

Mr. Fox's attaches heard the debate, and it will go out as a suitable commentary upon Mr. Pickens' report. There is no danger that it will be taken as a declaration of war, or as a manifesto of grievances. It does seem that we are fearful of speaking above our breath, lest Great Britain should overhear us.

LECTURES ON ORATORY AND MUSIC.—Professor BRONSON, (assisted by Mr. CHRISTIAN, a German vocalist,) commences a Popular Course of Lectures on these subjects, (condensing his VEN into six,) Tuesday evening, Feb. 16th, at eight o'clock, and continues each succeeding Friday and Tuesday evening, in the chapel of the Female Academy, Pearl street; interspersed with singing, and reading and recitations, from some of our principal poets and orators—descriptive, sentimental, patriotic, moral, amusing and tragical. The object of these Lectures are, to present an entirely new mode of developing and training the Voice for reading, speaking and singing; greatly extending its compass; increasing its power and music; a new method of learning the letters; of spelling, and teaching reading without a book, and then with a book; the causes and remedies of hoarseness and exhaustion; of the bronchitis and certain pulmonary diseases; and show how almost any one can read, speak and sing for hours, without injury; disclosing the supposed mysteries of polypus, (or ventriloquism,) showing how almost how any can acquire it; constituting a new system of mental and vocal philosophy.

Single season tickets for the course, $2; triple do. do. for a lady and gentleman, $3; family do. do. for 5 of its members, $5; single admission for one evening, 50 cents; triple do. do. $1. Programmes, testimonials, and references, at the principal book and music stores; where season tickets are for sale.

N. B. Mr. Bronson will give practical instruction in mental and vocal philosophy to individuals and classes of ladies and gentlemen in the day time, at Concert Hall, 46 State st. 3d story; where he may be generally found.

POETRY.

MASONIC ODE.

Awaken the harp—let the proud pæan swell!
All hail to the Art that can darkness dispel!
When Chaos and night gave way to the morning
Of Nature's first day, then our order arose;
And the harmony, then, all creation adorning
Must sink and be lost e'er its being shall close.
Strike ye the harp—let the proud pæan swell!
All hail to the Art that can darkness dispel!

When the dark cloud of ignorance hung o'er the mind,
And religion's pure light was unknown to mankind,
Our trust in our God remained still unshaken—
Our faith in his justice and love still secure,
Our hope, so heart-cheering was never forsaken,
And Charity dwelt in our temples so pure.
Strike ye the harp—let the proud pæan swell,
All hail to the Art that can darkness dispel!

The beams of fair science, resplendent have shown
Wherever the light of our order hath gone—
When men would have scattered those rays brightly beaming,

And driven from earth the fair Goddess of Art—
To our temples of friendship, she flew, rightly deeming
From the horns of our altars, she need ne'er depart—
And the Goddess of Art and of science the light
Have rendered the history of Masonry bright.

LINES TO A DOVE.

BY MRS. ANNA H. DORSEY.

Not where the Bulbul trills her song of love,
Or Indian seas, their golden island kiss—
I'd fly, had I thy gentle wings, oh dove!
To seek a better, kindred, clime than this.
For still amid their Eden scenes of light,
Tears gush, and gentle hearts are slowly broken;
And the young rose leaf but conceals a blight,
And kindly thoughts are crushed ere they are spoken.
Not here, oh dove! upon life's troubled wave,
Where wild ambition yars man's truth away;
Where cherished hope, like sun-light on a grave,
But marks the altar of its sure decay!

Had I thy wings, how gladly would I soar—
Far—far beyond the starry paths of heaven,
Until I basked on that eternal shore,
Where earths redeemed, their golden crowns are given.
But ah, how vain to sigh for wings like thine!
Life still demands the tribute of our woe,
Our drooping hopes—our broken hearts to twine
In coronals to death's pallid brow!
But when the valley's shadow hath been passed—
The soul by mortal sorrow long oppress'd,
Unfurls her wings far o'er the stormy blast,
And seeks repose upon her Savior's breast.

Baltimore, January 22, 1941.

TO ONE IN HEAVEN.

If from that high world, where thou now
Dwellest allauteous as below,
Thy God permits thee yet to bow
Thy pitying look on earthly woe,
Then false the lip which says that tears
Are strangers to that happy sky;—
To scan the wretchedness of years,
I know that thou must weep or die!

It would not be a heaven to thee,
What bliss thy loved ones could not share,
If thy pure grief had no relief
To burst thine eyelids even there.

Oh! how I wept to see the faded,
Though brightest bud of earthly bowers!
When from the wreath which Hope had braided
I saw thee drop like withering flowers!
Those tears have passed. The days roll on,
And ruin sweeps my path so drear,
I weep not now that thou are gone,
But that I live and languish here!

Yet I will spurn the thoughts that burn
Like lightning through my feverish brain,—
And raise my brow to heaven,—far thou
Wilt cool it with thy tears again.

THE DISTINGUISHED WARRIOR.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Gather him to his grave again,
And solemnly and softly lay,
Beneath the verdure of the plain,
The warrior's scattered bones away.
Pay the deep reverence taught of old,
The homage of man's heart to death,
Nor trifle even with the mould
Once quickened by the Almighty's breath.

The soul hath hallowed every part;—
That remnant of a martial brow,
Those ribs that held the mighty heart,
That strong arm—ah! 'tis strengthless now.
Spare them each mouldering fragment spare
Of God's own image—let them rest,
Till not a trace shall speak of where
The awful likeness was impressed.

For he was fresher from the hand
That formed of earth the human face,
And to the elements did stand
In nearer kindred than our race.
In many a flood to madness tost,
In many a storm has been his path
He hid him not from heat or frosts
But met them, and defied their wrath.

Then were they kind—the forest here.
Rivers and stiller waters, paid
A tribute to the net and spear
Of the red ruler of the shade.
Fruits on the woodland branchet I lay,
Roots in the shaded mould below;
The stars looked forth to teach his way,
The still earth warned him of the foe.

A noble race! but they are gone,
With their old forests wide and deep.
And we have built our homes upon
Fields where their generation sleep.
Their fountains sink our thirst at noon,
Upon their hills our haystack waves,
Our lovers woo beneath their moon,
Ah, let us spare at least their graves!

THE FORSAKEN.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

The dead are in their silent graves,
And the dew is cold above,
And the living weep and sigh
O'er dust that once was love.

Once I only wept the dead,
But now the living cause my pain;
How couldst thou steal me from my tears,
To leave me to my tears again?

My mother rests beneath the sod—
Her rest is calm and very deep:
I wished that she could see my loves,
But now I gladden in her sleep.

Last night unbound my raven locks,
The morning saw them turned to gray;
Once they were black and well beloved,—
But thou art changed, and so are they!

The useless lock I gave thee once,
To gaze upon and think of me,
Was taken with smiles,—but this was torn
In sorrow that I send to thee!

SONNET ABOUT A NOSE.

'T is very odd that poets should suppose
There is no poetry about a nose,
When plain as is the nose upon your face,
A noseless face would lack poetic grace,
Noses have sympathy; a lover knows
Noses are always 'touched,' when lips are kissing;

And who would care to kiss, where nose was missing?
Why, what would be the fragrance of a rose,
And where would be our mortal means of telling
Whether a vile or wholesome odor flows
Around us, if we owned no sense of smelling?
I know a nose, a nose no other knows,
'Neath starry eyes o'er ruby lips it grows;
Beauty is in its form, and music in its blows!

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY IN THE UNITED STATES.—Brethren.—We have been witnesses of the effects of one of the most extraordinary delusions in regard to our Institution, which in any land or age have tried its strength or durability.

That jealousies and fear of an Institution every where conducted on liberal principles, should have excited a spirit of opposition in arbitrary or tyrannical governments have never surprised us; but when our Order was attacked in our own land, and the people our own neighbors and friends, were excited by false, malicious, and absurd accusations against it; when we saw families disturbed, societies convulsed, and individuals of eminent virtue and station denounced and persecuted, we deplored the folly and fanaticism of our enemies, and sought by patience, and quiet and orderly deportment to assuage the bitterness of our revilers, and to turn the hearts of our misguided accusers. We knew that our Institution was devised in wisdom for the improvement of society in every land, and could not long be left as a mark for the scorn and derision of demagogues and fanatics, nor remain an object of terror to the well disposed.

The delusion has passed away—there has been a redeeming spirit in the midst of the storm—a spirit of inquiry after truth, which has wrought out for us a vindication, and fixed it in the popular mind. Once more our Order has free course, and has resumed its place as the medium of union, friendship, and kind offices amongst 'good men' of every rank, station, party, sect, and profession in the land. What we could not do when compelled to defend ourselves against the ingenious assaults of an organized and reckless faction, we can do now: we can take high ground; we can place our Institution in its true position; we can openly declare its principles to attentive hearers, and verify our declarations by the testimony of the greatest, the purest, the best beloved and venerated men, whose names adorn the brightest pages of our country's history. We have it in our power to shew, that so far is Freemasonry from having a tendency to corrupt the morals, weaken the faith, impede the justice, contract the soul, or relax the patriotism of its votaries, our country stands indebted for a large portion of its welfare, honor, and security to the members of our Fraternity.

The high position it is my intention to maintain by a work which I propose to publish, if sustained by the approbation and aid of the Fraternity to the necessary extent.

To test this, I offer the following plan for the publication of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States.

To place the work within the reach of every member of the Fraternity, it will be published in numbers, in the imperial Octavo form, at periods of one or two months, at 40 cents a number, payable on delivery, and will extend as is supposed, to about fifty numbers, forming five large volumes. Each number will contain three Portraits engraved on steel, and occasionally other illustrations, with biographies written expressly with reference to the Masonic character and acts of each subject, (so far as materials can be obtained,) as well as to his private life. For the fidelity, accuracy and beauty of the work, the responsibility will rest alone on the editor and proprietor.

JAMES HERRING, Grand Secretary of the

Extract from the minutes of the Grand Lodge, of the State of New York, Dec. 1st, A. L. 5840.

"The Grand Secretary then asked permission to present the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing, under the title of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States. The proposed Address to the Fraternity and the prospectus were then read; whereupon the following Resolution was unanimously adopted."

"Resolved.—That this Grand Lodge highly approve of the proposed work of the Rt. W. G. Secretary, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons,' and recommend it to the patronage of the Fraternity."

In Grand Chapter, of the State of New York, Feb. 3d, 5841.

"Resolved.—That the Grand Chapter of the State of N. York, do approve of the work proposed by our M. E. Companion James Herring, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons,' and while they commend it to the support of the Fraternity, to give to the author free access to the Records and Archive of this Grand Chapter, for such information on our Masonic History as may be necessary for his work."

GRAND CHAPTER OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Among the proceedings of the Grand Chapter of the State of New York, at its annual meeting on the 2d. inst. the following are deemed of sufficient interest to be fraternally generally to be published in the Masonic Register.

Tribute to the memory of the late Grand High Priest.

The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of New York, having learned with the deepest regret, the decease of their worthy and much respected companion, JACOB TEN BROECK VAN VECHTEN, who for a number of years filled the office of Grand High Priest, and resided over the deliberations of the Grand Chapter with dignity and honor to himself, and in the highest usefulness to the fraternity, in testimony of their respect for his manly virtues, their regard for his personal orth, and their love for his memory, do resolve that the members of this Grand Chapter will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, that the members of this Grand Chapter do sympathise with the bereaved partner and afflicted family of their deceased companion; and tender to them the assurance that his memory is dear to our hearts, and that our consolation is the hope that this dispensation of Divine Providence, though our mutual loss, is his great gain.

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the family of our deceased companion.

Resolved, that the Grand Chaplain, be requested in his next annual address, to pronounce an Eulogy on the character of our deceased companion.

Meeting of the General Grand Chapter of the U. S.

Whereas, the General Grand Chapter, and the General Grand Encampment of the United States, will hold their next Triennial meeting in September next, in the city of New York.

Resolved, that a committee of five be appointed to unite with any committee which may be appointed by the Grand Encampment and Grand Lodge of this state for the purpose of giving a respectful and hospitable reception to those Honorable Bodies.

Resolved, that M. E. Richard Pennell, and Companions George P. Morris, James Millar, John Van Duyne, and Alexander H. Robinson be said committee.

Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons.

The committee to whom we referred the prospectus of the work proposed for publication by our M. E. Comp. JAMES HERRING, under the title of "The Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States," reported, that they had considered the subject and are satisfied that such a work is calculated to promote the best interest of the Masonic Institution, by placing before the fraternity the lives and portraits of those distinguished men who have been equally the ornament of their country and of masonry. The completion of such a work uniting important Historical information with the letters, addresses, orations, &c. on Masonry from those who have been important actors in the history of our country, will tend to place our institution in its true position. The committee, therefore, most heartily recommend the work to the Grand Chapter for its sanction and approval; and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, that the Grand Chapter of the state of New York do approve of the work proposed by our M. E. Comp. James Herring, entitled "The Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons;" and while they commend it to the support of the fraternity, do give to the author, free access to the records and archives of this Grand Chapter for such information on our Masonic History as may be necessary for his work.

The Grand Chapter adopted the report of the committee, and the resolution recommended by them.

ADDRESS.

Delivered before Mount Moriah Lodge, No. 106, of Louisville, Ky. at the stated meeting of the Lodge, on the evening of Monday, January 18th, A. L. 5841.

BY THE REV. BR. THOMAS BOTTOMLEY.

BRETHREN,

You have requested me to address you this evening on your religious, moral, and Masonic duties, and although laboring under a deep sense of my incapacity to throw even a shadow of light upon a subject embracing so wide a scope and which has been treated on by so many abler members of the fraternity, than myself—yet still as a brother of the mystic tie, I feel bound to comply with your request, as far as my humble abilities will admit.

First, by our religious duties we understand the duty we owe to God, is formed by our belief in his existence, together with rewards and punishments in a future state of existence—these principles I think are clearly recognized by the rules laid down in our first admission to the portals of the temple, and which are given to us as a guide through life. The All-seeing Eye is to remind us that the Beneficent Author of our being, keeps an ever watchful eye upon even our most secret actions, and that he will ultimately reward us all, according to our works. The prayers we offer to Him, correspond with this belief—the bible is prized by us as an inestimable gift of God to man, and is therefore dedicated to him; and we are also informed that the Holy Scriptures point out the whole duty of man. We are also required as masons strictly to obey the moral Law, which consists in loving the Lord our God, with all our heart, with all our soul, and our neighbor as ourselves. We also say that we are taught to subdue our passions—the Rough Ashler is an emblem of this, and the book which we take for our spiritual Tressle Board represents man as so polluted by nature, that even David the man after God's own heart, prayed "Create in me a new heart, and renew a right spirit within me." Man is also represented as a cage of unclean birds, he is also said spiritually to be all wounds and bruises and putrifying sores—and when God viewed man, they were all gone out of the way; there was none righteous no, not one! Now as by nature we are all unclean and unholy, how shall we purify ourselves but by following the precepts of our Lord and Master, which we have taken for our Rule and Guide. I grant that by moral culture, we may learn to curb our passions, but not subdue them.—Our Most Excellent Grand Master, Solomon, King of Israel, the great patron of our Order, was well aware of this, for we read that at the dedication of the temple, he fervently asked of his heavenly Father, to hear his children, and when he heard forgive. What would the temple have been with all its massy columns, its elegance of design, and correctness of execution—its exquisite finish and durability of material, if the Shekina had not dwelt between the Cherubims, and overshadowed the mercy seat—it would have been like a house without a tenant, or a body without a soul—they continually offered their sacrifices and prayers by faith in the Messiah to come, and they trusted in him to take away their pollutions and guilt—this is particularly set forth by the scape goat, and their sin offerings, and if Solomon felt it necessary to pray—"hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and when thou hearest forgive"—how much more should we feel that without his help, we can do nothing—how earnestly should we be endeavoring to climb the theological ladder, which Jacob in his vision saw the principal rounds, of which are Faith, Hope and Charity. Faith the bottom round, because it is that through which Abraham was justified, and it may be said of all who are truly good, that they are partakers of Abraham's faith. Faith is not merely a cold assent of the mind to the truth but it is a confidence in the truths by which we are enabled to venture our all upon it.—Faith having truth for its evidence, God for its object, and the salvation of our soul for its end—this Faith puts us in possession of hope by which we desire and expect eternal life. Faith also puts us in possession of Charity, which is an earnest of eternal life. Charity has a double sense—it means giving alms to the poor, and also that supreme love we bear to our Creator, as will be seen by referring to Corinthians, Chap. xiii. 3, "And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not Charity it profiteth me nothing."—Here then we see that we may give all our goods to feed the poor, and yet have no Charity. What then does Charity here mean?—it means that love of God that is spoken of in the moral law, namely, loving God with all the heart, with all the mind, with all the soul, and with all thy strength—it is through the help of this Charity alone, that we can subdue our passions. Let us then never think that we can cleanse our hearts, this can only be done by an act of mercy on the part of God, and received by faith on our part. We conceive then the religious duty of Masons to be this—to adore God because of his glory and holiness—to revere him because of his power—to fear him because of his justice, and to love him because he is the Lord God—merciful and gracious—forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and to keep a prayerful watch over our own conduct, remembering that his eye is always upon us, and that he will in no wise clear the guilty.

2nd. What are our moral duties? We understand this as having reference to our conduct amongst men—our duty to our fellow men is set forth in every degree conferred—every prayer offered—and every lecture given in our Order—our conduct to and amongst men, should exhibit Justice, Truth and Love as the governing principles of our conduct. By Justice I mean that uprightness in our transactions with men, that is not governed by sordid, selfish and worldly motives, such as are characteristic of men of the world, but with those large expanded noble feelings which is governed by the Scripture rule, "Do unto others as you would wish them to do unto you," then should we secure for ourselves the character of men of uprightness and integrity. By truth, I mean that strict regard for our word, which will under no circumstances permit us to falsify it—that practice of truth which will gain for us the character of men of truth. By Love I mean that general benevolence which feels for others woes, and makes haste to relieve—for pure religion and undefiled before God is this—to visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions and keep yourselves "unspotted from the world," and if we would imitate our heavenly benefactor "who sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust, and causeth his sun to shine on the evil and the good," we must extend the fruits of our liberality, on suffering humanity wherever we may see it should have our help—yet virtue in distress should claim our first attention—thus shall we make the Widow's heart dance for joy, and the fatherless children rejoice that they have found a friend—thus shall you stop the sources of human misery; and when you shall be removed to the temple above, they who have been warmed and clothed and fed by your bounty shall rise up and call you blessed, and the eternal judge shall say "Blessed are they that remember the poor, inasmuch as you did it unto one of the least of these my children, ye did it unto me, enter into the joy of your Lord."

As masons we ought to attend to all these things for all eyes are upon us, and they judge of us according to the rule Christ gave to his disciples "By their fruits ye shall know them." In vain may we tell them that the principles of our Order inculcate virtue, if we are vicious—in vain may we tell them that our principles inculcate reverence for the name of God, if we profane that name—in vain may we tell them our Order teaches temperance if we are intemperate. There is nothing can disgrace us, if we do not disgrace ourselves. The world expects us to be better than other men, and so we ought to be; if our institution does not make us better husbands, better fathers, better neighbors and better citizens, the world sees at once that we are nothing bettered by becoming masons. And what will their conclusion naturally be? It will be that what our enemies have said of us is certainly true. Permit me to say that he who thinks masonry consists in keeping the secrets of the order, is no good mason.—

No, though this is absolutely necessary, neither is he a good mason, who thinks because he has made himself acquainted with all the mystic rites and ceremonies, that this all that is necessary. No, the good mason feels that besides all this, masonry inculcates duties which he owes to his God—duties he dare not neglect—duties of obedience and love. He feels also that masonry binds him to support and be subject to the laws of his country. In short, he feels that masonry has imposed duties upon him with respect to all the particulars of life, so that he finds no time to be unemployed—no time to be triflingly employed. The good mason, while he feels it his duty and his interest so to regulate his conduct that he may secure (thru' a blessing on his endeavors) the favor of God and the approval of his own conscience. He feels that to endeavor to better the condition of his fellow creatures, forms no small part of his duty; he does not rest contented when he has fed the hungry and clothed the naked, while those he has fed and clothed still remain immoral. No, he feels that he cannot rest until he has brought these straying, erring ones back to their God and duty. How many of our erring brethren, who though once respectable and respected, are now thro' vice, lost to themselves, their families, their country, and their God. Look around you—count them up and see their number, and then say, can nothing be done to reclaim these erring men. Can we not in our individual capacity by repeated warning and reproof in the spirit of love, win them back to virtue. I know it will be said, their habits are confirmed, but many such have been reclaimed and why not these? The Woodsman by repeated strokes, and persevering efforts tells the loftiest tree, but we are discouraged too soon, because we expect too much at first. The husbandmen ploughs his ground and sows his seed, but waits with patience till harvest for the fruit. Then let us learn a lesson—let us put in the plough of mild reproof—the seed of good advice. Let us fence them in by good example, harrow in the seed by our prayers, and then look to heaven for the fructifying showers and the enlivening rays, and though much of the seed may fall among thorns and in stoney ground, yet some will fall in good ground, and bring forth fruit.—The object of the good mason is to live in the world, that he may leave it better than he found it. Do you ask how are we to find time for this—I answer let the lesson taught us in the subdivisions of the twenty-four inch gauge, be at once acted on. By this we shall find eight hours for this and other benevolent religious duties in each day, and if this time is well employed we shall accomplish an amount of good that will astonish ourselves. And now let me ask, how did these erring men of whom we have been speaking fall—they were once of us—they did not fall at once, but by degrees—they thought themselves secure, till at last they found themselves in bondage an easy prey to the enemy they had not the moral courage to resist—and we should remember that many mightier than we, have this way been slain. What then should we learn from this reflection—we should learn to nip sin in the bud, to 'Crucify the old man' with his evil afflictions and lusts, while as yet we are not subject to his sway. Brethren, as masons we have great and many duties to perform and but a short time to do this great work in. In order that we may be stimulated to greater exertions—that we may be urged to crowd as much usefulness as possible into every hour, let us frequently look at our emblem of departing time. When we see the hour glass rapidly dropping its sand, let us remember that our time for usefulness is as rapidly by moments stealing away, and that the scythe of death will soon cut us all down. Then it is important that we work while it is day, for the night of death cometh when no man can work. That we may be the more stimulated to the pursuit and practice of all good, let us remember that virtue must and will receive its reward. God will acknowledge his own likeness wherever it is found, and he will bless those who go about doing good; and when we are gone the way of all the earth, it will be said of us—Blessed are they for they died in the Lord and their works do follow them—and the great master-builder will say—I was an hungry and ye fed me—thirsty and ye gave me drink—naked and ye clothed me—and when we shall ask him when saw we thee naked and clothed thee—he shall answer—inasmuch as ye did unto one of these little ones—ye did it unto me. Let us then dear Brethren so live, that we may live beloved and die lamented.

NO. 9.

But there is another class who deny the principle involved in works of fiction, and it is to the opinions of these, that we would particularly address ourselves at present. These opinions when strictly examined may be reduced to a narrow compass. They attempt to give credit to their cause by holding themselves out as the zealous advocates of truth and a just representation of nature, and maintain that any thing which bears the name of fiction must be the direct reverse of truth. We have on another occasion, attempted to show that there is that in the nature of man which refuses to recognize as beautiful, that which is not true, and accordant to nature, and it is perhaps therefore unnecessary to show the falsity of the assumption that the narration of any thing which has not actually taken place, must necessarily be false to nature. A narration may therefore be true to nature, though it may be untrue in fact, that is, it may consist of characters, which, though never in being, either resemble some who have existed, or display probable combinations of the faculties and traits common to all; and it may recite events which under the circumstances proposed, would have naturally occurred from the action of such characters. Now history may be supposed by some to contain all the various modifications of human character, and works descriptive of actual scenes, all the varieties of the beautiful which can be required for our instruction or amusement. But in this supposition is involved the false philosophy that the mind does not possess a distinct faculty which, not only, appreciates the forms of beauty actually presented by nature, but delights in creating new forms itself and receives pleasure from the contemplation of such creations of others. They forget too, that there are minds which are unwilling to apply themselves to the more strictly intellectual kinds of reading, and in thus endeavoring to debar them from works of fiction, they would in fact, prevent them from reading at all. The more successful course would be to indulge this taste for works that are attractive to such minds, and thus form a taste for reading which might easily be directed by degrees to other pursuits.

There is one objection however which bears about it more plausibility, and therefore deserves an answer. It is said that the reading of these kinds of works, and especially novels, creates a sympathy which finds no object upon which to expend itself, and therefore, when objects really deserving are presented to us, our feelings have become blunted, and the appropriate emotion fails to be excited. We doubt the correctness of the assertion, but granting that it be so, one or two extracts from a high authority upon these subjects, will afford a complete answer to this objection. Lord Kames, in his Elements of Criticism, remarks—"it already must have occurred to him (the reader) that if, in reading, ideal presence be the means by which our passions are moved, it makes no difference whether the subject be a fable or a true history; when ideal presence is complete, we perceive every object as in our sight; and the mind totally occupied with an interesting event, finds no leisure for reflection. This reasoning is confirmed by constant and universal experience. Let us take under consideration the meeting of Hector and Adromache, in the sixth book of Iliad; or some of the passionate scenes in King Lear: these pictures of human life, when we are sufficiently engaged, give an impression of reality not less distinct than that given by Tacitus in his description of the death of Otho: we never once reflect whether the story be true or feigned; reflection comes afterwards, when we have the scene no longer before our eyes." Again he says—"To support the foregoing theory, I add what I reckon a decisive argument: which is, that even genuine history has no command over our passions but by ideal presence only: and consequently, that in this respect it stands upon the same footing with fable. To me it appears clear, that in neither can our sympathy hold firm against reflection; for if the reflection that a story is a pure fiction prevent our sympathy, so will equally the reflection that the persons described are no longer existing." The objection then urged by these gentlemen would carry them too far, and oblige them to denounce history on the same ground that they do works of fiction. It has been urged too, though the subject is scarcely worth considering, that the tendency of many novels particularly, is immoral, that they not only describe vicious characters, but recommend them to our approbation, or convey secretly, immoral notions and opinions to the minds of their readers through the mouths of attractive characters. We know, there is a Bulwer in the department of fictitious writings, but we should remember also that there has been a Gibbon in that of history. These are instances which should not be cited as proving the general character or influence of either of these classes of works.

As for the objection that contact with vice, should always be avoided, and that this kind of writing often presents for our contemplation, characters of the most vicious and immoral description, it may be replied that we might as well shut ourselves up in an anchorite's cell, if we determine to seclude ourselves from ever seeing the exhibitions of vice and immorality.—Our intercourse in the world must inevitably force us frequently into such scenes, and as long as they are viewed in their true light, and no attempt is made to clothe them in the garb of virtue, the contemplation of them will to a rightly constituted mind, be productive rather of benefit than injury.

There are few whose intercourse in the world, particularly in the spring time of life, is so extended, or whose observation is so acute, as to enable them to understand all or even many of the infinite modifications of human character, or whose engagements would permit them to seek in nature for all those varieties of beauty and sublimity which are the appropriate stimuli to their imaginative faculty. And even were this the case, there are perhaps fewer still who in youth are able to draw for themselves the inferences which were intended to be deduced from all these differences of character, or feel the emotions which were intended to be excited by these scenes of beauty, or be able to combine them in all the forms which are suggested by the poet's fancy. Who can say that while these are the objects of the novelist and the poet, their works should be condemned as injurious? And yet this is the object constantly kept in view by the best of these authors. Nor are their works addressed solely to what is called the imagination. To read them properly, and use them as they were intended to be, requires the exercise of a keen discrimination and a sound judgment. They afford a greater opportunity for the play of the moral feelings than is often met with in the ordinary affairs of life, and prepare us to act in analogous circumstances, of which we would otherwise be devoid of experience. A proper relaxation is also afforded to our mind after being engaged in the severe occupations of life, and our feelings are often soothed and elevated and rendered happy by the perusal of the pleasing taste or glowing images of the enraptured poet. Many other considerations of a more important character might be added to demonstrate the benefits which belong to this class of writings; but our remarks have already been too much extended. The suggestions which have been made will be perceived to be based upon the idea of a proper selection of the subjects of our reading and a moderate use of them. We by no means advocate the propriety of making that which was intended to be a subordinate object of attention, a principal one, nor do we admire or approve the love-sick sentimentalist, or the unrestrained ravings of a diseased imagination.

Instead of any further enumeration of the beneficial tendency of fictitious works, we must content ourselves by referring to the history and reputation of the immortal Shakespeare, whose sayings have become proverbs, and whose writings have become almost a general medium of thought; of the sublime Milton: of the great and beloved Scott, whose name and works will ever rest near to the heart of every lover of truth and beauty. And let us not forget to recognize the claims of the other sex in the splendid creations of the genius of Joanna Baillie and Maria Edgeworth.

THE WILD MAN OF ESSEX.

[Good fortune visits the Seven with as little reluctance as she waits upon any other association of generous fellows—in support of which assertion we submit the following article which was kindly presented to us by a gentleman, who during a tour in the north part of this State,—two years since, kept a kind of "Every day book" from which the "wild man of Essex" has for the first time been extracted.]

Chandler informs me that about the middle of May in 1838, a man in a deranged state of mind, came to the Newcomb settlement, about fifty miles west from Crown Point. He made some strange requisition of the family at whose house he stopped,—remained but for a moment, and disappeared in the measureless forest on the west. Nothing of him was known until towards the close of September, when he was found by some trappers near sixty miles in the wilderness, barefooted and his clothes torn in tatters;—his frame so emaciated, that he seemed little else than a structure of bones and tendons in a casework of skin.

In the month of June his tracks made by barefeet, were seen upon the mountain, and afterward along the beach of a lake in the sand. He was next seen from a distance picking cranberries in a marsh,—but he was never taken, until discovered in the act of preparing his bed for the night. When come upon by the trappers he had collected high piles of moss, and strewn them on either side and all around him, and was just preparing with a large mat or rug to cover himself entirely from view. He expressed no surprise on seeing them, and consented with little opposition to accompany those who found him, from the society of the denizens of the wilderness to the hearths of civilized men.

His appetite was so voracious upon smelling food for the first time, that they were compelled to confine him with cords, that it might be given in sufficiently small quantities. He has since been removed to the Lunatic Asylum.

Who can imagine the scenes of suffering through which this man passed? Away from home, from the smile of affection, and from the enjoyment of all those endearing attentions that make life a blessing, in the wide wilderness of the forest, the companion of panthers and the associate of bears. Who can think of his awful situation and restrain a wish for the dawn of millennial glory, when lesion of intellect shall not be known.

See him sustaining his nearly famished body with the berries that are to be obtained by standing in the water and only one at a time;—see him gathering nuts and acorns, fit food for swine, and these with none of the variety that to a cultivated taste renders food palatable;—see him in a cold rainy night, with no genial blaze to dry his drenched limbs, and with nothing but a veil of moss between him and the mad winds of the skies;—see him in this state of human suffering making the instinctive exertions to keep alive the link that unites his spirit to his body, and can the heart but go out to sympathize with him in the loss of some near friend, or in the misfortune of some affair of romance, which has thrown between him and the sunshine of reason so frightful a cloud? To me there is nothing more awful than a mind in ruins, and I would sooner a thousand times that my friends were laid in a quiet grave where I might go and shed tears over their remains, than that they became the victims of insanity.

MISCELLANY.

ADDISON AND MALHERBE.—Addison's extreme anxiety to write finely and properly sometimes proved ludicrous. He was charged to write an account of the demise of Queen Anne to Prince George of Denmark; but delayed it so long, that the government was obliged to employ one of the clerks to do it, who afterwards boasted that he had done what Addison could not.—Malherbe was still more unfortunate. He undertook to address some stanzas of condolence to the President of Verdun; he was three years in performing his task; and he presented them, the president had already essayed a more substantial mode of condolence in taking a second wife. Le Globe, which relates this anecdote, calculates that during the twenty-five years of his poetical life, he wrote just thirty-three lines per year, and that he would waste half a ream of paper in the correction of a single stanza.

A PUNNING LEGISLATOR.—A legislator in Indiana who introduced a bill for the construction of a bridge in a certain location where two bayous or streams crossed each other, said that as this was an X-stream case, he saw no objection that could be offered on the passage of the bill.

A REAL KENTUCKIAN.

A Kentuckian, we believe of that class familiarly called a "Hog Merchant," rode up to a public house in the west, where a number of gentlemen were seated in the piazza. After a low bow to the company, he inquired if any present could tell him what was good for a burn. A young physician (there being several present) stepped forward, and with much complaisance gave him a learned lecture on burns, the mode of treatment, &c. &c., for which he was thanked politely by the Kentuckian who informed him, that his prescription would not answer his present complaint, as his saddle blanket had been very badly burnt the night previously. On hearing this the physician became exasperated, and told him if he would alight he would give him a good flogging. The Kentuckian again bowed and said, that he would not alight for two floggings let alone one, and rode off with much gravity and self satisfaction.

A French Priest of some humor says:—when the celebrated Bourdelyne preached at Rouen, the tradesmen forsook their shops, lawyers their clients, physicians their sick; but when I preached there the next year, I set all to rights again.—Every one minded his own business.

STATISTICAL.

LONDON PORTER BREWERIES.

Accustomed as a provincial inhabitant of the United Kingdom is to estimate at a very high rate the extent of the London porter breweries, from his finding the beverage in abundance in every spot on which he may set his foot, yet the reality, when it is his fortune to visit the actual scene of the manufacture in question, will prove in general far to exceed any anticipations which may have been formed. Nothing which a stranger can behold in the whole British metropolis will strike and amaze his eye more than the mere appearance of one of the larger brew-houses of the city with its enormous coppers, huge fermenting vessels, and monster-like store-vats; while, if he carries his observations farther, and examines into all the dealings and ramifications of such a concern, his mind will be filled with still greater astonishment at the seemingly incalculable amount of capital embarked in it, as necessary to sustain and carry it on. The first question which suggests itself to one's thoughts, on looking at the lakes of porter perpetually being manufactured in such places, is, "Who is to drink all this?" One can scarcely believe that any given number of human throats, even of the thirstiest order, can consume these seas of liquor as fast as they seem to be produced. Yet but a short residence in the mighty city which is the scene of this production, will remove much of this wonderment from the stranger's mind. He will soon discover that porter almost supplies the place of water in London, as the common and hourly means of slaking thirst. None so poor, none so miserable in London, but contends the thin colorless product of the spring, and will have his deep-brown "stout," in pot or can, at home or abroad. With the laboring classes the beverage has become a necessary of life, and indeed, even the most temperate and orderly among them would perhaps as soon want their solid food, as the "entire" to wash it down. In part, the origin, at least, of this habit may be owing to the rather impure sources of much of the water about the metropolis, and we have heard sensible men trace it to such a cause; but cheapness, abundance, and quality of the liquor, not to speak of other circumstances, seem in a great measure sufficient to account for the prevalence of the custom at the present day.

The difference in color between porter and ale, as well as other malt liquors, is chiefly owing, as is generally known, to the condition of the malt used in preparing the former of these drinks. The malt in this case is slightly scorched in drying, or curing as it is more frequently termed, so as to acquire a brown hue which it communicates to the liquor made from it. But there are other qualities for which porter is remarkable: and it is for the possession of these, more peculiarly, that the porter of London has obtained its great and distinctive celebrity. The agreeable bitterness and empyreumatic flavor which characterise it, have been the envy of all the brewers, we may safely say of the wide world, and fortunes have been thrown away in the endeavor to discover the source of these properties, and to imitate them. These attempts have always failed so signally, if not uniformly and universally, that at length mankind have almost agreed, by common consent, to rank the puzzle of London porter-brewing with the mystery of the Iron Mask, or that of the authorship of Junius. Numberless, indeed, were the explanations tendered by one party and another, before the point was thus given up; and as one of these notions may be said still, in some measure, to hold its ground, many persons may be glad of a little information upon the subject. Finding that no means whatever, tried in any quarter of the earth, could make porter taste as it did in London, some ingenious individual at length hit on the idea that the cause must lie in the Thames water, with which it was manufactured. As the Thames water was really known to have peculiar properties—that of keeping long fresh and pure at sea, for example, after undergoing several fermentations—many people regarded this solution as perfectly satisfactory: and one enterprising brewer of the Scotch capital actually went the length of bringing down the Thames water in casks, in the full expectation of at length rivalling the metropolitan brewers. The attempt was unsuccessful; nor will the reader marvel at this, when informed how erroneous were the premises upon which the experiment was based. Only four of the London brew-houses do really make use of the Thames river water! In other words, not a sixth part of the London porter is manufactured with water from that source. The breweries have in most cases private wells, and the liquor brewed thus is no what inferior in quality to that into which the river water enters. The public at least, have never discovered any difference. So much for the Thames water fallacy.

The real cause of the pleasing bitter relish and aroma of the London porter, we have good authority for asserting, rests with the malt used, and also the mode of curing it for use. The hops, of course, are a principal source of the bitter in all porter, but in the case of London porter, the delightful bitter smack is not so much derived from the employment of a large allowance of hops, as from the use, in the brewing of great quantities of brown or embrowned malt, which malt is cured along with dried wood of astringent quality. This wood is mixed with the malt, and, besides contributing to the spirit and strength of the beverage, is the ingredient that imparts to its much prized aroma. In the introduction of this astringent wood, consists the long-sought-for secret. All the stories which have been told of the unbounded use of liquorice, and drugs of every kind and name, are entirely erroneous as far as regards the leading brew-houses, which supply the world with London porter.

From various causes, it would be extremely difficult to give any thing like a correct estimate of the capital embarked in one of the great London brew-houses. In the hop room alone of such a concern, there lies a princely fortune, some single houses having usually a stock of hops on hand about two hundred thousand pounds in value. This is in some measure dormant capital, as such a stock would last a year or two. But the keeping of so large a store is a provision against a scarcity or a rise in prices, and the power of making such a provision is a magnificent proof of the means held at command. The stock of malt, again, in the larger houses, is on an equal scale. Malt and hops together will generally amount in value to about three hundred thousand pounds.* The stock-vats exhibit another immense absorption of money. In these vats, vast quantities of porter are stored up, to ripen and mellow for public use. The vessels in question resemble houses in size more than any thing else. In Messrs. Whitbread's brewery there are about thirty vats, each between twenty and thirty feet high, and of a proportionate transverse diameter. They hold many thousand barrels each, and are usually full to the brim. These vats are bound with a succession of very strong iron hoops, set as close to one another as they can well go; and, in reality, the danger would be extreme, without powerful supports of this kind. A number of years ago, a vessel of this nature burst in one of the large London brew-houses, and did no small damage, floating a family in a neighbouring house clean out of doors, besides other feats of the like order.

Barclay, Perkins and Company, have the most extensive porter brew-house in London. Their establishment is one of old standing, being the same which formerly yielded a noble fortune to Samuel Johnson's friend, Thrale. The quantity of porter now annually brewed by this house amounts to between three and four hundred thousand barrels. The following six brewing companies, Hanbury's, Reid's, Whitbread's, Meux's, Combe and Delafield's, and Calvert's produce also very large quantities, the issue of none being less than one hundred thousand barrels a-year, while it is double that quantity in several of the cases. But neither a knowledge of the amount of the annual manufacture, nor an estimate of the stock and consumption of hops and malt, will lead us to any thing like a fair idea of the capital embarked in one of these concerns. The cause of this may be in part explained. The hop and malt rooms are natural and obvious quarters for the employment of the wealth of these brewing-houses. But the funds of the same parties are absorbed also in less obvious ways. The most of the licensed public-houses in the city are connected with some brewing company or another, and hence are called "tied houses." The brewers advance loans to the publican on the security of his lease, and from the moment that necessity or any other cause tempts him to accept such a loan, he is bound to the lending party. Indeed, the advance is made on the open and direct condition that he shall sell the lender's liquor, and his alone. The publican, in short, becomes a mere retail-agent for the behoof of one particular company. They clap their signs above his door, and he can no longer fairly call the house his own. The quantity of money thus lent out by the London brewers is enormous. One house alone, we know from good authority, has more than two hundred thousand pounds so employed. Perhaps the reader will have a still better idea of the extent to which this system is carried, when he is told that a single brew-house has fifteen thousand pounds worth of sign-boards stuck up over London—rating these articles, of course, at their cost prices. This explains what a stranger in the metropolis is at first very much struck with—the number of large boards marked with "Whitbread's Entire," "Meux's Double Refined," or "Combe and Delafield's Brown Stout House," that meet the eye in every part of London. These signs are of such size as to extend usually from side to side of the building on which they are placed, and if a house presents two ends, or even three, to public view, the massive letters adorn them all. Such boards cost from fifteen to twenty pounds a-piece, so that eight or nine hundred of them will amount to the sum total stated: and some breweries have that number up, in one quarter and another of the great city. This mode of advertising may look expensive, but it has its advantages. It is permanent, and readily points out to the favorers of particular brewing houses where their favorite stout is to be found. One loves Meux's, another man Barclay's, a third Courage and Donaldson's and these gilded placards show where the desired articles may be had by all parties. What an idea of this "tie" system in itself gives us of the wealth of these brewers! A handsome fortune laid out on sign-boards!

In reality, however, the leading partners, whose names are at the head of these firms, are in many cases men possessed of extensive landed property, and to all intents and purposes private country gentlemen, though retaining, it may be, large shares in the establishment to which the wealth and standing of their families were originally owing. There are always some of the principal partners in these concerns, nevertheless, who take an active share in their management. The mode of conducting them is thoroughly systematic, as much so, and necessarily as much so as in the case of the Bank of England. The whole business is divided into sections, with responsible persons at the head of each. One man usually, and sometime two, superintend the brewing department. These are the operative managers, who are a shrewd and intelligent class of men. Salaries in these extensive concerns are on the handsomest scale, the motto of the proprietors being, "best service, best pay." The number of operatives about these places is of course very great. They are usually stout, florid men, with countenances and persons alike redolent of the cherishing fluids amid which they live, more, and have their being. And when hard exercise is combined with this generous nutrition, they will, we have no doubt, be as healthy as they appear. Otherwise, they will be liable, it is to be feared, to apoplectic and dropsical affections. Numerous as are these common workers at the brewing business, however, those who conceive the employment flowing from these vast establishments to rest and end here, will form but a poor idea of the range of their influence. Hop-growers, iron-founders, coopers, colliers, publicans, horse-dealers, saddlers, cart wrights, agriculturists in all the various lines of barley, corn and hay growing, with many other trades and professions, are all directly and perpetually benefited from the maintenance of these great concerns. It is astonishing how many of all these tradesmen one single brewing-house will sustain within its circle, disseminating its work and its payments with never-failing punctuality.

Serious attempts have frequently been made to shake the business of the great porter breweries, but the system was too deeply rooted to permit of its easy overthrow. A heavy though indirect stroke of this kind came from the ale brewers of London, who some time since commenced brewing an ale article at so low a price as to encroach on the sale of "entire." In retaliation, the porter houses, with the exception of three only, were tempted to add a proportion of ale to their ordinary manufacture. They do not, however, carry this ale brewing to any great extent, and on the other hand, their porter monopoly remains but little, if at all impaired.

One point about the London breweries, and we have done with these loose hints. The stables of one of these establishments, when filled with their allotted tenants, constitutes one of the very finest sights that can be seen on the whole premises. To Scotsmen, the powerful make and general beauty of the horses of burden that are seen traversing the streets of the metropolis, is always a subject of wonder. The little carts of his own country, and the comparatively puny though active creatures which draw them, sink into absolute insignificance in his eyes when contrasted with the colossal waggons and horses of the south.—One horse to one cart is the way in Scotland, while in England you observe a train of six or eight gigantic creatures dragging along a large and heavily loaded vehicle resembling a goodly haystack in breadth, height and compactness. A lengthened line of such waggons is one of the most imposing sights imaginable. As the brewers keep the very best of horses, it is in their stables that the beauty of the breed can be seen to most perfection. They are kept in the very highest condition, plump, sleek and glossy. The order maintained throughout these large establishments extends to their stabling arrangements. In Whitbread's we observed the name of each horse painted about his stall, and were told that every one of them knew its designation as well as any biped about the place.—Some of the most extensive breweries employ above one hundred such horses, to disseminate their products through all parts of the city and its suburbs.

HISTORICAL.

From the New York Iris.

ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS, A. D. 73.

TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN.

[The following article is a translation of one of the epistles of Pliny, by him addressed to Tacitus, the historian. In it an account is given of what came under the observation of the writer during the time of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius, A. D. 73. It will be recollected that Pliny the younger remained at Misenum after his uncle's departure, for the purpose of viewing from a nearer position, this, the first recorded eruption of the mountain. His life paid the forfeit of the attempt, while his less adventurous nephew escaped.]

Induced by the letter which at your request I wrote concerning the death of my uncle, you express a desire to learn all that I passed through (pertulerim) after leaving Misenum, (for a narration of these circumstances I commenced in my former epistle, but broke off very abruptly.)

After my uncle's departure, I continued studying, (for which purpose I had remained) until the time for the bath; after which, having supped, I passed the night, sleeping but little. For many days previous, there had been considerable agitation of the earth, which, as it was no unusual occurrence for Campania, excited but little apprehension. During the night, however, it increased to such a degree, that not only did every thing seem to be violently shaken, but completely overturned. While rising for the purpose of calling my mother, should she be asleep, she rushed into my chamber. Having seated ourselves in the court yard, which barely separates our house from the sea, I, calling for a volume of Livy, I know not whether to term it strength of mind, or recklessness, being then in my eighteenth year, commenced reading, and even making extracts, with perfect composure.

A friend of my uncle from Spain, seeing us thus seated, and myself engaged in reading, reproached my mother for her patience, and me for my careless security. Nevertheless, I continued intent as ever upon my book. It was now the first hour of the day, yet the light was feeble and languid, and the violent trembling of the adjacent buildings, (being seated in a confined, though open place,) threatened us with inevitable ruin. Then we determined to leave the village. The terrified people followed, and urged upon those departing in dense crowds, (as what in fear resembles prudence) each one preferring another's counsel to his own.

Having gone forth from our dwellings, we halted; where many things transpired which excited both our wonder and fear, for our carriages, which we had commanded to be driven before us, notwithstanding the uniform levelness of the ground, were forced in every direction; nor indeed, having blocked the wheels with stones, was it possible to keep them in the same position any length of time. Moreover, the sea seemed to be drawn back upon itself, and as it were by the trembling of the earth repelled from the shore. Certain it is that the beach extended into it, and many marine animals were left upon the dry sand. Upon the other side, a cloud, a cloud dark and horrid, with its broken and tortuous wreaths of fiery vapor seemed yawning (dehisebat) in long figures of flame, bearing some resemblance to, though exceeding in magnitude, flashes of lightning.

Then our Spanish friend, with increased earnestness exclaimed:—"If your brother, if your uncle lives, it is his wish that you should be saved—if he has perished, that you should survive him; why then do you delay your escape?" We replied, "we intend not, while ignorant of his safety, to consult our own." Immediately he left us, and rapidly fled from the danger.—Presently a cloud descended upon the land, overshadowing the sea, surrounding and enshrouding Caprea, and completely enveloping in darkness that part of Misenum which juts out into the sea.

Then my mother prayed, exhorted, and commanded me, to use all my endeavors to escape, saying that youth would assist me in flight, which her age and corpulency forbade her to attempt—that she would die content if so be she were not the cause of death to me. I refused to seek for safety unless with her, and seizing her hand compelled her to accompany me.—She complied reluctantly, upbraiding herself as the cause of my delay.

And now, occasionally the ashes falling upon us, looking back I beheld a dense blackness hanging upon, and seeming to follow us, pouring down upon the earth in the manner of a torrent. "Let us turn aside," I said to my mother, "while we are able to see, lest thrown down in the way, in the darkness, we should be trampled upon by those following us. Scarcely were we seated when night seemed to settle around, not moonless (illunis) and cloudy as it were, but as though we were in some enclosed place, with every light extinct. Then might have been heard the shrieking of women, the moaning of infants, the shouting of men; some were calling upon their parents, some their wives, with their voices, by their voices recognising them. These were lamenting their own misfortunes—those, the misfortunes of their friends. There were those, who through fear of death, even prayed for death. Many raised their hands to the gods. Many more deemed the gods had ceased to exist, and interpreted this to be the last and eternal night to the world. Nor were those wanting who sought to increase the real dangers by feigned and fictitious terror. There were those present who falsely, yet to credulous ears announced that Misenum was partially destroyed, and partly enveloped in flame. For a brief time light appeared, not to herald the day, but a renewal of the eruption. The fire having fallen at some distance, darkness again enshrouded us, and again the cinders in great quantities fell upon us, which, ever anon rising, had we not shaken off, would have overwhelmed and stifled us by their weight. I would glory in saying, that amid all this scene of danger, no groan, no word expressive of fear escaped my lips, were it not that the belief that I was perishing in the universal ruin of all, was my great though wretched consolation!

At length the darkness grew less intense, and gradually assuming the appearance of smoke or a cloud, the day manifested itself to us, and the sun shone forth with a lurid light, such as it accustomed to give at the time of an eclipse. To our confused sight, all things covered with ashes, as it had been with snow, were a changed aspect. Returning to Misenum, and having refreshed ourselves as we were best able to do, we passed an anxious night, alternately influenced by hope and fear, though fear was predominant. For both the tremor of the earth continued, and very many, deprived of their reason, with terrifying predictions, mocked at their own and the calamities of others. Not even then, although we had experienced much of danger, and were still in a situation to expect it, did we think of flight, while uncertain of my uncle's fate.

These things you will read, not as worthy of being enrolled in your history, and if unworthy their present place, (an epistle,) you will blame yourself who required them. Farewell!

VARIETY.

EXAMINATION OF A WITNESS.

Question.—Did you see the defendant throw the stone? Answer.—I saw a stone and I am pretty sure he threw it. Q.—Was it a stone of considerable dimensions? A.—Why it was considerable of a stone. Q.—How large was it? A.—I should say it was a large stone. Q.—What was its size? A.—Why it was a sizeable stone. Q.—Can't you answer definitely—how big was it? A.—I should say it was a stone of come bigness. Q.—You are a singular witness—can't you give the jury some idea of the bigness of the stone? A.—Why as near as I can recollect, it was something of a stone. Q.—Can't you compare it with some other object? A.—Why, if I was to compare it, so as to give my notion of the stone, I should say, as near as I can judge, it was about as big as a piece of chalk.

TIC DOLOREUX.

The following letter from a gentleman to another with whom we are intimate, describing how he was relieved from this excruciating disease, seems to us worthy of being made widely known:—

"I have to apologize for my having so long neglected sending you a statement of my case. It is as follows; and if its being made public can in any way subtract from the suffering of those who suffer under that dreadful disease, Tic Doreux, I shall feel most happy. For nearly two years I suffered the severest torture from Tic Doreux in the head (left side) and in the thigh. I believe I may safely say that I tried every known remedy, without any apparent effect.—For the last year I never had the slightest cessation of pain, without large doses of laudanum or morphia.—For fourteen months I could not lie down in my bed. In fact, the torture was so dreadful, that every morning at daylight I was thankful that I was not deprived of reason. I fortunately recollected that a friend of mine had derived great benefit from the use of electricity in a case of chronic rheumatism.

This led me to try the new instrument called the 'Electro-Magnetico.' I procured one, and from the first application I felt some what easier; and after using it half an hour, I felt inclined to sleep. I continued the use of it for that period, morning and evening, for more than a week, at the end of which time I was perfectly free from pain, and began to enjoy my natural rest. It is now nearly five months since I left off using it, and I am truly thankful to say that I feel as well as ever I did in my life."

We need only add to the above, that the electro-magnetico is an instrument made and sold by philosophical instrument makers, and the application, we believe, consists in allowing a stream of electric fluid to flow from a wire into the part affected, the process giving no pain whatever. Any skilful surgeon could apply the remedy. Tic Doreux being, in fact, a derangement in the nerves, or as we may call them, the electric wires of the body, it is quite reasonable to suppose that the disturbance can be rectified by the artificial means now mentioned.—Chambers Edinburgh Journal.

'WHAT A SAD PROVIDENCE!'

It has been customary, in some of our cities and towns for young ladies to walk in thin shoes and delicate stockings in mid-winter. A healthy blooming young girl, thus dressed, in violation of Heaven's laws pays the penalty; a checked circulation, cold fever and death. 'What a sad providence!' exclaimed her friends. Was it providence or her own folly? A beautiful young bride goes night after night to parties in honor of her marriage. She has a slight sore throat perhaps and the weather is inclement; but she must wear her neck and arms bare, for who ever saw a bride in a close evening dress! She is seized with inflammation of the lungs, and dies before her bridal days are over.—“What a Providence, cut off in the midst of happiness and hope,” exclaims the world! Alas did she not cut off the thread of life herself! A girl in the country exposed to our climate, gets a new bonnet instead of a flannel garment. Rheumatism is the consequence. Should the girl sit down tranquilly with the idea that Providence has sent the rheumatism upon her, or should she charge it to her vanity and avoid the folly in future! Look my young friend, at the mass of diseases that are incurred by intemperance, indiscreet dressing, tight lacing, &c. and all is quietly imputed to Providence. Is there no impiety as well as ignorance in this? Were the physical laws strictly observed from generation to generation there would be an end to frightful diseases that cut short life, and of the long maladies that make life a torment or trial. It is the opinion of those who best understand the physical system, that this wonderful machine—this body—this ‘goodly temple’ would gradually decay, and man would die as few now die, as if falling to sleep.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR. ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

TERMS OF THIS PAPER.—To subscribers residing out of the city, $2 in advance—$2.50 if within six months, and $3, if not paid until the expiration of the year. BACK NUMBERS at all times furnished.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—B. W.'s Fancy Sketch, has been received.

Will J. A. W. of Washington, Alabama, send us the proceedings of G. L. & G. C.

The favor of L. S. D. of Wheeling has been received, and his requests will be attended to.

The interesting communication from our red brethren of the Seneca Tribe of Indians, in this State, shall have a place next week, if possible.

The Address, of Br. Haswell, of Hardinsburgh, Ky. shall have its turn.

CITY AFFAIRS.—Mr. McElroy from the committee of the Common Council, on the proposition to divide the city from five to ten wards, reported in favor of making State street the dividing line as far as Eagle-st. making four wards on each side of State street, and two west of Eagle, divided by a line through Washington street. The election to be held on the 2d Tuesday of April. The Argus, from whom we derive these facts, very quaintly observes, “We should not be surprised, if there should be for once, a state of opinion in the city, approaching very near unanimity.” We hope for the future, that our citizens will manifest “unanimity,” in all which may relate to the welfare of the city. Our party differences should be merged in the “city’s good.” This is the secret of Trojan enterprise and prosperity. Our “unanimity” on the Bridge question, is worthy of all praise, and Troy begins to find she has got her hands full, while we all pull one way. So may it ever be.

Death of Gov. Winthrop.—We regret to learn that the Hon. Thomas L. Winthrop, formerly Lieut. Governor of Massachusetts, died at his residence in Boston, at the age of 81 years.

A HINT.—Those of our friends and correspondents who may hereafter send us the names of individuals, either as Officers of Masonic Bodies, or otherwise, are particularly requested to write such names as intelligibly as possible. Perhaps there is no small thing more provoking, than the blunder in a man’s name, and we are satisfied that the sin of omission, and commission in this respect can be laid to our charge; not that we cannot read tolerably, but, that we lack the yankee qualification of “guessing” out certain i’s, t’s and other letters, which belong to the “duck track” system of penmanship. Names are arbitrary, and can be reduced to no correct standard; so we trust, our correspondents, will be careful.

N. B. Those of our subscribers who are desirous of paying their subscriptions, are informed that all credits are duly entered according to the most approved system of orthography, in a book provided for that purpose. This remark is made to remove any uneasiness, which might possibly exist in the minds of those who are fearful of being credited twice on the same vol.

THE APPRENTICES LIBRARY, realised 173 dollars by the benefit given at the Amphitheatre. Mrs. Nichols, the wife of the generous manager took a benefit on Wednesday evening last, and the house was crowded almost to suffocation. This fact may be taken as substantial evidence of the popularity of the proprietor. We understand that it is the intention of our play-going citizens to give Mr. N. a complimentary benefit, before he leaves us in the Spring. It will be a bumper.

JAMES G. BROOKS, ESQ. favorably known to the reading world, as the author of “Florio” died on Saturday last, in this city, after a lingering illness, aged about 40. Mr. B. has been connected with the public press, for nearly 20 years, and probably has experienced in that time, as much of the vicissitudes of editorial life—light and shade, as has befallen any brother of the profession. Mr. B. was a Mason of the highest order, both as regards Degree, and Heart, and his many noble virtues, will ever be cherished by a large circle of friends and acquaintances.

MODESTY.—The “Divine Fanny,” demands $800 per night for standing on her toes, &c. at the New Orleans Theatre. Many an honest man in this country is obliged to labor hard for four years, to earn this sum, and some of them with families too. Yet this foreign sandango, who kicks up her heels at the expense of woman’s brightest jewel—MODESTY, is sought after to the tune of $800 a night. Shame!

LITERARY.—We have received the first four Nos. of an excellent monthly, entitled the Iris or Literary Messenger, published at $2 per annum, at 647 Broadway, New York. The Iris is chiefly filled with original matter, and if the present Nos. are to be taken as an earnest of its spirit and talent, it may be placed by the side of our proudest periodicals.

An interesting article from the Edinburgh Journal, on London Porter Breweries, will be found on another page.

It is strongly rumored, (says the Washington correspondent of the J. of Commerce,) that Gen. Harrison, in his inaugural, will declare utter hostility to the abolitionists and all their projects. Amen, say we.—But “what will Mrs. Grundy say?”

TEMPERANCE.—Father Mathew, said in one of his addresses, that the tee-totalers in Ireland amount to 3,300,000.

Mr. Editor.—I wish through the medium of your Journal, to say a few words respecting the course of lectures now in progress in this city by Profr. Bronson. The subjects of reading, speaking and singing, open an extended field, which the Professor has questionless explored as thoroughly as any other individual of modern times. His vocal philosophy embraces some principles which appear novel, but on investigation will be found irrefutable. The use of the abdominal and dorsal muscles in producing sounds must be of great utility to those who are engaged in public speaking or singing, and in fact a proper understanding of these principles, should prevail among those in the more ordinary walks of life, for if they be true, and the positions assumed by Mr. Bronson, be tenable, a just appreciation of them would prove of incalculable value, and should be universally applied.—Three lectures have already been delivered and listened to by a more numerous and intelligent audience than is usually secured for any course of scientific instructions. From the interest manifested and the large numbers who attend these exercises, I am confident I am not alone in the favorable impression received. For the purpose of more fully demonstrating and explaining the wonderful powers of the human voice, when fully developed, the Professor has associated with him a Mr. Christian, who I understand has spent twenty years of his life in Germany, where he has acquired the art, or rather cultivated his vocal powers so successfully as to be able to give two bass sounds at the same instant, the one formed in the larynx and the other in the glottis. The combined efforts of the two gentlemen, afford an evening’s entertainment both delightful and instructive.

J. B.

Mr. S. H. NICHOLS,

Dear Sir—In behalf of the Trustees, and the Apprentices Library Association, I return you thanks for your generosity in relieving their Institution by the proceeds of one night of your well conducted Amphitheatre amounting to $173.

It will always awaken pleasing reflections in a generous bosom, when it can look abroad in Society and point to those, whose Philanthropy keep pace with their means, and stand ever ready to relieve the destitute, feed the Orphan, and scatter knowledge to the youth, whose humble destinies is strewn with toil.

Such I feel proud to say is your character during your sojourn in our city. If our wealthy citizens would emulate your nobleness of spirit, suffering, penury, distress and ignorance, would soon be almost driven from our city.

May those feelings that swell and throb in the bosoms of men, while performing good actions, always be yours, and a generous public your reward.

I subscribe myself yours respectfully.

JOHN TAYLOR, President of Association.

FOREIGN.—Twenty-seven days latter from England.—The Boston Traveller of Tuesday, says the Royal mail steam ship Britannia, Capt. Cleland, arrived at this port yesterday morning, 7½ o’clock. She left Liverpool on the afternoon of the 4th, and has experienced severe weather during most of the passage, having had strong gales from the westward. On the day after leaving Liverpool, she broached to, stove her bulwarks, and broke her iron tiller short off.

She brought 84 passengers to Halifax, landed 4 there and took on board 19 for Boston.

On the arrival of the Britannia at Halifax, a committee of the passengers waited on Capt. Cleland with an address, expressing a high sense of his kindness and courtesy, and his skill as a commander, and requesting him to accept a piece of a plate as a testimonial of their respect.

The news by this arrival is not very important. The most important is the settlement of the eastern question. There is nothing later from China, and the news in relation to the settlement for the difficulties between England and China is neither confirmed nor contradicted.

The steamship Calcutta arrived at Liverpool

the 16th of January, making the passage in about 14 days.

The steamship President for New York was to sail on the 10th inst.

England, Scotland and Ireland have experienced an unusually severe winter, and the sufferings of the poor have been very great.

Scott, the American diver, came to an untimely end on the 12th ult. He advertised an exhibition on Waterloo bridge, where he was to go through with a mock execution, from the top of a pole erected for that purpose. On the third performance of the trick, the noose slipped, and the poor fellow was hanged in earnest.

Mr. Charles Kenble's health is nearly re-established. He is now residing with his daughter, Mrs. Butler, and daily drives out.

Ellen Tree was privately married, at Manchester, to Charles Kean, "Shakespeare's murderer," as he is termed in some of the English papers.

Parliament was opened on the 26th ult., by her Majesty in person. The Queen's speech alludes to the convention to effect a pacification of the Levant, concluded with Austria, Prussia, Russia and the Sultan—to the negotiations going on at the last accounts with the government of China—to the differences with Spain and Portugal about the execution of a treaty concluded by those powers in 1835—and several local matters; but says not one word in relation to our differences on the Boundary question.

An alarming insurrection has broken out in Switzerland, connected with the new constitution, which does not give universal satisfaction. After much bloodshed, it was put down.

The grand Council of Argovia had decreed the suppression of all monasteries within the jurisdiction of the canton.

France.—In France the fortification of Paris engrosses the attention of every one. The newspapers are filled with the debates on this subject, to the exclusion of every thing else.

Sir Astley Cooper was severely ill, and the most serious apprehensions respecting his recovery were entertained by his friends.

Distressing Accident.—As Mr. Christopher Skank of Springport, was engaged on Saturday the 30th ult. in splitting a couple of maple logs in front of his brother's house, a fatal accident occurred. He had succeeded in splitting one of them in the ordinary way, but wishing to avoid the great labor thus required, procured a blast of powder and applied a slow match.—By some means this ignited sooner than was intended—and the plug was driven into his head, a little below the right eye, proving instantly fatal. The plug, it appears, so far through the head, as to strike with great force upon the back part of the skull, and thence bounding back—lying when found, at a distance of 18 inches from the body. Mr. S. was a worthy, hard working man, between 30 and 40 years of age—and has left a wife and four small children to mourn his death.—Auburn Journal.

Melancholy Delusion.—A man named Joseph Ackland, residing at 125 Third avenue, was committed to prison for resisting the coroner on Wednesday.—Ackland had just lost a child, aged three days; and, under the delusion that he could restore it to life, he not only refused the coroner admission, but attacked with a club the officers who came to the assistance of Dr. Archer. The poor fellow is a religious fanatic, and is said to be a mormon.—N. Y. Paper.

Death of Hatfield, the lunatic.—James Hatfield, who was tried at the Old Bailey, in the month of September, 1802, for firing a loaded pistol, in Drury Lane theatre, at his majesty King George the III., and acquitted on the ground of insanity, died on Saturday, the 23d inst., in the 69th year of his age.

Death of the American Consul at Paris.—Died on Sunday evening, Jan. 31, in Paris, in the 68th year of his age, of typhoid exhaustion after gout, Daniel Bront, esq., Consul of the United States of America for Paris and agent of American claims.

The state of New Hampshire is said to manufacture annually 1,065,030 pounds of maple sugar.

Rumored dreadful accident—upwards of one hundred lives lost.—Rumors have been prevalent in this neighborhood that, on Monday last, a most serious calamity happened on Whittlesey-mere—the ice breaking, and, it is said, upwards of a hundred lives being lost. From inquiries we have made, we have reason to fear this rumor is not without foundation, though various reports still continue.—Cambridge Adv.

PEDESTRIAN MATCH.—The match for 200 miles in 200 successive hours, one mile in each hour, was won easily by Nicholas Low, Esq. of this city. The performance commenced on Friday the 5th, at 12 A. M. and closed on Saturday evening, the 13th, when Mr. Low drove to town and reported his success to the Club. He suffered at first a little in his knees, but he soon overcame it and came in the last at perfectly fresh, walking his 199th mile in 13 minutes, and his last in 14½. Pedestrians, always select the last twenty minutes of one hour to walk one mile, and the first twenty minutes of the next hour for the next mile, leaving an interregnum of an hour and a half between every two miles for refreshment, and repose. It is now admitted that Mr. Low can perform 500 miles on the same conditions, and many assert that he can perform Capt. Barclay's feat of 1000 miles in 1000 hours.—N. Y. Standard.

Col. Andrew Jackson Hutchings died on the 15th inst. at the residence of the late Gen. Coffee, in Alabama. He was an adopted son of Gen. Jackson.

In New York on Monday morning, 22nd inst., by the Rev. Dr. Welch, of Albany, Mr. William H. Taggard, of that city, to Mary E. only daughter of the late Wm. H. Seymour, esq. formerly of Albany.

DIED.

Of consumption, on the 23d inst., in the 42d year of his age, Charles Rodgers, a native of Kerkeel, Ireland and for the last 20 years a resident of Albany.

In Hudson, on the 17th inst., Peter Downing, a respectable citizen of Hillsdale, aged 64 years. Mr. Downing, while at supper, was choked by a piece of meat passing into the trachea, and expired before surgical aid could be obtained.

At the residence of Rev. Staats Van Santvoord, New Baltimore, Sunday morning the 21st inst., Capt. William Mc Murray in the 26th year of his age.

At Clifton Park on the 18th instant, Everet Van Vranken an aged, respected and pious inhabitant of that town.

In Philadelphia, on the 16th inst., Gertrude Elizabeth, daughter of Walter L. Cochran, of Schenectady, N. Y., in the 21st year of her age.

At Watervliet, on Saturday, 20th inst. Celestia Jane, infant daughter of Wm. D. and Margaret Ferris, aged eight months.

At La Grange, Tennessee, Mr. Joseph Shinpoek, aged 40 years. Mr. Shinpoek was a zealous Mason; and his remains were interred with the usual solemnities of the craft, at the Village Grave Yard on Monday attended by a number of his fellow citizens.—Whig.

POETRY.

MASONIC ODE.

The world was darkness. No imperial flowers
Bloomed on her mounds, or blossomed in her bowers.
Fate strewed her carcases on the murky wind,
And nought was left to cheer or soothe the mind.

Oh, Charity! thou harbinger of Light.
Thou sun by day, the polar star by night,
Haste to the orb which pale misfortune flies,
Where sorrow falters, and where misery dies.

Is there a hand which blunts the poisoned dart,
And turns its baleful influence from the heart?
Is there a talisman whose magic power
Can change the desert to the vermil bower?

Is there a shrine, where winter-woe is driven
To seek from tranquil clime the bliss of Heaven?
Yes! there is one, immutable divine,
And sorrow greets it at the MASON'S SHRINE.

THE LYE.

[This poem, written by Sir Walter Raleigh, while under sentence of death, we extract from Percy's Reliques of ancient English Poetry. It contains ideas of a loftier flight than most poetry of that age—sentiments which do honor even to the well known talents of their author—and a contempt of life, perfectly in character with a man of his mind, in such a situation; and the whole expressed in language, of which any poet of the present day might well be proud.

Goe, soule, the bodie's guest,
Upon a thankless arrant;
Feare not to touch the best,—
The truth shall be thy warrant:
Goe, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.

Goe, tell the court, it glows
And shines like rotten wood;
Goe tell the church it shows
What's good,—and doth no good:
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.

Tell Potentates they live
Acting by others actions;
Not loved unless they give,—
Not strong but by their factions;
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition,
That rule affairs of state,
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate;
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell them that brave it most,
They beg for more by spending,
Who in their greatest cost
Seek nothing but commending;
And if they once reply,
Spare not to give the lie.

Tell zeale, it lacks devotion;
Tell love, it is but lusts;
Tell time, it is but motion;
Tell flesh, it is but dust;
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.

Tell age, it daily wasteth;
Tell honor, how it alters;
Tell beauty, how she blasteth;
Tell favor, how she falters;
And as they shall reply,
Give each of them the lie.

Tell wit, how much it wrangles
In tickle points of nicenesse;
Tell wisdom, she entangles
Herselfe in over-wisenesse;
And if they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physicke of her boldnesse;
Tell skill, it is pretention;
Tell charity of coldnesse;
Tell law, it is contention;
And as they yeild reply,
So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindnesse;
Tell nature of decay;
Tell friendship of unkindnesse;
Tell justice of delay;
And if they dare reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell arts, they have no soundnesse,
But vary by esteeming;
Tell schooles, they want profoundnesse,
And stand too much on seeming:
If arts and schooles reply,
Give arts and schooles the lie.

Tell faith, it's fled the citie;
Tell how the country erreth;
Tell, manhood shakes of pitie;
Tell, vertue least preferreth:
And, if they do reply,
Spare not to give the lie.

So, when thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done babbling,
Although to give the lie
Deserves no less than stabbing,
Yet stab at thee who will,
No stab the soul can kill.

From the New York Iris.

JACK FROST.

Jack Frost, thou art a roving blade,
And nipping noses is thy trade,
Thy limbs of icicles are made—
Of snow thy body;
The keen north wind, is also said
To be the hobby.

Thou art no tender child of spring,
When painted flow'rs their incense fling,
And wild birds warble on the wing,
The live long day;
Thou art no pale-fac'd puny thing
Of sunny May.

But when the north wind whistles loud,
And snows wrap nature as a shroud,
And round the blazing hearth we crowd,
Or shivering cower;
Child of the tempest and the cloud!
We own thy power.

Yet welcome still with all thy blasts,
Thy reign is pleasant while it lasts,
Replete with friendship and repasts
Of love and reason;
The human soul anew it casts,
Sweet social season!

There's music in its merry bells,
Its joys the nimble skater tells,
While sociably, the enjoyment awells
The evening circle;
The holidays, with their sweet spells,
And wreaths of myrtle.

Yet there are those, who ill endure
Thy biting blasts—the humble poor—(Stern penury can ne'er inure
To cold and pain:)
Oh! for their sakes, Jack Frost,
Thy rage restrain!

MUTIBILITY OF EARTHLY JOY.

Life is a fitful shadowed hour,
A stone of light and shade,
Hope's gentle sun—grief's gloomy bower,
And in the grave were laid.

We look for peace, we look for rest,
For light in beings gloom,
Alas we find us only blest,
Reposing in the tomb.

What are the gaudy joys of earth,
What are the fleeting scenes of life,
What are its beauties hopes and mirth,
Its anxious cares and strife?

All—all but chaff before the wind,
Chastisement by our father given
To fit the soul and raise the mind
And lead the spirit on to heaven.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY IN THE UNITED STATES.—Brethren.—We have been witnesses of the effects of one of the most extraordinary delusions in regard to our Institution, which in any land or age have tried its strength or durability.

That jealousies and fear of an Institution every where conducted on liberal principles, should have excited a spirit of opposition in arbitrary or tyrannical governments have never surprised us; but when our Order was attacked in our own land, and the people our own neighbors and friends, were excited by false, malicious, and absurd accusations against it; when we saw families disturbed, societies convulsed, and individuals of eminent virtue and station denounced and persecuted, we deplored the folly and fanaticism of our enemies, and sought by patience, and quiet and orderly deportment to assuage the bitterness of our revilers, and to turn the hearts of our misguided accusers. We knew that our Institution was devised in wisdom for the improvement of society in every land, and could not long be left as a mark for the scorn and derision of demagogues and fanatics, nor remain an object of terror to the well disposed.

The delusion has passed away—there has been a redeeming spirit in the midst of the storm—a spirit of inquiry after truth, which has wrought out for us a vindication, and fixed it in the popular mind. Once more our Order has free course, and has resumed its place as the medium of union, friendship, and kind offices amongst 'good men' of every rank, station, party, sect, and profession in the land. What we could not do when compelled to defend ourselves against the ingenious assaults of an organized and reckless faction, we can do now: we can take high ground; we can place our Institution in its true position; we can openly declare its principles to attentive hearers, and verify our declarations by the testimony of the greatest, the purest, the best beloved and venerated men, whose names adorn the brightest pages of our country's history. We have it in our power to show, that so far is Freemasonry from having a tendency to corrupt the morals, weaken the faith, impede the justice, contract the soul, or relax the patriotism of its votaries, our country stands indebted for a large portion of its welfare, honor, and security to the members of our Fraternity.

This high position it is my intention to maintain by a work which I propose to publish, if sustained by the approbation and aid of the Fraternity to the necessary extent.

To test this, I offer the following plan for the publication of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States.

To place the work within the reach of every member of the Fraternity, it will be published in numbers, in the imperial Octavo form, at periods of one or two months, at 50 cents a number, payable on delivery, and will extend as is supposed, to about fifty numbers, forming five large volumes. Each number will contain three Portraits engraved on steel, and occasionally other illustrations, with biographies written expressly with reference to the Masonic character and acts of each subject, (so far as materials can be obtained,) as well as to his private life. For the fidelity, accuracy and beauty of the work, the responsibility will rest alone on the editor and proprietor.

Extract from the minutes of the Grand Lodge, of the State of New York, Dec. 1st, A. L. 5840.

"The Grand Secretary then asked permission to present the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing, under the title of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States. The proposed Address to the Fraternity and the prospectus were then read; whereupon the following Resolution was unanimously adopted."

"Resolved.—That this Grand Lodge highly approve of the proposed work of the Rt. W. G. Secretary, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons,' and recommend it to the patronage of the Fraternity."

In Grand Chapter, of the State of New York, Feb. 2d, 5841.

"Resolved.—That the Grand Chapter of the State of N. York, do approve of the work proposed by our M. E. Companion James Herring, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons,' and while they commend it to the support of the Fraternity, to give to the author free access to the Records and Archives of this Grand Chapter, for such information on our Masonic History as may be necessary for his work."

OUR RED BRETHREN.

[The following communication is from Br. Spencer H. Cone, an account of whose induction in our mysteries, together with three other Indians of the Seneca Tribe, we noticed in our first Volume. Br. C. is an educated man, and we believe assumed his present English name, after Mr. Cone, a respectable Baptist clergyman.—En.]

Buffalo, Feb. 22d 1841.

Br. L. G. Hoffman.

SIR,—We were much pleased to see in the columns of your paper, our address delivered by our worthy Br. Col. Jemison, at the celebration of the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist, in the Washington Lodge Room, June, 24th, 5840. Therefore we feel it a duty to our Masonic brethren to send you a copy for publication "a reply" on behalf of the Federal Lodge No. 1, in Washington city, which was received with our best acknowledgments and gratitude. We tender our thanks to our brethren of the Federal Lodge, No. 1, for this communication, which was respectfully handed us by brother Fitz Hugh, of Washington city.—While we associated with those members, and the brethren we daily met with, during our travels the last season, we never have seen nor experienced more union, harmony and brotherly love than existed among the masonic fraternity. How often have we praised THE GRAND ARCHITECT OF THE UNIVERSE that in our uncivilized and unenlightened state, and the disadvantages we have labored under for more than three centuries, we are now highly respected by a society where "LIBERAL PRINCIPLES ARE FOUNDED ON THE IMMUTABLE LAW OF TRUTH AND JUSTICE." May we always prove worthy of the order: appear as bright ornaments on the walls of the Institution, and support this Ancient Temple with that "resolute and dignified mind" for which our fore fathers were so distinguished.

Respectfully your ob't servants Fraternally,

GEORGE JEMISON X
WHITE SENECA X
JOHN JEMISON X
SPENCER H. CONE, marks

At a special meeting of Federal Lodge No. 1, held at Masonic Hall in Washington City, D. C. on Thursday evening July 3d A. L. 5840, the following proceedings were had.

A communication was received by the hands of brother Thomas L. Fitz Hugh, covering a written translation of the address made to the Masonic Brethren on the 24th Juhe (St. John's day) by our worthy brother George Jemison, of the Seneca tribe of Indians, on behalf of himself and brothers Spencer H. Cone, White Seneca and John Jemison of the Seneca Tribes.

Resolved—That a committee be appointed to make a reply to brother George Jemison, and the brethren with him in behalf of this Lodge, and that brother T. L. Fitz Hugh be requested, when he visits their country, to convey to them, the feelings and kind respect of the members of this Lodge, in such manner as he may deem proper.

And brother J. P. Van Tyne, was appointed a committee to make a reply.

Attest.

J. P. VAN TYNE,
Sec'y of Federal Lodge No. 1

To George Jemison, Spencer H. Cone, White Seneca, John Jemison, Chiefs of the Seneca Tribes of Indians.

BRETHREN—On meeting you as the great family of the Universe, would at anytime have afforded our Masonic brothers much pleasure, and excited our warmest sympathies in behalf of the red men of the forest.—But when meeting you in that strong bond of brotherly love and union, by which we as members of the masonic family are bound to act, that bond of friendship and affection, which has cemented our order in union and harmony, from the remotest ages of time to the present, and enabled it to stand the dashing waves of persecution, so often aimed at it by the ignorance and superstitions of every nation on the globe, we feel our hearts glow with gratitude to the Great Author of our existence, that he has not been unkindful of those Ancient Children of the mighty forest, who have ever been partakers of his special care. But we rejoice that he has brought them to seek the light of truth, and made them partakers in an institution whose only aim is to spread abroad the influence of His holy laws; of an institution, that can know no difference between the members though they may be of different nations, language, or tongue.

In the high and holy office of Charity, Benevolence and Truth among mankind, we are happy to have you associated with us, and that it may be the means of disseminating peace and harmony among the people whom you govern, will be the prayer of every member of this Lodge; and we feel assured when the light of truth and morality, of charity and benevolence is made to shine abroad, among the people of the wilderness, by the example of those brethren who have been among us, that the moral influence will shine with a double lustre, and contribute not only to their happiness here below, but propitiate the favor of the Great Spirit, and finally lead them to that haven of Eternal rest, that Lodge Celestial, in the Heavens.

To state to you the pleasure felt on meeting and associating with you as members of our Ancient Order, or the happiness in tendering to you those humble civilities which were in our power, while you remained among us, would but half express the gratification manifested by the brethren of this Lodge; and their only regret has been, that your short stay was such as to prevent a more extended hospitality to brethren for whom they feel the warmest love and friendship. Should it ever be our lot to receive you here again, we hope a better opportunity will be given us to reciprocate those feelings of brotherly love, than we have had on this occasion, and should any of your people journey to our city, and be commended to us by you, be assured they shall be received as our brothers, and receive from us the attention we would be bound to render you.

And finally, brethren, commending you (wherever you may go) to the care of our Grand Master above, in whose unerring care, his servants are ever safe, and deserving a remembrance of ourselves among you, we hope to meet you in that Temple above not made with hands.

J. P. VAN TYNE,

On behalf of the Master, Wardens and brethren of Federal Lodge No. 1.

GRAND LODGE OF MISSOURI.

The Grand Annual Communication of the Grand Lodge of the State of Missouri, was held at the Masonic Hall, in the city of St. Louis, on the first Monday in October last, and was in session one week.—The proceedings, which we have been favored with, are characteristic of the unity and harmony, which should pervade every masonic body, and the session appears to have been an interesting one, in which much business was transacted, although chiefly local. We summarise such parts of the proceedings as may be of interest to the general masonic family.

Since the last annual communication, a dispensation has been granted to sundry brethren residing in the county of Randolph, Mo. to organise and hold a new Lodge in Huntsville, in said county.

A dispensation was also granted for forming a new Lodge in the town of Liberty, Clay county, to be called Liberty Union Lodge. [This Lodge, as we are informed, already numbers 45 members, and has a respectable number of applicants.]

A new Lodge has also been formed, in Lexington, Lafayette county, under very favorable auspices.

During the past year, at the request of the public authorities, the corner Stone of the Court House at St. Louis, was laid in due masonic form, by Brother Chambers, acting as Deputy Grand Master, who also presided at the celebration of St. John's Day, on the 24th of June last.

A number of brethren, of Wisconsin Territory petitioned the Grand Lodge, during its sitting, for a charter for a new lodge to be held at Mineral Point.

A memorial from Springfield Lodge, Illinois, was received, praying that the allegiance of said Lodge, might be transferred to the Grand Lodge of Illinois, recently instituted in that State, which was granted.

Charters for new Lodges were granted, to the Brethren of Carlisle, Clinton co. Ill. and likewise a dispensation to form a new lodge in Jefferson city.

The committee on foreign communications, reported no business before them requiring the attention of the Grand Lodge, except the following resolution from the Grand Lodge of Alabama, which resolution, the committee say, has received the sanction of several of the Grand Lodges. The committee, in conclusion, "embrace the opportunity to congratulate the fraternity upon their prosperous condition throughout the United States."

Resolved, That all Grand Lodges in correspondence with the Grand Lodge of Alabama, be requested to elect one delegate to meet in general convention on the first Monday in March, 1842, in the city of Washington, for the purpose of determining upon uniform mode of work throughout all Lodges of the United States, and to make other lawful regulations for the interest and security of the craft."

The Committee "on the work of Subordinate Lodges," notice one or two deviations from masonic usages, which as it has a general bearing on the craft, we extract: they say.

"From the returns from ——— Lodge, it appears that they interred the remains of a deceased brother, with masonic honors—though it is not shewn that this was requested by the deceased—your committee find this contrary to the custom of the craft as appears from the history of the fraternity."

"Copies of the proceedings of Lodges, working under dispensations, have also been examined, from which some irregularities are apparent, but your committee specify only one of them. The balloting in the degree of Entered Apprentice and Fellow Craft, for admission and passing of applicants.

This is a practice highly improper, and has so often met the decided disapprobation and censure of this Grand Lodge, that your committee deem it useless to say more on the subject, and will only refer the Lodges to the former action of the Grand Lodge, from which it will appear, that it is directly contrary to Masonic usage and custom, as well as the positive and often expressed opinions and directions of this Grand Lodge, to perform whatever, (except what directly relates to the conferring the degrees of Entered Apprentice and Fellow Craft) in any other than a Lodge of Master Masons."

The committee conclude their report with the following, which is extremely gratifying.

"From the foregoing, it is apparent to your committee, and they so report with pleasure, that every Lodge under this jurisdiction has forwarded by their representatives, returns of their proceedings for the year that is past, and with equal pleasure, they also report, that though some informalities, irregularities and omissions in the work of the craft are certainly apparent, yet from an examination of the whole subject, nothing appears to your committee calculated to discourage the Philanthropist and the Mason. But on the contrary much to cheer and encourage him on in his labor of love. Your committee find, to their encouragement, that there has been established in our sister state of Illinois, a Grand Lodge, and though this will subtract from the number of our own Lodges somewhat, your committee rejoice that their vacancies will very soon be supplied by new Lodges within our own state. From all of which, it is apparent, that the fraternity in our state as well as the state of Illinois, is in a prosperous condition, the contemplation of which will serve to stimulate all to a faithful energetic performance of all their Masonic duties, and to cheer them in the performance of every good word and work."

The following resolution was offered by Br. C. H. Bower, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Grand Secretary be instructed to subscribe for thirty copies of a Masonic Journal, at Albany, State of New York, and cause two copies to be forwarded by the publisher to each of the subordinate lodges under the jurisdiction of this Grand Lodge. [If any thing can enhance our grateful acknowledgements for this manifestation of good will, it is to be found in the fact, that it was unsolicited on our part, and emanating from a Br. an entire stranger to us.]

PUTNAM, SMALL, AND WARREN.

At the action on Bunker Hill, Putnam said to his men, "Aim at the handsome coats; pick off the commanders. When the British were driven back the second time, and nearly all the officers killed, the gallant Major Small, dressed in dazzling uniform, a tempting mark for a soldier, was left standing alone, every one having been shot about him. The American marksmen by Putnam's side levelled their muskets to shoot him, when Putnam suddenly recognized in Small an old and particular friend and fellow soldier. "For God's sake," exclaimed Putnam, "don't kill that officer; I love him as a brother;" and springing forward threw up the muzzles of the deadly muskets with his sword, and saved his life. Small was so near to hear him make the remark, and he repeated it in the British camp, and among the British officers, whence it found its way to the Yankees.

When the Americans were retreating, and General

Warren had left the redoubt, he was recognized by his friend Small, who called to him, and begged him to stop and save his life. Warren turned round, and seemed to recognize him but would not stop. Small ordered his men not to fire at him, and threw up the muzzles of the muskets with his sword. But it was too late. The fatal ball had gone, and Warren fell, eighty yards from the redoubt. Putnam, Small, and Warren were Freemasons, and had been in the habit of meeting together in the provincial lodges at Boston, and in the lodges attached to the British army. In this way they had formed a strong personal attachment for each other. The fact as above stated is historical, and well attested.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

NATURAL RELIGION.

Does Natural Religion throw any light upon the future existence of the soul? In attempting to answer this question it would be proper to understand what we mean by 'Natural Religion.' The idea contained in this term would seem to be satisfied by saying that it consists of those precepts, doctrines or ideas, usually distinguished by the adjective 'moral,' which are derived exclusively from a contemplation of Nature, and the laws which appear to direct and govern the operations of the external world, and our present existence. We are to suppose man, left entirely to the observations of himself and the external world, and to inquire whether in this situation, he could infer that that thinking principle which he feels within him was subject to other laws than the matter that surrounds him, and composes his physical frame, and was destined by some special prerogative to escape 'the wreck of matter,' and rise triumphant over that decay and death into which he observes every thing else to sink sooner or later.

In answering the question proposed, we take it for granted that Natural Religion has enabled man to discover that some Supreme Being exists who has created this external world in which he finds himself placed, and is also the Author of man's existence; and it would not be a very extraordinary mental effort to infer that this Being must be himself eternal or at least that there must be an eternal Being who had no beginning, and created every thing else. Thus Plato believed and Socrates, and although Aristotle chose rather to ascribe eternity to matter itself, he felt himself obliged to admit the direction of a Superior Being to be visible in the works of nature, falling thus into the absurdity of clothing that which was subject, with higher qualities than the power which ruled and governed it.

No sooner has man satisfied himself of the existence of such a Being than he hastes, by a very natural feeling, to clothe him with attributes, and the unaided exercise of his faculties were able to teach him that this Being must be omniscient, omnipotent, unchangeable, infinitely good, and consequently a rewarder of virtue and punisher of vice. Thus Socrates believed and taught, we are informed, and this philosopher went farther, and said that men had violated the laws of this Being whom he worshipped, and that such men, not being punished always in this life, must meet with the consequences of their guilt hereafter, although how, he knew not.

Some of the ancient philosophers, in the manifold hypotheses into which the desire of knowledge led them, held that the human soul was an emanation from the Deity, and as He was immortal, the soul must partake of the same quality. But this was evidently, a mere conjecture, and not an inference from any thing which Nature or the constitution of the mind unfolded.—This was the doctrine of the Vedas of the Bramins, and Zendavestas of the Parscees, from which the early Grecian philosophers obtained their first rudiments of metaphysical science. But although they admitted in this way, that the soul was immortal, their knowledge was unable to direct them as to the mode of its future existence, most seeming to think it was absorbed into the Great soul from which it had originally emanated. Even the doctrine of Pythagoras resulted in this, although he extended for a time the individual existence of the soul, imagining it to transmigrate, once or twice into different bodies, and at last, be lost in its original source.

These however were the notions of those who were styled philosophers; the popular tradition differed somewhat. This taught that a spiritual form or ghost of the individual survived the death of the body, walking the earth for a short time, and then going to a place reserved for all these shadowy beings, and differently demonstrated according to the peculiar character of the people. Thus it was among the early Grecians and Romans, the Celtic tribes of North Britain, as may be seen in numerous passages of Ossian, and in later times, among the American Indians, who look forward with glowing imaginations to the hunting grounds through which they are to roam after death, and in the full confidence of this enjoyment in a future state of existence, choose the means of sustenance necessary for the journey to this Elysium to be buried with them. But the question arises, what was the origin of those philosophical notions and popular traditions? Are they the natural productions of man's unassisted reason, and spontaneous conjectures from the innate principles of that soul about which they are concerned, or have they sprung from the vague knowledge of the Divine Revelation which was accidentally communicated to the nations who had connections with the chosen people of God. So much uncertainty hangs over this point, that the reasonings of ancient pagan philosophers and popular traditions, are very unsatisfactory evidence of the capability of man to infer, unassisted by revelation, the future existence of the soul.

To prove from Natural Religion alone, that the soul is immortal, it has often been said, that any thing which is susceptible of destruction, must be compound, and therefore the soul not being so, cannot but be immortal. But how know we that the soul is not compound, or does revelation itself give us any light in regard to its nature or essence. Plato, professed to teach from the light of Nature, that the soul was a compound, consisting of an emanation from the Deity, a portion of the soul of the world, and some portion of matter and yet inferred nevertheless, that it was immortal.

On the other hand, to support the position that a Revelation is necessary to enable us to know of any thing beyond the grave, the case of the French nation has been adduced, when in a fit of phrenzy they abandoned all religion and announced to the world, that death is an eternal sleep; but this act did not throw them back into the state of a people who had never heard of a revelation, but was rather an exhibition of an attempt to throw off all moral restraint, after they had succeeded in ridding themselves of all civil obligations. It was the raving of a wounded and fevered patient, who feels every covering or bandage an intolerable load, and tears away in his delirium even that which keeps his life-blood from ebbing away.

But there are some reasons for concluding that Natural Religion gives us an idea, though an indistinct one, of a future. There is that in the mind itself which never feels satisfied with the present, but tries to pierce into the future, as if hoping to find there something to satisfy its constant craving. There is, as it were, implanted in the human mind, an innate idea of futurity, and as soon as it has attained to the knowledge and acknowledgement of a Supreme and Infinite Being who created it and all things beside, it must feel that that Being has not given it a faculty or an irresistible tendency without any object upon which to exercise it. There is too, in that same mind, something which points out a distinction between right and wrong, virtue and vice, and what are these terms to that mind, but empty sounding words, without a future to look forward to, in which these qualities of actions will receive an immutable character, and be accompanied with their unchanging and eternal consequences.

All this seems to be attainable without the aid of Revelation; still this is but little and unsatisfactory, compared to that more perfect knowledge which we have obtained of the future destiny of this most noble part of man, though it will require the veil of futurity itself to be withdrawn, before our conceptions of its nature, and situation hereafter can be full and complete.

THE PIPE OF PEACE.

A SCENE ON THE PRAIRIE.

One of the most delightful of the days of Indian Summer was fast drawing to a close, when Mr. L—— found himself traveling o'er an extended Prairie in the territory of Wisconsin. He had been beguiled by the the splendor of the scene on either hand, until the mellow tints of the fast declining sun equalled only by the soft twilight of an Italian sky, aroused him from a reverie, and he began to feel the loneliness of his situation. He had expected to arrive at the settlement beyond the Prairie before evening, and had made no haste. But evening was come and he was 12 miles from any habitation. No voice was there to break the stillness of nature, and he felt that it would be sacrilege to disturb her slumber. His faithful horse, pursued the trail which had become invisible, and he hoped soon to see the glimmer of some taper by which he might direct his way to the cottage of some bold "pioneer of the West." At length the horse turned from the course in which he had been going, and Mr. L—— dismounted to inspect the path. There were three trails which separated from each other in angles of about forty-five degrees, and after deliberation he determined to pursue the right hand trail, as that appeared to be more open than either of the other two. The light clouds that obscured the stars, were soon put to flight, and, as the eye rapidly coursed the Heavens, it rested almost instinctively on the Pleiades—the same Seven that a mother in the tenderness of affection pointed out in those Halcyon days, when it was the highest heaven of happiness to sit upon her knee—and he thought of home.

At length something like a cloud appeared in the distance, arising above the horizon, and it was evident that an oak opening or wood-land was near, and he hastened on in hopes to find inhabitants as these openings are first settled, but there was no sign to indicate the residence of any one, and the path led directly to the margin of a narrow stream which he supposed of course to be fordable. The horse stepped in, but was compelled to swim, and as the opposite bank was low, he thought there would be no difficulty in gaining the shore. The noble animal seemed to cut the water with perfect ease, but the banks were rocky and very abrupt; the fore feet of the horse slipped as he struck upon the shore until they caught in a narrow seam of the rock, and he became unable to extricate them.—Mr. L—— threw himself from the saddle and with his portmanteau gained the shore completely drenched, but the poor animal struggled, having no foothold behind, the force of the current carried him around, and it seemed that his fore legs must be twisted off.

By some means he gained his liberty and came directly to the place where Mr. L—— was standing as if for protection. He soon found that no material injury was done to the horse, and taking him by the bridle he pursued the trail up the acclivity, on whose summit a light might be seen. He found eighteen or twenty Indians collected together in a small hut, and Fiends from Tartarus, would not have looked more savage, but it was too late to fly, and all depended on the self-possession of the moment. They regarded Mr. L—— as their prisoner, and consulted together relative to his fate. He trembled for his safety, and felt in his pockets for something to present them. He found the stump of an old pipe much worn by use, and thought it might prove the pipe of peace. Having filled it with tobacco he presented it to one of the Indians who seemed to be the Chief, and who looked for a time in amazement, but drawing a whiff or two passed it round the company, and it was apparent that he had nothing to fear. The Indians soon retired, as it was after midnight, and an old squaw who seemed to be the presiding genius of the place, threw down a few rags in one corner of the hut for his bed, and on these he lay till day dawned. An old Indian then pointed out the way to the settlement, and at eight o'clock in the morning, he found himself in the precincts of civilization, having no objections to accept an invitation to breakfast with even a doubtful friend, for twenty-four hours had elapsed since he tasted a morsel of food.

A FREE TRANSLATION.

There is a peculiarity in the hum attending a court of Common Pleas. It is rather overpowered and drowned by the crier's "Silence!" than interrupted. There seems to be a class of persons always in attendance who will talk. We stood near a couple of this class upon one occasion, who if not of the legal profession, had evidently been practitioners at the bar. We do not recollect how it came in, but one of the Attorneys probably speaking of the Sabbath, insisted that it was "dies non!" "What does he mean Bill?" enquired one of them. Bill replied with an air of perfect ease, "Die a Snob!" That is the Latin for a dead shoemaker."

Palestine.—Some of the leading British journals now propose that the Jews should be allowed to purchase the land of Palestine. As Turkey is in want of money this could be easily effected, and Great Britain would have a noble pretext for protecting them in their former country. For this purpose she would be obliged to hold Acre and one or two other strong points on the coast of Syria; and thus her darling policy would be maintained with the show of public expediency. Unless her present Government break faith with their Tory advisers, some very sound reason will be given for holding St. Jean de Acre, or else Gidrakar and Malta furnish no historical precedent.—Baptist Advocate.

Repartee.—An elderly gentleman travelling in a stage coach, was amused by the constant fire of the words kept up by two ladies. One of them at last kindly enquired, if their conversation did not make his head ache—when he answered with a great deal of naïveté, "No madam, I have been married twenty eight years."

VARIETY.

THE JEWS' NEW YEAR.

The Jews believe that God created the world in September, or Tisri—that at the revolution of the same time yearly, he sitteth in judgement, and takes reckoning of every man's life, and pronounces sentence accordingly. The morning of the new year is proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet of a ram's horn to warn them that they may think of their sins. The day before they rise sooner on the morning and pray. When they have done in the Synagogue, they go to the graves, testifying that if God does not pardon them, they are like to the dead, and praying, that for the good works of the Saints, he will pity them, and there they give large sums in alms. After noon they shave, adorn, and bathe themselves, that they may be pure the next day, and in the water they make confession of their sins. The feast day begins with a cup of wine and New Year salutations; and on their tables there is a ram's head in remembrance of "That ram which was offered in Isaac's stead; and for this cause are the trumpets of ram's horns." Fish they eat to signify the multiplication of their good works; they eat sweet fruits of all sorts, and make themselves merry, as assured of forgiveness of their sins; and after meat they resort to some bridge to hurl their sins into the water; as it is written "He shall cast all our sins into the bottom of the sea." From this day to the tenth day, is a time of penance or Lent. See Purchas' Pilgrimage, published 1613, p. 174.

ELOQUENCE.

A young sprig of the law, just commencing practice in one of the southern states determined to make a bit in his "maiden speech," and thereby put the noses of his older contemporaries out of joint. He therefore volunteered in the case of a poor man who had been guilty of sticking a knife into one of his neighbor's hogs, and commenced his speech in the following manner:

"Your honor the judge, and gentlemen of the jury. While Europe is deluged in blood—while classic Greece is struggling for her rights and liberties, and trampling the unhallowed altars of the bearded infidel to dust—while the chosen few of degenerate Iberia are waving their burnished swords in the sun light of liberty—while America is standing forth the brightest orb in the political sky—I, with due diffidence, arise to defend the cause of this humble hog-thief."

Another specimen of Ciceronian eloquence is still fresh in our memory. A committee man on the construction of a certain turnpike, once addressed a meeting in the following language:—

"Who among you, gentlemen, can mark the onward march of Internal Improvement without cherishing feelings of pride for the present glory of your country? The stupendous work now under construction, when completed, will be an additional star in the coronet of our nation's greatness—millions will admire the patriotism and enterprise of the citizens of—county; the hog trade with Kentucky will be secured which will be of immense benefit to this flourishing village which I can already picture as one of the proudest cities in the world! I therefore, gentlemen, motion that we appropriate an additional wheelbarrow and two shovels for the use of the workmen."

Handel.—Handel was a tremendous eater. Among other stories told of him, it is said that whenever he dined alone at a tavern, he always ordered dinner for three; on receiving an answer to the question, "Is de tinner ready?" "As soon as the company come, sir," he said, con strepito, "I am de company bring up de tinner."

A Stinging Charge.—An able judge was once obliged to deliver the following charge to the Jury:—"Gentlemen of the Jury, in this case the counsel on both sides are unintelligible; the witnesses on both sides are incredible, and the plaintiff and the defendant are both such bad characters, that to me it is indifferent which way you give your verdict."

POPULAR TALES.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

A SIMPLE STORY.

THE following little story derives no interest from any surprising entanglements in the plot, or peculiar romance in the situations. It will, however, we trust, be found somewhat striking as a series of actual and recent occurrences in the life of an individual, while, as it chances, there is not wanting in its conclusion a pretty strong inference in favor of prudent and virtuous conduct.

In a small town, in a certain part of Scotland, there lived some time since a respectable writer or law-agent, whom we shall call Brydon, a widower, with a family of two daughters and one son, all of them grown up. Mr. Brydon, like many of his profession, kept up a respectable appearance in society, but in reality had nothing to depend upon except the current proceeds of his business. At his death, which took place rather unexpectedly, he left his daughters entirely dependent on the exertions of their brother, who had been trained to the pursuits of his parent's profession. But the son was not long in following the father to the grave, and the two girls were then without a friend or guide in the world. Necessity compelled them immediately to make an endeavor to support themselves by the use of their needles, and, to do them justice, they set about it attentively and ungrudgingly. The elder Miss Brydon, however, was of weakly constitution, and subject to frequent attacks of severe illness, so that the whole burden, almost, of their maintenance, fell on the younger sister, Margaret. She toiled incessantly; yet, let her do what she might, she was barely able to earn enough to procure the mere necessities of life, where its comforts were almost indispensable to the poor invalid. Whether the issue would have been otherwise or not under happier circumstances, it is impossible to say; but, as it was, the elder of the sisters continued to decline until she died.

Alone in the world, friendless and penniless, with a heart weighed down by these successive calamities in her once happy family, Margaret Brydon, then only eighteen years of age, struggled for some time longer to maintain herself in her native place. But she found it a difficult task to live upon sympathy, of which she received a sufficiency, although extremely little real assistance came in her way. At length she bethought her of a female relative in England, a cousin of her late father, and a person usually reported to be in wealthy circumstances. With this individual, it is true, Mr. Brydon had never kept up any correspondence, and had never mentioned her to his family but as a woman of rude manners and hard heart. Poor Margaret, nevertheless, thought that her destitute condition might awake pity even in the breast of such a being, supposing her to prove to be all that she had been represented. A journey to Nottingham, where this relative resided, was therefore resolved upon, and it was soon accomplished, as Margaret was not burdened with any great effects to render removal difficult.

For three months after her arrival in Nottingham, did Miss Brydon reside with her relative, whom she found to be all and more than her father had said. The old lady, if such a name should be given to her, had started in life as a house maid, coarse and uneducated, and had ended her career of service as the housekeeper of a nobleman, who at his death left her a considerable annuity to subsist upon in her latter days. Her original rudeness of character had only been aggravated by after-habits of petty domestic rule; and although she had asked Margaret to stay with her, she behaved subsequently with such unkindness, as to make life almost insupportable to the poor girl. Finally, a proposal made by an old woman, who added a keen love of money to her other qualities, that Miss Brydon should take upon herself the duties of house-servant at the coming term, brought matters to a point. "Heaven knows," said Margaret to herself, "that I am not unwilling to work! But if I am to maintain myself, I shall at least do it where I may have peace." The result was that another vicissitude took place in our heroine's condition. She sought one of the great manufacturing establishments of the town, and was fortunate enough to be employed in executing a particular kind of needle-work. She would have had it in her power to work in private, but this could not be allowed in the circumstances. A considerable number of other girls were engaged in the same occasion in the establishment, and to their number Margaret joined herself. Happily, the remuneration for that variety of work was respectable in amount, and she was enabled to take a little lodging, and to keep herself above all fears of want.

For some time Miss Brydon, pursued her humble occupation without having her fate chequered by any new incident of importance. At length some circumstances occurred, which gave her at first a considerable degree of uneasiness. One of the numerous partners of the establishment, a gentleman in the prime of life, and who chanced frequently to come on business errands to the room where Margaret wrought, began to take particular and displeasing notice of her. She bore it in silence for a time, trusting that the fancy would be a passing one; but when on one occasion, he began to praise her in a way which females in good society are not accustomed to, she gently but firmly told him that "such language was disagreeable and painful to her," and begged "him, as he was a gentleman, to desist." Mr. Middleton, for such was the merchant's name, started, and stammered out an apology. He had never before heard the sound of Miss Brydon's voice, except in mere monosyllables, and he was surprised at the grace and breeding apparent in her manner and expression. "I—I beg pardon," he stuttered for the third or fourth time; as he retired. Margaret made no other reply than by a gentle inclination of her head.

Mr. Middleton did not, however, give up his visits to the work-room of Margaret and her companions. On the contrary, he came thither more frequently than ever, and it was still to the young Scotswoman that he directed his attention, though in a very different style from that used in former occasions. Still he found it very difficult to induce Miss Brydon to enter into conversation, or lay aside the retiring coldness which she had assumed at the first. But his respectable manner and address prevailed ultimately to a certain extent, and so far broke down the barrier of honorable and maidenly reserve as to make him aware that she was of good parentage, and well educated as well as sensible and intelligent. Things were in this state when Mr. Middleton became suddenly ill. He was subject to inflammatory attacks in the chest, and the occurrence of that complaint on this occasion made his friends alarmed lest consumption should follow. On this account he was ordered off, as soon as he could be moved, to Devonshire. Before he went thither however, he showed how deep was the impression which Miss Brydon had made on his mind, by sending a note to her in the following terms:—"Dear Miss Brydon, you will be aware that I have been ill. I should be the last person to desire that sorrow of any kind should fall to your lot, yet I confess that it would give me pleasure to know that you were sorry for me. I am advised to go for a time to the south of England. Will you permit me to write to you while I am absent?—Grant me but this; I do not ask you at present to write to me again. I am &c. Margaret returned an answer consenting to his request, and briefly expressing her regret for his illness.

While in Devonshire, Mr. Middleton wrote once or twice according to his proposition. He described the beautiful scenery of the Devon in his letters, spoke of the excellent effect produced on his health, and expressed a warm wish to be home again, hinting plainly at his resolution then to "ask a peculiar favor" from the reader of his epistles. But foreknowledge is a thing unknown to man. Before Mr. Middleton returned to Nottingham, Margaret had left it. Her close application to work had injured her health, and she found it absolutely necessary to allow herself some temporary relaxation. Fortunately, an invitation came to her about this time from one of the few friends with whom she maintained a correspondence in her native place. Margaret, took advantage of the opportunity and was in Scotland when Mr. Middleton arrived in Nottingham. He resolved to follow her, and assigning a desire for change of scene as the cause, took upon himself the commercial journey to the north, which had usually been performed for the house by a traveller.

In the course of this route he came to the native town of Miss Brydon. But he knew not the name of the friend with whom she resided, nor could the people of the inn answer his inquiries on the point. He could only hope that chance might cast her in his way. An hour had scarcely elapsed, when, as he sat at the inn-parlour window, he saw Miss Brydon pass. He sprang up, and followed her. She was greatly surprised to see him. He walked with her a little way, and then entreated her to enter the inn with him, as he could not communicate to her on the street all that he wished to do. Margaret demurred. "My dear Miss Brydon," said the gentleman, "do not refuse me this. I will ask the landlady to be present with us. Your delicacy of feeling is too precious to me to be treasured upon by any act of mine." The young lady at length consented, and in the course of a few minutes longer she had given her promise to become the wife of Mr. Middleton.

The accepted lover of our heroine had to complete his commercial rounds, and it was settled that immediately after his return to Nottingham, he should send for his bride and present her to his friends. But Mr. Middleton only reached Nottingham to suffer another attack of his former complaint, and the first tidings which poor Margaret received from him were dated from Devonshire, whether he had again been sent. Instead of being summoned to a happy marriage, Miss Brydon was called upon by her betrothed to come instantly to England, that he might see her once again before he died. "Take any conveyance—four horses if necessary: think not of expenses, but come—come with speed." Such was the close of the letter. Margaret hesitated not a moment to comply with its demands. But the journey, however speedily performed was a long one, and she did not arrive until two hours after Mr. Middleton had breathed his last!

This was a serious trial for the poor girl. She was a being alone in the world: and just as the hope was held out to her of having strong support to lean upon—a strong arm to guide her for life—her prospects were at once and most painfully blighted. Her affection for Mr. Middleton had been of the temperate kind founded upon friendly and grateful esteem, but her regret was not the less sincere. She was, however, of that gentle and patient temperament, which makes no violent display of feeling, and, by bending, perhaps escapes in part the force of the blast. Her deceased lover had left a small sum to be delivered to her—all that his hurried illness left at his command—under the plea of paying her expenses in coming to him, and she received also an open letter, which it was his wish that she should present in person to his mother. This paper described the situation in which Margaret and he had stood, and requested Mrs. Middleton to be kind to her. After waiting with a tear her lover's new-made grave, Margaret slowly returned to Nottingham, ill at ease both in mind and body. The old lady did speak kindly to her when she called with the letter, and wished to see her again! But Miss Brydon had resolved to go back for a time to her native place, and there remain in quiet, till her mind had recovered from the late shock and her frame had renewed its exhausted strength.

She fulfilled her intention, and staid in Scotland for several months. Both her strength and spirits were gradually recruited; and well it was that the case stood so, as she saw no course before her but that of returning to daily toil. She was just hesitating in what field to resume her honest endeavors, when she met accidentally, at a friend's house, a lady from Nottingham, who, on learning her wish to get employment for her needle, pressed her anxiously to return to that town. "I know various establishments where I am sure I can procure you good employment at once." Margaret told the lady of her having been there before, but disclosed nothing further, as well from sensitiveness of feeling as from prudence. The issue was, that she accompanied the lady soon after to England. "I am certain," thought Margaret, "of making thee a peaceful living. Few can know my story; nor could they extract from it, if they did, anything to my disadvantage." With these thoughts Margaret again entered Nottingham, and her friend immediately set about getting an engagement for her. It has just been mentioned that she did not relate the particulars of her former stay in the town to the lady, nor had she told the names of her former employers. Strange to say, these were the very parties to whom the lady went, and from whom she obtained a promise of ample employment for the young Scotswoman. When she came to Miss Brydon, and told her that she would have for her masters the house of Boyle, Middleton & Co., our poor heroine was startled and stunned. But she soon regained her composure. "Why should I be unwilling to go there again?" she reasoned internally; "to be sure I might have borne a very different place—but it is silly to recall such thoughts. These people can know nothing of which I have reason to be ashamed. They will perhaps even be kinder to me than others might be. Yes, it will be weakness to refuse the offer." By exerting this quiet firmness of mind, Margaret gained the victory over the feelings at first awakened in her breast. She returned to work in the place where she had formerly been. In doing so, she was little aware of the happy consequences which were to follow therefrom.

The lady who brought Margaret to England did not rest satisfied with merely procuring work for her. She introduced her young protegee to all her friends, and, among others, caused her to meet the Middletons the mother and brothers of the late Mr. Middleton. Previously to this, Margaret had seen the necessity of informing the kind lady of her whole history, or rather gratitude had prompted the disclosure. The Middletons were very kind to the object of their late relative's affection. They even pressed her to come and reside with them, but Margaret preferred her honourable independence; and the only request she preferred to them was, that she should be allowed to work in private. Her conduct did not go unrewarded. It was the cause of attracting to her the especial notice of the younger Mr. Boyle, a junior partner of the house. He met her occasionally in the evenings, when her toil was done, at the house of her friend, and ultimately he made her an offer of his hand and fortune. It was accepted.

We are not now speaking of things of a musty date. Margaret Brydon's marriage was seen by us in the columns of a newspaper but a few days ago. We earnestly trust that her future career will be as happy as its commencement has been discreet, modest, and honorable.

CHARACTER.

"SAM SCOTT, THE AMERICAN DIVER."

A short paragraph in Saturday's paper announced the death of this bold and courageous second "Sam Patch." The following particulars are gathered from two or three London papers.

For nearly a week previous to the 11th of January, placards had been posted in the streets, stating that, on that day, Scott would take one of his extraordinary leaps from Waterloo bridge. It seems that he had first fixed on Southwark bridge as the scene of his daring exhibition, but the proprietors, fearing that a violent death would ensue, took measures to prevent it. At 2 o'clock, P. M., the hour specified in the bills circulated in the neighborhood, the steamboat pier, both sides of the river, and every spot which commanded a view of the scaffolding which had been erected on the side of the bridge adjoining Somerset-house, was crowded with spectators. By half-past two o'clock, that part of the bridge on which the scaffolding was erected was thronged by several hundreds of spectators, mostly of the lowest class; and to amuse them while a collection was made for his benefit, Sam began, as on a former occasion, to display his agility, and, amongst other feats, entertained the spectators with a mock execution. A rope, to one end of which was attached a slip-knot, was suspended from one of the cross-beams, or cross-poles. On the upper one the diver was seated, and having fastened the noose properly round his neck, jerked himself off into the air, intending to make use of the lower pole to assist him to regain his former position, after he had remained suspended for a short time. Twice was this feat repeated, and as often did he recover himself, after hanging in the air for a few moments, by the assistance of the lower pole. A third time was the daring attempt made, and a third time was he suspended by the neck in the air. The rope came down lower than was intended, and after hanging for some minutes, his face began to grow black, and it was evident to most persons that strangulation had commenced, although many, from his former successful manœuvres, thought this was only a still more daring exhibition of his skill. But a few minutes had elapsed when the diver's frame became suddenly agitated by an apparently thrilling motion, and after a shudder, which was distinctly seen by all the spectators, a death-like stiffness pervaded the limbs and the whole body. The immense crowd became alarmed—they cried, "he is dead," "he is dying," "cut him down!"

The scene that followed is indelible: a rush was made towards the scaffolding, and it was almost impossible for any one to near it. At last Sergeant Thompson forced his way, and some men being sent up the scaffolding, the rope was loosened, and the body lowered down, but life was entirely gone. Some surgeons who were in the crowd opened the temporal artery, but it availed nothing, and he was ultimately taken in a cart to the Charing cross Hospital.

The following account of Scott and his extraordinary feats is from a letter of a correspondent of the Evening Chronicle:

"This man was born at Philadelphia, in the United States, and was in his 28th year. He was about five feet seven inches in height, of slender make, and appeared at least twelve years older than he really was. His penchant for swimming and diving displayed itself at a very early age. He had served on board English and American frigates, and his skill and dexterity as a seaman, his bravery, and general good conduct, would have secured him promotion in either service, if he had not abandoned a naval life and become a mountebank, to please the depraved taste of mobs. Notwithstanding the multitudes he always collected to witness his singular feats, and his great popularity, his remuneration seldom exceeded a few shillings, except on two occasions, when he exhibited off the custom-house, when £4 was collected on one occasion, and about £3 on the other."

His performances were of a most daring and singular kind; and, as he contrived to dodge death by a mere hair's breadth for a long time, the eagerness of the mob to see how far he could go and not kill himself, became intense. He once saved the life of a beautiful child in the Bay of Biscay, for which noble act the father, a General in the British army, frequently assisted him by donations of money. Scott asserted before his death, that he jumped off a place below the Falls of Niagara, a height of five hundred and ninety-seven feet! Whether this be true or false, he has leaped from a cliff at Port Isaac, in Cornwall, three hundred and forty-seven feet high, into the sea; he has also leaped from Bangor bridge, the highest in this country, two hundred and ten feet high, and has often, within a few months, jumped from the top gallant masts of English and American ships into the Thames.

Scott commenced his exhibitions four months ago at Gravesend; and after remaining there a week, proceeded to Perfleet, thence to Blackwall, and intended working his way up the river to Oxford. He once jumped off Bangor bridge into the water below, and from the cliffs at Port Isaac, in Cornwall. Last summer he was about to precipitate himself from the cliffs at Broadstairs, but a humane gentleman interfered, and gave him two sovereigns not to attempt the leap. Scott has visited all the principal watering places and ports in England, and expressed his intention of making a tour of the remainder during the next summer. He never appeared much affected by his immersion in the water on the coldest day; and it was his custom to swallow a single glass of rum after he came out of the river, dress himself, and then smoke a pipe. He was never married, and he has been heard to say that he has not a single relative in this country, and that the many stories of his wife and sister having performed similar feats, and of their offering to swim from Blackwall to London bridge, were fictitious. Scott was regardless of the height from which he precipitated himself into the water, and he has frequently leaped from the main-top-gallant-masts of line-of-battle ships, frigates, and East-Indiamen, and frequently declared that he had no objection to leap from the gallery of the monument on Fish street hill, if eight feet of water were sunk below it. In swimming and diving he perhaps excelled any man that ever lived, and his feats in the water were very extraordinary.

MISCELLANY.

INTERESTING CASE.

The D'Hautville and Barry cases have excited a great deal of public attention, and the decisions seem to have given very general satisfaction.* In both cases there were disagreement and separation between husband and wife, and the point to be adjudicated was, which of the parents should have the custody of an infant child. The highest courts of Pennsylvania and New York, have decided that the mother may retain the child. In connection with these decisions the N. Y. Times and Star gives the following interesting narrative:

Major W. on the Hudson river, a man of fortune, but with peculiar notions of matrimony, and very much in favor of bringing up a wife to the hand, undertook to educate a country girl, who in due time, he married. There was, notwithstanding all his caution, 'an uncongeniality of temper,' which rendered the parties unhappy, and a separation and finally a divorce was the result; the lady continued to reside in the Highlands, while the Major and an infant daughter emigrated to the south, where he soon again married. Dying in a few years, he directed by will that his daughter should be conveyed to Vermont to be educated by a certain clergyman. Her step mother accordingly carried her to that State, in a secret manner, unknown to her mother, who, after many painful inquiries, finally discovered her abode. With the aid of friends, she devised a plan to possess herself of the child. A farmer in the neighborhood espoused her cause, and called in one day, as if by accident, to see the clergyman, who had a large family of his own. In fondling with the children, this girl, then about seven years old, came in for a share of his attention, and he remarked, 'why, this seems to be a stranger.' 'Yes,' said the clergyman, 'she is an adopted child.' The farmer having ascertained her abode to a certainty, invited the whole family to a party the next evening, where carriages were procured, and the mother bore off her daughter, hotly pursued, to the lines, by a numerous party. She arrived safe with the child on the banks of the Hudson, and in a short time the step-mother, the clergyman, and gentleman learned in the law appeared and sued out a writ of habeas corpus.

On the return of the writ, the case was to be argued before the Chancellor, a man as eminent for legal abilities as he ever has been for good sense and the excellent qualities of his heart. He thought the case a curious one, with some embarrassing circumstances, if not legal difficulties, and before the writ was returnable, he rehearsed the particulars to his wife, who, in a summary manner, said, 'My dear, I hope you won't take the child from its mother.' 'Tut, tut,' said he playfully, 'my dear, don't attempt to influence the Chancellor—nor decide the case without a hearing—that's contempt of court.' The hint, however, was not lost upon him. When the day arrived, he repaired to his chambers, and there found the mother, the child, the mother-in-law, the clergyman, several friends and legal gentlemen, of the highest eminence, with piles of law books and bundles of papers, tied with red tape, and all the preparations of a protracted debate. After salutations were over, the Chancellor called the little girl to him—placed her on his knees—played with her hair, and patted her cheeks, until the child felt quite at ease and sociable. 'What is your name my dear?' 'Mary.' 'Ah: quite a pretty name; and how old are you?' 'Seven years, sir.' 'Well, Mary, my dear, tell me who you would like to live with.' 'With my mother,' said the child. The Chancellor, taking her from his knee, and setting her on her feet exclaimed, 'There, my child, go to your mother. Gentlemen, the case is decided; the child prefers remaining with her mother.'

[We copy the above article, more as an interesting incident, than from any disposition of acquiescing in the principle laid down, which we not only believe to be wrong in the present case, but fraught with danger, as a precedent. When a man's child is taken from him, it should be done from other considerations, than to gratify the fastidious taste of a lady who wishes to separate from an amiable man, because their is "not a congeniality of feeling" between them.—Ed. R. & J.]

THE OAK.

Naturalists estimate the natural life of the Oak tree at from 300 to 400 years. One was felled in England many years since, which was judged to be 300 years old. It was perfectly sound and contained 634 cubic feet of timber in the trunk. One writer expresses his belief that there are trees which have been above three thousand years in existence!

To the provident care of the squirrel in laying up his winter stock of food, it has been thought our woodlands are much more indebted than will at first be thought possible. A person observing a squirrel sitting upon the ground under an oak, had the curiosity to watch his motion, and saw the animal several times ascend the tree and descend with an acorn each time in his month, which after digging a hole in the ground he carefully deposited, and covered it with earth. In this way probably many acorns are planted which the squirrel never has occasion to reclaim, and thus a continued growth of the oak is kept up by the help only of this little animal.

Curious Relic.—It will be remembered, that on the capture of the Chinese Island Chusan in July last there was taken by the British, among the spoils of war, a brass cannon, a six pounder, bearing an inscription showing it to have been made in 1601, by Richard Philips. It is supposed that this gun was sent to China by Queen Elizabeth as a present. It appears from certain records that Richard Philips was one of the Royal gunfounders during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I, and a record has been found of the casting of a gun by Philips in 1601 which answers to the description of that taken at Chusan. No other gun of the kind is known to have been cast in that year. It is supposed that the gun is the oldest of its kind in existence.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR, ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos, prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

TAXES.—Perhaps there is no evil existing in this community which requires reform, so much, as the present oppressive and cruel system of collecting our yearly taxes. Upon the propriety or justice of a tenant laboring one third of the year for his landlord, or the tacit consent given by a tenant to submit to any assessment which may be put upon him, for the improvement or benefit of another's property, are not questions which we are going to discuss at this time. Our present object, is, to invite attention to two crying evils, of the present tax system, which can be ameliorated, but which never will, until the PEOPLE take the matter into their own hands. The evils which we allude to, are 1st—the unreasonable time, in which our city taxes are collected; and 2d, the oppressive exclusiveness in which the law is at present construed.

The taxes should be collected in the Summer. At that time all classes, have employment, and the means of living is nearly one third less than in winter, exclusive of the heavy tax for fuel, which bears so heavily on the poor. We never could see any good reason why the taxes should be collected in winter, other than the additional misery it brings on those whose burthens are full heavy enough already. It has been said, that it would be inconvenient for the country towns. If this is the case, let the law be so altered as to meet the necessities of one class, and the convenience of the other. By the way, however, we should think the country towns might waive any little inconvenience on this point, when the city suffers an unequal and oppressive tax for their particular interest.

The second evil we complain of, is the barbarity, very often practised in the collection of a tax, which we think is not warranted by the spirit of the law, hard as it is, by any liberal construction. A collector, when he receives his warrant, is directed to collect the assessment on the inhabitant of such premises; and in case of neglect or refusal, he is empowered to levy and distrain on the goods and chattels of the occupant, and in case no personal property is to be found, then he is to make his return as provided by law. It is the opinion, we understand of an eminent lawyer of this city, and common sense would seem to carry out the conclusion, that a collector has no right, under the polity which governs civil transactions, or the laws which should ever influence humanity, to levy or distrain on any article which the law exempts on an ordinary execution. For if the law takes away the means of a man's keeping his household together, by the same statute book, the poor master is compelled to take such family and provide for their destitution in the Alms House which, is supported in fact by the same taxes, of which the "goods and chattels" of the man before us were a part! This would be the extreme of folly, and the law in its wisdom, never contemplated so great an inconsistency.

During the past season, we have taken some little pains to ascertain a few of the peculiar hardships, among the many which at present exist. The collectors feel themselves bound, by their construction of the law to make no exception to its very letter which says take all. Hence, in one instance, a widow with two or three children had her goods sold to pay some trifling tax, and the proceeds of the sale was less than one dollar. In Heaven's mercy! can the law contemplate such an outrage? In another case, the stove in which a woman was cooking a meal was taking down; the fire scattered, the chair on which she was sitting taken from her, her bed rolled up, and all the means she had to keep from perishing, was carted away "according to law." Again, a man with a large family, who by the dint of the most extreme pinching, had been enabled to supply himself with a little meat, had it taken from him and sold. We could cite many cases of similar hardship, but time will not admit of it. We do not intend by these facts, to cast censure on the collectors of the city. They as a body, probably have as much of the "milk of human kindness" in their composition, as usually falls to others. They do what they conceive to be their duty; and it cannot be expected that they will pay the tax for another, however onerous it may be. We complain of the law which suffers a tenant to be assessed under any circumstances, on property not his own, and we bitterly complain, of the barbarity and inhumanity of any law, which will wrest the last stick from the desolate hearth, or the last loaf from the famishing mouths of a helpless widow and her children.

We are aware of the argument used by landlords—that if they have to pay the tax, they will add it to the rent. Be it so. This can make no difference to the tenant who is able, but it makes a very material difference to him or her, who by some unforeseen dispensation of Providence, may be reduced to the extreme of penny and want. We shall resume this subject, another time.

CELESTE.—The N. Y. Standard says, the bill to divorce Henry Elliot from his wife Celeste, who is now in Europe, was taken up in the House of Delegates, Maryland, on the 25th inst., and rejected by an almost unanimous vote.

THE OLD STATE HALL.—It may not be generally known, that on the removal of the State officers into the new State Hall, which is to take place in the course of a few months, the old building is to be altered for that purpose and is to be made the depot of the numerous and varied collections made by the scientific corps, having in charge the geological survey of the State.—Those collections comprise specimens in mineralogy, botany and natural history, carefully prepared, and properly arranged. We have reason to believe that the collections are full in each department, and they without doubt will constitute an object of interest and curiosity. The developements already made of the hitherto unknown resources of our State have far more than repaid the comparative trifling cost of the survey.

OPPOSITION.—We observe that it is the intention of the proprietors of several of the Hudson River Steam Boats to charge but one dollar for the transit of passengers, between the cities of Albany and New York, during the coming season. It is exceedingly to be regretted that an arrangement can not be made between the parties beligerent, to the end, that they may be enabled to receive an adequate return for the immense expenditures which they incur in the construction of their unequalled boats. It is a mistaken notion to suppose that the community in general are benefited by a low fare; on the contrary, it is an absolute evil, as it is an inducement to many to travel and neglect their business, who would otherwise stay at home. Its evils are manifold, and we might fill a page in reprehending them but we fear it would be without avail.

So huzza, for low fare, crowded cabins—shocking bad suppers, and its other concomitants.

THE MECHANICS of this city, have again had a numerous meeting on the subject of the odious state prison monopoly, and have passed resolutions expressive of their feelings on the subject. There can be no doubt but the present unjust system should be abolished, and some other substituted; but whether the present legislature will give the relief which is asked for, is rather doubtful to our minds, judging from past applications. There however is a way in which the evil can be reached, if the mechanics of the state will prove true to themselves,—act with firmness, and unitedly. If the present legislature will give them no relief, let a mechanics Association be formed in each town and county of the state, without party or sect—let their grievances be laid before the community, intelligently and respectfully—let each town association bring every mechanic possibly within its direct influence, and by delegates from each town, concentrate the rule of action to be observed, in a county association. Let the county Association require the positive and public pledge of each candidate, for the Legislature, that the monopoly shall be abolished. If the candidates of both political parties, give the pledge desired, than the voter is to be left to his individual preferences. But if the candidates of one party subscribe to the principles required, and the other refuses; their individual preferences should be laid on the altar of the object proposed to be accomplished. If the mechanics of the state of New York, will unite on some such course as is suggested and which undoubtedly could be improved, if next fall does not return a legislative body that will turn an ear to their just demands—why, we will consent to print papers at the convict price, all the days of our life.

"PUBLIC OPINION."—Our Trojan neighbors or their friends, certainly deserve credit for their industry.—Witness the following from the Argus, which the editor says is from a respectable citizen of Geneva.

"It may be proper that Albanians should know that liberal prices are given for signers to a remonstrance against the Albany Bridge. I am credibly informed that a young man made five dollars procuring names last Friday. Indeed, it is currently reported that four cents per signature is the going price."

PROFESSOR BRONSON.—It will be perceived by the advertisement in another column, that Proff. Bronson has consented by particular desire, to continue his stay among us for two weeks longer. Perhaps, no better evidence can be given of the estimation in which Proff. B. is held among us, than is to be found in the universal desire on the part of our most respectable citizens, to have him repeat select portions of his Readings and Recitations. It is truly an intellectual treat.

HAYDN'S ORATORIO OF THE CREATION.—This sublime composition of its immortal author was performed at West Troy on Tuesday evening last. A correspondent informs us there was a deplorable deficiency in the instrumental accompaniment, but the solos and chorusses, were executed with great judgment and effect. Eve in particular was sung most sweetly, and will be long remembered with pleasant sensations, by a numerous audience who were in attendance.

GEOLOGY.—Proff. Hall has just concluded a course of lectures on this important and interesting subject. The attendance was not so numerous as it should have been, but those who did attend express themselves in terms of the most unqualified approbation, and at the close of the course united in the passage of resolutions declaratory of their gratification.

A counterfeit red back $5, on the Bank of Syracuse, is in circulation. It is well executed, except that the engravers' names, "Rawdon, Wright & Hatch" are printed "Rawdon, Wright, Hatch, New-York."

The "Fancy Sketch" of our correspondent B. W. would, we fear, be so much above the comprehension of our readers, that we must deprive ourselves of the pleasure of publishing it. There is an occasional gleam of poetic merit about it; and if the "fayre ladye" (are we right) will try again, perhaps her next effort will be better.

LOOK OUT.—The Bills of the Union Bank, at Buffalo, are no longer redeemed, by their agent in this city.

SHIPWRECK AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.—The following singular and affecting narrative is extracted from a letter to a lady in the city of New York, from one of the American missionaries in the Sandwich Islands, published in the Commercial Advertiser.

Hana Maui, Sandwich Islands, July 21, 1840.

We have just returned from our general meeting at Honolulu. Our passage was made in a canoe to Lahaiu, a distance of 80 miles, a perilous undertaking, for the sea was high, and fearfully threatening our little bark. From this place we obtained a passage in the King's vessel to Honolulu; we had a pleasant meeting with our friends.

About the time of our leaving home, a sorrowful providence occurred. The brethren at Honolulu, fearing that we would not venture upon a canoe, epgaged a vessel, which was to go to Hawaii for Mr. Lyons, and to call on its return and take us. The vessel made its passage to Hawaii, and when near its place of destination was capsized and lost. All on board, consisting of thirty souls, were drowned except our. These seemed to be miraculously preserved to tell the sad tale of the fate of their companions.

When the accident occurred they were near the shore, but the wind and current were against them, and thinking it vain to attempt to reach Hawaii, they congregated themselves upon the rolling billows, and there together in their distress offered up their supplications to Him who alone could preserve them from the threatening deep.

They attempted to swim to Kahoolura, some thirty miles on the opposite side of the channel. One man and his wife took a covered bucket and tied to their bodies, and in this way swam until the bucket came to pieces. The female swam for some time, but on turning she saw her husband becoming too weak to support himself. She stopped and rubbed him until he could proceed. They went on until Kahoolura was full in sight; he then became too feeble to proceed without assistance, and supported himself by holding to the long hair of his wife's head. In this way she rowed him for some time; his hand soon let go the hold, and she tried in vain to rouse him. She told him he must pray—he commenced, but only uttered a few words. She put his arms around her neck—held him with one hand, and made for the shore. When within about half a mile from the shore, she found he was dead, and she was compelled to let go her hold to support herself. They had then been in the water about thirty hours. When she landed she was three days before she saw a human being, and was without food. At last some fishermen found her, and conveyed her to the village, where she is now in good health. The captain of the vessel was a foreigner, and could swim but little; his wife saved herself by the assistance of an oar. The others disappeared from time to time, until all perished but the four.

TEXAS.—The Austin Sentinel of the 30th ult. in speaking of their relations with Mexico says.

"We rejoice to communicate to our fellow citizens the gratifying intelligence that a convention with England has been ratified by the Senate, by which the British government has agreed to mediate effectually with Mexico, and it is probable that within a very few weeks an armistice will be agreed upon, by which hostilities will be suspended for six months, with a view to a complete pacification between the two countries. If Mexico shall accept the mediation of England, this armistice will take effect within thirty days after the Mexican government is notified of the convention by the British minister in Mexico. As the despatches of Lord Palmerton relating to this subject have already been forwarded from Galveston, we may expect intelligence from Mexico relative to the armistice about the first of March."

Cure for Hydrophobia.—A French paper states that the bite of a mad dog, whether given to the human or brute creation, may be cured by frequently washing the part with new salt water and taking for nine or ten successive days a new laid egg, beat up with some oil of olives and calcined oyster shells, fried in a pan.

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register.

'TIS NOT THE CARES.

'Tis not the cares of outward life,
The busied scenes of doubt and strife,
That damp the spirit's fire:
These serve to make the gem appear,
To throw aside its rustic gear,
And burnish its attire.

'Tis not the hardships, not the woes,
Not the trem'ling spleen of foes,
That gives the pulse a chill:
These we meet, and onward pass,
And scarce distinguish in the mass,
A sov'reign ill!

'Tis when the heart has lost the spell
Of something it has lov'd too well,
In homage bent before:
Then death makes true each troub'ling doubt
Of time, and blows ambition out
From all the future's store.

THE HOUR OF PEACE.

There is an hour of sacred peace
By angels blessed, by saints revered;
An hour when sorrow's wailings cease,
And sad complainings are unheard.

There is an hour when man may steal
From faithless friend, from Godless foes;
And in his bosom calmly feel,
The healing cordial of repose.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE JAMES GORDON BROOKS.—
The mortal remains of the late JAMES G. BROOKS were consigned to the tomb on Monday. As we looked for the last time upon the corpse of our departed friend, the following beautiful and pathetic stanzas of his were brought to mind, and we re-publish them. They are among the best of the many truly good productions that emanated from his polished mind and pen:

THE LAST SONG.

BY THE LATE J. G. BROOKS.

Strike the wild harp yet once again!
Again its lonely numbers pour;
Then let the melancholy strain
Be hushed in death for evermore.
For evermore, for evermore,
Creative fancy, be thou still;
And let oblivious Lethe pour
Upon my lyre its waters chill.

Strike the wild harp yet once again!
Then be its fitful chords unstrung,
Silent as is the grave's domain,
And mute as the death mouldered tongue,
Let not a thought of memory dwell
One moment on its former song;
Forgotten, too, be this farewell.
Which plays its pensive string along!

Strikes the wild harp yet once again!
The saddest and the latest lay;
Then break at one its strings in twain,
And they shall sound no more for aye:
And hang it on the cypress tree,
The hours of youth and song have passed,
Have gone, with all their witchery;
Lost lyre! these numbers are thy last.

DARKNESS AND LIGHT.

Oh! why this weakness! Is there nought
By which the mind to virtue brought,
Can crush the tyrant who enchains,

Its spirit with unnumbered pains!
Have we no haven, whence to glide?
No anchor in the impetuous tide?
Like vessels to the whirlpool borne,
We hope, but never can return!

And this is life—a vale of gloom
E'en darker than the rayless tomb;
Upon the face of which there falls
No kindly light. Thus, being palls,
And feeling, sense, and every part
Of that which live, is but a dart
To pierce more deeply in the soul,
And wound, where we have least control.
And yet we live—and still the light
That o'er the world shines gay and bright,
Reveals not our sad gloom to those
Who see us as in sweet repose.
They do not mark the tearful eye,
Nor see, half masked, the hectic dye;
They think the hours strong in mirth,
Nor dream the cause that gives it birth.

So let it be—with conscious pride
We may one term of years abide;
And joy, that in affliction's night
Within ourselves there shines a light
Of such celestial hue, that they
Who dwell within its lingering ray,
E'en think it ever free and bright,
And not a sequence of the night.

It is affection's beam—and ye,
Whate'er in life your lot may be,
Who think that Love is but a dream
Of some wild fancy—ye who seem
To view life's pageants as they go,
As the sole antidotes to woe,
Will sadly grieve, when these have passed,
To find such gems were not amassed.

Without this light we could not live;
No fountain could to us then give
A cooling draught for parching thirst,
Or quench the fires that inward burst;
No sparkling vapors could ascend
And cool the brow; that does suspend
The essence of our inward grief,
And give the fevered pulse relief.

Oh! 'tis the only gift we know,
From which sweet streams of comfort flow.
It is a mother to our grief
Who by kind words oft gives relief;
Who, when we're bowed by every care,
Still takes from us a weighty share;
And lightened thus, we trusting live,
And to Despair a respite give.

WHY DO WE LOVE.

I often think each tottering form,
That limps along in life's decline,
Once bore a heart as young, as warm,
As full of idle thoughts as mine.
And each has had his dream of joy,
His own unequalled pure romance;
Commencing, when the blushing boy
First thrills at woman's lovely glance.

And each could tell his tale of youth—
Would think its scenes of love evince
More passions, more unearthly truth,
Than any tale, before or since:
Yes, they could tell of tender lays,
At midnight penned, in classic shades,
Of days more bright than modern days—
Of maids more fair than modern maids:

Of whispers in a willing ear,
Of kissing on a blushing cheek—
Each kiss, each whisper, far too dear
For modern lips to give or speak;
Of prospects, too, untimely crossed,
Of passions slighted or betrayed—
Of kindred spirits early lost,
And buds that blossomed but to fade.

Of beaming eyes and tresses gay,
Elastic form and noble brow,

And charms—that all have passed away,
And left them—what we see them now!
And is it thus—is human love
So very light and frail a thing?
And must Youth's brightest visions move
Forever on Time's restless wing?

Must all the eyes that still are bright,
And all the lips that talk of bliss,
And all the forms so fair to sight,
Hereafter only come to this?
Then what are Love's best visions worth,
If we at length must lose them thus!
If all we value most on earth,
Ere long must fade away from us!

Of that one being whom we take
From all the world, and still recur.
To all she said, and for her sake
Feel far from joy when far from her;
If that one form which we adore,
From youth to age, in bliss or pain,
Soon withers and is seen no more—
Why do we love, if love be vain?

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY IN THE UNITED STATES.—Brethren.—We have been witnesses of the effects of one of the most extraordinary delusions in regard to our Institution, which in any land or age have tried its strength or durability.

That jealousies and fear of an Institution every where conducted on liberal principles, should have excited a spirit of opposition in arbitrary or tyrannical governments have never surprised us; but when our Order was attacked in our own land, and the people our own neighbors and friends, were excited by false, malicious, and absurd accusations against it; when we saw families disturbed, societies convulsed, and individuals of eminent virtue and station denounced and persecuted, we deplored the folly and fanaticism of our enemies, and sought by patience, and quiet and orderly deportment to assuage the bitterness of our revilers, and to turn the hearts of our misguided accusers. We knew that our Institution was devised in wisdom for the improvement of society in every land, and could not long be left as a mark for the scorn and derision of demagogues and fanatics, nor remain an object of terror to the well disposed.

The delusion has passed away—there has been a redeeming spirit in the midst of the storm—a spirit of inquiry after truth, which has wrought out for us a vindication, and fixed it in the popular mind. Once more our Order has free course, and has resumed its place as the medium of union, friendship, and kind offices amongst 'good men' of every rank, station, party, sect, and profession in the land. What we could not do when compelled to defend ourselves against the ingenious assaults of an organized and reckless faction, we can do now; we can take high ground; we can place our Institution in its true position; we can openly declare its principles to attentive hearers, and verify our declarations by the testimony of the greatest, the purest, the best beloved and venerated men, whose names adorn the brightest pages of our country's history. We have in our power to shew, that so far as Freemasonry from having a tendency to corrupt the morals, weaken the faith, impede the justice, contract the soul, or relax the patriotism of its votaries, our country stands indebted for a large portion of its welfare, honor, and security to the members of our Fraternity.

This high position it is my intention to maintain by a work which I propose to publish, if sustained by the approbation and aid of the Fraternity to the necessary extent.

To test this, I offer the following plan for the publication of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States.

To place the work within the reach of every member of the Fraternity, it will be published in numbers, in the imperial Octavo form, at periods of one or two months, at 50 cents a number, payable on delivery, and will extend as is supposed, to about fifty numbers, forming five large volumes. Each number will contain three Portraits engraved on steel, and occasionally other illustrations, with biographies written expressly with reference to the Masonic character and acts of each subject's, (so far as materials can be obtained,) as well as to his private life. For the fidelity, accuracy and beauty of the work, the responsibility will rest alone on the editor and proprietor.

JAMES HERRING, Grand Secretary of the

Extract from the minutes of the Grand Lodge, of the State of New York, Dec. 1st, A. L. 5840.

"The Grand Secretary then asked permission to present the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing, under the title of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States. The proposed Address to the Fraternity and the prospectus were then read; whereupon the following Resolution was unanimously adopted."

"Resolved.—That this Grand Lodge highly approve of the proposed work of the Rt. W. G. Secretary, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons,' and recommend it to the patronage of the Fraternity."

In Kiss Chapter, of the State of New York, Feb. 3d, 5841.

"Resolved.—That the Grand Chapter of the State of N. York, do approve of the work proposed by our M. E. Companion James Herring, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons,' and while they commend it to the support of the Fraternity, to give to the author free access to the Records and Archives of this Grand Chapter, for such information on our Masonic History as may be necessary for his work."

ADDRESS.

Delivered in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Hordinsburgh Ky., before Breckinridge Lodge, No. 67 on the 26th day of December, 1840. Celebrated as the Anniversary of St. John the Evangelist.

BY JAMES G. HASWELL.

Friends and Brothers:—This is a day of rejoicing, of praise, and of thanksgiving, to the great Supreme Architect of the Universe, and Author of our existence. Through his mercy and loving kindness we are once more permitted to assemble ourselves together, as a lodge, as friends, and as brethren, in this tabernacle of the most High. And how can we enter this Temple erected and dedicated to God, without being deeply impressed with the feelings of solemnity. Without feeling that whatever is uttered on this occasion, should be in strict accordance with those truths which are so oft repeated here for the good of mankind. Without feeling that in the exercises of this hour there is a responsibility resting upon us. We trust that we feel this responsibility, and we come supported by the reflection, that the cause in which we are engaged, is the cause of virtue, the cause of religion, and it is the cause of God.

Brethren, surrounded as we are by those who are more competent to the task; we feel a great degree of diffidence in attempting to act the part of your organ on this occasion, in commemorating the virtues of one whose whole life exhibited a true devotion to the doctrines revealed from Heaven—in which are embodied the principles of Masonry.

As we have not been qualified by education for a speaker, we have not followed it as a profession. And having had but little experience in public assemblies, we feel at best, ill qualified, to discharge the duties which this day devolves upon us. The subject upon which we are about to address you, is a very important one:—and should engage the attention of every Mason, no matter upon what part of earth's surface he may be located. And that should be our theme, which concerns in some degree: the highest, best, and dearest interests of man; his well-being here, and eternal happiness hereafter. Feeling very sensibly our inability to point out with clearness and precision, that path which leads to the highest, and most glorious attainments in the scale of happiness: we cannot but regret that the task of addressing you had not fallen to the lot of a more able and experienced speaker. On this subject however, we come clothed with all the panoply of truth; and we shall attempt to address you in naught but its plain language. And if the sentiments expressed, are not clothed with all the beauties of oratory; or the ideas advanced, arranged according to the most approved method; we still hope that some observations will meet with your approbation, though they be dressed in the simple attire of truth, unadorned by oratorical embellishments.

It may be rationally presumed, that all who are present on this occasion, are fully acquainted with the design of this festival. It is one peculiar to our order, and has been held sacred by all genuine Masons, ever since its institution.

The history of every nation is fraught with eras, and events, of peculiar importance; which extend their influence to succeeding ages and generations, and which are fondly commemorated by latest posterity.—The ancients often celebrated the virtues, and recounted in song the heroic deeds of their ancestors; thus encouraging each other to the imitation of their virtues. In the history of modern times, almost every day of the revolving year is presented as the anniversary of something memorable which befel our forefathers;—and is remembered by us, their sons with joy, or with sorrow. And though the celebration of this day, is calculated, to carry our minds back to an early age in antiquity; yet the virtues of our Patron are recorded in the book of God: and we commemorate his virtues, and remember his name with joy, and not with sorrow. Feeling assured, that he has a seat at the right hand of the great Grand Master on high: there to be the subject of his favors and blessings throughout an ever during eternity. This teaches us that we too must die, and that all things earthly must decay and crumble into dust. It also teaches us another important lesson, and this is consoling, that if we live righteously and Godly in this present world; we shall not only receive the praise of all good men, but we shall ultimately receive, the approbation of our Father who art in Heaven.

We celebrate this as the natal day of St. John, the Evangelist; and the return of it, is hailed by every true Mason, as a time of rational rejoicing, and holy remembrance. We have met as a band of brothers, to commemorate the virtues, and to deck the mausoleum of him, who taught mankind the doctrines of Heavenly inspiration, and whose whole life was devoted to the service of the most High! After the lapse of ages, we still have before us the inspired writings of our exalted patron; through the dark ages of superstition and idolatry, they were as a beacon-light, guiding all those who would follow them, safely through the labyrinthian mazes of heathenish darkness, to the resplendent light of the gospel soon to shine in all its brilliancy throughout the habitable earth. The doctrines taught by St. John and his contemporaries, are now high in the ascendant, of all doctrines received from a fallible source; the prophecies are hastening to their fulfillment, and all heathen nations will soon receive that universal light, (emanating from the throne of God,) though the instrumentality of his ministers upon earth: when all things earthly shall hasten to their final consummation.

We have chosen St John the Evangelist as one of the Patron Saints of our Order, not that we have any conclusive proof, of his having been a member of the institution of Speculative Masonry:—but because, he was an able advocate of the principles of Masonry; and the high veneration in which he was held by early Christian Masons. We do not think it necessary to give you a narration of the life of our distinguished Patron, in the enumeration of his many virtues, believing that you are all acquainted with his history. We reverse his name, and believe the doctrines which he taught. As an Order, as a Lodge, we believe the doctrines which he taught, because they came from God: teaching man true wisdom, in showing him his depravity, his inability to do any acceptable act without the aid of his Maker:—and the necessity of a change of heart, a preparation for Heaven. Teaching him, that his race, with all their inventions; must decay, and return to their mother dust.

“Every production of human power and skill bears this inscription, I am made to perish, man himself the moment he begins to breathe begins to die.” And the most durable, the most magnificent of his works, are no sooner completed, than they begin to decay and crumble into dust. In vain does the antiquary search for the primitive grandeur and magnificence of the monuments of antiquity; they have either fallen in ruins, or are tottering from their crumbling base; remaining only the wonder of an age, the design of which was long since lost in oblivion. Where is Nineveh! and Babylon, and Thebes with her hundred gates! all have gone;—thrones, kingdoms and empires, have alike met with the same fate. Every nation has left behind them, monuments of human folly. The Egyptians, have left upon the plain, their huge and stupendous pyramids, which even to this day, in their dilapidated state, attract the attention of the traveller. And they stand as lofty monuments, towering almost to the clouds; and showing to the world the folly and extravagance of the projectors. “They have gone to that bourne, from whence no traveller returns,” and have left behind them those decaying fabrics, which have not benefitted succeeding generations; and now only remain as the pompous mausoleums of the illustrious dead:—and as the astonished traveller beholds; he may say to the sleeping dust within, sleep on! ye once proud ones; entombed for ages in the Temple of fame,—that Temple, which if exchanged for a better; must be for one, “made without hands eternal in the Heavens.” Here is enough presented to the mind for reflection and meditation; and well may we exclaim in the language of the poet.

“Look behind thee—cities hid
“In the night of treacherous story;
“Many a crumbling pyramid,
“Many a pile of senseless glory,
“Temples into ruin hurled,
“ (Fragments of an earlier world.)”

Ah yes! they remain but as fragments of an earlier world. “The certain principle of decay has entered into all the works of man.” “And that Temple of the Lord, that magnificent structure on Mount Zion,” reared by the Grand Master of Israel, with the assistance of both Jew and Gentile:—and standing in after ages “the wonder and glory of the world:” “not one stone remaineth upon another.” The decree had gone forth from the eternal throne; and that decree, was irreversible. That decree, was passed, by the same supreme power at whose omnipotent fiat; Nations, Thrones, and Kingdoms, have been hurled from their sandy foundations; falling in ruins from their towering heights, leaving nothing of the past but fragments, and the names of the actors recorded on the historic page, or locked in the archives of nations. But amid the general ruin, amid the downfall of Kingdoms, and Imperial thrones; amid the changes and innovations of every age, masonry has escaped, and is at this day unpolluted, uncontaminated. And there yet shines in the great constellation of Heaven's best boons to man; two bright luminaries, resplendent shining, guiding all those who will approach the light (as did the star in the east;) to him who will be the rewarder of all virtuous men, in the grand consummation of all things. These two bright luminaries, are the Christian Religion; Heaven's full and overflowing love to man, and Masonry her handmaid: one of Heavens means for the instruction, and the amelioration of the condition of man. Religion, and Masonry, now stands pure and unscathed by the persecutions and general ruin of the past. And is religion then made pure by the persecutions of the past? the Temple of Masonry now stands burnished like bright gold, by the unhallowed fires of persecution which have raged against it: ignorance and superstition have attempted to defile this Temple, and to raze with the ground, that beautiful edifice, erected and dedicated to God, by the inculcation within; of those great moral truths, which always tend to bring man nearer to his maker. On the altar of this Temple, is ever spread the Holy Bible; Heaven's best gift to man: its doctrines are inculcated, and he who believes not in its sacred contents must forever be debarred the privilege of entering this Temple of truth.

Mighty efforts have been made to raze with the ground the beautiful Temple of Masonry; but like the wave repelling rock, it has withstood the storms and tempests of ages; and its whitened summit may yet be seen, towering above the darkness of superstition, the rage of party zeal, and bearing in the gloom of their own disappointment, those designing men, whose misapplied, and feeble energies were thus in the end abortive.

Brethren, we worship not in Times consecrated by Polytheism to strange Deities; but we consecrate our Temples, by the worship of the “One True God,” and by the help of revelation, we can behold the Temple of the Lord, we can see its beauties, and learn that we were created to inhabit one more beautiful and perfect, made by the Supreme Grand Master of the Universe; "eternal in the Heavens." With the hope of being inhabitants of this perfect Temple, let us rejoice, and look with proud admiration upon the splendid and magnificent structure reared by our illustrious Grand Master Solomon; supported by him whose virtues we this day commemorate: now looked upon by a majority of the world as a temple to virtue. Upon its majestic dome, reaching far, far above the gloomy piles of decayed heathen temples, blazes as a beacon fire, the pure and holy flame of universal love. By its light many in every age and nation, have been enabled to see, and read that grand system of ethics, stamped with the impress of truth: preparing them for the reception of those great, grand, and glorious truths, given to man by heavenly inspiration, sustained, and sanctioned by divine authority. May this light continue to shine through all coming time, and shed its lustre o'er all the world: increasing in brightness by the vestal fires, which ever burn upon our altars—unextinguished, guiding to the hill of science, promoting morality and virtue, a light which shall guide many to that Temple, "whose Maker and builder is God.

Friends, this is an age and a day of rejoicing; the light of science, with its illuminating rays, now diffuses light resplendent o'er all the civilized world, the fetters of superstitions are knocked off and broken in twain, by the power and influence of that gospel whose bright beams celestially shines throughout the greater part of the habitable earth; giving life and energy to man, and placing him in that situation, which it was intended he should occupy. It has pleased God in every age of the world, and under every dispensation to make use of men as instruments in the propagation of his truths: and in the establishment of his kingdom upon earth in the hearts of men. God has blessed, and perpetuated every institution, which has for its object the inculcation of morals; and the amelioration of the condition of man. He has blessed that eminent Patron of our order, whose virtues we this day commemorate; God has blessed him who was cast on Patmos rocky Isle; by the cruel Emperor Domitian:—it was there that he suffered all the horror of banishment, it was there that he showed forth all the Christian graces, it was there that he exhibited that humility and meekness, always characteristic of the true Christian: and there it was that Heaven's revealed will was written on his heart; evidencing the glory, and the goodness of God to man;—sublime as sublimity, and lasting as eternity. This is the natal day of him, who was the instrument in the hands of God; of giving to the world, a part of this revelation, this light, sufficient to guide man to his great unoriginated self-existent author. Endowed with Heavenly inspiration, St. John the Evangelist, uttered these solemn truths, as from the mouth of him

Whose voice was heard
On Sinai's awful mount.

And however simple the exercises of this day, we should feel the importance, the sublimity, and grandeur of the doctrines taught by our distinguished Patron: and we should learn to imitate his simplicity, humanity, charity; and his practice of all the virtues. Our task then to day is simple, yet sublime; and our offerings, should be the incense ascending from grateful hearts up to the throne of God.

We come not before you as an Order, with our hands imbrued in the blood of our enemies, we come not in the pomp of war, with swords unsheathed, with which we have achieved victories. No triumphal arch is erected to commemorate our glory, nor do we come, with our hands reeking in the blood of our enemies, immolated upon the altar of sectarian zeal. But we come before you, bearing aloft the Olive Branch of peace; and exerting an influence in the amelioration of the condition of man. Has science and masonry existed in the same nation? and has science with airy wing taken her flight to regions more remote, to cultivate people more ignorant? There has Masonry appeared by her side, rearing high the temple of morals; and inculcating therein those principles which tend to elevate and expand the mind of man. Inculcating those great moral truths, as taught by St. John the Evangelist; that eminent man of God, who possessed all the Christian graces, who has been worthy and well qualified; and who has been passed and raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason. There rest thou, in that lodge above; in the full enjoyment of the smiles and favors of the Great Grand Master of that beautiful and ever-during Lodge in Heaven.

Leaving this distinguished Patron of our order, and pattern for all good and virtuous men; we shall have enough to do in the consideration of the origin of Masonry, its principles, emblems, and design; either taken separately, or collectively, as we can best point them out. Every good Mason, on occasions like the present, takes great pleasure in attempting to point out with all the clearness and precision he is master of something of the history, and design of the order. In attempting this, we need not dig for hidden treasures amidst the ruins of all the temples dedicated to heathen gods; rendered conspicuous on the pages of history by a recital of the ignorance and superstition of the past. But we may search first, for the truths of Masonry; in the revelation of God's will to man: and the book of nature, which has been spread out before us by the great omnipotent author of our existence. For its progress amongst the nations, we may refer, to the writings of many of the Sages and Philosophers of every age; thus can be traced, the origin, and growth of an institution, which has for its object, the inculcation of morals, and the teaching of that system of ethics, built upon the foundation of eternal truth.

It is asked, from whence the origin of Masonry?—when were the first drawings of its light seen upon earth? We answer, when first the great I Am spoke this world into existence from chaotic darkness; then were the first principles of Masonry developed; in the order of the universe; and in the recognition of that great unoriginated intellect, as the Grand Master over all his works. The principles of Masonry were developed:

"Ere the infant sun
Was rolled together, or had tried his beams
Athwart the gloom profound;"

As order grew out of the perfections of the Deity, so masonry is built upon the broad foundations of the order observed in the works of nature. And the first principle of the order, is the recognition of the great I Am as the Grand Master over all his works; and as the great Donor or giver of all good; the author of that revelation, which records his full and overflowing love to man. This revelation lies open upon the altar of every Masonic Temple, a star in the east; guiding all those who will approach, practice, and believe in a sacred light. This light is the Holy Bible. The

"Lamp of our feet whose hallowed beam
Deep in our hearts its dwelling hath;
How welcome is the cheering gleam
Thou sheddest o'er our lonely path!
Light of our way! whose rays are sung
In mercy o'er our pilgrim road,
How blessed its dark shades among:
The star that guides us to our God."

Deprive us of this star, deprive us of its guidance; and we are lost in the labyrinthian mazes of unassisted human reason. Assisted by revelation, we behold in perfect order and beauty, the commands of God, all conducive to the happiness of man: all linked together, and essential to give us just conceptions of the glory, and the grandeur of the Deity.

The fundamental truths of Masonry, notwithstanding its antiquity have been derived from the inspired writings. And though we may trace it in its operative or in its speculative character from the most remote ages; and find it like the history of the most renowned nations of antiquity, obscured by the fictions and legends of an uncultivated age; and the ceremonies within its Temples, veiled in mystery; yet we must come to the conclusion, that a religious object, was the primary purpose of the institution. "And if we view Masonry in its operative character, in that Heaven favored clime of Western Asia, where architecture was taught in all its perfection: and where we can trace the Phenician builders of the Temple of Solomon, the Dionysian artificers, the Masonic instruction of the Knights of the Temple;" we shall find that the world was benefited, not only by the arts and sciences, which emanated from the Masonic repository; but in the still more important matter of religion. For revelation teaches us, that the living God dwelt not only in the Mosaic tabernacle, but that he dwelt at a future period in the Temple of Solomon; in that Temple which was built by the united efforts, of Jew, and Gentile Masons. From this we are enabled to discover the wisdom and the goodness of God, in thus uniting by the strongest ties, these two distinct nations in thus giving to the Gentile world correct views of the One True God. These views obtained to a greater or less extent, in some of the Gentile nations; though perverted by the natural depravity of man. Some of the Grecian Philosophers, no doubt understood the principles of Masonry; for we find them travelling to the east in quest of knowledge in things Divine and human: receiving light from revelation by reading the original manuscripts as written by Moses, or by tradition receiving light from "Masonry by beholding those gorgeous piles of architectural skill which never were the acquisitions of a day; returning to their native land and incorporating into their system, some of those moral truths received from revelation: together with that science, morals, and discipline which they had learned from operative Masonry; thus adopting and sanctioning, this mode of enlightening their disciples." And whether we view Masonry in ancient or modern times; we are driven to the conclusion, that it is enlightening in its nature and progressive in its morals. Though notwithstanding this conclusion, it would be asserting too much to say; that Pythagoras and other Philosophers, taught the principles of Masonry in as great purity as they are taught at the present day.—The Saviour had not appeared. Paul had not as yet stood in the midst of the Areopagus, and proclaimed unto the knowing Athenians, his knowledge of the living God. They had never heard him proclaim that glorious doctrine, which was calculated to overthrow all the errors of the Greek Philosophy. All the sublime truths, and resplendent beauties of the Greek Philosophy was but a borrowed light from the pages of Heaven's inspiration, received either by tradition, or from the inspired penmen of antiquity. That Philosophy, was but the scintillations, of those great, and eternal truths; soon to be corrupted, in all their bright and glowing colors: in the adoption of God's revealed will to man, as the basis of all wisdom, of all truth, and the only guide to immortal joys.

SIR MATTHEW HALE.

—quid virtus et quid sapientia possit
Utile propositis nobis exemplar.

Hor. Epist. 1. 7

The legal profession in all countries has produced many eminent men in common with the other liberal and sister professions of theology and medicine, and we find these especially in the infant days of their particular department. Need we refer, for the truth of this, to the names of Littleton and Coke, which have survived the long lapse of centuries, and the many alterations and changes which their favorite science has undergone, and which now still claim of right a place as "the foremost of the first" in the science of the law. Acute discrimination, profound research, and untiring industry are some of the qualities which have entitled them to this distinction and made that title absolute and in fee forever. The profession in which they spent their lives; is one peculiarly calculated to exercise the most exalted and the noblest powers which are bestowed upon man. It is one which although stigmatized as uncertain, possesses within itself, principles as certain and indisputable, as the axioms in mathematics and is founded and built up, on these exclusively. It were easy to show all this, were the present a fitting occasion, but the character of the minds which have been imbued with its principles through a long life, in their displays of the most logical, powerful, and accurate reasoning, demonstrates its truth, as clearly as any direct proof. "Legal sta-dies," says a celebrated writer, "eminently invigorate and fortify the mind's noblest faculty,—the power of attention; they discipline the understanding; excite discrimination, give activity and acuteness to the apprehension and correct and mature the judgment."

Of the character and influence of pleading, an important branch of legal science, numberless authorities from all professions might be adduced which would attest the rigid accuracy of reasoning required in the prosecution of legal studies and practice.

Of the two great names which have already been mentioned, something may be said at a future time; at present, we desired to recall some of our early recollections of a character which has always been fondly cherished by us, as combining in itself, learning of the most profound and useful description, a course of life the most brilliant and exemplary, a heart the most kind and affectionate, and moral feelings the most pure and just. Our readers would have already anticipated us in the announcement of the name of this individual, even if we had not placed it at the head of this little article. And the classical quotation which we have placed under that name, will surely not be thought inapplicable, or to savor aught of the too favorable prejudice of an humble, but ardent admirer.

Sir Matthew Hale was born in Alderly, in Gloucestershire, on the 1st of November, 1609. At seventeen, he was entered at Magdalen Hall, in the university of Oxford, and at the age of twenty, he was admitted at Lincoln's Inn, when he commenced the study of the profession in which he was destined so much to distinguish himself.

His application at first was intense, and his studies were not confined to his professions, but took a wider range, comprising the mathematics and natural philosophy, of the latter of which he was exceedingly fond. He says that during the first two years after he came to the Inns of Court, he studied sixteen hours a day, but it almost brought him to his grave, though he was of a very strong constitution; and afterwards reduced himself to eight hours: "but that he would not advise any body to do so much—that he thought six hours a day with attention and constancy was sufficient." To illustrate his constant and persevering application, a biographer has these remarks. "He seemed particularly attached to the study of divinity; and those who read his religious disquisitions, may be induced to think, that the science of theology engaged the principal part of his attention:—here, therefore, it may not be improper to remark, that the gnarus mans forum and sub galli cantum, of Horace, were precepts so high in the estimation of Hale, that he rigidly observed them. In truth so averse was he, from the dissipation of time, that he would not even correspond with his friends, except on necessary business or matters of learning; in short, he made every human aid contribute in advancing him to a superior degree of knowledge and of wisdom.

In 1653, he was appointed by Cromwell, Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, though with some doubt of the legality of the commission under which he held this office. While in this station and shortly after his appointment, the natural integrity and independence of his moral character was strikingly evinced in refusing to try a cause then depending before him, for which the jury had been returned under the immediate directions of the Protector.

In 1660, he was appointed by Charles II. Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and the estimation in which he was then held by his contemporaries may be inferred from the address of the Earl of Clarendon, when delivering to him, his commission. "If the king" said the Chancellor, "could have found an honest or an abler man for the employment, he would not have advanced you to it: he prefers you, because he knows no one who so well deserves it."

In May 1761, he was raised to the dignity of Lord Chief Justice of England, but had held this office only five years when he was attacked by the disorder which occasioned his death. He continued to persevere in the discharge of the duties of his office, although the powers of life were evidently failing fast, and he soon felt compelled to withdraw from the labors of his profession and tendered his resignation.—His sovereign refused to accept of it until after many repeated solicitations from Lord Hale, and at last did so coupled with the assurance, that "he should still look on him as his oracle, and would have recourse to his advice when his health would permit, and that he should continue his salary during life."

After a long protracted course of suffering, which was distinguished by the remarkable patience of the sufferer, his disorder terminated the existence of this great and good man, on the 25th December 1676.—The same virtues, to which we can give but a passing notice, which had adorned his life, remained bright in death.

A biographer from whom we have already quoted, remarks, that the pen of Plutarch, is only competent to the delineation of a character so elevated as that of Sir Matthew Hale, and we are disposed at present neither to attempt to lower this eminent character, nor to give undue dignity to these loose sketches by usurping an office for which we fully appreciate our incapacity. Our object is rather to present only some prominent traits of this truly great man, and this shall be attained in the present instance most easily by merely collating some of his most striking peculiarities and habits.

As a man, aside from his character as a Judge, he remains as one of the safest and purest objects of imitation upon which the pen of the biographer can be engaged. His regard for truth might be anticipated, as no man, void of this quality can have any claims to the titles of great or good. This he seems in some measure to have inherited from his Father, of whom it is pleasantly narrated, that he gave over the practice of the law, because he could not understand the reason of giving color in pleading, which, as he thought, was to tell a lie. Although we cannot but admire the principle which prompted this course, we are happy to see it more correctly applied by his distinguished son.

His religious character was as marked as his regard for morality, and though the observance of external forms is not always a correct indication of the possession of true piety, yet in his case, there could be no doubt of the state of his heart, and he took care to manifest it to the world by a strict and proper observance of all those forms which are recommended in the Scriptures and by the regulations of the church. "So regular," says a biographer, "was he in the duties of religion, that for six and thirty years' time, he never once failed going to church on the Lord's day."

It will be naturally supposed that a man, such as Sir Matthew Hale has, in part been described, must have had an active, ardent mind. Nor would this supposition be erroneous, for Lord Hale, by nature, was possessed of a quick and perhaps somewhat hasty disposition, I do not mean by this, that he was irritable or passionate, but he was disposed in his younger days to run to conclusions too inadvertently. He, of course, soon perceived his error, but a good sense exhibited the impropriety of such a tendency so strongly, that he determined early to subdue this disposition, and succeeded in forming a habit never to act in any important matter without full and mature reflection.—So deeply impressed was he of the importance of such a course, that on the head of his staff, was engraved that motto pregnant with meaning, FESTINA CENDE. He often took occasion to remark, (and his words are vividly impressed on our memory) "that he had observed many witty men run into great errors, because they did not give themselves time to think, but the heat of imagination making some notions appear in good colors to them, they, without staying till that cooled, were violently led by the impulses it made on them; whereas calm and slow men who pass for dull, in the common estimation could search after truth and find it out, as with more deliberation, so with more certainty."

The subject of these remarks was, like every great man, a modest one, and he loved to see its exhibition in others. He himself avoided display of all kinds and condemned it in others, particularly the young. He kindly encouraged diligence in study among young persons, and was disposed to assist them in the prosecution of their studies, but he did not hesitate to correct their faults. This trait is so well illustrated and described by one of his biographers that we shall not scruple to use his words again instead of our own.—"Sir M. Hale was a great encourager of all young persons that he saw followed their books diligently, to whom he used to give directions concerning the mode of their study, with humanity and sweetness that wrought much on all that came near him; and in a smiling way he would admonish them if he saw anything amiss in them; particularly if they went too fine in their clothes, he would tell them, it did not become their profession. He was not pleased to see students wear long periwigs, or attorneys go with swords; so that such young men as would not be persuaded to part with those vanities, when they went to him, laid them aside and went as plain as they could to avoid the reproach which they knew they might otherwise expect." And here one word in relation to the manner in which he recommended young students to pursue their studies. "I must in general say thus much," says the Chief Justice, "to the legal student, it is very necessary for him to observe a method in his reading and study.—Let him assure himself, though his memory be never so good, that he will never be able to carry on a distinct serviceable memory of all, or the greatest part of what he reads, to the end of seven years, or much shorter time, without the help of method; nay, what he hath read, seven years since, without the aid of method, or reiterated use, will be as new to him as if he had scarcely read it."

We have contemplated but a few and those hastily, of his peculiarities, as a man, and in the character of a judge, a wide field is open for our highest recommendation and praise. But the history of the law and the records of our highest courts bear upon their face, the story of many of his excellent and noble traits.—Lord Keeper North revered Lord Hale for "his great learning in the history, law and records of the English constitution," and we will dismiss our readers with the remark of another biographer, that on the bench,

— "he reign'd

In a superior sphere of cloudless day,"

A pure intelligence ————

THE LEGENDARY.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

MAGICIANS OF MODERN EGYPT.

Ancient Egypt was famed for its dextrous jugglers or magicians, and the country in the present day still boasts of possessing personages of that mysterious character. The existing magicians of Egypt, who are most commonly of Arab descent, display their art almost always by what is called "the experiment of the magic mirror of ink." This is performed in the following way:—Being in the presence of those who are to witness the exhibition of his powers, the magician prepares for his task by certain forms of invocation, which consist usually in writing down on a slip of paper a string of charmed words. Mr. Lane, author of "The Modern Egyptians," and one of the first oriental scholars of the day, examined a charm of this kind, and found the words to signify in English "Turshoon! Turshoon! Come down! Come down! Be present! Whither are gone the prince and his troops? Where are El-abham the prince and his troops! Be present ye servants of these names!"—And on a second slip of paper were written the words, "And this is the removal. And we have removed from thee thy veil; and thy sight to-day is piercing." These last words are intended to open in a supernatural manner, the eyes of the boy, on whom the workings of the charm mainly depends; for after the preliminary invocations are gone through, the magician announces himself ready to begin his display, and desires a boy to be brought to him. A pure and innocent female would do equally well; and some magicians hold that a black female slave or a pregnant woman would also answer the desired purpose, but a young boy is generally chosen, as the most convenient party; and those before whom the enchanter is exhibiting his art, commonly hire any boy whom they find accidentally on the streets, in order to prevent, if possible, the chance of collusion. When the boy arrives the magician takes the lad's right hand, and draws in the palm of it a magic diagram, in the form of a square. A little ink is then poured into the hollow of the same hand, and this ink forms the "magic mirror," into which the boy looks intently in the course of the exhibition, and sees all the figures and scenes which it is the wish of the enchanter and his visitors or employers to call up. A chafing-dish stands all the while at the magician's hand, and into this he throws at times the before-mentioned charm cut into slips. Perfumes are at the same time burnt in the chafing-dish, and their smoke fills the room, circling around the performers and spectators, and satiating their nostrils with the odors of frankincense and coriander.

When all is thus prepared the enchanter begins to question the boy—"Do you see any thing?" If the charm works well, the boy usually appears frightened, and replies that he sees "a man sweeping the ground." (This answer, we believe, is at least a common one, if not uniformly given.) The magician then desires the boy to call for various flags in succession, and the boy calls for and sees seven flags of various colors. He then calls for "the sultan," who is the party that is to show all the future objects in the mirror. If the sultan comes the charm is wound up. The chief performer, meanwhile, mutters incessantly in the intervals, and keeps throwing the fragments of the written charm into the chafing-dish. After a time, if all has gone to his mind, the magician turns to the spectators, and announces that any person whom they may select, living or dead, will be called up in the magic mirror, beheld, and described by the boy.

Lord Prudhoe, an English nobleman of the Percy family, and Major Felix, a British officer, were among the first persons who astonished the European world with their report of the magic mirror experiment.—Being men of character and sense, their statement created a considerable sensation, when it was reported by the interlocutors in the Noctes Ambrosianæ of Blackwood's Magazine for August, 1831. The experiment, such as we have described it, was performed before the two gentlemen when travelling in Egypt, and they were desired to call up either the absent or the dead. They asked for Shakespeare, Voltaire, and others, and received descriptions of them from the lips of the boy, exactly corresponding with their portraits, as regarded dress, figure, and countenance. They then tested the boy with lesser known living persons. Archdeacon Wrangham was called for, and described by the boy as "a tall, white-haired Frank, with a smiling countenance, and wearing spectacles," whom he saw "walking in a garden." Even his dress, that usually worn by an English clergyman out of his canonicals, was pointedly described. Warming with wonder, Major Felix then called for a description of his own brother, an officer in the army, and then in India. The boy described a red-coated Frank, whom he saw standing by the sea-shore, with a horse and a black servant behind him. Finally, the lad exclaimed, "Oh! this is a strange Frank; he has only one arm!" When Maj. Felix heard these words, which accurately painted the condition of his brother, his feelings of awe and excitement so much overpowered him that he fainted away!

Lord Prudhoe and Major Felix were not the only persons thus impressed by the magicians of Egypt.—The late British consul, Mr. Salt, a man intimately acquainted with the language, people, and country, and less liable to be deceived than a passing traveller, found himself completely puzzled on many occasions by the results of the magic mirror experiment. Having once, for example, private reasons for believing that some one of his servants had stolen various articles of property, Mr. Salt sent for a celebrated Mugh re bee magician, with the view of intimidating the suspected person, and causing him voluntarily to confess if he were really guilty. The magician came, and at once declared that he would cause the exact image of the guilty person to appear to any boy not above the age of puberty. A boy was taken incidentally from a band of several them at work in Mr. Salt's garden, the form were gone through, and the magic mirror properly formed. After seeing various images, the boy finally, described from the mirror the guilty person—stature, dress, and countenance; said that he knew him, and ran down into the garden, where he apprehended one of the laborers, who, when brought before his master, immediately confessed that he was the thief.

Mr. Lane, whom we have already mentioned, and to whom Mr. Salt related the preceding story, was another person who witnessed personally the operations of the Egyptian magicians, and who candidly confesses that there is a mystery in the matter to which he cannot discover any clue. The magician from whom Mr. Lane received the invocation, "Turshoon! Turshoon! Come down! Come down!" requested him, on the occasion of that experiment, to call for any person he chose. Mr. Lane named Lord Nelson. The boy employed during the process was one taken from among several returning home along the street from a manufactory. He appeared to have never heard of Lord Nelson, for it was with difficulty that he pronounced the name after several trials. "The magician," says Mr. Lane, "desired the boy to say, 'My master salutes thee, and desires thee to bring Lord Nelson: bring him before my eyes, that I may see him speedily!' The boy then said so; and almost immediately added, 'A messenger is gone, and has returned, and brought a man, dressed in a black suit of European clothes; the man has lost his left arm.' He then paused for a moment or two; and, looking more intently and closely into the ink, said, 'No, he has not lost his left arm, but it is placed to his breast.' This correction made his description appear more striking than it had been without it; since Lord Nelson generally had his empty sleeve attached to the breast of his coat. But it was the right arm that he had lost. Without saying that I suspected the boy had made a mistake, I asked the magician whether the objects appeared in the ink as if actually before the eye, or as if in a glass, which makes the right appear left. He answered, that they appeared as in a mirror. This made the boy's description faultless." As the Egyptians call dark blue es wed, or black, the naval dress of Nelson was accurately described. Mr. Lane subsequently called for a friend, a native of Egypt resident in England, and who had been long confined to his bed by illness. The boy described a man "with a pale face, mustachos, but no beard," and who appeared in the mirror "on a kind of bier, wrapped in a sheet." This suited the figure of the individual, and also his supposed condition at the time. Mr. Lane afterwards heard of the recovery of his friend, but did not exactly learn whether at the period in question he had recovered his health, or remained ill. The succeeding answers of the boy to Mr. Lane's questions on this occasion were imperfect. On another occasion—when Mr. Lane was not present, but heard the account from unquestionable authority—the same magician's performances were ridiculed by an Englishman present, who said that nothing would satisfy him but a correct description of his own father, of whom, he was sure, no one of the company had any knowledge. The sceptic was a little staggered when the boy described a man in a Frank dress, "with his hand placed to his head, wearing spectacles, and with one foot on the ground, and the other raised behind him, as if he were stepping down from a seat. The description was exactly true in every respect; the peculiar position of the hand was caused by an almost constant headache; and that of the foot or leg by a stiff knee caused by a fall from a horse in hunting. I am assured (continues Mr. Lane) that on this occasion the boy described accurately each person and thing that was called for; and I might add several other cases, in which the same magician has excited astonishment in the sober minds of Englishmen, of my acquaintance."

We have now given a fair and reasonable specimen of the marvels and successes of modern Egyptian magic. The other side of the picture must now be glanced at, and sorry are we to say that thereby much of the gloss and glitter of enchantment disappears, though it cannot be said that all doubt or mystery is fairly removed. By the precautions taken, all possibility of confederacy or collusion between the magician and the boy has been prevented on most of the occasions where Englishmen have witnessed these experiments. Nor, indeed, could a perfect understanding between the man and the boy be of much service for the most part; for the man must be equally in the dark with his assistant respecting the obscure or private individuals called for. Moreover, the magician could not communicate in an underhand way with the boy, in presence of such orientalists as Lane and Salt, even if he had any promptings to give. We must therefore give up the idea, that the boy in these cases answers from the magician's prompting, or is told what he is to see. "Does the boy then really see objects in the ink?" comes to be the question. The belief of most observers is, that the boy's imagination is either so wrought upon as to make him conceive he sees figures, or that, by some art of the magician, the semblance of objects is actually presented in the ink. But, then, how does the boy come to see the exact objects that are wanted? If he did always do this, Egyptian magic would indeed be a thing passing strange. But such is not the case. If we had goodly evidence on the one side, we shall produce equally unexceptionable testimony on the other, which will, we fear, remove much of the marvel from the modern enchantment of Egypt.

Lord Lindsay, son of the Earl of Balcarras, and the author of a recently lively book on Egypt, describes the doings which he witnessed with the magic mirror of ink. The magician was a famous and long-trying one, and went through all the preliminary forms with becoming gravity. The boy, who was a stranger to the experimenter, at first saw a "man sweeping," then "seven flags" in succession, and then "the sultan," after which the magician declared the charm complete, and bade them call for whom they chose. "The first person whom we summoned," says his lordship, "was the Rev. —. He was described, upon the whole, accurately; but this was the only successful summons. The spirits either would not come, or appeared by proxy, to the sad discomposure of our Arab Glendower. I tried him with Daniel Lambert, who, I was informed, was a thin man; and with Miss Biffin, who made her appearance with arms and legs. He has been equally unsuccessful with a party of Americans; this is odd enough when one considers how strongly Mr. Salt, Lord Prudhoe, and Major Felix, were impressed with the belief of his supernatural powers." Lord Lindsay concludes by remarking, that "one thing is unquestionable—the children do see a crowd of objects, following each other, and, at the commencement of the incantation, always the same objects—as vivid and distinct as if they looked out of the window at noonday. How is this to be accounted for? Collusion is out of the question."

The next witness whose testimony we shall present on this subject, is Col. Peyronnet Thompson, a man remarkable for shrewdness. As the colonel tells in a little article in Tait's Magazine on Egyptian magic, he chanced to reside for a time in Cairo, in 1822, with his family, and hearing much of the fame of a certain Mughre bee magician, sent for him. I remember (says Colonel Thompson) a well-dressed, personable man, of what after the fashion of the nomenclature in the Chamber of Deputies might be called the young middle-age. He agreed to show us a specimen of his art, and fixed upon our little boy of seven years old to be his instrument. He dispatched a servant to the bazaar, to procure frankincense and other things which he directed; and on their being produced, we all retired into a room, and closed the doors and windows. An earthen pot was placed in the middle of the floor, containing fire, and the magician sat down by it. He placed the little boy before him, and poured ink into the hollow of the boy's hand, and bade him look into it steadily. I think the mother rather quailed on seeing her child in such propinquity with 'the enemy,' but recovered herself on being exhorted to defy the evil one and all his works. The boy was innocent of fear; and on the whole I imagine there never was a better subject to cope with a sorcerer. When the little fellow asked the cause of the immediate preparations, we told him the man was going to show some feats of legerdemain, such as he used to see in India. The magician began by throwing grains of incense on the fire, bowing with a see-saw motion, and repeating, 'Hecyya Hajji Capitan,' or 'Hurrah Pilgrim Captain!' being, as I understood it at the time, an invocation by his style and title, of the spirit he wished to see. When nothing came, he increased his zeal, and seemed determined that if the 'Captain' was sleeping or on a journey, he should not be missed for want of calling. One slight variation, in his questions to the boy, I observed. Instead of saying to the boy, 'What do you see?' as had been reported, he said, 'Do you see a little man?' which if the boy had been accessible to fear or phantasy, was manifestly telling him what he was to look for. The boy, however, resolutely declared he saw nothing, and the sorcerer continued his calls upon the spirit. When in this manner curiosity had been roused to something like expectation, the boy suddenly exclaimed, 'I see something!' All were tremblingly on the alert; when he quashed it all by adding, 'I see my nose!' By the dim light of the fire he had succeeded in getting a glimpse of his own countenance reflected in the ink. The magician redoubled his exertions by way of carrying the thing off, but there was much less gravity in the audience afterwards. Finding, at length, that he could make nothing of the young Thompson, who had probably a due share of the paternal hatred to humbug, the disappointed sorcerer declared that he could not make the spirit come because the boy was a christian. An Arab boy was then sent for, and, sure enough, at the first propounding of the leading question, "Do you see a little man?" the boy said, "Yes." The magician then called for flags in due order, and, as he called, the boy beheld. The colonel does not think there was collusion here, and is at a loss to say whether the boy was operated on by a superstitious dread of refusing, or by the natural inclination of one rogue to help another. However, by the colonel's account, not one sight was seen by the boy, which the magician's words did not direct him to behold. And so ended Colonel Thompson's interview with the Mughre bee magician.

These statements of Lord Lindsay and Colonel Thompson are calculated greatly to lower our estimation of Egyptian magic. In fact, in numerous instances the boys can see nothing; in more instances, when they do profess to see something, their answers to questions have not a shadow of correctness; in some instances their answers are imperfect—here right and there wrong; and in a few instances they give occasional perfect answers. Probably, a fair average, on the whole, might be—once correct (or something like correct) for ninety-nine times wrong. If there be any truth in this conclusion, there seems no unfairness in attributing these rare instances of success to mere accident. If figures be undeniably visible in the inky mirror, as some observers seem to think, and as the uniform vision of the "sweeping" and the "flags" would seem to confirm, why did Col. Thompson's boy why do all boys, not see them at once? Mr. Lane admits that the experiment often entirely fails on this fundamental point. Now, it is hard to see and how it should ever thus fail, if the art of the magician can place the semblance of figures there. May not the whole be explained on the supposition that the boys themselves have a partial knowledge of the forms of the art, and that, when placed in such situations as those described, a dread of the sorcerer's power, and perhaps excited imagination, may lead them to bend to its influence, and answer his leading questions as he seems to wish? Doubtless, the subject of magic, its rites and incantations, will be talked of in all families, and the dread of sorceries instilled into ears of children from their cradle. Some, indeed, may not hear of such things; and may not these be the boys who can see nothing in the mirror of ink?

We have now said enough on this subject, and must leave the reader to form any further conclusions for himself. But it may be first observed, that, though a thing of awe and fear, magic of the kind alluded to is held to be a science founded on the agency of Allah and of his angels. The pasha's good sense, however, overcomes his reverential awe for what may be divine in the matter, and he has not scrupled, once or twice, to give notorious enchanters an opportunity of trying whether their art can strengthen their necks against the bowstring, or replace a head on their shoulders when once taken off by a sabre-stroke.

MISCELLANY.

A MASONIC EMBLEM.—A masonic emblem has been found in a stone wall at Ghuznee. It is merely the five points, with an inscription in Persian round it.—The translation of which inscription is "God grant me what I want." During our campaign through Afghanistan, a strong resemblance to the customs, dress, and manners of the ancient Jews, was very prevalent among the Afghans. Indeed, at Candahar they acknowledge their direct descent, and called themselves "the children of the Jews." No doubt many more masonic emblems might be traced, and if due examination were made, we should probably elicit these scintillations, embers of the masonic light itself, which might be enkindled into pristine power and beauty.—Freemason's Quarterly.

Head of the Laocoon.—A Lyons journal publishes the following letter from M. Valmore, an artist at Brussels: "In the gallery of the Duke d'Arenberg there are many things which are not known to any but the initiated. Among them is the original head of the Laocoon. This fine group, when first discovered in Italy, was without the head of the father, and an arm of one of the sons. The head was supplied by a celebrated artist, who copied it from an antique bas-relief. Some time afterwards, the original was found by some Venetian connoisseurs, and was ultimately sold to the grandfather of the Prince for about 160,000*fr.*, and brought to Brussels. When Napoleon, during the Consulate, had the group transported into France, he knew that the real head was in possession of the Duke, and offered him its weight in gold for it. This was refused, and as it was known that Napoleon was not scrupulous in gratifying his desires, the Duke d'Arenberg sent this chef d'œuvre to Dresden, where it remained concealed for ten years, but was brought back again into Brussels when Belgium became tranquil.—It expresses in the highest and most admirable degree moral grief mingled with physical pain. The compression of the teeth and the contraction of the under jaw are almost too horrifying to be long contemplated, and yet in this intense expression of suffering there is not the slightest grimace. The pupils of the eyes are so exquisitely executed, that they actually seem to flash from the marble. A cast from the head now on the statue is placed by the side of the original, and the vast difference between the two is at once evident."—Galvani's Messenger.

A new Era in Engraving—Electrotype.—This ingenious application of science to the practical purposes of art, promises to effect a great revolution in the trade of print-selling. Formerly a worn-out copperplate could only be replaced by a new engraving, but by this method of producing plates by galvanism, a copperplate may be perpetuated, and an engraving once made, an infinite number of other plates may likewise be formed by a mere mechanical process, and without any new expenditure of skill. It is, in fact the introduction of stereotyping into the art of engraving. Large impressions have been recently taken in London, both from the original and new formed plate, and it has been impossible to detect any difference between them. The following is the means by which this new and extraordinary art is effected:—

The original engraving is immersed in a solution of sulphate of copper, and negatively galvanized, while a plain sheet of copper positively galvanized is placed in the same trough. By the galvanic action the sheet is decomposed into a number of imperceptible atoms, which are precipitated on the engraving, forming a new sheet on which the design is taken in relief. The engraving is then removed, not having been in the least injured by the process, the plate with the design in relief is put in its place, and another sheet of copper is in the same manner decomposed and precipitated, forming a plate with an intaglio design exactly corresponding to the first. From this the impressions are taken, the plate in relief forming a matrix on which more plates may be made to any number.

There is also a simpler method employed, in which the sheet of copper to be decomposed is not used at all, but the same results are produced by the mere precipitation of the copper contained in the sulphate, the galvanic circle having been completed as before. The mere scraping away of the particles of copper which adhere to the edges of the two plates causes them to fall asunder.—N. Y. Standard.

A short time since, a gentleman who was requested to value the books of a deceased clergyman, found to his surprise, that many of the most valuable works were imperfect, having leaves torn out. Upon asking a servant who had lived with the divine for some years, if he knew any thing of the circumstance; he replied, after some hesitation, "Why to be sure, sir, I did now and then tear a leaf out, but I never went twice to the same book, so that it couldn't be of much consequence!"

HAMLET QUOTED.

A musician, celebrated for his devotion to the rosy god, having sacrificed too freely, found himself at a loss in the orchestra of one of the theatres, on turning his instrument, to produce harmony. The leader, of the band, rather displeased, demanded what was the matter with his violin. The votary of Bacchus, after a short pause, answered, "Why my fiddle is acting Hamlet; it says, 'though you can fret me, you cannot play upon me.'"

SLOVENLY PENMANSHIP

An Italian gentleman wrote to his correspondent, wishing him to send him one or two monkeys; but, instead of writing the words one or two, he made use of the Arabic numerals, divided by the Italian o (or), so that the order read thus—102 monkeys. His astonishment and vexation may be imagined, when at the return of his vessels he beheld above twenty men marching up to his mansion, escorting what seemed to be an almost innumerable number of the ridiculous animals he had written for a specimen of, and read the following words, addressed to him by his agent:—"I duly received your order for 102 monkeys, which I have been able only partially to execute, although I have given and offered very high prices—but your order has exhausted all that could be immediately procured, even those which could be procured from private individuals. I have sent, however, to Gibraltar and the coast of Africa, and hope to send you the remaining 50 by the Santamaria."

PAPER.—The most ancient specimen of paper, such as we now use, made of linen rags, is a charter, seven inches long, and three inches broad, preserved in the Emperor's library at Vienna, which was written in the year 1243, as the date is calculated by Mr. Schwandner, an Austrian nobleman, and principal keeper of the imperial library, who has written an essay on this curious relic, which is half a century older than any other specimen that has been discovered.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR, ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

GEN. HARRISON'S INAUGURAL.—This long looked for document has at length been spread before the American people, and did we not think, it was "carrying coals to Newcastle," we should give it to our readers, at least in a condensed form. The inaugural is a good one, much better, as a literary production, than we supposed the General could write, and as to its subject matter, although we voted against the "old hero," we must say in frankness and sincerity, that if his professions are to be taken as an earnest of his acts, the great mass of the people will have no cause for complaint. We do most earnestly hope that his administration will be allowed to have a fair trial, and as the country rises or sinks, so let it be judged. For our own part we are heartily tired and sick of this bitter party strife, which after all, is more of a scramble for office, among the few, than from any particular devotion to the public good. The country needs rest, and we trust that General Harrison will guide the helm of State with a direct reference to the good of country, and discard the petty politician from his breast. The General has every incentive to prompt him to this course. He has attained the highest elevation which it is possible for man to arrive at, by a majority which must satisfy any pride he may have; and if he regards his solemn pledge to never be a candidate a second time, and governs himself by the rules of action that he has laid down for himself there will be no necessity for him to bend from "his high resolve" to ensure a "succession." The country is at present in a critical situation both as regards our monetary affairs, and our foreign relations. And we believe that eight tenths of the American people at present, are willing to sacrifice party feeling to a reasonable prospect of a return to public confidence. If Gen. Harrison's administration will give us "better times," we shall heartily say name to it.

THE HEILDERBERG TROUBLES—AGAIN.—We understand that Sheriff Adams, in the discharge of his official duties, a few days since, visited the "debatable ground," and attempted to make sale of some property by virtue of sundry executions; that a considerable number of the "patriots" assembled, and manifested a pugnacious intention, by committing personal violence on the bidders, and threatening the sheriff himself with serious injury; so much so, that, that functionary was compelled to evacuate without consummating the object of his tour.

We fear that these misguided people are engendering for themselves the most serious trouble, as they must eventually succumb to the potency of the Laws. How are we to account for the apathy manifested by our daily papers, in this matter. Can political considerations have any weight?

EASTERN RAIL ROAD.—From the buisny note of preparation manifested by those engaged in the construction of this important work, and from the progress already made, no doubt exists but that it will be completed in the course of next year, by which time the line from Boston to Lake Erie, will be uninterrupted. The Albany Bridge will then be indispensable.

M'LEOD.—The Journal of Commerce, contains a long article, which goes to show, according to the construction which the editors give to the Constitution, that the General Government can interfere in the sentence of our State courts. Admit for a moment, that the U. S. can interfere, what benefit can M'Leod realise from it? Will the National Government surrender a convicted murderer, who is justly and righteously condemned, for fear of offending the British government? If there is so much reluctance to assume the responsibility of bringing this individual to justice, let us pack a jury and acquit him, guilty or not. It is better to do this, rascally as it is, than to show Johnny Bull the white feather. In soberness, we hope M'Leod, may prove himself innocent, both as regards his own peril, and the grave consequences, attached to his case. But if it shall be shown clearly that his hands have been imbrued in the blood of one of our citizens, let him die the death of a dog, and treason to him who will try to prevent it.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is expected that Correspondents will not subject us to postage, on their communications. All matters relating to the paper can be sent through the post master, who is so authorised by law; and as for other communications, the correspondent is as much interested as ourselves.—Our necessary postage bears upon us, full heavy enough, without adding to it.

ROBBERY MOST FOUL.—It is said, that the office seekers on their way to Washington are in the habit of picking each other's pockets of their letters of recommendation, petitions, &c. &c. Next to rifling the pockets of an editor this is the most preposterously audacious crime, on the calendar of absurdities.

AMUSEMENTS, &c.—The city of Albany can no longer rest under the imputation of being a "dull place," as the the present season has been prolific in recitations of all descriptions, both entertaining and instructive. Scarce an evening has elapsed without affording an opportunity for the attendance of a Lecture, Concert &c. &c. This augurs well, and is an evidence of the elevated tone of the age in which we live.

ORATORIO OF DAVID.—The different amateurs and professors of this city, are engaged in the rehearsal of this wonderful production, which is to be performed during the present month. Those who were so fortunate as to be present at the performance of Hayden's Creation, last spring, can bear ample witness of their competency to the undertaking, as the same individuals have taken David in hand.

ACCIDENT.—On Thursday evening last while young Howes' was riding his courser in the ring of the Amphitheatre, in attempting to jump through the hoop, his foot accidentally caught, which threw his body with much force on the curb of the ring; and for a few moments it was doubtful whether he was not killed. He was taken away senseless; but we are happy to learn, that although severely bruised, no serious consequences will result from the accident.

AN ESCAPE.—The Rochester Democrat says, that the son of Wm. J. Battle, aged about 12 years, accidentally fell over a precipice in the vicinity of the falls, of about seventy feet, and escaped with a broken hip. The lad is now doing well.

SUGAR.—The consumption of Sugar in the United States is estimated at 200,000 hogshead per annum or one hundred and eighty millions of pounds.

The navigation is said to be open as far as Poughkeepsie.

REV. E. N. KIRK.—This distinguished divine, is preaching in the city of New York, in the French language.

THE YOUTH'S MENTAL CASKET, and Literary Star, commences its third volume, in an enlarged form. It is conducted by Messrs. Pratt & Blakesly; and is certainly one of the best little works in the country.—The Casket is made up of original matter, and afforded for $1, per annum in advance. It is printed in Jersey city.

An attempt was made by a number of the prisoners in the Baltimore jail, to escape on Saturday last, during which one of them named Wm. M'Coy was shot by the police.

Intelligence.

DESTRUCTION OF A STEAM BOAT BY FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The steam-boat Creole, Capt. Dalmau, one of the Red River packets, on her passage from Natchitoches to New Orleans with a cargo of upwards of 1000 bales of cotton, boxes of specie, bundles of bank notes, merchandize, &c., came out of Red River very early on the morning of the 22d ult. When about twelve miles below, she was discovered to be on fire, and a general alarm was given. The passengers, more than sixty in number, and consisting of men, women, and children, were all in their berths at the time. The fire commenced at the after part of the boat, the tiller ropes were immediately severed, and the confusion, consternation and panic which ensued, defies description. Amid the raging of the flames, the engine continued, working, and drove the boat directly against the shore. Here four persons leaped off and escaped. Rebounding, as it appeared she altered her course, and running near a mile and a half, brought up against the bank on the opposite side of the river. In the meantime, and while the Creole was crossing the river, many of the passengers, and some of the crew, threw over bales of cotton, on which they embarked. Some missing their aim in jumping or their balance afterwards, were precipitated into the stream and drowned. Many remained on board till she reached the opposite shore, when they leaped off. A few were fortunate enough to reach the land, but the greater part plunged into the water, and it is believed of these nearly all were rescued. The present estimate is that about twelve human beings lost their lives in the catastrophe. Of the 20 or 30 unaccounted for it is hoped the most of them floated off on the cotton, and may have been picked up by steam boats and other craft. There was scarcely an article saved. The passengers, male and female, with scarcely an exception, escaped with barely what they slept in. The proverbial hospitality and kindness of the inhabitants of the neighborhood relieved their pressing necessities and enabled them to reach the city.

Among those who are missing is Mr. Colquhoun, cashier of the Branch of the City Bank at Natchitoches, a child of Mrs. Cuney's, another of Mrs. Norman's, and a French cigar maker of Natchitoches, whose name we have not been able to learn. One of the crew, a Spaniard, together with some eight or ten of the passengers, are also supposed to have been drowned or burnt, but in the confusion it is impossible to get their names, as the register and all the clerk's papers are lost. A. M. Davenport of Rodney, Miss., broke his leg while jumping ashore. All the passengers who were saved lost trunks, clothing, and every thing they had, so sudden was the conflagration.—They all speak in the warmest terms of the exertions of Capt. Dalmau to save the lives and prevent unnecessary confusion on board.

Since writing the above we have learned that there was $2000 in specie on board the Creole, belonging to the Exchange Bank.—N. O. Bulletin.

A wealthy man.—A gentleman by the name of William Hogg, lately died in Brownsville, Penn. leaving an estate valued at $1,000,000. Fifty years ago he crossed the Allegheny mountains with a pack on his back, and established himself at Redstone, now called Brownsville. Here he opened a small store, conveying his goods from the city of Philadelphia by means of pack horses. He thus continued to increase his stock from time to time, until he became one of the most opulent merchants in the western part of the state.

A large Wolf was killed in the town of Villanova, about 12 miles from this place, one day last week, which has long been the terror to the sheep, and a periled foe of the suffering farmers in a large section of the country. Its depredations had become so great of late, that in addition to county and state bounties, individuals had bid up a large reward. For two or three weeks past, hundreds of individuals had scoured the woods and swamps almost daily, till at length the cautious vixen (for it was a she wolf) came within reach of the moulten messenger, and she fell a victim to her uncontrollable love of sheep.—Callarauguse Freeman.

The Rochester Mail Robbery.—Henry C. Gilbert, the individual charged with abstracting from the mail at Gaines, a one hundred dollar package of bank notes mailed at New York, and addressed to the post master at Oak Orchard, has been fully examined and held to bail in the sum of $2000.

McLeod.—We are this morning informed that Mr. McLeod is to be removed to Albany for trial—it being satisfactorily ascertained that an impartial jury cannot be found at the west. It is further stated that the first trial will be on the civil suit, brought by the owners of the Caroline.—Commercial Adv.

A Duellist Shot.—A duel was fought at New Orleans, on Sunday the 27th ult., between a Frenchman named Dauphin, and a Creole named Moru. They fought with double barrelled guns at the distance of 30 paces. Dauphin was killed at the first fire, and Moru's pantaloons were cut in the folds of the waistbands, but he received no bodily injury. Dauphin was the most celebrated duellist and swordsman in the city, and has fought it is said at least a hundred duels, generally with the sword. The quarrel originated at a gambling table, the night previous.

INQUEST.—Doct. F. L. Harris, the coroner, was called yesterday morning to view the body of Urial Gleason, which was found lying on the ice, about a mile from the Light House, on the Lake. From the evidence it appeared that the deceased in going from this city to Smoke's Creek, (his place of residence about four miles west of Buffalo, upon the Turnpike,) got the hinder legs of his horse into a crevice of the ice, and in endeavoring to extricate him became exhausted and perished. The animal also perished.—Verdict in accordance with the above facts.—Buffalo Journal.

From Florida.—An official report from General Armistead to the Secretary of War, is published in the Globe. It is dated Tampa, Feb. 14th, 1841. He says that there are 270 Indians at that place, a large portion of whom he intends to send to New Orleans—that he has promised $5000 to the chiefs, and $30 and a rifle to the common men who have come in, and concludes that the remaining hostiles will sue for peace.

MYRON HOLLEY is dead! This eminent citizen, accomplished scholar, and noble man, expired yesterday morning, at his residence on Johnson-st., in this city, at the age of sixty two, carrying with him to the grave the love and regrets of all who knew him. The public services of Mr. HOLLEY are engraved upon the State in lines as enduring as Lake Erie and the Hudson, while his private virtues and benevolence will live in the hearts of his friends and acquaintances, until they cease to beat.—Rochester Dem.

Fatal Casualties.—A laborer on the canal at this place was killed last week by the fall of a box of stones upon him—the chain by which it was being hoisted out of the bottom of the canal having given way.

On Monday last a Mr. Ferguson, who was assisting in making some repairs in the Bissell Mill, made a mistep and fell head foremost several feet, by which his skull was horribly fractured. He was taken up lifeless. "In the midst of life we are in death."—Lockport Courier.

A man by the name of Reynolds got into a fight at a place called Napoleon, Henry county (Ohio,) with some Irishmen on the Canal, and drew a dirk which was taken away from him, upon which he went home and got his gun, returned, and shot a man through the heart. He was immediately secured.

Col. Harney.—The Report that Col Harney, of the 2d Dragoons, had been arrested by Gen. Armistead, is entirely without foundation. On the contrary, Col. Harney's conduct in the everglades was approved by the General and the Secretary of War, and that approbation has been published in orders to the army in Florida.—N. Y. Standard.

New Catholic Bishops.—The Catholic Herald announces the receipt in this country of Papal Bulls appointing the Rev. Richard Whelan, Bishop of Richmond, Va., and the Rev. Dr. J. Change, President of St. Mary's College, Baltimore, first Bishop of the newly created See of Natchez, Mississippi.

A Runaway Rail Road Train.—During the gale on Saturday afternoon, a tender and a passenger car which were standing on the track of the Long Island rail road, at Hicksville, were suddenly set in motion by the force of the wind, and moved off in double quick time toward Jamaica. Their progress was not arrested till they reached the woods on the New York side of the village above named. Some estimate may be formed of the force of the wind, by the fact that the distance travelled over by the cars was fifteen miles, and that the time in which it was accomplished was thirty minutes.—An average of a mile in two minutes.

English War Steamers.—Bell's Weekly Messenger of the 30th of January, says that five new war steamers of the largest class have been finished in her Majesty's dock yards, and are to be immediately fitted for active service. They are to be furnished with two 96 pound guns on the upper decks, working on swivels, besides other guns of large calibre on the lower decks.

The Mobile Register of the 25th says that the steamer Shylock was snagged and sunk in the Tombigby River, a short distance above Pickensville. She was on her downward passage, and had on board 751 bales of cotton, consigned to merchants of Mobile. The cotton was got off, the boat a total wreck.

The Tornator, (U. C.) Patriot states that upwards of 15,000 soldiers, horse, foot and artillery, the very élite of the British Army, are now stationed in United Canadas.

A contractor on the public works in Illinois, has patented a new drill for excavating rocks. A fair days work, with one of these drills and a good horse, is forty nine feet in the solid rock.

POETRY.

BYRON'S PRAYER.

BY JOHN MALCOM.

My soul is sick of this long day,
I'm weary of its lingering light—
And loathing life, I turn away
To weep and wish for night.
I long to lay me down
In slumber on my mother's breast—
And would exchange an empire's crown
For everlasting rest.

Though but in manhood's morn I stand—
I've lived the laurel wreath to gain—
My songs are heard in every land,
And beauty breathes the strain.
Her smiles and sweeter tears are mine,
And yet of love—youth—fame possess—
Oh! gladly would my heart resign
All—all for the endless rest.

The dreams for which men wish to live,
Or dare to die—the gilded cloud
Of glory o'er the tomb I'd give
For silence and a shroud.
I ask no paradise on high—
With being's strife on earth oppress—
The only heaven for which I sigh
Is rest—eternal rest!

My natal day with tears I keep,
Which I rejoiced in when a child,
And each return the birth I weep
O'er which my mother smiled.
Bid heaven take back the breath it gave,
That I, a cold and silent guest,
Within my father's house, the grave,
May find a long—long rest.

Without my own consent I came,
But with my wildest wish I go—
For I would fairly be the same
I was—ere born to woe.
My cold hush'd heart, with no pale gleams
Of consciousness to wake and waste
I would have slept without its dreams,
And rest—eternal rest!

BECAUSE I'M TWENTY-FIVE.

'Tis wondrous strange how great the change
Since I was in my teens,
Then I had beaux and billet-deaux,
And joined the gayest scenes.
But lovers now have ceased to vow;
No way they now contrive
To poison, hang or drown themselves—
Because I'm twenty five.

Once, if the night was e'er so bright,
I ne'er abroad could roam,
Without—"The bliss, the honour, Miss,
Of seeing you safe home."
But now I go, through rain and snow—
Pursued and scarce alive—
Through all the dark without a spark—
Because I'm twenty-five.

They used to call, and ask me all
About my health so frail:
And thought a ride would help my side,
And turn my cheek less pale.
But now, alas! if I am ill,
None care that I revive;
And my pale cheek in vain may speak—
Because I'm twenty-five.

Now, if a ride improves my side,
I'm forced to take the stage,
For that is deemed quite proper for
A person of my age:—
And then no hand is offered me,
To help me out alive—
They think 'twont hurt me now to fall,—
Because I'm twenty-five.

O dear—'tis queer, that every year
I'm slighted more and more;

For not a beau pretends to show
His head within our door;
Nor ride, nor card, nor soft address,
My spirits now revive:—
And one might near as well be dead,
As say—I'm twenty-five.

THE PILGRIM'S ROCK.

BY "AMELIA."

When the first lonely May-flower threw
Her canvass to the breeze,
To bear afar her pilgrim crew,
Beyond the dark blue seas,
Proud Freedom to our land had flown,
And chose it for the brave;
They formed the nation's corner stone,
And set it by the wave,
That when the Pilgrims anchored there,
Their stepping-stone might be
That consecrated rock of prayer,
The bulwark of the free.

And there they stood; each pilgrim brow
Was wan with grief and care,
And bent each manly form—but oh!
A tender sigh was there—
Fond woman with her sweet sad face,
All trembling pale and chill,
But oh! there was in that lone place
A sight more touching still—
The cheek of childhood pale with fear,
And hushed its voice of glee;
And they are gone; but we are here,
A bulwark of the free.

Our pilgrim sires are gone, yet still
A nation in its pride
Hath poured o'er every vale and hill,
In a bright unbroken tide;
And still their sons shall flood the land,
While that old rock appears,
Like a pilgrim spirit burn to stand
The mighty wreck of years;
And oh! while float the wind and wave,
That hallowed rock shall be
The threshold of the good and brave,
The bulwark of the free.

WHY DON'T HE COME?

Why don't he come? He promised me
He surely would be here;
And pa and ma are out to tea,
For once the coast is clear.

I wonder what he wants to say?
When last his leave he took,
He asked me twice at home to stay,
I wonder how I look?

Oh! why I'm almost out of breath!
Suppose he asks? What then?
I'll certainly be scared to death.
I'm so afraid of men!

I think I'll have him though, at last,
But first I'll answer no!
For many a girl by hurrying fast,
Outstrips her tardy beau!

Oh! here he comes—his steps I hear—
And now he'll soon begin;
I would not for the world appear
In haste to let him in.

"A winter day! A winter day!
What shall I find to chase away
The dense damp air of a winter day?"

Give me a wife whose sunny eye
Shall drive the cloud from yonder sky—
Whose honied words and books will say:
That love will bloom in a wintry day:

Friendship may come, with plausible air,
To cheer the moment free from care;
But worldly friends soon shrink away
From the frost and storm of a winter day.

Wine hath a quick, but passing power,
To lay the fend of a gloomy hour;
But it lacks the vigor to drive away
The lengthened gloom of a winter day.

A wife! a wife whose sunny eye
Shall drive the gloom from a clouded sky!
Her will I seek to chase away
The dense, damp air of a winter day.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY IN THE UNITED STATES.—Brethren.—We have been witnesses of the effects of one of the most extraordinary delusions in regard to our Institution, which in any land or age have tried its strength or durability.

That jealousies and fear of an Institution every where conducted on liberal principles, should have excited a spirit of opposition in arbitrary or tyrannical governments have never surprised us; but when our Order was attacked in our own land, and the people our own neighbors and friends, were excited by false, malicious, and absurd accusations against it; when we saw families disturbed, societies convulsed, and individuals of eminent virtue and station denounced and persecuted, we deplored the folly and fanaticism of our enemies, and sought by patience, and quiet and orderly deportment to assuage the bitterness of our revilers, and to turn the hearts of our misguided accusers. We knew that our Institution was devised in wisdom for the improvement of society in every land, and could not long be left as a mark for the scorn and derision of demagogues and fanatics, nor remain an object of terror to the well disposed.

The delusion has passed away—there has been a redeeming spirit in the midst of the storm—a spirit of inquiry after truth, which has wrought out for us a vindication, and fixed it in the popular mind. Once more our Order has free course, and has resumed its place as the medium of union, friendship, and kind offices amongst "good men" of every rank, station, party, sect, and profession in the land. What we could not do when compelled to defend ourselves against the ingenious assaults of an organized and reckless faction, we can do now: we can take high ground; we can place our Institution in its true position; we can openly declare its principles to attentive hearers, and verify our declarations by the testimony of the greatest, the purest, the best beloved and venerated men, whose names adorn the brightest pages of our country's history. We have it in our power to show, that so far is Freemasonry from having a tendency to corrupt the morals, weaken the faith, impede the justice, contract the soul, or relax the patriotism of its votaries, our country stands in debt for a large portion of its welfare, honor, and security to the members of our Fraternity.

This high position it is my intention to maintain by a work which I propose to publish, if sustained by the approbation and aid of the fraternity to the necessary extent.

To test this, I offer the following plan for the publication of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States.

To place the work within the reach of every member of the Fraternity, it will be published in numbers, in the imperial Octavo form, at periods of one or two months, at 50 cents a number, payable on delivery, and will extend as is supposed, to about fifty numbers, forming five large volumes. Each number will contain three portraits engraved on steel, and occasionally a few illustrations, with biographies written expressly with reference to the Masonic character and acts of each subject, (so far as materials can be obtained,) as well as to his private life. For the fidelity, accuracy and beauty of the work, the responsibility will rest alone on the editor and proprietor.

JAMES HERRING, Grand Secretary of the

Extract from the minutes of the Grand Lodge, of the State of New York, Dec 1st, A. L. 5840.

"The Grand Secretary then asked permission to present the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing, under the title of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and History of the Masonic Institution in the United States. The proposed Address to the Fraternity and the prospectus were then read; whereupon the following Resolution was unanimously adopted."

"Resolved.—That this Grand Lodge highly approve of the proposed work of the Rt. W. G. Secretary, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons,' and recommend it to the patronage of the Fraternity."

In Grand Chapter, of the State of New York, Feb. 3d. 5841.

"Resolved.—That the Grand Chapter of the State of N. York, do approve of the work proposed by our M. E. Companion James Herring, entitled the 'Portrait Gallery of Eminent American Freemasons,' and while they commend it to the support of the Fraternity, to give to the author free access to the Records and Archives of this Grand Chapter, for such information on our Masonic History as may be necessary for his work."

ADDRESS.

Delivered in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Hardinsburgh Ky., before Breckenridge Lodge, No. 67 on the 26th day of December, 1840. Celebrated as the Anniversary of St. John the Evangelist.

BY JAMES G. HASWELL.

The peculiar tenets, forms, and ceremonies of our institution, have never been committed to writing, but have been handed down from generation to generation. Hence it has, been said, that our origin is derived from all those sects to which we bear any resemblance.—Some of these are the Eleusynian Mysteries, Essenes, and Druids, together with the different sects, which have existed, under the direction of the Philosophers of ancient times. We are willing to admit, that some of these sects had a striking resemblance to the Fraternity in many of its parts, so as to convince us that Masonry had its origin in high antiquity. The Eleusynian Mysteries were introduced at Athens, by Eumolpus; three hundred and fifty two years before the dedication of Solomon's Temple: this festival, was the most celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece; and was held sacred to Ceres and Proserpine. These mysteries, or this sect, together with the Essenes, a society which existed amongst the Jews, and the Druids of ancient Gaul and Britain, are said, (by some writers,) to bear a resemblance to the Fraternity.—Though Masonry, in the varying shapes in which it has appeared in the world, has suffered; (like the doctrines taught by Moses and the Prophets,) by an intermixture with the refined speculations of later times. And this has only been removed by the enlightening influences, and general reception of a further revelation. For however pure Masonry may have been, in every age and nation; and however firm the establishment of its principles, yet like other human institutions, it has been subject to numerous variations in its forms, and ceremonies. The different aspects under which it has appeared, and the principles by which it has been regulated, depended in some degree on the progress of civilization; and upon the nature of the government by which it was protected. In examining the history of the past, we find, that the Philosophers of ancient times, "were ever ready to seize upon every nation which could aid them in their speculations; they borrowed from the Prophets, but were unwilling to acknowledge the obligation; adopting that which was most conducive to the splendor of their systems, and the interest of their sect." And that which they learned from the Prophets, and from the society of Free Masons, in their journeyings to the east, was converted by them, into a kind of speculative theory, the knowledge of which was confined to a few. "and by them carefully concealed from vulgar curiosity, under the veil of mystery, into which none were initiated, until they had tried their intellectual capacity, and the firmness of their characters." And the very foundation of all that was pure and correct in their systems, emanated from the Masonic Repository, from whence, no doubt, they received their knowledge of the primitive traditions. We shall have no controversy with a religious people, when we assert, that Solomon was well acquainted with the true fountain, from whence proceeded all correct tradition, by reading the books of the law. And he must have understood, (even in his time,) the nature of Jewish traditions as they existed in their purity during the prophetic ages, "which consisted in a simple explanation of those divine truths which the prophets delivered, or their law exhibited, under the veil of emblems;" and which existed in their purity, before foreign tenets were borrowed from the Egyptians and Greeks, and blended with the oriental philosophy. And if it be the fact (as is supposed by some,) "that the speculative or philosophical principles of Freemasonry, was unknown to the building of the Temple; and that it was then infused into the fraternity of operative Mason by Solomon: we would ask them to examine the Bible and see the account given of the building of that edifice, and they will find in the account, a great probability that the builders witnessed its awful dedication to the most high!" and the workmen at the Temple from other countries, must have been benefited by correct religious views. "Tyre must have derived an accession of religious information from its intercourse with the Israelites in the time of Solomon, for we find Hiram the King blessing the Lord God of Israel, as the Maker of Heaven and earth."

In addition to the few scattered ideas which have been advanced, we would beg leave to add the opinion of a writer of considerable research, in "A History of Freemasonry," compiled for the "Amaranth and Masonic Garland," "traces the Order from the earliest ages of antiquity, through the Eleusynian and Dionysian mysteries, to the building of the Temple, and from thence through the Essenes and Kadeans, to the fraternity of builders during the middle ages, and until the establishment of the Grand Lodge of York, in England. The reasoning of this writer is good, and will no doubt throw great light upon the origin and growth of the institution. All Masons however are certain, that Masonry is not of modern origin. Though from its character of secrecy, and being confined to a favored few, it is difficult to trace its history." And to trace it through all its varying shapes, would require a long and labored investigation; far exceeding my ability, or the limits of this address. With this consideration we shall leave this part of the subject to the investigation of the antiquarian, and conclude by saying; that to revelation, we are indebted, for all the purity and correctness of principle which belong to our institution. And although the writing of Moses and the prophets, may have been obscured in their mixture with the fables of later times; yet before the reception of a further revelation, they taught to men, all of correct, and pure morals. Enabling the craft,

"To view that hieroglyphic bright,
Which none but craftsmen ever saw!"

Enabling us, to look through the long dark vista of three thousand years, and to behold the faint glimmerings of a light; which has now burst upon the world, shining as the splendor of the meridian sun.—This light is the Christian Religion; enabling us to see in all its brilliancy the bright Star of Masonry:—which like the glorious sunlight brilliancy, that emanated from Moses and the prophets, was somewhat obscured for ages, only to break forth with that transcendent effulgence, which has enlightened the world, and made mankind happy.

We come next to our principles, and ask if they are not correct? Seeing that we have had light from revelation, and the book of nature, in the first building up of our institution; the light of science, with the more sure and safe guide of Christianity to guide us in modern times—strengthening our ties, and securing our perpetuity. As an Order, we have outlived the storms and tempests of ages, the fluctuations and changes of governments; living to see the triumph of Christianity over paganism and false philosophy; and now beholding its banners of white displayed o'er all the civilized world—evidencing the truth of the promises of God, firm as his throne, and lasting as the joys they unfold. Showing to the world the safety and permanency of institutions, which have for their object, the bettering of the condition of fallen man; which have for their principle, the golden rule of doing to others, "as we would they should do to us." In accordance with this principle, all nations, kindreds, tongues and people, can worship under the same broad canopy, which covers the Masonic Temple. And in the words of our great Grand Master Solomon, we can say, "The rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all." Acting up to and carrying out this principle, she receives men of all religious creeds, into her Temple; if they bring with them, the true principles of virtue and honesty, having proved themselves by the doing of virtuous deeds. She asks not the amount of his wealth, the extent of his influence, nor whether he has descended from a long line of illustrious ancestry. But she asks,—Is he in possession of moral worth? Is he likely to learn and retain the principles of the Order? Will he promote brotherly love and charity, and be altogether a worthy member of the institution? But it is said that many of our members, do not sustain such characters; grant it, do all the members of every religious denomination, sustain the character of true Christians? we answer no; and let it be recollected, that the mere act of joining the Church, never made men Christians, neither does the joining of the fraternity, make men good Masons; they can only be such, by living in strict accordance with the principles of the Order. And let those who denounce us, recollect, that the conduct of a part of the members of a society, cannot be a sure test, of the principles, of a whole community. The principles of the Order, forbid a system of persecution or proscription. And for proof that good principles are inculcated in our Lodges, let me ask those who have denounced Masonry; if they have ever heard, of the Masonic fraternity as a body, engaged in the persecution of individuals, or of institutions of any kind?—Has she begun the strife in which different political parties have engaged? we answer most emphatically that she has not! Has she gone forth in her strength and set herself in battle array against those who have denounced the institution? No, but she has left them to deride beneath the clouds of their own ignorance. Has she assembled her legions, and declared a crusade against Christianity? No, but she implores the protection of the same being, worships the same God, inculcating brother love, and that kind of perfect charity, which is not obtrusive in its character; called forth and exercised upon true principles. Not sending a herald before, to proclaim the goodness, and the amount of the gift, but the blessings of charity are felt and received, without coming in contact with the gaze or cold and heartless indifference of the world. This brethren is one of the secrets of our Order, which has been productive of much good in the world; having been built upon that admirable teaching of our Lord, which reads thus. "But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth; that thine alms may be in secret, and thy Father, which seeth in secret; himself shall reward thee openly."

Friends, bear with us for a moment, while we present you with a few of the emblems, or working tools of our profession. Recollecting at the same time, that Masonry does not stand alone in the teaching and illustrating by signs or symbols, the great principles of her existence. All nature abounds in emblems which illustrate her being, pointing man to the great maker of all things: pointing man to God, who has seen fit to teach by emblematic instruction—thereby making it the striking and eloquent language of Heaven. Do you ask for evidence? Fancy you see at this moment the bow of God. Look, behold! and see the sign of his promise. Look back for a moment at the time when this promise was verified.

"When o'er the green undeluged earth
Heaven's covenant thou didst shine
How came the world's gray Fathers forth
To watch the sacred sign.

And when its yellow lustre smiled
O'er mountains yet untrod
Each Mother held aloft her child
To bless the bow of God."

"Every character, figure and emblem, depicted in a lodge, has a moral tendency, and inculcates the pra-tices of virtue." Why is it then said by some that these emblems are unmeaning? Can we not use fit emblems and symbols, to impress upon our minds, and to fix deep in our hearts, the most instructive and important truths? Are not these emblems, which lead us to reflect on some moral truths, sufficient to teach us? Though they be derived from the humble sphere of operative Masonry, yet in referring us to the source of all truth, they teach great and important lessons.—They teach us to build a Temple greater than Solomon's, a Temple within, which shall withstand the "wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds," and which shall appear in perfect beauty before the throne of God. "The colors are significant of the order to which they belong, when arrayed together they show forth unity, but separately they have a higher meaning. The apron with which a newly initiated candidate is presented, is an emblem of innocence, and being white it is significant of the purity of our cause; hence it is a badge of mourning. The blue is the unsullied honor of Masonry. The red denotes that we will make war on none—and our motto is, "peace on earth and good will to men." Though at the same time we have an anxious desire to protect, defend and preserve our mysteries. These colors must ever teach the same important lessons, as long as men shall receive instruction from earthly preceptors. Shining in all their pristine beauty, so blended, as to set forth the unity existing in our Lodges; and gleaming in our moral sky as a rainbow of promise, showing that Masonry, never! never! will be destroyed. "The square teaches to regulate our conduct by the principles of morality and virtue, the compass teaches us to circumscribe our actions, and keep our passions in proper bounds. The simple trowel learns us to spread the cement of brotherly love; the plumb line to walk uprightly; and the keys to keep securely locked the secrets and mysteries of Masonry. The coffin teaches that we are mortal, and the sprig of Cassia that we shall live forever. The letter G points us to the name of that Being before whose presence the nations of earth, shall one day appear. The east and west teaches us that the Masonic Temple is commensurate with time, and the cloudless canopy is its only covering." Surely this is simple yet sublime, teaching in a language bold and impressive; teaching a language, which no Mason can forget; and stand approved before the bar of conscience, or the bar of God.

We have in a feeble manner examined our origin, principles and emblems: and from what has been presented to you,—what can be our design? Is it to sow the seeds of dissension in every society? Is it to cast the fire-brands and arrows of death into every community? Has our conduct hitherto pointed us out as selfish and illiberal? Must an ignorance of our design, cause us to be driven from the sanctuary? Must we embrace your particular faith, in order to the favorable reception of our tenets? Must we be slain by the calumniator, or lay hold upon the horns of your altar? No, we will not plead guilty by thus doing, but we will flee to the City of refuge, and there be safe, until we have a fair trial before the proper magistrates. Sit in judgment upon us, those of the world who know nothing of our design—who understand not our principles—we expect, and await the decision.—Sit in judgment upon us, ye who know something of our design; and who believe in the correctness of the principles of a Washington, a Warren, and a Franklin:—ye who possess charity, judge, we will abide the decision.

But it is often said with an air of triumph, that Masonry will not answer the end of Christianity; grant it, and in so doing, we might ask what system, earthly, would answer the end of Christianity? we answer none; and because of this fact, must we blot out every means of its attainment, except through the Church, must we overthrow every moral institution! and thus destroy many of the means of bettering our moral condition. Recollect that Heaven works by means, and approves all the good done upon earth. Understand us, when we say, that it is our design, to enlighten, to promote unity, brotherly love and charity; and it is in our Lodges that we are often brought in contact with those truths, which teach the way to life everlasting.

Many of the inquisitive, in this improving age, object to our secrets; and the passage is often quoted, "let your light shine before men." Now, we do not claim to have established, and to have carried out a system of religion: nor do we think, that our system of ethics, is equal to Heaven's revealed will. With this view of the subject, let us make the contrast, between the Christian Religion, (as revealed in the scriptures,) and Masonry her handmaid, in reference to this thing of letting our light shine. One is of Divine origin, universal in its application, well adapted to the condition of every man, and its full possession, is one of the greatest ends for which men were designed in this world. The other is of human origin, not universal or binding upon all, and cannot be adapted to the condition of every man. The handmaid of religion, it is only one of the means of obtaining the great end. And if we have obtained the favor of God, (which is the great end for which we were designed in this world;) let us live up to the commands of God, "that men seeing our good works, may be moved to love and serve God likewise." This will apply, with all its force to Masons professing Christianity, and when applied to the Order in general; (in reference to our secrets,) it is enough to say that men seeing the happy results of our unity, brotherly love and charity, may be constrained to come and do likewise. Thereby making use of one of the means of being moralized; one of the means of obtaining a love for the Holy Scriptures, one step towards the attainment of that love to God, which may ultimately enable them to do so, "let their light shine before men, that they may see their good works, and glorify their Father which is in Heaven." And further upon the subject of secrecy, we are taught by Solomon. "That a tale-bearer revealeth secrets: but he that is of a faithful spirit concealeth the matter."

There are many in the world, who think, that there is something so mysterious and dangerous, in Masonry, as to be subversive of all good government, and at war with Christianity. This opinion is founded, upon the fact that some good Masons cease, regularly, to attend their Lodges. In answer to this objection, we might ask: why do not all good Christian Masons, cease to attend our Lodges, and to join with us on occasions like the present? But we answer, (without the fear of successful contradiction,) that no man ever did cease to attend Lodges, because the principles of Masonry tended to anarchy, or were in any degree Anti-Christian. Masonry does not require of its members, a regular attendance in Lodge, to the detriment of their particular business. And there may be Masons, who cease to attend Lodge regularly, and yet retain the very essence of Masonry. Though there are some men in all societies who are unstable in their ways, and who are easily influenced by notions of an opposite character. And there are others who lack moral courage to bear up against the tide of persecution. Like many Christians, they only remain firm and unshaken in the days of prosperity. But when the days of adversity come, "thick and fast upon them," they shrink, turn back to their idols, and worship only popular Gods. And with a part of mankind,

—Prosperity's the very bond of love
Whose fresh complexion and whose heart together
Affliction alters.

It is said by some, that we compose a secret institution in league against all governments, with a determination for their overthrow. But the general conduct of the Order, in all ages, has hitherto contradicted this most emphatically. We are not such enthusiasts, as to seek the destruction of our Country, and establish upon its ruins a Masonic Hierarchy. Our principles are all republican. Our lectures, and the instruction given in our Lodges, is calculated to increase our attachment, for our common Country; and to nerve us to repel every innovation, which may be made upon our liberty. The design of the fraternity is, to better their own condition and to cultivate peace and harmony with all mankind. Supporting the government under which they live, and saying in the fulness of their hearts.

Dear native land! how do the good and wise,
Thy happy clime, thy countless blessings prize!

We have gotten through with our design to the best of our ability, but it may be asked, what is our design in regard to another matter? We shall give our own opinion, and no doubt in so doing, we shall give the opinion of the Masonic fraternity.

Brethren, in this enlightened age of the world, when the stern, and almost inflexible nature of man, is gradually yielding before an all-powerful influence. And when those who exert that influence, have approximated to that degree of perfection, hitherto unknown in the history of nations:—"when the harshness and asperities of men, are smoothed and polished by assimilating with beings of more softness and refinement"—in short, when Women exerts that influence, and holds that pre-eminent station, which it was intended she should occupy; and when all the necessary helps, are extended with a liberal hand to promote her happiness. Is it to be thought strange, that the question is often asked why are females excluded from our institution? Why are they excluded from an institution, which embraces the purest system of moral ethics ever introduced into the world? We answer, they are not excluded from the benefits of our institution: "they are not it is true permitted to attend our Lodges, neither are they required to perform the labors of an operative Mason; but every Mason knows that they hold a distinguished place in our rites and ceremonies," and that their protection, comfort and enjoyment, is instilled into the mind or heart, of every true Mason.

As an order, we believe that Women occupy a higher sphere in the scale of humanity than men. We believe that all the refined, and better feeling of the human heart, have in them a more spontaneous growth; not needing so much cultivation as men, but seed forth in all their native beauty, those fine feelings and sympathies which emanate from some superior inherent virtue belonging to her nature.

This high degree of moral perfection, endows her with more of the benevolent or disinterested feeling. This feeling, this principle, is taught in our Lodges, under the name of brotherly love and charity. Hence it is not necessary, that Women, should be taught that which the God of nature has so bountifully bestowed upon her. And hence it is needless, that she be taught in the school of Masonry. "She needs not Masonic implements to break off that roughness and rudeness, which belong only to men." She came from the hands of her Maker, with a heart made to feel for human woe; with a hand ever open to the wants of suffering humanity. "Having all those requisites which are so well adapted to answer the end and purposes of her being, from him who does all things well; who suits the agent to the action, who accommodates the instrument to the work." And who has given that disinterestedness, that beneficent desire to diffuse happiness amongst those by whom she is surrounded; "and that pliancy of spirit which adapts itself to every diversity of condition. This good principle of her nature, sustains her under all the vicissitudes of fortune." "And whether in poverty's vale, or abounding in wealth," whether sought on rejected, "this principle reveals itself as a sustaining power." And when man, proud man, has lost all his fortitude; when all other ties, which bind us here, are broken,

Theirs shall never break
Her heart can feel—but will not move
Her soul, though soft, will never shake.

The true value of Women is not diminished, by their having no participations in the business of our Lodges. But their true worth is estimated, by a knowledge of their equality, in reference to mental endowments, and of their superior moral qualifications.—Hence it is the greatest compliment we can pay to their intellectual or moral powers.

We are certainly under great obligations to God for that Heavenly light, without which Masonry is only, "As sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal;" which has enabled the nations of the earth to make such rapid strides, in the scale of civilization and refinement. In this onward march, Women has been advanced almost to the summit of her glory, and it remains now, only, for her to use that vigorous intellect and those moral powers which God has given her, for the farther advancement of her best interests, and for the improvement of mankind. In all her laudable undertakings, Masonry stands ready to assist—claiming as an Order, to have acted some humble part, in advancing her to her present condition. Masonry is now pleading her cause, and Masonry will protect her happiness, as long as Masons find a place amongst men: or the Masonic Temple has a place upon earth.

Thus to the best of our ability, have we presented you with some of the doctrines taught in our Lodges, and we present them as being worthy of reception; amongst the most enlightened; acknowledging however, the feebleness of the hand, which has but sketched the picture, and feeling assured that the subject presents, "no barren field to glean upon." Would we had the wisdom of our once great Grand Master Solomon, together with the eloquence of a Demosthenes, that we might be able to set before you the doctrines of the Order, in all their bright and glowing colors.—Would we could throw aside the veil, and let you behold in all their simplicity and grandeur, the altars of every Masonic Temple supporting the book of God, teaching in the eloquent language of Heaven the whole duty of man, and making sacred the place where "dwells Masonic light."

Behold Masonry as she issues from the temple of the Lord on Mount Zion, having inscribed upon her brow, in legible characters this motto:—"Peace on earth and good will to men." Behold her as in her onward march, she bears aloft the Olive Branch of peace over the nations of earth; promulgating her principles in the spirit of meekness and charity. No torrent of blood marks her course, no ensanguined plain presents a scene of woe. But amid persecutions dire, the fair form of mercy is seen to hover around her path and Dove like, finding no rest amidst the angry contentions of men, she bears in peace the Olive Branch within the Temple of mercy; patiently awaiting the time when the passions of men shall be assuaged. Go view her as she worships there—go read the oracles of God lying open upon her altars. See her walking hand in hand with Christianity, acting as her handmaid, drawing supplies from the same fountain, teaching the same doctrines, worshipping the same God, and hoping to arrive with all her charge and be admitted into that Temple—"made without hands eternal in the Heavens." Brethren, the task assigned me is done; in a feeble manner have we accomplished it, please to accept it, for if we have failed to present our institution in its true light, the fault lies not in Masonry.

"What is writ is writ,
Would it were worthier."

And if what has been delivered to you, has wearied your patience, forgive one who is interested in the subject: forgive one whose heart believes in the principles of Masonry. This you will do, for it is a favorite theme with you all; and must be as long as you have a place amongst the children of men.

Accept now my grateful acknowledgements for the distinguished honor received from your hands, and my best wishes for each and every brother here assembled, who worships around the Masonic altar.—This day with all its pleasing recollections, will rise up in after life, as one of the most pleasurable remembrances of by-gone days; and though we may be separated by distance, yet you my brethren of the mystic tie, even then shall be the cherished remembrances of this day's enjoyment. Brethren, one task is yet remaining; we have not forgotten that since last we met here to celebrate this festive day, one of our Brethren, who received the mystic sign amongst us has gone to the chambers of death. He has gone at the call of our Lord and Master on high, bearing the consolation to his friends and brethren, in the evidence that he went suitably appraised for that Lodge above, "having on the wedding garment." We have seen the mound of earth which covers o'er his grave, we have there dropt the sympathetic tear, and have been consoled by the reflection, that he shall arise at the last day, at the Master's call, and being clothed in robes of white, shall enter the Lodge in Heaven.

Brethren, soon will the Supreme Grand Master call us from labor to refreshment—soon will we be done meeting upon earth—soon will the last grand procession of all the sanctified, ascend to the Supreme Master on High. In view of this solemn charge, and of the responsibility which we are under to God; let us pause and reflect:—"that to the Christian only belongs a well grounded testimony of his faith, and this growing evidence gathers strength by length of time, affording at every step in the Christian's path fresh proofs of its divine origin." May we all so reflect, as that we shall embrace, and retain the faith of the Christian, and be fully prepared to come at the Master's call—hear his voice with gladness, and ascend up to the empyrean Heaven, there to be received with the welcome plaudit—"well done good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of the Lord."

COOKE AND INCLEDON.

Cooke and Incledon, after playing at the Richmond Theatre, retired to the Star and Garter to sup together. The convivial habits of these two histrionics are well known; but soaker as Incledon was, he was by no means a match for George Frederick, and accordingly was the first who felt inclined to retire from the contest, and exclaim, "hold! enough!" "Sit ye down, Charley! sit ye down man," said Cooke, "we'll have another bottle." "No, no, my dear fellow—'tis late—'tis late—besides I've to sing before the king and the queen to-morrow night, you know at the Covent Garden Theatre, and must be careful of my voice, so good night—good night." "Phoo! phoo! sit ye down man—sit ye down. I tell you we'll have another bottle." "Impossible, my dear fellow, impossible, I've to sing before the king and the queen, and—" "Sit ye down, I say—sit ye down. Your voice! by heaven! 'tis harmony! the music of the spheres, Sir! and another bottle—" "Upon my soul now—" "Here! waiter!" "I tell you I—" "Well sing the Storm first—the Storm, my bully-boy!" "No, no, not to night, my dear fellow—not to night." "Come, cease rude boreas—" "Impossible! I've to sing before the king and the queen, and—" "You won't then?" "Not to night, good bye—good bye. 'You shall though, Charley—you shall sing me the Storm before morning, said Cooke; and Incledon retired. He had not been long asleep, however, before he was awoken by two constables, who approaching the bed immediately seized him. "Hands off, vociferated our vocalist, as soon as passion permitted him to speak. "Hands off, I say! what do ye mean ye rascals?" "Come, come, no nonsense; bless you! we knows the whole." "The whole!" "Ay, so put on your things quietly, Muster Smith, and come with us." "Muster Smith! I'm Charles Incledon, ye villains! Charles Incledon, sirrah! the native vocalist! I've to sing before the king and the queen to-morrow night, and unless you bundle this instant—" "I tell you it won't do, we knows you." Charles Incledon, indeed! ha! ha! ha! that's a good one, aint it, Sam? What! I suppose you didn't rob that there poor woman of her bundle this here blessed morning, upon the green yonder." "I tell you I'm Charles Incledon—my friend George Frederick Cooke is now in the house, and will tell you the same." "Muster Cooke! why that's the gentleman as informed against you. Howsomdever if you're Charles Incledon, you can sing the Storm, you know." "To be sure I can, ye scoundrels—to be sure I can sing the Storm indeed! only stand aside, and I'll soon—" So saying, he cleared his pipes, and in this situation poured forth this celebrated ditty, with his usual pathos and power, at the conclusion of which Cooke thrust his head from behind the curtain, and saying with a sneer, "I told you you should sing the storm before morning, Charley," left him to his repose.

THE BLIND GIRL AND HER MOTHER.

The following thrilling incident, the meeting of a mother and her child—is from the recent report by Dr. Howe, Principal of the Perkins Institution for the blind at Boston, concerning Laura Bridgman, the deaf, dumb and blind girl, whose only means of communication with objects around her is by the touch, which is remarkably acute:

During the last year, and six months after she had left her home, her mother came to visit her, and the scene of their meeting was an interesting one.

The mother stood some time gazing with overflowing eyes upon her unfortunate child, who, all unconscious of her presence, was playing about the room.—Presently Laura ran against her, and at once began feeling of her hands, examining her dress, and trying to find out if she knew her; but not succeeding here, she turned away, as from a stranger, and the poor woman could not conceal the pang she felt that her beloved child did not know her.

She then gave Laura a string of beads which she used to wear at home, which were recognized by the child at once, who, with much joy put them around her neck, and sought me, eagerly, to say she understood the string was from her home.

The mother now tried to caress her; but poor Laura repelled her, preferring to be with her acquaintances.

Another article from home was now given her, and she began to look much interested, she examined the stranger much closer, and gave me to understand that she knew she came from Hanover; she even endured her caresses, but would leave her with indifference at the slightest signal.

The distress of the mother was now painful to behold; for although she had feared that she should not be recognized, the painful reality of being treated with cold indifference by a darling child, was too much for woman's nature to bear.

After a while, on the mother taking hold of her again, a vague idea seem to flit across Laura's mind that this could not be a stranger, she therefore felt of her hands very eagerly, while her countenance assumed an expression of intense interest—she became very pale, and then suddenly red—hope seemed struggling with doubt and anxiety, and never were contending emotions more strongly painted upon the human face.—At this moment of painful uncertainty, the mother drew her close to her side, and kissed her fondly, when at once the truth flashed upon the child, and all mistrust and anxiety disappeared from her flushed face, as with an expression of exceeding joy she eagerly nestled in the bosom of her parent, and yielded herself to her fond embraces.

After this, the beads were all unheeded; the playthings which were offered to her were utterly disregarded; her playmates, for whom, but a moment before, she gladly left the stranger, now vainly strove to pull her from her mother; and though she yielded her instantaneous obedience to my signal to follow me, it was evidently with painful reluctance. She clung close to me, as if bewildered and fearful; and when, after a moment, I took her to her mother, she sprang to her arms, and clung to her with eager joy.

I had watched the whole scene with intense interest, being desirous of learning from it all I could of the workings of her mind, but I now left them to indulge, unobserved, those delicious feelings, which those who have known a mother's love may conceive, but which cannot be expressed.

The subsequent parting between Laura and her mother, showed alike the affection, the intelligence, and the resolution of the child, and was thus noticed at the time:

Laura accompanied her mother to the door, clinging close to her all the way, until they arrived at the threshold, where she paused and felt around to ascertain who was near her. Perceiving the matron of whom she was very fond, she grasped her with one hand, holding on convulsively to her mother with the other, and thus she stood for a moment,—then she dropped her mother's hand,—put her handkerchief to her eyes, and turning round, clung sobbing to the matron, while her mother departed with emotions as deep as those of her child.

ATHANASIAN CREED.

Parson Paten was so much averse to the Athanasian creed that he never read it. Archbishop Secker having been informed of his recusancy, sent the archdeacon to ask his reason: "I do not believe it," said the priest. "But your Metropolitan does," replied the archdeacon. "It may be so," replied Mr. Paten, "and he can well afford it—he believes at the rate of seven thousand pounds a year, and I only at that of fifty pounds."

A certain baron had a son, who at the age of eleven or twelve years, rose to the rank of Major. One morning, his mother hearing a noise in the nursery, rang the bell to know the cause of it. "It is only," said the servant, "the Major crying for his porridge!"

Two friends exchanging pinches of snuff at a coffee-house, an observer remarked, "you are making a profitable barter, gentlemen." "That cannot be," said one of the snuff takers, "as it is only pinch for pinch." "Nay," rejoined the observer, "you each get scent for scent by it!"

I have great aversion to Auburn locks as the criminal said when he took lodgings, in the Auburn prison.

POPULAR TALES.

From Bentley's Miscellany.

THE THREE RAVENS.

In one of the loveliest valleys of the west of England stands a small town called Greystone, a corruption (according to the antiquaries of the place) of its original name of Gravestone. Near the market place, not far from the town hall, and at the corner of a street (the name of which we are not permitted to reveal) dwelt a Mr. Simon Raven, undertaker: to this profession Mr. Raven had formerly added those of auctioneer and appraiser; but, whether the two latter branches brought him but small profits, or that his genius lay exclusively in the former we know not. Certain it is, that at the time of which we write Mr. Raven was only an undertaker, but to that he enthusiastically devoted himself mind and body.

Every morning his spouse, Mrs. Raven, might be seen (dressed in a black velvet cloak) leaving her home with the charitable intention of visiting the sick. In the act of closing the eyes of the dying, and rendering them the last sad offices, she had by long practice acquired a wonderful address. Her appearance in a house was almost a sure sign of approaching death, and some of her neighbors were uncharitable enough to say that she had been known to occupy herself with the funeral preparations even before the breath was out of the body.

All the happiness of this thrifty couple (a happiness partaking, however, of their moody temperament) was centered in an only daughter, Miss Niobe Raven; who also shared the gloomy labors of her parents. Her greatest delight was in reading. She delighted in the solemn pages of Sherlock, Horvey, and Dr. Dodd, sometimes, to give a little variety to her recreations, she tried the poets. It is unnecessary that Young's "Night Thoughts" and Blair's "Grave" were preferred to all others. In music, she had a great predilection for "The Dead March in Saul," and the bell tolling for a funeral had for her a silvery sound. But to the cause of these melancholy tastes.

For some years past, (we will not say how many) Miss Niobe had been of age, yet she still remained in the sorrowful state of a single-blessedness. For many years she had hoped to establish herself in matrimonial life with some swain of her native town, or the neighboring parishes, or indeed, of any other,—for the fact is, she was not particular as to where he came from, so—that he did come. But, alas! no one had presented himself,—and this tender cypress found no prop to support her.

Several years had elapsed, as we have been credibly informed, since young Roots, (the son of a market-gardener at the end of the town,) thinking that Mr. Raven had gathered a more profitable harvest from the churchyard than his father was ever likely to do from his garden, had intended to pay court to Miss Raven; but, to discreet a lover, he had only proceeded as far as a few tender glances.

Strop, the barber, too, the most punctual, as well as the most busy man in the town, had been known to spare a few minutes in his rounds to address a compliment to Miss Raven; but latterly he had been heard to declare that he never had the slightest intention of converting Miss Raven into Mrs. Strop.

Things were in this state when Miss Niobe arranged a plan to put an end to her state of desolation. She had tried in vain to gain a husband by assuming a gentleness of manner; and she was now determined to act with decision.

Exactly opposite to the house of Mr. Raven, lived a Mr. Narcissus Nonpareil, draper. This Mr. Narcissus Nonpareil, unlike the usual measurers of cloth, had an aspiring mind. No tradesman in the town carried his head so high, nor had any better reason to do so, for his stature was only four feet four. He might be seen every morning standing at his shop-door, rubbing alternately his hands and his chin while inhaling the morning air, for tyrant custom, as in most small towns, confined him all day to the shop. Miss Niobe had seen "and marked him for her own." Mr. Nonpareil had retired to his parlor one evening after the cares of the day, when a shopman entered.

"Any one waiting, Mr. Smith?"

"No, sir, Mr. Stoat's clerk has just left this letter, and has since gone over to Mr. Raven's."

Wondering what Stoat, the lawyer, could have to write to him about, Nonpareil opened the letter, and read as follows:

Sir,—I am instructed by my client, Mr. Simon Raven, to inform you that if you any longer refuse to fulfil the engagement contracted by you with Miss Raven, that legal proceedings will be forthwith commenced against you. I am, sir, your obt. servt.
CATMAN-STOAT.
To Mr. Nar. Nonpareil, &c."

It is not necessary to paint the surprise into which this singular epistle threw our friend, the draper: he read it over more than once; but that only plunged him deeper into conjectures as to its meaning. "What engagements had he contracted with Miss Raven that Stoat could call upon him to fulfil? What proceedings were to be taken against him for the accomplishment of a contract he had never heard of before? It must surely be some pleasantry between Mr. Raven and Mr. Stoat," thought he. But Mr. Raven was not a man given to joking, and Mr. Stoat was anything but a pleasant man. "I have never," said Nonpareil, (rising from his chair with dignity,) "never by word or thought injured Miss Raven, in fact, never thought about her."

Having said this, and being convinced of his own innocence, he took his hat and went out. "I must see Stoat immediately," said he, "and learn the meaning of this letter." Saying which, he proceeded to the lawyer's house.

"Good-evening, Mr. Stoat," said Nonpareil, entering the office, in which he found the man of law busily occupied in writing; and presenting the letter he had received, asked the meaning of it. "If it be a joke, it is one that will not make you the richer, I suspect."

"A joke—you may call it a joke if you please," Mr. Nonpareil, though I am sorry to find you treat so serious an affair in this manner; but I would rather see your lawyer about it. We shall be better able to come to an understanding."

"Understanding—about what? I do not understand a syllable of this. What do you mean?"

"Nothing more, Mr. Nonpareil, than this—that we have the most exclusive evidence, the most efficient witnesses, that you have proceeded too far in your attentions towards Miss Raven to draw back now without subjecting yourself to very heavy damages."

Nonpareil on hearing this threw himself into a chair in a state of great agitation.

"Damages—for what? You surely do not threaten to force me to—"

"Young men ought to have more discretion," Mr. Nonpareil. The damages will be laid at five thousand pounds!"

There was such a tone of sincerity in these words that they failed not to make a great impression on the draper.

"Alas!" cried he. "What can I do?"

"You are not in a fit state at present to listen to me. Who is your lawyer?"

"Mr. Ferrett—Mr. Ferrett," replied Nonpareil, trembling; "Ferrett, who lives at the end of North street."

"Very well. I will see him," said Stoat, conducting Nonpareil to the door, who followed him like an automaton, a thousand times more confused and bewildered than when he entered. On his way home he thought the best way to get at the truth would be to go to Raven's house. He arrived there, knocked, and asked in a loud tone for Mr. Mrs. & Miss Raven. "Walk in, sir: missus is in the parlor." He entered, and found Mrs. and Miss Raven seated at work.

"Ah! sir, said Mrs. Raven, with a solemn air, "we have waited to receive this visit for some time." Then (turning towards her daughter) said "Niobe, my dear take courage; all will be well."

Miss Niobe, on hearing this, said, in a languishing tone, "No—no; this is indeed too much to bear."

"Leave the room, my dear; take the shroud with you, and finish it in the other room." Then turning to Nonpareil, Mrs. Raven continued, "You see the responsibility of this dear girl. As she retired, Narcissus could not forbear murmuring to himself, "Frightful creature! would the shroud were her own!"

"You see, sir," we are obliged to assist in the work, said Mrs. Raven, with a ghastly smile. "We have so many funerals to complete just now that we cannot find hands enough. You will excuse me if I continue my employment: but Mr. Raven will be here directly."

During this explanation our hero had heard the noise of hammers in full operation in the back premises. A shuddering came over him, and he turned deathly pale. The entrance of Mr. Raven did not at all tend to allay this feeling of alarm when he said in sepulchral voice, "So you're come at last, Mr. Nonpareil; but you seem ill?"

"Yes," faltered Narcissus, "I am ill—very ill," for he found the eye of Mr. Raven fixed on him, as if already measuring him for his coffin.

"What the devil, do you mean by the way in which I have treated your poor Niobe? Do you mean to insinuate that I ever paid any attention to your daughter—that I ever pretended to like her? So far from thinking of her, if she had her weight in gold I would not have her."

"Oh! oh! you would not have her, eh?" replied Raven with a frightful grin. "No matter, we'll see if you do not marry her. We know how to make you."

"The devil take me if I do, though!" muttered Nonpareil, as he buttoned up his coat with the air of a man prepared for any thing.

"Fie! fie! gentlemen," said Mrs. Raven. "Simon, my dear, moderate your passion."

"Once for all," said Nonpareil, "explain yourself, will you, Mr. Raven?"

"Well, then, you must marry Niobe, or justice shall take its course. We have your own letters, of the most tender and passionate description; and that's expiation enough, I suppose."

Narcissus started back a few paces. "It's a vile conspiracy," said he; "but Ferrett shall inquire into this affair for me."

"Did I not tell you he would deny them?" said Raven, turning towards his wife.

"He denies his own handwriting, does he? Well, the wickedness of the world! who would believe one of his sex?" sighed poor Mrs. Raven.

"We have nothing more to say to you," added Mr. Raven, moving towards the door. "We have your letters; we have your offer in black and white."

Narcissus retired more confused than when he entered the house. When he reached home he thought over the affair. "These Ravens say that they have several letters of mine to their daughter. I cannot understand it. No matter. They have sworn that I shall marry her; and I really believe them capable of any thing, the cannibals! Marry their frightful daughter—a living spectre! Who's there?" said he, as the door opened, and a head appeared.

"Are you alone?" asked the proprietor of the head, for the body was not yet visible.

"Yes," replied Narcissus. "Come in, Captain Trigger."

A short stout man accordingly made his appearance, his neck enveloped in an enormous cravat, and his cheeks ornamented with a superb pair of whiskers.—Such was the appearance of the formidable Captain Trigger, who having retired from the service for some years, had lately settled in the town of Greystone, retaining little from his military services except the title of Captain, and the before mentioned whiskers. This gentleman frequently honored our friend the draper with an evening call, to play a game of piquet, of which Narcissus was very fond, and at which the captain was very skilful.

"Why what ails you, man? You look ill," said the Captain, seating himself. "Are you for a game to-night?"

"I am seriously ill, Captain Trigger," replied Narcissus, putting his hand to his head.

"Take some of Dr. Gargle's pills, and you will be all right to-morrow."

"Can you keep a secret?" said Narcissus, drawing nearer to the Captain.

"As profoundly as the grave. But do not look so very melancholy, for Heaven's sake, or you will give me the blue devils! Let's take a glass of grog. There's nothing better to dispel melancholy."

"As you like, Captain." And whilst the Captain was engaged in the agreeable occupation of mixing the grog, the draper recounted to him all the details of his unfortunate position. The captain took a pinch of snuff, put the stopper into the bottle, looked hard at his friend, tasted his mixture, and said, "This is all very strange. You have never made love to this Miss Raven?"—"Never!"

"Have you never written any letters to her?"—"Never!"

"Have you ever written any love letters to any other person?"—"Nev—ah!" exclaimed Nonpareil, jumping up suddenly, "I have it, I have it, my good friend. Yes, I have written several letters—love letters, to Penelope Pincroft, who—"

"And these letters are in the possession of these Ravens," said the captain, interrupting him. "Where does this Penelope live? I will go directly to her, and find it all out." "Alas! captain, she has been dead these six months."

"But these letters were directed to her, and not to Miss Raven?"—"I sent them always by a trusty person, without any address, and never mentioned her name in them, for fear they should fall into old Pincroft's hands."

"This becomes serious," said Trigger. Then turning to Narcissus, he added, "This Raven, (the old man, I mean) has feathered his nest well?" "Oh! no doubt of it. He is called rich, and I hear will give his daughter three thousand pounds."

"Well, why not marry her then?" "How can you ask me such a question? I marry one of such a family of spectres! I should soon become a prey to my father-in-law."

"That is all prejudice. You cannot do better than marry the girl; for it will be impossible to prove that these letters were not intended for her. The damages may be considerable, and the affair will half ruin you."

"I would rather beg my bread than marry such a scarecrow."

"Silence followed, when the captain said, 'Listen to me, Nonpareil. You know that I have ruined myself with play and good living; now, three thousand pounds would be most acceptable to me—don't interrupt me;' (seeing that Nonpareil was going to speak)—"I have a plan in my head by which I can secure the money, and get you out of the scrape." He then detailed his plan to our friend the draper, who appeared delighted with it. 'Tis unnecessary, however, to let our reader into the secret before the proper time."

"You think it will do, then?" said the captain, "and you will try it without hesitation?"—"Certainly."

"The two friends, after laughing heartily, separated for the night."

Nonpareil was up very early the following morning, and very carefully dressed. He took a last look in the glass, and being satisfied with his appearance, satisfied forth. His expectations had not deceived him.—During his walk he met Miss Niobe. She perceived his approach, and was on the point of turning back; but Narcissus detained her by the eloquence of his persuasive language.

"Am I then so odious, dear Miss Raven?" said he, as he overtook her. "I beg, I entreat you to listen to me, whilst I own the reason of my conduct yesterday evening."

"It certainly was much at variance with your present behavior, sir. Pray explain yourself."

"I desire nothing more. You love me—nay, do not deny it—you love me, dear Niobe, and this explains fiction relative to certain letters—very excusable under such circumstances. Do not blush, but tell me—tell me the truth, I conjure you—how could your respectable parents think of putting the matter into Stoa's hands? This ruins my hopes completely."

"How so, Mr. Nonpareil?"

"Will not the world say that I did not love you, and only consented to be led to the altar to save my pocket? 'Tis terrible to think of such a thing! I have loved you; let us defy the scandal of the world, and elope at once. This will prove our affection for each other."

"Elope! elope!" screamed Miss Niobe, at the same time drawing a little nearer to our hero, who saw that he had gained the day.

"I have no time to delay; my business cannot be long left without its master. What say you, my dear Niobe?" He pressed her hand; the pressure was returned. "You consent, then," cried he. "Tomorrow morning I will be here with a post-chaise at six o'clock."

"Oh! not here," said Niobe. "Let it be at the end of the town, at the lane near Thompson's Mill." "Be it so. But here comes Doctor Gargle; do not let him see us together. Adieu!" So saying, he was out of sight in a minute.

It was half past five the next morning when Nonpareil descended from a post-chaise, which stopped at the lane near the mill. It was not without a feeling of great anxiety for the success of his scheme that he looked in the direction from which he expected Miss Niobe to appear. His fears were groundless. In a few minutes she approached with rapid steps. He took her hand, pressed it with apparent affection, and assisted her into the chaise, in which Captain Trigger was already seated, and instead of entering himself closed the door, and gave the signal for instant departure.

When the sound of the wheels had entirely ceased, he turned his steps to the house of Mr. Raven. On arriving there, and telling the servant that he had something of consequence to communicate to Mr. and Mrs. Raven, he was admitted, though this worthy couple were in a sound sleep when the servant entered their bed-room, and surprised them by saying that Mr. Nonpareil waited for them in the parlor.

"What can he want?" said Raven, angry at being disturbed. "Mr. Nonpareil here at this time of the morning!"

"Yes, sir. He says he wants to see you and miss—"

"Very well; say we'll be down soon."

Dressing themselves in haste, and wondering what could be the reason of this early visit, Raven and his wife half descended to the parlor, where they found Nonpareil pacing up and down impatiently.

"You're a pretty couple, truly," cried he, when they entered, "to wish me to marry your daughter, who has eloped with—"

"Eloped!" cried they, both at once.

"Yes—with Captain Trigger."

"Impossible!" exclaimed the father. "She does not know him."

"I tell you I saw them together in a post-chaise, and I overheard the direction given to the post-boy to drive to the Salisbury Arms, at—"

The mother ran up stairs to ascertain if Niobe was in her bed-room. Not finding her there, or in the house, she begged Nonpareil to accompany Raven and herself in search of the fugitives. To this he readily consented, and Raven having procured a chaise, the trio departed for the Salisbury Arms, where in due time they arrived. A waiter (with a napkin under his arm) was at the door.

"Pray, did a lady and gentleman arrive here in a post-chaise this morning?" said Raven.

"Yes, sir; they're in No. 4." And he pointed to the room in which Niobe and the gallant captain were at that moment.

On opening the door, Raven discovered Capt. Trigger busily engaged in satisfying a ravenous appetite, while Miss Niobe was seated on a sofa. On seeing her father and mother she rose, and would have thrown herself into the arms of the latter; but she perceived a coldness on the part of her mother towards her demonstration of affection.

"Give me back my child, said Raven, approaching Capt. Trigger—"give me back my child. She is engaged to be married to Mr. Nonpareil."

"No such thing," replied the captain, continuing his breakfast with the greatest composure; she is engaged to me. Mrs. Raven, will you do me the favor to take this chair by my side, and I will explain all this to you." Mrs. Raven seated herself in silent wonder. "You see my young friend there," said the captain, (pointing to Nonpareil, who was seated on the sofa, talking earnestly to Miss Raven,) "that friend whom you threatened to sue for breach of promise of marriage—that friend ought to sue you for conspiracy against him; and it only rests whether you consent that Miss Raven becomes Mrs. Captain Trigger, or that you are indicted for the conspiracy. Do you remember poor Penelope Pincroft?" At this question the countenances of both father and mother became rather clouded.

"I have," continued the captain, "proofs that the letters now in your possession were written by my friend Nonpareil to Miss Penelope Pincroft, now dead. Have I your consent that Miss Niobe becomes my wife, or not?"

"What does the captain mean?" said Raven.

"Oh! my dear," replied his wife, "we must be allowed a little time to think over this affair."

During this time Narcissus had continued his conversation with Niobe. "Why refuse the captain?" said he. "He has long loved you. Why not make him happy? He only requires a little money to become a colonel."

"Mr. Nonpareil tells you nothing but the truth," chimed in the captain. "My unfortunate modesty has alone hindered me declaring my sentiments sooner."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Raven, in a softened tone, "you military gentlemen are so pressing. Niobe, my love, you hear what the captain says—will you accept him?"

"Dear mamma, what can I say?" A tender glance at the captain decided the affair, much to the satisfaction of all parties—but to none more than our friend Narcissus Nonpareil.

ANOTHER TRUE TALE OF REAL LIFE.

A Blackleg enacts the Southern Planter—Life in Buffalo—Grand Rope in the Game—Religion and Love—Matrimony and Merchandize—the Denouement.

"Got his Due.—Henry H. Taylor, the individual who by forgery obtained something over $20,000 from a firm in Louisville, and a Mr. Russell, of Buffalo, was lately tried in Louisville, and sentenced to the penitentiary for six years."—N. Y. Sun.

Mr. Russell, spoken of above, was in this city last spring. He told us of the doings of Henry H. Taylor at the North; they were on an extravagant scale; he went the "big figure" in the "roping in" business.—When he went to Buffalo, he put up at the inn where Mr. Russell was stopping, who conducted the business of a branch of a large importing house located in Buffalo. He was fashionably dressed, was liberal of his champagne at the dinner table, and was always willing to pay the fare for an afternoon drive or theatre ticket, when any one of the gentleman boarders chose to accompany him on such occasions. He soon became a "lion" not only among those of the hotel, but was so regarded by all the people of Buffalo. He represented himself as the holder of a large amount of valuable funds, principally in certificates of deposit from the Orleans Bank of this city, and deeds of land; and lost any incredulity should exist about the matter, he availed himself of every opportunity that offered to show them, and convince the Buffalonians that it was O. K.

He said he owned a large cotton plantation in Point Coupee, Louisiana, and decided on settling in Texas, where he designed opening an extensive mercantile business in the importing line; and that finally, the object of his northern tour was two-fold; first, to dissipate the grief of which the death of his wife had been the source; and next to purchase merchandize for his embryo establishment in Texas.

By unanimous consent, as it were, he became a great man in the eyes of the Buffalonians. He patronized the theatres, Sunday school societies, cigar sellers, livery stable keepers, tailors, shoemakers, and in fact the whole town. They all looked upon him as "a Southern man with Northern principles." The milliners, from whom he bought his gloves and pocket handkerchiefs, loved to hear him talk, he was so nice a man. Two ladies in the hotel called him a republican prince—a Southern gentleman; and the young bloods, whom he every other night treated to oysters, champagne and cigars, laughed loudly at all his stories of Southern life, and swore they believed he possessed more real wit and graphic humor than Boz.

There was stopping in the same hotel an old pensioned British officer, who had shared the perils and the glories of many a well fought field; his wounds were the medals which told of the battles he had been in. He had with him two daughters, they had travelled with him on the continent of Europe; were intelligent, educated, religious to enthusiasm, and might be called handsome. The elder had seen some eight summers since she had stepped out of her teens, and like most other ladies of her age, had an instinctive penchant for matrimony. She saw Mr. Henry H.

Taylor, and she loved him. She did not do as a less sentimental, less religious hoyden, the inmate of a boarding school, for instance, would do, she did not keep her blue Saxon eyes on him and keep them there till he observed her, and then pretended she had not looked at him at all; she did not drop her glove that he might pick it up, nor underline particular passages in a romance which he might see—no,

"She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,
Prey on her damask cheek."

He was ever there, and the officer's daughters set him down as a most pious, proper man. But notwithstanding the church, the theatre, and the afternoon drives, and the oysters, and the champagne suppers, with Mr. Henry H. Taylor, business was business, and he was determined to attend to his. He had in the meantime spoken to Mr. Russell about buying of him twenty or thirty thousand dollars worth of goods, and for prompt cash payments.

"What," said Mr. Russell, who is a canny Scotchman, "surely ye diana mean to make sic a purchase and pay in siller? Ay, mon, but you're daft."

"It's a fact, I do," says Mr. Henry H. Taylor, "here are the funds;" and he opened a well filled portfolio, from which he drew a large pile of certificates of deposit that he held from the Orleans Bank.

"Ma conscience!" said the Scotchman, "an ye do business on a large scale out South, mon."

"Very," says Mr. Henry H. Taylor, not seeming to mind the compliment paid to southern enterprise—"very," and he selected a certificate of deposit in favor of Henry H. Taylor, for $23,000. "There," said he, "send that on to New York, have it discounted at the lowest current rate, have the proceeds placed to your credit, as I am in want of funds, when you learn the discount I will purchase your goods and pay out of those certificates of deposit in my port folio, at New York rates. That will be equal to cash, you know, Mr. Russell, won't it?"

"It's fac as death, and so it wull," said Mr. Russell. The certificate was sent on to New York and paid at a discount of three per cent. Mr. Russell was duly advised of the transaction, and as he said himself, he always liked to "strack while the iron it's hot," he instantly closed sales for $18,000 worth of goods with Henry H. Taylor.

Mr. Taylor having finished his business, seen the Falls of Niagara, and having had a pleasure excursion with the British officer's daughters on Lake Erie, was about to return; but could not do so without making an open and candid profession of his love to Miss——, the old officer's eldest daughter. He therefore did it; he pop'd the question, and in two days after she was Mrs. Henry H. Taylor.

They were married and felt happy.

"Each was to each a dearer self,
Supremely happy in th' awakened power
Of giving joy."

For Mr. T. and his fair bride to linger long was impossible. His business peremptorily called him to the South, and it was a call not to pass unregarded.—The $10,000 worth of goods were shipped in "good order and condition," and he and his blooming bride, ere yet the honey moon had waned away, were on their route to the South—the sunny South.

The first certificate of deposit for $23,000, was in the meantime sent on here by the New York broker, to the Orleans Bank. The brief reply was on examining it, N. F.—"no funds"—in fact nothing was known of Mr. Henry H. Taylor, nor his certificates of deposit, further than they were forgeries, and remarkably good ones at that; so much so, that they deceived the New York broker, who was quite conversant with the cashier's signature, and would almost deceive himself.

Of this, Russell was advised in due course. He pursued Taylor, and overtook him at Louisville in possession of the merchandize, and had him arrested.

The unfortunate officer's daughter found she was deceived by a villain; she left him, heaping curses on his head. He was put in prison, and the result is told in the extract from the New York paper.

There is a moral in all this. Northern people should not believe that every one who goes there from the South is the owner of a large plantation. Northern adies, whether officer's daughters or other, should not fall in love with Southern gentlemen in a day and marry them in a week. And merchants should be cautious how they take certificates of deposit at the South.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YEAR, ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

Should there be any neglect in the regular delivery of our paper, north of State street, it will be attributed to a new carrier in that part of the city.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.—It has never been our lot to witness a more gratifying spectacle than that which presented itself on Wednesday last. The 17th of March has hitherto been welcomed by the disorderly portion of our own citizens as a day on which they could indulge their propensities at the expense of poor "Pat;" and poor Pat himself was wont to think his patron Saint neglected, unless he pledged him in a bumper of Inishorne and "drowned his shamrock" and his senses together. But thanks to the exertions of the Rev. Mr. Schneller, the 'Father Matthew of Albany' who has so warmly entered into the cause; and to that little band of patriots, the Hibernian Temperance Association, who so nobly 'threw themselves in the breach' and for a time braved alone the contumely of the interested, and the taunts of their former companions, with a devotion and perseverance which betokened a resolution to succeed in spite of all opposition. Indeed we cannot sufficiently admire the 'high resolve' which prompted them to forego even the moderate use of an article which has hitherto been considered an indispensable ingredient in the cup of Sociability, in order to induce others of less nerve to follow their example: and most gloriously have they succeeded.

The Catholic Total Abstinence Association' headed by the Rev. Mr. Schneller, the Rev. Mr. Smith of Poughkeepsie, and Elisha Taylor, Esq. Chairman of the State Executive Committee, and numbering over 800 members, led the way. A splendid new banner, painted by Goodwin—representing a group of postulants receiving the pledge from the Rev. Mr. Schneller on front, and on the reverse a fountain, with an appropriate scene from Irish topography spread on an immense surface of silk shone conspicuously at the head; numerous and appropriate mottoes were profusely scattered throughout the entire procession, but which our Limits will not permit us to particularize.

Next came the Hibernian Temperance Association with their beautiful Banner elevated on a platform and drawn by four of Nichols' splendid horses. The platform was covered with a green carpet and on each corner was a boy supporting an American flag. Their principal marshal Mr. Michael Cooney mounted on a fiery charger and attired in the Irish costume of breeches and top boots, looked quite unique. They numbered over two hundred and were tastefully decorated with badges &c. and at the rear was a new banner representing the different stages in a drunkard's life from the first "glass with a friend," to the termination of his existence by suicide. The figures in the different stages were admirably drawn and colored, after the manner of Shakespeare's "seven ages" and exhibited the progress of the inebriate "to the life;" and the "tout ensemble" was beautiful and imposing beyond all previous exhibitions within our recollection; and whether we regard this movement in a social or religious point of view, we cannot but congratulate our Irish fellow-citizens on the manifest improvement already apparent in their condition, through this mighty moral revolution.

We understand that the junior members of the Hib. Temp. Association held a ball and picnic at their room in the evening. During an intermission in the dancing, the pledge was administered to every lady present who had not before taken it. The company broke up among the "small hours," highly gratified with the proceedings of the day.

EXEMPTIONS FROM TAXES.—We observe from the reports of legislative proceedings, that scarce a day passes without the presentation of petitions praying for the repeal of the statute which exempts the property of clergymen from taxation, and we can see no cause why the prayer should not be granted. This exemption had its origin in a remote period, when the cause of the church needed the fostering indulgence of the legislature, when the sacred calling of the ministry was rather a gratuity than a profession, when the minister depended for the support of himself and family rather on the liberality of his congregation than on a fixed stipend. This state of things no longer exists. The gospel and its ministers, have assumed their proper rank and position in the eyes of the world.—Churches are richly endowed and the clergy in all cases receive compensation, fully adequate to their temporal wants and in many instances their incomes are princely.

Taxes are a grievous burthen to all, and should be borne by all alike, and this exemption is the most anti-republican feature, in the institutions of our state, indeed we question whether those whom the repeal of this law is to effect are not themselves in favor of its repeal.

THE PEOPLES LINE OF STEAM BOATS.—This popular and deserving line of Boats, it will be perceived by reference to another column, commence their summer operations, under auspices which cannot fail of ensuring for them a continuation of the public approval and patronage. In addition to the splendid Boats, Rochester and North America, a new one is to be added by the name of the South America, said to be full equal in her speed and appointments, to her associates. With such Boats, placed as they will be under the charge of Captains St. John, Truesdell and Brainard, no doubt can be entertained of their favorable reception with the travelling community.

FUEL.—The scarcity of coal at the present time, is another admonition, of the necessity of making provision for a more plentiful supply in future. Had the past winter been as severe as some within our remembrance, the sufferings incident to this culpable omission would have been dreadful.

This is not a perishable commodity, and its price is uniform. Would it not be well, that a supply should be procured by the Corporation, and kept to meet similar contingencies.

WHOLESOME CAUTION.—An editor "some where," advises young men who are about committing matrimony, to have it distinctly understood, whether they are about to marry an individual or a whole family.—To which a brother of the quill wittily rejoins. That parents having marriageable daughters, should enquire of their suitors, whether it is their intention to marry into the family or one out of it.

ELSSLER.—The New Orleans papers, with great flourish, announce the arrival of the incomparable and "DIVINE FANNY" at that place from Havana, and make known to the world that the Cushion on which her aerial person rested during its transit from the vessel to her lodgings, is to be raffled for. One hundred chances, at two dollars and fifty cents each!

O manhood where is thy blush! O monstrous degradation, that those professing to be American citizens, have become so servile as to bestow such fulsome adulation, on one whose chief attribute is in her heels, and whose reputation, is, to say the least, doubtful.

This is nearly equal to the homage paid another of the same kidney, named Taglioni, in London, a few years since. A party of her worshipers formed themselves into a club, and by bribing her waiting maid procured one of her cast off shoes, from which they drank their libations!

Faugh the gorge rises at these unmanly exhibitions. Mr. Caldwell, the manager, has effected an engagement with her, by which Fanny is to receive twelve thousand dollars, for dancing twelve nights.

THE BROKERS, the past week have had most admirable picking. The more conscientious portion of them, would take a "red back," from a poor devil, at 50 per cent, if the applicant was actually suffering for the means of buying bread. But the best part of this Robin Hood game, was, if you found any fault, they told you to thank God that it was no worse. Shake-spear would never have immortalized Shylock, if he had been acquainted with — some other very honest men. Talk about a "pound of flesh," why, there has been more flesh skinned from the ribs of the poor the past week, than they or their families have eat the past month. So huzza, for the Banks and Brokers, and down with the mechanics and laborers.

THE DUEL.—All of our readers have no doubt read the particulars of Mr. King, of Alabama, challenging Mr. Clay of Kentucky, and we have no further remark to make to it than the one, that the "manners at Washington," must not be only very easy, but likewise very moral, when two old men, verging on three score years and ten, can so far forget themselves and their constituents, as to send and accept a challenge in the Senate of the Nation. Are these the men to enact our laws? Never, after this, let a President dismiss hair-brained middies, for fighting, on account of his "immorality!"

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—In order to complete the Masonic Address, in this paper, we are compelled to defer the publication of the "7" until next week.

OUR CITY OFFICERS.—The ATLAS, in speaking of several candidates for the Mayoralty says, "For ourselves, we think it is time that politics were thrown aside in the choice of city affairs, and that regard only should be had to their competency." We think so too.

GEN. SCOTT, arrived in this city, a day or two since on his way to the western frontier, where he is ordered by the government, connected, as is supposed with the M'Leod affair. We regret to say, that the general in crossing the Hudson, at a late hour at night, accidentally fell on the ice and severely bruised himself. His hurts, will probably, confine him to his room for a few days.

Two children, one fourteen, and the other eleven, who were out a gunning with another child aged eleven, accidentally shot the latter, in the neighborhood of Savannah. The Republican says, that people will be amazed, when they learn that "our boys carry arms long before they cease to wear aprons."

"CLOTHE THE NAKED."—The N. Y. Planet facetiously says, that the Van Buren party have literally carried out the portion of scripture, quoted above—for they have absolutely "clothed" half of the whig party since the election. Shouldn't wonder.

COLD WEATHER.—The Ogdensburgh Times, in noticing a recent snow storm, says there is a prospect of having six weeks sledding in March. For the last week we have had nearly as cold weather, as at any time during the winter, and the prospect of a steam boat waxing fainter and fainter each day. N. B. Our Southern friends who intend visiting Saratoga this summer had better bring their great coats along.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.—A correspondent of the N. York Journal of Commerce, in Washington says: "We know from Lord Palmerston's speech that full and conclusive instructions were prepared and were immediately to be sent to Mr. Fox; and we know that the speech and instructions arrived here together. It cannot be long before we shall know something more."

Mc'LEOD.—The President of the United States has directed Mr. Crittenden, the Attorney General to attend the trial of M'Leod, which commences in a day or two.

A NEW IDEA.—An abolition paper, somewhere, says that the way they procure black-writing ink in South Carolina, is to take a young negro, and whip tears from him, which they collect in a bottle. They must be very cruel in South Carolina.

THE AMISTAD.—Justice Story, in the Supreme Court of the U. S. has given the decision of the Court in relation to these negroes, which is adverse to the claim of the Spanish government. They have consequently been set at liberty.

☞ The trial of Robinson, for the murder of Mr. Suydam, was to have commenced on the 16th.

☞ The Spy in Washington says that the State Department has received authentic accounts of the capture, by the British, of twenty American vessels, which they have chosen to suspect of being concerned in the slave trade.

THE BRIDGE.—The committee to whom this application was referred, after a protracted setting of some weeks, and after listening to the testimony of innumerable witnesses from all sections of the union, have closed their arduous labors, and are now compiling their report. Its present fate is still uncertain, but the application must eventually succeed.

A SPECK.—Orders have been received at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, to proceed forthwith to the completion of the present frigate on the stocks and to lay the keel of another.

FIRES.—The paper mill of H. C. Church & Co. near the lower falls at Rochester, was destroyed by fire on the evening of the 11th inst.

The Hartford City Hotel was sold on Tuesday last to Mr. Judson, of the New Haven Pavilion, for the sum of $41,000

MESSRS. CLAY AND KING.—The only paragraph on the subject, we find in the N. Y. American of Monday:

The personal difficulty between Messrs. Clay and King of Alabama, was still unadjusted on Friday when the Senate adjourned, and it was understood to be one of the objects of adjourning over till Monday, (today) that if previous thereto, the difficulty were not amicably arranged, it should, on the meeting of the Senate, be brought formally to the notice of that body, and that each of the parties should be required to pledge himself in the face of the Senate, not to pursue the matter farther.

At Baltimore on Sunday the Rev. Dr. Chance was ordained a Roman Catholic Bishop for Tennessee.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptedness to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock. mr. 12

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register.

A FRAGMENT.

A group, a solemn group attends my scene,
And fills the little space the sable things
Have left unus'd; All, where sorrow is not,
In burning tears betray'd, assume the face
Of saddest thought. Save the sob, half suppress'd,
Of grief, no sound disturbs. God is there! Death,
His messenger, attends! the pending act
Delays, to wing more bitterly upon
The self sufficient hearts around; that in Their own accusing sin are dumb; and more
Betray, in fear, their tears, than in regret:—
A door into an ante-room stands open'd;
And there, approach'd his dying hour, a youth
Lay stretch'd.

Beside his couch a maiden sits;
And, to each pang of death, there seems infus'd,
Into her soul, a cold and blank despair:
That part at least that must survive. For they Were one in love, in thought, in hope; and parting
Seem to stronger feel the tie. She is fair;
With brow of alabaster White, and locks
Of golden hue, framing its outline, in
A blending beauty that nowhere else could
Be. With eyes that stand, like burning guards,
To the mine of wealth within, and yet so
Lavish, seem to entice the theft. With cheek
So dimpled o'er, and ruby red, as made
A constant blush. And lips, that in their still Quiescence, could more than giant power
Exert on human mutability.
And neck, springing so full in outline, from
A heaving bosom, defying art its Truth to sketch. O! she is a being where Beauty lov'd to sit, high enthroned,
And mortal hearts, as well as eyes, to thrall.
She sits alone, in the dreary abode
Where soul contagion plays; weeping agony
O'er one by disease despoiled, that soon
Must to the clay compare, in all, save shape.
So full intent on grief she seems that friends
Can scarce a recognition greet. Sorrow,
And that alone she knows; and it so well,
As almost to forget the dying cause,
Or bleach his mem'ry in the flooding tide.
Appears there naught, in such as this, of pride,
To show before the world? A kind of woe
In egotism rife, courting praise of all;
For bab'ling list'ners, and the rest, to sound:—
As, measur'd by our tears, how much, in truth,
We loved, and so as much admired—
Why, when disease in racking torture blanch'd
The loved one's eye, and writhed the form,
In throes of agony, is so much of love
So far removed, nor more near attends
Lending its gentle sympathy and aid?
Say, why; waits it aloof, till death's approach,
That o'er the stiffen'd corse it may lament,
Weeping its own loss?

Away! thou mocking doubt!
Back into thy charnel abode! nor ere
With thy unsightly form intrude again!
Away thou fiend! that so canst mar the gifts,
Holiest of God, with impiousness!—
Yet, so we are in contamination
Swathed, so smeared in clay, that naught,
With heaven marked, can occupy the mind
Without thee.

Albany, March 10, 1841.

THE BEAUTY.

"My God!" the beauty oft exclaimed,
With deep impassioned tone—
But not in humble prayer she named
That high and holy One.

'Twas not upon the bended knee,
With soul upraised to heaven,
Pleading with heartfelt agony
That she might be forgiven.

'Twas not in heavenly strains, to raise
To the great source of good,
Her daily offering of praise,
Her song of gratitude.

But, in the gay and thoughtless crowd,
And in the festive hall,
Mid scenes of mirth and mockery proud,
She named the Lord of all.

She called upon that awful name
When laughter loudest rang—
Or when the flash of triumph came—
Or disappointment's pang!

The idlest thing that flattery knew,
The most unmeaning jest,
From those sweet lips profanely drew
Name of the Holiest.

I thought—how sweet that voice would be,
Breathing this prayer to heaven—
"My God, I worship only thee.
O, be my sins forgiven!"

[The Troy Budget publishes Florio's Last Song; with the remark, that the first part was published some time since, but without his signature, and therefore not recognized as his, and the last verses were added a few days before his death. It will be read with a melancholly pleasure by the many friends of Mr. Brooks, as the dying notes of one of rich and varied minstrelsy.—Albany Argus.]

FLORIO'S LAST SONG.

Oh, over life's departing scroll
What varied scenes of memory roll,
Bidding the proudest and the best
Sigh to embrace the church-yard rest—
And pray, on being's farth'est brink
That the wild meteor soon may sink.
Hark to the new-born infant's cry,
Hark, to the old man's heavy sigh—
With prophecy and memory rise,
The music this of human life.

Wild o'er the world my course has been,
Aye, guided by an evil star,
Upon each sad untoward scene,
Shedding its baleful light from far.
What wonder that I look to heagen,
Indignant that it sheds such ray,
And murmuring that fate hath striven
To mar each effort—cloud each day!
No—let the stubborn spirit break,
It shall not bend submissively
To the wild winds that rudely wake
The foamy waves of destiny.

On, fated bark—the storm is high.
But near us is the welcome shore,
When that false star shall cheat the eye
With its fell radiance nevermore!
Of what avail against my doom,
Firm heart and ceaseless energy?
Go, ask the tenant of the tomb
To bid himself again to be—
Then; tell the lone predestined man
That he can rule the secret power,
That guides him through life's little span,
And governs every darksome hour.

Oh for the slumber of the tomb,
The stillness of its grassy rest,
I see beyond its sable gloom
The radiance of the pure and blest.
Fast sinks the taper's fitful flame,
And care and strife and sorrow past,
Upon the shrine from whence it came,
The weary soul finds rest at last.

SATURDAY.

In glowing terms I would this day indite;—
Its morn, its noon, its afternoon and night;
The busiest day throughout the week; the latter day;
A day whereon odd matters are made even;
The dirtiest—cleanest too—of all the seven;

The scouring pan, pail, plate and platter day!
A day of general note and notability!
A plague to gentlefolks
And prime gentility,
E'en to the highest ranks—Nobility!
And yet a day (barring all jokes)
Of great utility,
Both to the rich as well as the Mobility!
A day of din—of clack—of clatter day;
For all, however they mince the matter, say
This day they dread;
A day with hippish, feverish, frenzy fed,
Is that grand day of fuss and bustle—Saturday!

ADDRESS.

Delivered before Austin Lodge, in the Republic of Texas, Jan. 1st 1841.

BY DAVID S. KAUFMAN.

Brothers, Ladies and Gentlemen:—

What mean this parade and pageantry? this public display? this solemn procession? these badges and insignia of ancient honor—the exhibition of the Bible, Square and Compass—borne by that tottering remnant of humanity! the petition to the Throne of Divine Grace? and the melting strains of music which have just fallen on our delighted ears? Why have age and youth, and beauty, honored this hall with their unaccustomed presence on this sacred day? Why are you, my brothers, clothed in your working apparel, and armed with the implements of your office?—This is the birth-day of the beloved disciple of the Prince of Peace, and an honored festival in the Masonic Calendar! The presence of the votaries of the Temple, from the humble apprentice to the Knight of Malta, shows that we cherish the highest veneration for this celebrated patron of our order; and the christian audience which I see around me, gives me the gratifying assurance that the memory of the Evangelist is nurtured in other bosoms than ours. Whilst, as Masons, we regard St. John amongst the most illustrious of our brotherhood, and one who has shed a halo of glory around our mystic union, the world adores him as the proclaimer of the "true word," and as the prophet of Patmos, to whose revelations none can add, and from which none dare take away.

In every age and country, amongst the savage as well as the civilized nations of the earth, it has been customary to observe stated anniversaries and festivals. Greece and Rome had their public games, the middle ages their jousts and tournaments; France has her three days of July, the United States her 22d of February, and Texas her 2d of March. Masonry, too, has her festivals, and amongst these stand conspicuous the 27th of December, and the 24th of June, the anniversaries of the two St. Johns. The assemblage of individuals on these interesting occasions, is admirably calculated to burnish the link which connects the present with the glorious past; to brighten and preserve those animating recollections, which the selfishness and cupidity of the world are so prone to rust and corrode, and to enable us again to live over in imagination those few proud scenes in the dark and bloody history of man, which stand out as beacon lights on the promontories of time, and still claim for him an immortality beyond the grave. Without recollection what would we be? Like the brutes that go down to the dust and perish. Events create a nation, and the recollection preserves it. The invocation of the name of Brutus could rebuke treason to Rome; and the memory of a Washington, calling on the country he had created to frown upon the first dawnings of any attempt to destroy the American Union, enables the "Star Spangled Banner," still to brave the battle and the breeze.

Although the celebration of this day presents nothing new, nor strange, yet I may be permitted to congratulate my audience that we are enabled to do so here. The proud scenes which this day greet our eye cannot but quicken the pulse of every one that beholds them, and make it beat high for the permanency and glory of our country. Memory carries us back to but a few short years since when Texas was alternately the sport and victim of anarchy and despotism. The point, however, at length arrived, at which forbearance ceased to be a virtue. The people rose in their majesty, and declared themselves a nation. The tawny sons of the south-west vainly attempted to subdue the unconquerable spirit of freemen; but the presumptuous effort ended, as all others of a similar character will end, in the complete overthrow of the enemies of the Anglo-saxon race! They were scourged back to their ranches, and for nearly five years we have had no other demonstrations from that quarter but vaporing menaces and bragadocio threats. The very spot where now stands the capitol of a nation was, but two years ago, the range of the wild buffalo, the haunt of the savage panther, and the still more savage Comanche, whose untamed vengeance knows no distinction between age, sex or condition! Our country has gone on increasing her power. Emigration has poured into her capacious lap thousands of hardy pioneers; our Government has been firmly established, and Texas has taken a proud and emulous stand among the nations of the earth. Legislation has put on her official robe; justice has assumed the ermine, and praises now ascend to the living God, where the war-whoop was wont to be heard, foreboding a dreadful fate to helpless women and children.

In the meantime, our benign order has been transplanted and interwoven with our republican institutions. It has grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength. The "five points" of Masonic Fellowship has become the "Star" of our political hope;—and if, as men, we could never desert it, as Masons we would cling to it with undying affection as the happy harbinger of a better destiny, and as the index to the source of all our blessing! It is the first duty of every mason to sustain his country, and to confound her enemies. This lesson is taught him at the threshold of the temple, and none but recreants to their duty have ever disregarded its precepts. Party spirit has no passport to the temple of Truth, and the demon Faction sinks rebuked before the piercing glance of the genius of our order.

It may not, perhaps, be uninteresting to take a brief retrospective glance at the origin and character of our institution. Although from its extreme antiquity little positive is known of its early history and progress, yet we are able to trace it back to the building of the temple of Solomon our Grand High Priest and Master.—This stupendous specimen of architecture, which was seven years in being built, and which, indeed, was among the wonders of the world, could not be erected without the strictest subordination of all the workmen to the Grand Master of the enterprise. It required the labor of the world to perfect it, and different nations of the earth lent their aid to the completion of the grand design. It is said that there were employed three Grand Masters, 2,300 Masters, 80,000 Craftsmen and 70,000 Entered Apprentices. All these were so classed and arranged into lodges that neither envy discord nor confusion, was permitted to interrupt the harmony of those engaged in that important work. Mount Moriah was the place immortalized by its location, and it was erected a lasting monument of the spot where Abraham was about to offer up Israel's hope, and where David encountered and appeased the destroying angel. After this grand edifice had been erected and dedicated to the true and living God, it is reasonable to presume that the associations there formed would not be broken off, but that they would continue after the causes which produced them ceased to exist. They did continue, and they have become the foundation of a moral edifice to which this gorgeous temple of Solomon could contain 300,000 souls; the temple of Masonry contains millions who worship in it without any to molest them or make them afraid! The former occupied a small space on the mountains top—the latter has extended itself into the uttermost parts of the earth. The one has already passed away like the baseless fabric of a vision, and lives only in story—the other still exists in more than its pristine vigor and beauty, strengthening and growing with the onward march of time, and will continue to live unhurt amidst the war of elements, the wreck of nations, and the crush of empires! In its onward progress down to our day and generation, it has included amongst its worshippers many of the great and good of every clime and tongue, and amongst these Saint John the Evangelist and St. John the Baptist challenge our peculiar admiration; and will we not rejoice that amidst the death and desolation of time, he has involuntarily spared our sacred order, and that it contains within itself the seeds of its own eternal preservation? When we consult the page of history we weep over the mutability of things, and pine at the lot of humanity. We ask ourselves—where are the towers of Babylon, the gates of Thebes, the Lyceums of Athens, and the amphitheatres of the "Eternal City?" They have passed away! Where is Greece the arbiter of letters, and Rome the mistress of the world? They still live; but oh, how changed! The one has become the home of the degraded Mussulman, as to the other.

"The Goth, the Christian, time, war, flood and fire
Have dwelt upon the seven-hill'd city's pride;
She saw her glories, star by star, expire,
And up the steep, barbarian monarch ride.
Where the car climbed the capital, far and wide
Temple and Tower went down, nor left a site,
Chaos of ruins! who shall trace the void?
O'er the dim fragments cast a lunar light,
And say—'here was, or 'where all is doubly night.'"

Where are the splendid mausoleums, the towering columns, and the triumphal arches of the conquerors of the earth? At the touch of the destroyer's noiseless foot they have crumbled into their native undistinguished dust, and the very names of those they were intended to honor now swell the long black list of infamy.

But we look again, and cease our regret; we see an institution of humble origin gradually rising and growing, until it has filled the earth with a knowledge of its name and character. The waves of persecution and power have dashed against it, but they have been thrown back upon their exhaustless source, only to return again in powerless and harmless fury. Amidst the rage of faction, the strife of party, the change of revolution, and the horrors of civil war, it has pursued the even tenor of its way, regardless alike of all. It has been delivered out of the jaws of the lion, and has passed through the fiery furnace unscathed. The foot of power has attempted to crush it, but like the plant of which nature yields but one specimen, it has lifted itself from the dust and bloomed again with renewed fragrance and beauty. "The rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house; but it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock." Vain man! how long will you attempt to annihilate that which is indestructible, and to war when defeat is your certain doom? Why will you strive to wither the oasis in the desert pathway of life, and leave no green spot on which the eye may rest and feast its weary vision? Why would you strike from the moral world the sun of indissoluble friendship, and involve it in the darkness of universal misanthropy?

The question is frequently asked why our society takes not into its communion the softer and lovelier sex, and why they are not made participants of its counsels and its secrets?—It is not, I may assure my audience, and particularly the fairest portion of it, because we entertain any opinions derogatory of their worth, or because we wish to deprive them of their elevated rank in the scale of society. No! the farthest from it possible. Operative Masonry being the foundation of our order, and the origin of our association, females were not permitted to share in the toils and drudgeries of the rougher sex. The dwelling was to be enjoyed and enlivened by them when completed, but the burthen of its erection was borne by other shoulders. Heaven has appropriated for them a more elevated and lofty sphere, and we would not disregard the beneficent designs of the Author of "every good and perfect gift." After the heat and burthen of the day is over, it is their proud prerogative to cheer and animate with their heavenly smiles the drooping spirits of the toil-worn laborer. We are to be the hewers of wood and drawers of water" for those to whom we proudly yield the palm of supremacy. It is a principal part of our duty, as Masons, to vindicate the rights of women, and to place her above the vicissitudes and misfortunes of life. No look that threatens her with insult will pass unrevenged by any true and loyal knight of our order. We feel that if woman is degraded from her elevated rank, that society would be at once resolved into chaos and confusion. Instead of being blessed with her animating presence, a cheerless gloom would brood over our social relations, and man would be without a "light to his feet and a lamp to his path." Yes—

"Where'er we wander, East or West,
Tho' fate begins to low'r,
A solace she is to us
In sorrow's lonely hour.

When tempests lash our gallant bark,
And rend our shiver'd mast,
Fair woman's form withstand the storm—
She's constant to the last.

And when our fevered lips are parch'd
On Africa's burning sands,
She whispers hopes of happiness,
And tales of distant lands.

Our life had been a wilderness,
Unless'd by Fortune's gales,
Had fate not link'd our lot to her's,
And fill'd our happy sails."

To be concluded in our next.

A LESSON FOR YOUNG HUSBANDS.

Before marriage a young man would feel some delicacy about accepting an invitation to spend an evening where his "ladye love" had not been invited. It is always so? During the days of courtship, his gallantry would demand that he should make himself agreeable to her; after marriage it frequently happens that he thinks more of being agreeable to himself. How often it happens that married men, after having been from home the livelong day, during which the wife has toiled at her duties, go at evening again to the same place of amusement, and leave her to toil on alone uncheered and unhappy. How often it happens that her kindest offices pass unobserved and unrequited, even by a smile. How often it happens, even while the evening is spent at home, that it is employed in silent reading or some other way that does not recognize the wife's right to share even the enjoyments of the fireside.

Why did she leave the bright hearth of her youthful days. Why do you ask her to give up the enjoyments of a happy home. Was it simply to take her stockings, take care of your children, and watch over your sick bed. Was it simply to conduce to your comfort; or was there an understanding that she was to be made happy with the man she dared to love.

It is our candid opinion that in a large majority of the instances of domestic misery the man is to blame.

GREATNESS.

There may be greatness of action, without greatness of intellect. The world may admire the splendor of an individual's career—he may have effected the revolutions of empires,—and the glory of many a conquest may illuminate his path—yet the mind which conceived may be far inferior (in comparison) to the hand which executed. Numerous are the instances on the page of history, where minds scarce above mediocrity, have produced changes, political and moral and astonished the world with the splendor of their actions. While others whose minds were the product of nature's finest soil—whose genius might create and whose imagination embody forth the forms of things unseen, have sunk like some faint meteor in the distance and posterity know not their names.

It is a common remark that great occasions produce great men, and true is it in fact that they call forth the latent energies of the soul and inspire great actions.—Like Napoleon, perhaps, called to act his part on the Theatre of life, at the close of one of the most diabolical, and bloody revolutions that ever disgraced the earth, when there was not an officer left capable of leading on the armies of France to victory—he with star propitious and fortune smiling; reached that proud eminence in the temple of Fame—whence with a Sam Patch leap he fell as far below the station in which he was qualified to act, as the former was above it. Had he possessed the penetration of a Josephine, the snows of Russia, would not have drank the blood of the noblest sons of France; the curling smoke of her metropolitan city would not have presaged his downfall—nor the plains of Waterloo even now produce so luxuriant a harvest, had not its former soil been mingled with that, which was so lately fashioned into man.—He did not consider that the fated star of fortune that had ever twinkled so lucidly, could be obscured by a conflagration—that its reflection so dazzling in an Italian sky could be lost amid the northern snows—nor that the unyielding Cossack could withstand the onset of the furious Frank.—Had he been born in a less auspicious period, and had not ambition's hands been washed in blood the shrill note of Fame would never been heard by future generations.

When ignorance and indolence, like incubi, brood over an age, when tyranny and oppression are seated on the throne, genius is confined in the prison house of superstition, and if perchance she break the goal, or scale the wall, the darkness and chains of a Galileo's dungeon await her. Then may the moderate intellect seize the helm and as the Charibdis of political desolation is roaring on the one hand; and the Scylla of fanaticism threatening on the other, may guide, by chance, the bark of state to the harbor of safety, where the gazing multitude with wonder and admiration, will shout huzza and deify his name.

Glory is the polar star, and ambition is the magnet in life's compass directing earth's infatuated mortals to grasp the bubble fame. But Troy's brave Hector, and Greece's renowned Achilles would forgotten be, had not genius struck the chord, that posterity might hear the echo.

'Great actions long have made the Sages smile,
They're little, nothing, words illusion, wind
Depending more upon the historian's style
Than on the name a person leaves behind,
Words are but things—and a small drop of ink,
Falling like dew upon a thought, produces
That which makes thousands, perhaps millions think.

And the mind that originates, and sends its thoughts with an Angel's speed along the track of ages, is as much above the actions of Fame's votaries as immortality exceeds this transient life.

How flickering and feeble is the light reflected by the actions of the Heroes of antiquity. Once it was so dazzling that earth could not absorb its rays, and therefore raised it to the Heavens above to radiate there—but like the untrimmed lamp which feeble, and yet more feeble burns as day rides on, it gradually becomes obscured by the increasing splendor of civilization and christianity. While the products of genius, that were scarcely distinguished through the hazy atmosphere of error become brighter and brighter as the world advances in knowledge and virtue—and like the delighted traveller on the mountain top, who beholds the brightness of the sun while the tempest is lashing the elements below; may we stand on the pinnacle of truth, and contemplate their greatness, unobscured by the storms of ambition that sweep over the vale beneath. This spirit of magnanimity—this sublime essence of true greatness, charmed at the appearance of virtue and disgusted with the hideous aspect of vice, seems to descend from its proud eminence and act for self alone. Feign would it open the arsenal of truth, and clothe the world with its invincible armor, and feign would it breathe upon the formless mass of mind—and chase away its darkness—it would not rob an equal of his just reward, nor look upon a superior, with a fallen Angel's envy.

How unlike the world's prevailing spirit that would rather "reign in Hell than serve in Heaven,"—that would swim to victory, through seas of blood—close the eye to suffering's scene—and stop the ear to misery's tale. That would smother thought that should be as free as the evening breeze, tear from innocence her cloak of modesty, and revel in the palace of exalted virtue. Could a pure intelligence from some distant planet visit our earth—and could the events of her history pass before his confounded vision—how would his breast alternate between indignation and pity, as its dark pages were unfolded to his view. The same people that put in motion that ball which has rolled onward with accelerated velocity—whose offspring the press has become the chief corner stone in the temple of Liberty, dug from the mountain the materials for the pyramids, that they might remain to the latest period of time, unshaken by the convulsions of nature, and untarnished by the finger of time. The same people that would give a triumph to the sacrilegious hand that applied the torch to the royal library, and scattered to the four winds the concentrated thought of centuries, could appreciate the efforts of her own ingenious sons. And the same people too that would sacrifice a Socrates, and worship an Alexander, could admire the virtues of an Epaminondas.

Power has been the watchword, and the groans of slaughtered millions would bear its echo to the ear of our celestial visitor—the abominations of the Romish Church hiss its name—and the sword of Mahomet writes it on the Heavens. But as the eye rolls down the stream of by-gone centuries—as it becomes dim and the heart sickens in the desert without a moral plant—it rests perchance upon the "little moss."—

Some Washington

"Who born for the universe did not narrow his mind
Nor for power employ what was meant for mankind."

Who stands like a watch-tower unharmed by the waves that beat against its base, for his station is on the immutable rock of virtue. And with what delight will our visitor contemplate such a character—he bears the likeness of Heaven—no dark malignant passion lies deeply concealed, no dissimulation is in his action, and no cloak of secrecy is assumed,—all is open, frank and free. And well might an Angel

"Tell his doom without a sigh,
For he is freedom's now, and fame's—
One of the few, the immortal names
That were not born to die."

DREAMS.

[There is a philosophic lesson connected with each of these fantastic visions of our sleeping hours; and hence the relation of them has been common, from the time when the lady of the Roman Governor would have taught her husband a good lesson thus, to the present, when the good ladies of men in general, and particularly, good ladies who have no men, connect them with every marriage and death. The immortal sage of Fernel has given the dream of his dog a place in his philosophical dictionary, and why should not the Sages of the Immortal Seven give the world the airy visions of one of their own mysterious number, related to them upon a certain occasion when the telling of dreams was in order?]

Every body dreams, but every body does not know how to dream. I have always supposed the imagination to be as much entitled to, and as susceptible of cultivation as any other power of the mind; and believing the production of dreams to be an act of the mind I have felt it a duty to extend my mental discipline to them. I think that I have succeeded—possibly in consequence of the very common place nature of my fancy. I know that I have succeeded in bringing a little reason into my dreams. When I find them assume a grotesque character, I immediately say to myself "Pshaw! this will not do, I must awake."—
Or (if I happen to be in the humor) I say "this is evidently a dream, but it is a droll one and I will see how it will come out." I find however that the habit of bringing in the reason is in such cases provoking—it has spoiled me some rare sport.

Retiring a few nights since in good health, I somehow before morning became involved in a quarrel between a young friend and a pompous and insolent Major. A challenge had been sent and accepted, and I followed my friend to the place of meeting, under the impression that he contemplated a trick upon the swaggerer. The preliminaries were arranged by a squad of the military associates of the Major who were the only spectators, from which I feared that fair play was not intended. As matters now assumed a serious aspect I no sooner saw the combatants back to back pacing towards the points from which they were to fire than I attempted to interfere, but was overpowered and taken from the ground. I now determined to call assistance, but the sound of a pistol recalled my attention to the scene. The Major had fired and directly his fire was returned, but neither fell. I hoped that this would be satisfactory; but was astonished to see each hold his weapon of death unmoved, while shot followed shot in quick and regular succession. Here (whether from habit, or because the climax was likely to be unpleasant, I am unable to say) my reason came to my aid—"Now" said I to myself, "this is all humbug; a pistol does not go off in that way until it is loaded. If I can't dream common sense, I won't dream at all"—and accordingly awoke, but what was my surprise to hear the firing continued! But there it was, shot after shot, with just about the proper diminution of sound, considering my change of position from the region of fancy to my own little bed room. "But" thought I—"they are not pistol shots because they cannot be pistol shots. But what are they? I am awake—Yes, clearly. And here are a regular succession of sharp sounds. O! it's the rocking chair."

The reader should be aware that I am, as every honest man should be, a Benedict; and furthermore that I am blessed with those solaces of the conjugal condition that usually require much rocking to prevent a superabundance of vocal harmony; and finally, that as a consequence, the useful piece of furniture above mentioned had become a little rickety, and upon each oscillation emitted a sound which if not a harmonious, was at least a natural accompaniment of the harmony aforesaid.

Having satisfied myself that it was really the rocking chair, my next curiosity was to know what ghostly visitor could be using it, for the room was perfectly dark and the family all in bed. I lay for a few moments trying to fathom the mystery, and was quite vexed at myself that I did not succeed; for I am in the habit of accounting for every thing in some way. As soon as I had against the evidence of my own ears, reasoned myself into the belief that it was not the chair, it suddenly occurred to me that it was the tick of the clock—the clock that I had nightly heard ticking in the same way year after year. "Yes" said I, "it is the clock. And I am an Ass" and thereupon I fell asleep.

MISCELLANY.

From the London Metropolitan.

THE BURNT CONVENT.

A young lady, of one of the first families of Catania was on the point of marriage with a Sicilian officer, but before the time appointed for the ceremony arrived the regiment to which he belonged was ordered to Naples on service. It was thought advisable to defer their union until the return of the officer from the expedition. A few weeks only had elapsed after his departure, when the news arrived of his death; he was reported to have fallen in action with the French.—
The young lady, for several months, indulged the fond hope that the disastrous tidings might be contradicted; but not receiving any letters, she could no longer refuse her belief, and, notwithstanding the opposition of her friends, insisted on retiring into a convent. On the expiration of the year of her novitiate, she had adieu to the world forever, and took the vows.
Three months after the execution of this fatal resolution, her lover returned to Catania: he had been wounded, taken prisoner, and carried to France; of his many letters unfortunately not one had been received. On hearing that his intended bride had, on the supposition of his death, taken the veil, without reflecting that it would have been more prudent to have kept the fact of his being alive a secret from her, his first step was to obtain permission to see her in the parlor of the convent. Dreadful were the emotions of the unfortunate nun; she tore the hated veil from her head, rent her hair, and uttered a thousand imprecations on her precipitation. It is believed that her lover, to calm the violence of her anguish and disappointment, promised, if she could escape, to receive and carry her with him to some place of security and concealment. The convent was situated in the country, at a short distance from the city; the officer took up his residence in the neighborhood. In the meantime the unhappy girl made various, but fruitless, efforts to escape. At length, unable to withstand the violence of her passion, and agitated at once by love, hope, rage, despair, and disappointment, she introduced herself into the magazine of the convent, which at the same time contained the provision of wood for the consumption of several years; this she set on fire, in the hope of escaping in the confusion, knowing that the gates would be thrown open on the discovery of the fire;
but it so happened that the dry faggots burnt with such fury and rapidity, that she was dreadfully scorched and injured before she could reach the door of the magazine; in this state, her clothes in a blaze of fire, she ran through the long corridors of the convent giving the alarm: the flames at the same time bursting out on all sides, the terrified sisterhood rushing out half dressed from their cells, thought only of saving themselves. As she had conjectured, the doors were opened, and she contrived, notwithstanding the injuries she had received, to make her escape, and even to reach the habitation of her lover; but the agitation, fright, and shocking manner in which she was burnt was too much for her exhausted frame—she fell at the threshold. It was night, her groans brought the officer, whom there is no reason to suspect of having been privy to the scheme, to the door. What must have been his surprise and anguish at so sad a spectacle!—

The ill-fated young woman was instantly put to bed, and medical assistance obtained, but in vain; after lingering in excessive torture, she expired in the arms of her disconsolate lover.

The convent was burnt to its foundations; its ruins are still to be seen in the vicinity of Catania. It is some consolation to add, that no lives were lost on the occasion, except that of the unfortunate subject of our story.

REFLECTIONS ON MARRIAGE.

Did young people seriously consider the important change which marriage must necessarily produce in their situation, how much more cautious would it make them in their choice of a companion for life.—
Alas! what avail the graces of the finest figure, the most captivating address, or the assemblage of all that is ensnaring, if the heart is depraved, or the conduct imprudent! The gayest associate of the convivial hour may be the dullest, the most unfit company for the domestic circle; and he who is never satisfied but in a crowd, or when engaged in a continual round of pleasure, is very unlikely to make a tender and prudent husband—should sickness or distress draw near, depend upon it he would fly from the approach. If beauty alone excited his passion, it would cease to exist when you are deprived of those attractions on which it was founded. If fortune was his inducement, that will likewise lose its value in his sordid mind; and the very person who brought him the wealth for which he sighed, will be considered as the grand obstacle to his enjoyment. Too often is this unpleasant picture to be seen in many discontented families, which a little serious reflection might have prevented being so unfortunately realized. Never be prevailed upon to yield your heart to any one, however he may shine in the gay circles of the world, if you are convinced that he has no relish for a retired life. The man who likes every house better than his own, will scarcely take the trouble of making his home agreeable to others whilst it is disgusting to himself. It will be the only place in which he will give way to discontent and ill humor.
Such people are forever strangers to the dear delights of the social state, and all the real comforts of a well regulated family. He that is indiscriminately at home, is never at home, and he feels himself a stranger or a visitor amidst his closest connexions.

A GOOD NATURED HUSBAND.

When the Greeks were raising forces against Troy, they sent ambassadors to Polix King of Thrace, to desire his assistance. He inquired the cause of war, and was told, it was the injury Paris had done Menelaus, in taking his wife from him. "If that be all said the King, let me accommodate the difference.
Indeed it is not just the Greek Prince should lose a wife; and on the other side, it is pity the Trojan should want one. Now I have two wives; and, to prevent all this mischief, I will send one of them to Menelaus, and the other to Paris."

Billards.—A match at billiards for $500 a side—best three in five games of 500 points each—came off at the St Charles Billiard Rooms (New Orleans) between Mr. Philborn and Mr. Dess. The former was successful—winning the first, second and fourth games.
Dess won the third game by 140 points; Philborn the fourth by 24. By-bets to the amount of $5000 were made upon the result.

YAMMA.

AN EAST INDIAN STORY.

The truth of the following story is avouched by the author of the volume in which we find it. It is from "Sketches and Tales of a Soldier's Life," by the author of "Fifteen years in India."

"I led my friend towards the Parsee cemetery on the sea-shore. The Parsees neither burn nor bury the bodies of their dead, but expose them in two receptacles, one for males and the other for females, made of solid masonry, and open only at the top for the admission of birds of prey. Having deposited the corpse in one of these sepulchres, through a door at the bottom, it is left, slightly covered with a muslin cloth, to be devoured. The bones are then carefully collected, and buried in an urn, with certain ceremonies. This mode of sepulture was common in ancient times, in some parts of Persia. It excites surprise now, by its seeming barbarism; and that it should be practised by such an enlightened and humane tribe as the Parsees of Bombay, who are very justly called the Quakers of the East, is strange. Precept and example will, however, school the human mind to any thing, and, therefore, we need not wonder at strange customs, when we reflect, that our own are considered surprising and ridiculous in their turn.

As we were approaching this place of sepulture, we beheld about forty men and women, whom we recognised as forming a Parsee funeral procession. Amidst them was a corpse, which we afterwards found to be the body of a young female, on a cot, or low bed, that served for her bier. They all seemed to be her near relations: and instead of the solemn decency which I had before observed at such ceremonies, this exhibited hurry and secrecy; the hour was unusually early; the lamentations were not loud; there was no beating of the breast by the women; but, in long dresses smeared with ashes and paint, and with dishevelled hair streaming to the morning breeze, they were uttering low groans and imprecations. Tears were flowing copiously down two of the women's cheeks and we could hear them lament that ever they had been born, and utter wildly suppressed rejoicings, that she whom they bore along was dead. When they arrived at the receptacle, instead of unlocking the door, and placing the body on the platform with tenderness, it was thrown, with apparent detestation, from the parapet, and we heard the echo of its fall with a chill of horror.

All this naturally roused my curiosity, and through the instrumentality, of Hormongee and Monagee, to the latter of whom I promised my interest respecting the canteen, by way of bribe for divulging the secrets of his sect, I received the following particulars, which I have every reason to believe perfectly true, and in strict accordance with Parsee usage:—

Limjee Dorabjee, a respectable trader in jewels, had a daughter called Yamma, whose beauty equalled the lustre of the finest diamond. She appeared among the virgins of her tribe, as a gem of Golconda amidst beads of glass. Her parents saw in her, as in a flattering mirror, their fondest wishes. They perled her jet black hair with many a costly transparent row; their rubies in burning glow were pendant from her delicate ears; their sapphires from her graceful nose; while many a far-famed mine glittered on her bosom, sparkled on her fingers and arms, and shed its light on her toes and ankles. This charming young Parsee, or Peri, was about fourteen years old, an age at which the female figure attains the sound perfection of beautiful ripeness in India. Indeed, marriage takes place generally at a much earlier period of life; but in Yamma's case, the young man to whom she was affianced had been detained at Surat nearly two years by important commercial affairs, in which he was deeply concerned, and the expensive ceremony, on solemnization of wedlock, had been postponed from time to time, in anxious expectation of his return." The Parsee possesses a number of strict and regular usages, and one of these is an obligation to marry only within the tribe. Any aberration from this practice is punished with immediate death. Nothing can avert the fate of the unfortunate victim.

The prospects of Yamma were at the brightest, when as the narrative proceeds, "it was her fate to be rescued from imminent peril by the intrepidity of Capt.

S—. She had accompanied her mother, in a covered and gorgeously decorated hackery, to a garden-house which belonged to her father, on Colabah.—They staid in the garden rather longer than their attendants wished, pleased with its cooling fruits, neat walks, silver streams, and shady trees. The golden banana, glittering mango, and imperial jack, attracted their gaze and touch. At length their bullocks, in splendid housings, proud of the music of the silver bells which played in suspension from their necks, approached the bed of the tide, which I have before described as separating the island of Colabah from Bombay. The raft was beginning to ply in the lower part of the channel, but the carriage road, along the crest of the high rock, was practicable, though the rising tide might be seen glittering in streams across its black ravines. The drivers and runners calculated that the bullocks would cross before the tide covered the rocks, and they urged them at full speed. A strong breeze, however, came into Bombay harbor, with the flow from the ocean, and before the hackery reached the shore, the ladies saw with terror that the devouring element was floating them, that their footmen were swimming, and in great agitation, striving to keep the bullocks' heads towards the land. Alarm soon finds utterance. The mother and daughter mingled their cries, and wept in pity more for each other than for themselves; but their agony was drowned by the roar of the flood, and the crowd at the ferry were too much absorbed in their own views, and too distant, had it been otherwise, to afford them aid.

At this awful moment Capt. S— was galloping from the fort; and hoping that he should be in time to cross the rocks, he made directly for the course of the hackery, saw the life-struggle of the men heard the piercing cry for help by the women, and plunged in to their assistance. His horse was a strong docile Arab, and Capt. S— being exceedingly fond of field sports, had accustomed him to swim rivers, and even the lower part of this ferry, though a quarter of a mile wide. The horse, therefore, swam as directed to the hackery, and Capt. S—, having perfect confidence in his strength and steadiness, placed the daughter, who was as light as a fairy, before him; and, with the mother clinging behind, gained the shore in safety, while the hackery and bullocks were swept away by the force of the tide. The terror of the animals, preventing their effectual struggle, destroyed them; for, a moment after the perilous escape of the ladies, the hackery was upset, and the bullocks were drowned.

Many battles and dangers require a longer time in description than in action. It was just so in this case. Short, however, as the time had been, a crowd was gathering; and not only the ladies, but all tongues, were loud in thanking Capt. S— for his gallant conduct. Meanwhile, he gazed on Yamma with wonder, and she on him with grateful surprise. Many of the Parsees have fair complexions, and Yamma's was transparently so. Indeed, she looked, though pale with fright, and dripping with brine, so much like Venus, rising from Ocean's bed, that S— pronounced her, in his own mind, the loveliest of the creation.—He galloped to the fort, procured palankeens, and saw the fair Parsees conveyed home in safety.

I wish, for Capt. S—'s sake—I wish, for the sake of a happy termination to my story—that his acquaintance with Yamma had here terminated; but I am impelled, by the laws of history and the nature of my information, to proceed, not with the wing of fancy, but with the plume of plain matter of fact. In short, then Capt. S— used every means in his power to win the love of Yamma. He corresponded with her through the medium of fakiers, or religious mendicants and fortune-tellers. He loved her to distraction; he offered to marry her: for S— had a soul too noble to ruin the object of his adoration. She listened to the magic of his addresses; she forgot all the customs of her tribe; she afforded her lover opportunities of seeing her; he visited her in the disguise of a Hindoo astrologer, and she agreed to leave father and mother, and follow him for life. Unfortunately they were discovered, and so promptly followed by three stout and well-armed Parsees, that S— was nearly killed in an unequal contest to preserve his prize; and poor Yamma was returned to her enraged family.

The reader may conceive her terror and confusion—how she protested her purity and innocence—how she was disbelieved and upbraided—how S— sterned and raved—how he offered her family every reparation that an honorable man could make, and how they spurned his terms with contempt and indignation. He cannot, however, so easily picture what followed; for he may not have believed or known that such scenes occur in the world. Well, I must briefly describe it—no I cannot dwell upon it—I will hurry over it, merely sketching the outline, and turning with horror even from my own faint colors.

The heads of the tribe were assembled, and an oath of secrecy having been taken, the fair Yamma was introduced, arrayed as a bride, and decorated as the daughter of the rich jeweller, Limjee Dorabjee. After certain ceremonies, her mother and grandmother approached her, where she sat like a beautiful statue, and, presenting a poisoned bowl and a dagger, said, in a firm tone, 'Take your choice.' 'Farewell, mother! farewell, father! farewell, world!' replied the heroic Parsee daughter, taking the deadly cup; and she drained its contents! Her leaden eyes were watched till they closed in death; she was then stripped, arrayed as a corpse, and conveyed to the receptacle of the dead as I have described.

When S— heard that Yamma was gone, and suspected that she had been murdered, according to the customs of the Parsees, the noble fabric of his brain gave way, and reason fell from her throne. 'My horse, my horse!' cried he; and as he patted the neck of the animal, the alarmed attendant saw the fire of his eye, and trembled. Away went horse and rider—far behind ran the groom. He heard the hoof of thunder on the ground, and his master's voice urging his spirited steed towards the foaming surf—then a loud explosion, as of breaking billows; and, on gaining the sea-shore, he saw a black point on the stormy surface of the ocean, but he never saw the brave S— and his Arab more."

THE LEGENDARY.

OTWAY'S ORPHAN.

The father of Charles Brandon, afterwards Duke of Suffolk, retired on the death of his lady, to the borders of Hampshire. His family consisted of two sons, and a young lady, the daughter of a friend lately deceased, whom he adopted as his own child. This lady being singularly beautiful, as well as amiable in her manners, attracted the affections of both brothers; the elder however, was the favorite, and he privately married her, which the younger not knowing, and over-hearing an appointment of the lovers to meet the next night in her bed-chamber, he contrived to get his brother otherwise employed, and made the signal of admission himself, thinking it a mere intrigue; unfortunately he succeeded.

On a discovery the lady lost her reason, and soon after died. The two brothers fought, and the elder fell. The father broke his heart in a few months afterwards. The younger brother, Charles Brandon, the unintentional author of all his family misery quitted England in despair, with a fixed determination of never returning. Being abroad for several years his nearest relations supposed him dead, and began to take the necessary steps for obtaining his estate, when, roused by this intelligence, he returned privately to England, and for a time took obscure lodgings in the vicinity of his family mansion.

While he was in this retreat, the young king (Henry VIII.) who had just buried his father, was one day hunting on the borders of Hampshire, when he heard the cries of a female in distress, in an adjoining wood. His gallantry immediately summoned him to the place (though he then happened to be detached from all his courtiers) where he saw two ruffians attempting to violate the honor of a young lady; the king instantly drew on them when a scuffle ensued, which roused the reverie of Charles Brandon, who was taking his morning's walk in an adjoining thicket; he immediately ranged himself on the side of the king, whom he then did not know, and by his dexterity, soon disarmed one of the ruffians, while the other fled.

The king, charmed with this act of gallantry, so congenial to his own mind, inquired the name and family of the stranger, and not only repossessed him of his patrimonial estate, but took him under his immediate protection.

It was the same Charles Brandon who afterwards privately married Henry's sister, Margaret, queen dowager of France, which marriage the king not only forgave, but created him Duke of Suffolk, and continued his favor towards him to the last hour of the duke's life.

He died before Henry, and the latter shewed in his attachment to this nobleman, that notwithstanding his fits of capriciousness and cruelty, he was capable of a cordial and steady friendship. He was sitting in council when the news of Suffolk's death reached him, and he publicly took that occasion, both to express his own sorrow, and to celebrate the merits of the deceased.—He declared that during the whole course of their acquaintance, his brother-in-law had not made a single attempt to injure any one; "and are there any of you my lords, who can say as much?" When the king subjoined these words (says the historian), he looked round on all their faces, and saw that confusion which the consciousness of secret guilt naturally threw upon them.

Otway took his plot from these facts, but to avoid, perhaps, interfering in a circumstance which might affect many noble families at that time living, he laid the scene of his tragedy in Bohemia. There is a large painting of the above incident, now at Woodburn, the seat of his Grace the Duke of Bedford; and the old Duchess Dowager, in shewing this picture, a few years before her death, to a nobleman, related all the particulars of the story.

HISTORICAL.

ACCOUNT OF THE TORTURING OF THE KNIGHTS TEMPLARS.

From the "Priest and the Jewess, a Chronicle of the time of the Philip the 4th, by Israel Jehush."

On his entrance in the Hall of Tortures, Phillip of France seated himself in a large arm chair of crimson velvet, the only ornament of this theatre of the cruelty and barbarity of the 14th century. Engueraud and the other nobles of his train were seated behind him on benches so coarsely and carelessly made, that save for the want of blood upon them, they might easily have been mistaken for instruments of torture. The king commanded the culprits to be brought before him, forgetting in his eagerness to make them acknowledge their crime, that even their confession could not bind him to the motive which urged him to persecute them. A side door suddenly opened, and preceded by their jailer, six Templars entered the hall of their doom Jacques Molai entered at their head. He bowed to the king, as did his companions with the exception of one, who passed proudly in front of the king and his train, and seated himself on a bench near them. Philip pretended not to see him, and seemed hesitating whether or no to return the salutes made to him by the others who came slowly, one by one, through the dark and narrow door. All was calm and silent in that dismal hall. At last the king spoke—"Let those knights," said he, "who have made a sincere confession of their crimes, and have thus obtained their liberty, repeat here, in the presence of their God and of their king, what they have already confessed in private, that it may be known that no worldly thoughts or feelings have urged us to this trial. Our sole object is the honor and glory of the church." Some of the prisoners raised their eye to the face of the king, as he made this hypocritical speech, but instantly cast them again to the ground.

Flamel touched his friend's elbow, and he, raising his voice the utmost pitch, exclaimed, "I Guillen de Boinsé, Knight of the Temple, declare the order of the Knights Templar unworthy of existence, and infamous; for felony impiety, blasphemy, and crimes of every kind!"

"May the God of Truth confound thee!" exclaimed the Grand Master.

The enraged Boinsé replied, "May all the devils in hell seize!"

"Silence!" cried Philip, "Molai, wait till thou art questioned, or rather see if, among the Knights who accompany thee, there are none likely to make the confession I require; if not, tortures must exact it."

"There are none who fear thy tortures," replied the Grand Master calmly.

"Thy boasts shall not avail thee," replied Philip. "Thou thyself shall feel if the executioner understands his business. Drag Molai to the torture!"

The Grand Master gave the king one glance of supreme contempt, and exclaimed with fervor, "God give me strength to bear this trial." A yellow curtain at the bottom of the hall drew up with a horrid creaking noise, and in the midst of wheels, rack, saws, screws, and other fearful instruments, stood a half-naked man, humming the tune of a drinking song, and greasing with a sort of yellow and dirty lard, the screws and hinges of the different machines. He gazed for one moment stupidly and vacantly around him, and then continued his occupation. Among the assembled persons in that Hall, some turned away their heads, others shuddered, while Flamel smiled and pressed the hand of Guillen de Boinsé, who considered himself most happy in having escaped from the tortures which now threatened the ill-fated Grand Master of the Templars. "Choose," cried Philip, "confess thy crimes or seat thyself in that iron chair." Molai did not even answer him, but calmly and proudly sat himself down in the dreadful chair. The executioner rudely tore off the white mantle which covered the shoulders of the Templar; he then touched a spring, and two large iron hooks twisted the feet of Molai, while six long bars of the same metal, disposed in triangles, crossed on his chest, and pressed his naked shoulders on sharp points with which the back of the chair was garnished. Molai raised his eyes to Heaven, but did not utter a word, a shriek, or even a groan. His breath came whistling from his crushed and wounded chest, and the blood flowed in torrents from his shoulders on the shining and polished instrument of his torture.

"Speak," cried Philip. "I am innocent," replied Molai, in a faint and faltering voice. "Sire," whispered Engueraud, "he will never confess." Take him away," said King Philip, "another one less resolute will speak;" and Molai released from the iron bars which were crushing his chest, breathed freely once more. While the Grand Master was seated in the accursed iron chair, one of the younger knights had shed tears, and when he was released from the torture the youthful Templar exclaimed—"God be praised." Philip now turned to him and said—"What is thy name? Pierre de Villeueuve," replied the Knight.—"Perchance," continued the king, "thou wilt prove less obstinate than thy Grand Master, and tortures will force thee at least to confess." "Thou art mistaken," replied the Templar. "Drag him to the torture," cried the infuriated Monarch. "My liege," said a voice, "it is the same to you which one of us submits to the torture, your aim being only to enjoy the sufferings of a Knight. My brother is young, exhausted by imprisonment, hunger and care, and to curtail his sufferings he may betray his honor. Let me be tortured in his place. My name is Fulk de Tracey." "No, no, my brother," eagerly replied young Villeueuve, "do not doubt my constancy. Executioner do thy duty;" and he advanced towards the yellow curtain. "He is very young," whispered Marigny to the king, "he cannot bear the torture long." "So much the better Marigny," replied the King, "he will confess the sooner." And these words were pronounced in such a terrible tone of voice, that the astounded minister did not venture on another whisper during the whole trial. The eyes of the king sparkled with rage; and this prince who had consented so reluctantly to witness this dreadful scene, seemed now determined to exhaust all the resources of cruelty, as if to appease his conscience, and to persuade himself he had listened only to the voice of justice. "Pierre de Villeueuve," he said, "it is not yet too late." The young man gazed at him disdainfully, and made no reply. The executioner instantly seized him, and bound him on a machine called the cross of St. Andrew. It consisted of two beams laid crossways, and almost at right angles. On the limbs of this dreadful cross the executioner bound the naked arms and legs of the young Templar and then slowly turned a winch that set in motion a small sharp pointed lance which penetrated the joints of the sufferer. The executioner stopped one moment to interrogate his victim while the lance had already penetrated between the cartilages which unite the vertebrae. "Speak," cried Philip. Pierre de Villeueuve opened his mouth slowly, and from his purple lips came forth in short and feeble accents, "Not guilty, not guilty. "Go on, go on," exclaimed the king, enraged at so much resolution and fortitude.—The executioner again turned the winch, the lance rose by degrees, till suddenly the Knight gave a shriek, shook the St. Andrews cross with great violence, and the terrible and bloody lance breaking his bones like so much glass, penetrated into his bosom. The youthful Templar closed his eyes, and his head fell on his shoulders. "My brother, my brother," shrieked Fulk de Tracey, "Ye have murdered him. Why did he not confess then," said Philip, carefully averting his eyes while the executioner unbound the corpse of the ill-fated Pierre, and bore it away on his shoulder, leaving a long track of blood behind him. When the captives were first summoned into the presence of the King, one of them, as we have already stated, passed before the royal judge without bowing to him, and had seated himself on what now proved to be an instrument of torture. His name was John de Beaufremond—he had grown grey in the service of the temple, and had been in all the campaigns against the Saracens. He was remarkably tall and strong, and during the whole execution had kept his large eyes, arched by long thick and grisly eyebrows full on the king. Irritated by his bold bearing, Philip ordered him to be tortured—"Thank you," said the Templar, "I began to think you had forgotten me. Let me expire under the same torture which killed Villeueuve. I loved him as my son. I first taught him to wield the lance; let my blood be mingled with his, and I ask no more." "No no," replied the king, "by Our Lady that would be too easy a death for thee. Every bone in thy body shall be broken, ere thine eyes close on the light of day. As you will," replied Beaufremond, "but I thought as I had shed so much blood in the cause of Christianity, that I might have chosen where and how to shed the last drops that flow in these old veins of mine." "Tie him to the clock," exclaimed Philip. This, of all the tortures, was the most dreadful.

The sufferer was suspended between two beams, and above him him swung an immense leaden weight, which at regular intervals fell and crushed one of the limbs of the victim. The executioner tried to drag this machine into the centre of the room, but it was so heavy as to resist all his efforts to stir it. Beaufremond sprang up, and with one firm grasp drew the immense apparatus into the middle of the hall. Astonished by this exhibition of strength, the executioner looked upon this victim as a supernatural being, and if Beaufremond had only given him one glance of his bright black eyes, he would never have dared to touch him. Observing his hesitation, the knight placed himself without assistance, on the dreadful machine, and the weight began to move regularly above his head. He had time to confess before it reached a large black spot, whence it was to fall on one of his limbs. "Look at that weight," said Philip. No answer. "Remember that when it touches the black spot, it falls," continued the Monarch. No answer, but the bright black eyes remained fixed on the king's face. Suddenly the weight touched the black spot—it fell, and crushed the Templar's leg. "I have only one more leg at your service," said Beaufremond, firmly and proudly; and still gazing intently on the king. "Bear him hence," cried Philip, and starting up, as if to avoid the gaze of his victim, he left the hall, called for his horse, and rode off towards the palace.—Marigny followed him, and none were left in the hall but John Flamel, the legate of the Pope, and those Templars who had confessed. They were sufficient to have tortured those among the captives who still survived, but their calm and majestic mien had such an effect on their judges, that they unanimously started from their seats and rushed out of the Judgment Hall. The prisoners were re-conducted to their cells, and John Flamel announced to the crowd without the prison, that the confessions had been complete and entire, and that in a few days the king's pleasure and justice would be known. Long live king Philip—long live John Flamel, shouted the crowd as they dispersed, in anxious expectation for the execution of the knights of the Temple.

Some robbers having broken into a gentleman's house, went to the bed of his servant, and told him if he moved, he was a dead man. "That's a lie," said he, "for I can't move unless I be alive."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1841.

TO AGENTS AND FRIENDS.—Those of our friends who may obtain subscribers for us on this Volume, are requested not to receive pay, beyond THREE QUARTERS OF A YE R. ($1.50) as we find ourselves unable to supply any back Nos. prior to No 14. It is desirable to have no broken accounts, and we make this statement, in reference to the next Vol.

THE OLDEN TIME—A CURIOSITY.—A friend has placed in our hands a relic of the last century, from which we shall occasionally cull some very curious and interesting facts. It is a volume of Almanacs, from 1769, to 1782. A part of them are entitled "Hutchins; Improved, being an Almanack and Ephemeris, of," &c. "Printed and sold by Hugh Gaine, at the Bible and Crown, Hanover Square, New York,—where may be had," &c. From the style of the printing, and the color of the paper, which is a shade lighter than good straw paper, together with certain commendations of the publisher, it appears that Mr. Hugh Gaine was the fancy printer of that day in the great city. In 1774, Mr. Gaine has a formidable rival, in the person of Mr. John Holt, who published the "New York Almanac in Dock-street, near the Coffee House," who says he has published the "best Almanac in America, and a purchaser must be very unconscionable indeed, if he does not think he has the full worth of his money." "I could (says this immortal chronicler of thunder storms) give you a very extraordinary encomium and account of myself, but shall reserve them for my future almanacks."

Among the collection we have also "Watson's Connecticut Almanac, for 1777." "Bickerstaff's Boston Almanack, or the year of our Redemption, for 1778." "Dedicated to the Glorious Washington & Gates." "Father Arahaham's Almanack, for 1779," published at Philadelphia. Besides several others published at about the close of the Revolutionary war.

The volume before us appears to have been carefully preserved as affording data of events in some old Dutch family of this city, and the margin is covered with memoranda like the following:

1772, } Sot a hen in the cob-house on 9 turkey
June 13. } and 10 ducks' eggs.
1773,
April, 17, } Soad the garden.
" 21, } Sot a hen in the tub.
June 24. } St. John's Day the best for planting cabbages.

1774, }
May 4. } Snow six inches deep.

The following, which is all we have room for, will give the reader some idea of New York in the "olden time."

THE CELEBRATED "DICK GRAVES," who is well known throughout the United States, as possessing more wit and drollery than falls to the lot of humanity, has got himself in a scrape, which in all probability, will occasion his retirement from public life for a number of years. For several months past, repeated robberies have been committed on the rail road between this place and Syracuse. Col Wilkie of New-York, who was entrusted with a large sum of money, together with Wm. K. Strong, of Geneva, and Freeman Clarke, cashier of the Orleans Bank had their trunks robbed during the past week, from the baggage cars. On discovery of the robbery, immediate steps were taken to ferret out the robbers, which resulted in the arrest of an old offender by the name of Wall, and "poor Dick." Dick kept up his usual assurance, until a package of the money was found secreted, with his name written on it. He then sank in a chair confounded; since which time. "Richard has not been himself." Five thousand dollar bail has been required, which Graves has been unable to give.

Alas! poor [Dick.] I knew him Horatio; a fellow of infinite jest; of most exquisite fancy. . . . Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment; that were wont to set the table on a roar? Not one to mock your own grinning; quite chap fallen.

OUR CITY.—A majority of even our own citizens are not aware of the extent of the improvements in Albany for the past year, a vast number of buildings have been erected, nearly all of which are of the first class. New streets have been opened, immense hills have been removed, graded and made ready for building.—Notwithstanding which, there is a scarcity of tenements; to obviate this, active preparations are being made for the erection of a large number of houses during this season. Albany must become a large place, in spite of lamentations here or elsewhere."

DAVID FROST AND EVELINE WELLS.—The application for a divorce of the above parties, who were wedded some three years since under such peculiar circumstances, is still before the Legislature of this State. This case is a perfect anomaly in hymenial occurrences, and in our opinion demands the interposition of the Legislature to dissolve a connection entered into under such circumstances. The plea of setting a dangerous precedent is absurd, as there is not the remotest probability of the recurrence of a parallel.

CANAL ENLARGEMENT.—It is worth one's while to saunter into the vicinity of the Little Basin, as by an inspection of what is going on there, a pretty correct estimate may be made of the magnitude of this work. The huge stones employed in the construction of the locks &c. &c. are indicative of its permanence and solidity. The monuments of antiquity are nothing in comparison to this stupendous work, and is alone sufficient to immortalize the present age.

"THE REWARD OF MERIT."—The Madisonian has a long article addressed to "applicants for office."—That paper says, "We have noticed within the last week, and more within two or three days, no small dissatisfaction, that so little is done by the President and Cabinet, in deciding upon new appointments.—We take upon us to say—wait with patience." The article then at considerable length goes on to show the reasons for waiting with patience. These "certain moveables," play the d—l with the patriotism of either party, and if Gen Harrison through his administration of four years does not get more "kicks than Coppers from "friends" as well as "foes" why he will be a very fortunate man.

STREET AUCTIONS.—The corporation have at length enforced their edict against this detestable nuisance, which has as long been a foul blot on the character of our city. No reason can be assigned why auctioneers should be allowed to transact their business in the highways, more than other trades people. The next step should be to limit the sale of wood's &c. to some place other than the public streets.

A PERFECT TURK.—A fellow named Hempson, of Jamaica, L. I. against whom an indictment for bigamy was pending, being at large on bail, married the third wife. He was convicted and sentenced to four years and seven months imprisonment.

The Albany Phrenological Society, should procure a cast of that fellow's head, it would doubtless be an interesting study.

A GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY.—It will be seen by a reference to the daily papers, that, Mr. W. C. Little has commenced disposing of his extensive stock of books by auction. This collection comprises the latest and best editions, in the various departments of literature and science, and affords an unequalled opportunity of purchasing to the best advantage.

EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS.—The President of the United States, has, by proclamation convened both houses of Congress to meet at Washington, on the thirty-first day of May next, when "sundry weight and important matters, principally growing out of the revenue and finances of the country," will be presented to that body for their consideration.

Gen. Solomon Van Rensselaer, has been reinstated as Post-Master of this city, and will enter upon the duties thereof, on the 1st of April.

SARATOGA.—The most extensive arrangements are being made for the accommodation of visitors at this delightful watering place, for the coming season. The boarding houses are to be enlarged, and several new ones are to be erected. It is but a few years, since this populous village was a comparative wilderness; it has sprung into existence like magic. Last season the throng was unprecedented; so much so, that the accommodations were inadequate for their reception. It is supposed that the coming season will far eclipse all others, both in gayety and numbers.

SQUINTING.—This unsightly deformity, is now obviated with the utmost uncertainty, by a trifling operation, simple in its nature, and without serious pain to the patient. No person, hereafter can offer a valid excuse for looking askew at his neighbor.

JUVENILE SOVEREIGNS.—The Kingdoms of England, Spain, Portugal and Turkey, are each ruled by monarchs under the age of twenty one years.

VERY LIKE, &c.—The Rochester Advertiser says that "St. Patrick's Day was celebrated in Albany, by 25,000 persons, on the temperance principle."—This is not only creditable to a population of some 30, or 40,000 but it is likewise flattering evidence that the editor of the Advertiser possesses the principal ingredient for a good poet—a fertile imagination.

NAVIGATION.—The Robert Stevens came up the River as far as Hudson, on Thursday last, and from present appearances there will be a boat to-day or to-morrow.

P. S. The Union arrived yesterday morning at 10 o'clock.

The venerable Union is about to publish the reminiscences of his eventful life. The book cannot fail to be one of interest.

Intelligence.

THE GOV. FENNER.—Our readers, generally are already acquainted with the distressing loss of this American ship, by which 122 fellow beings were sent into eternity, with scarcely a moment's warning.—The following is the latest additional intelligence.

The following is substantially the account of the catastrophe given by the persons who were on the deck of the Nottingham when the collision occurred:

"About a quarter past two o'clock on Saturday morning, when about 15 miles to the westward of Holyhead, the weather calm, but rather thick, one of the men on the watch saw a ship bearing down upon the Nottingham. She had no light at her mast, while the steamer had three. He reported the fact to the second mate, who was then at the wheel. The second mate hailed the ship, and was answered. He directed her to starboard the helm. This, they thought, was not done. A voice from the ship, which was supposed to have been that of the captain, requested the steamer to starboard her helm, as he could not bring the ship over, she not answering her helm. At this instant the Gov. Fenner struck the Nottingham amidships. In less than five minutes she filled with water and disappeared. The steamer became quite motionless after the shock, and the people on board of her could not make the least attempt to succor those on board the ship, which sank bow foremost. The cries of the people on the wreck were heart-rending, but they soon ceased, and all was still. The steamer's starboard side was completely stove in; the paddle shaft and wheel were shivered in pieces; the starboard engine was broken, and the funnel carried away. 17 cows were killed, 7 beasts and 78 sheep were thrown overboard, and eleven died before the vessel reached port. On Saturday evening, the wreck of the Nottingham was fallen in with by another steamer, and towed into the Mersey.

"The opinion on board the Nottingham was, that the Gov. Fenner's helm, instead of being put to starboard as they supposed it was, must have been to port, for, if had been put to starboard, the ship would have cleared the steamer."

The Nottingham, was visited at Liverpool by thousands of curious spectators. Her starboard side was a complete wreck; even the houses on the dock adjoining were shivered into fragments. The dead animals, cows and sheep, covered the deck, and presented a shocking sight, most of them having been disembowelled by the concussion which caused their death.

The passengers were all below in their berths when the collision between the ship and steamer took place. The shock caused by it would, of course, rouse even those who might then have been asleep. No doubt they would make a rush towards the deck; the interval which elapsed, however, between the shock and the sinking, was so short, scarcely five minutes, that very few if any could have succeeded in reaching it. So that in all probability, they perished in the steerage. The mate had been married only a few days before the ship's sailing; the captain had given his wife a berth with her husband in the cabin. When the fate of the ship became inevitable, he attempted to run aft and rescue her. Time failed him, the instinct of self-preservation became strong, he sprang up the shrouds, and reached the steamer, as we have already stated, by jumping from the yard-arm.

The bulk of the passengers is described as being superior to the ordinary run of steerage emigrants, for there were no cabin passengers, and some of them are said to have carried out considerable property.

FOREIGN NEWS.—Twenty-two days later from England.—The British steam-ship Caledonia arrived at Boston, on Saturday last, from Liverpool, which place she left on the 4th inst.

The McLeod affair and the Boundary Question had caused much talk in England, the former at one time being the all-engrossing topic.

The Thames Tunnel is now 1138 feet 8 inches in length, and the excavation for the shaft has been made to the depth of 23 feet, leaving only about 50 ft. more to be completed.

Sir Will. Colebrooke is to succeed Sir John Harvey, Governor of New Brunswick, who has been recalled.

It was rumored in Paris on Thursday afternoon, that the French Cabinet was disposed to offer its mediation to arrange the dispute with the United States.

The report that George Kean and Ellen Tree had been privately married is contradicted by the Court Journal.

The American pack-ship President, that went on the Nore Sand, has been sold at Lloyd's for £830.

Destruction of Wynyard House.—On the night of the 26th inst., the splendid mansion of the Marquis of Londonderry, near Stockton-upon-Tees, was destroyed by fire, supposed to have originated in the overheated flues of the conservatory. The loss is stated to be between £300,000 to £400,000. The Marquis is en route to Italy from Malta and Turkey. The house was left in charge of his servants.

Mexico.—Extract of a letter from Tampico dated Feb. 10.—The commercial affairs in this place are completely paralyzed, and the consequence is that several failures have already taken place—one house for $111,000 that will not pay 25 cents.

Arista has made a formal application to the government, to be allowed to retire to private life, and it is now supposed to be an auspicious time for the Texans to make a bold stroke.—N. O. Bulletin.

The case of the "Home."—In the case of James P. Allaire, the owner of the unfortunate steamboat "Home" against the American Insurance Company, the jury yesterday morning brought in a verdict for the plaintiff, for $11,301 35 damages, and six cents costs.—The other contested claims of Mr. Allaire against sundry insurance companies, will probably abide the issue of this suit.

Saxon Antiquity.—A massive ring of pure gold has been found near Rockingham, Eng., supposed to be a Saxon abraxia, or preservative against witchcraft, &c. It is inscribed on the outer side in Saxon characters, "Gutta: Gutta: Madros: Adros:" and on the inner "Udros: Udros: Thebal:"

The Amistad Negroes, with the exception of the three little girls, left here on Thursday, in the Rail Cars for Farmington, where we understand they are to be placed on the farm of Mr. Williams, until capable of taking care of themselves.—New Haven Herald.

A CARD.—Mr. Buxton, has the pleasure to inform his friends and the public, that the Lecture, which he delivered in this city—On the Animality of the Earth—will be published in a neat Pamphlet form, of about 30 or 40 pages. Price 12½ cents—and will be delivered to Subscribers on Monday or Tuesday next.
mr. 30.

MASONRY AND RELIGION.

When first th' Almighty mandate spoke
Creation into birth;
When light from chaos' cradle broke
Upon th' astonished earth;
Then Masonry, the maid of love,
From realms of light sublime,
Came in her beauty, sent by Jove,
To join the march of time.

From that supernal Lodge of light,
Not made with hands, on high,
She came to gild the gloom of night
Beneath her native sky;
And here, in Friendship's sacred shade,
She bade her temple rise,
And, thus obey'd her sons array'd
In robes brought from the skies.

The Gods look'd down, and smil'd to see
The glorious Ark of art,
And blest the maid of Masonry,
Her hand, and generous heart,
And cry'd—from henceforth thou shalt be,
In every age and state,
The handmaid of sweet charity,
And all the virtues great.

And thou shalt be, to all the poor,
The kind and faithful friend,
In every clime, on every shore,
The helping hand to lend;
With fair Religion thou shalt go
Across the stormy wave,
To soothe the weeping widow's woe,
Poor man from sin to save.

Thus spoke the Gods—and hand and hand
With fair Religion, she Departed to each foreign land
With blessed Charity;
But oft the sons of Bigotry,
With jealousy imbued,
Cry'd out against fair Masonry,
Least she should do some good.

THE CASSIA SPRIG.

This for the dear lamented dead
Proclaims it hallowed earth.
Some frail memento, o'er the head
Of those who for their country bled,
May awe the sacrelegious tread,
And check the scoffer's mirth;
But this commands the orphan's tears;
His friend, his father slumbers here.

We plant this little withering stem
Amid this broken sod.
Though frail, far dearer than the gem
Of earthly star and diadem;
And he who scorns it, would condemn
The wonder working rod
Of him, who made the mountain burst
And slake a dying nation's thirst.

What though from this aye holy earth
The morrow may remove
This token; desolating dearth
Of pure, serene, terrestrial worth!
The spirit shall awake to birth
In perfect strength above;
Reckless if death shall sweep away,
All memory of his earthly stay.

Come then, child of adversity,
And weep above this grave,
If ever, amid the agony
Of ruthless cold and hunger, he,
With one bright tear of sympathy,
Stretched out the hand to save;
Come, weep; weep on, the hand which did
Such mercies, is forever hid!

From the New-York Evening Post

MY BOY'S BIRTH DAY.

"—You gods, look down,
"And from your secret vials pour your graces,
"Upon my dear child's head."—SHAKESPEARE.

This day, my absent, blue eyed boy,
Thy heart drank in its light of life:
This day, a mother found a joy,
And smiled at pangs that pained the wife.

Oh, may thy little seed of mind
Expand to flowers of brightest hue;
And prove to her, like southern wind,
Just breathing o'er the violets blue,

God bless thee, boy! a father's tears
Are mingling with a father's cries;
And thus, he joins his prayers with fears,
Blessings with sorrows, saddest sighs.

God bless thee, boy, and bear thee up
From fest'ring guilt's corroding chain—
From bitter draughts of sorrow's cup—
From dulle disease—from active pain—

From all thy sins thy sire has known,
And all the griefs he yet may know,
As o'er the world he wends alone,
Far from the pleasant water's flow.

Be thou, in boyhood, pure in thought,
Blooming like Adon's almond rod—
In manhood, strong, unstained unbought—
In age, a relic, fit for God.

And, though I fill a foreign tomb,
Or, for thy good, am doomed to rove,
Chase thou away a mother's gloom,
Never forget a mother's love.

A mother's love—a mother's love—
Remember that, my glowing boy:
It lasts like an eternal grove—
It knows no chance, has no alloy.

Repose each wish with her warm heart,
Give all thy griefs to her warm breast,
From her pure precepts ne'er depart,
And heaven, my boy, will give thee rest.

God Bless thee, thy mother too,
Until my beams (so rightly shorn)
Return with fire of fairer hue,
When plenty shall exalt my horn.

Until that day, my absent boy,
Let her who loves thee stoop thy knee;
And, calming down thy childish joy,
Hallow thy lips with prayers for me.

FAIR CLARA.

Fair Clara was a comely maid,
As any to be found;
Her wit and beauty have been said,
To charm the country round:
But ah! she would not, lovely girl,
At one thing take rebuff;
Still she would rub her teeth of pearl,
I blush to say, with snuff.

Such virtues you can seldom find,
In one sweet maid agree;
Blest with an educated mind,
As well as charity;
To view her lips of ruby red,
To love were charm enough;
But ah! those lovely lips she fed,
But ah! I scorn to say, with snuff.

The features of her beauteous face,
Were dear to soul and eye;
And on her form sat many a grace,
Her dress of crimson dye:
None of her features, save her chin,
From beauty's mould was rough;
And that without, and that within,
Was stained with filthy snuff.

Young Damon came to woo—her breast
With generous passion rove;
Upon her lips a kiss impressed,

The tribute of his love:
But ah! her balmy breath he found,
A most unpleasant puff;
His angel with the graces crown'd
A devotee to SNUFF.

Yet still his bosom felt the pang,
Of love still lingering there;
And whilst the beauteous Clara sang,
He thus addressed the fair—
"Claim me, my dear one, for thy own,
Nor at me take rebuff;"
She placed her hand above her zone,
Upon her box of SNUFF.

Still she continued every day
The same thing o'er and o'er;
Her lovely looks soon flew away,
And beauty was no more:
Her skin assumed a yellow hue,
Her lips were dark and rough;
Her teeth were neither black or blue,
But like the solid SNUFF.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY

NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptability to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 8 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock. mr. 12

MASONIC.

ADDRESS.

Delivered before Austin Lodge, in the Republic of Texas, Jan. 1st 1841.

BY DAVIDS. KAUFMAN.

Loyalty to the sex is the distinguishing characteristic of every genuine craftsman, and he that proves recreant to this trust we discard as an exotic!

Although woman is not permitted to share in our labors, yet our wages are freely and liberally divided with her. The uninitiated may disbelieve our professions, but the testimony of thousands and tens of thousands of widows and orphans rise upon judgment against them and condemn them. The charity of Masons, like the dew of Hermon, visits its objects noiselessly, and without ostentation. The destitute receive, and the world knows it not. Their necessities are relieved, and they themselves hardly know the hand which pluck them from despair. Although as yet a novice in the craft, and only on the threshold of the Temple, I would not exchange the feelings occasioned by the little good it has made me instrumental in doing for all the honors and distinctions which the favor of the world can bestow.

There are many, however, who acknowledge the benefits arising from Masonry, but object to it on account of its secrecy. This is the main cement of our union, and the foundation of its permanency. Take this away, and our venerable fabric falls to the ground; abolish this, and the lovely streams which adorn and beautify the moral earth are at once swallowed up and lost in the great ocean of the world. Associated together for no pecuniary, selfish, or worldly purposes, it is necessary to our ends that we should retire into the sanctuary of privacy to accomplish our noble designs. Will it, however, be denied that any benefits arise from union?—The day was when such a dogma might have been advanced; but, thank God, that day is past and gone! We live, emphatically, in the age of Associations;—associated capital has penetrated Europe and America with artificial rivers; it has propelled the steam car with the rapidity of the wind, and ploughed our rivers with the majestic steam boat.—It has dragged wealth from the bowels of the earth; has made the temperate zone subsidiary to the torrid, and the torrid to the temperate; has almost annihilated time and space, and brought together what ignorance had too long kept assunder,—it has converted nations from rivals into friends,—ameliorated the horrors of war, and begun to lay the foundations of that era “when the sword shall be converted into the plough-share, and the spear into the pruning-hook.” And shall it be said that an association for moral purposes ought to be discouraged? Can a principle so successful in the progress of physical improvement operate injuriously when applied to the moral amelioration of mankind? Are we so much of utilitarians that every thing we hold dear must be sacrificed for physical improvement? Is Friendship to be proscribed? and can no temple be erected to Charity, without which all other virtues would be as “a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal?” Will it be considered as a useless waste of time to endeavor to square our actions by the principles of morality, and circumscribe our desires in every varied station of life that our lot may be cast? But I need no further interrogate; I know your answer—I appreciate it.

Masonry, like Christianity, though humble in its origin, and born as it were in a manger, has attained a lofty and elevated stand, and now numbers among its disciples many of the powerful of the earth. It is no respecter of persons, and in the sacred recesses of the Temple all meet as equals. The monarch is lost in the man; and his subjects, as men, are at once put upon an equality as masons. Brothers of the same extended family, we share the same burthens, and enjoy the same exemptions. Our labor and refreshments are one, and we set under the same vine and the same fig-tree. This principle of our order must commend it to the approbation of all. The feelings of human liberty and natural equality are engraved on every human heart, and an institution which recognizes these feelings cannot but be right, at least, in that respect. We work with our equals, and before our peers, bound to us by the strong ties of friendship, we lay our plights. In the chequered scenes of life, so beautifully represented by the Mosaic pavement of the Lodge, we should be overtaken by adversity or encountered by misfortune, we can lay our sorrows before our brothers unsubjected to the censorious criticism of a cold and unfeeling world. Should an untoward fate consign a brother's wife and children to a premature widowhood and orphanage; his dying bed will feel soft from the gratifying reflection that he leaves behind him those who will be a friend to the widow, and a father to the orphan. Oh, who would not flee to this city of refuge from the persecutions, bickerings and casualties of this world? Who would not search for the treasure-board of Masonry, on which he will find drawn those beautiful designs from which he can build up his own happiness and that of his family here and hereafter. I cannot tell what others may feel, but as for myself, when I look at the ancient origin of our institution, the sacred character of its patrons, the universality of its extent, comprehending the four quarters of the globe, and knitting together into one family men of every tribe, kindred and tongue; the unbroken chain of tradition which leads us back to the early ages, and has transmitted to us unwritten and unimpaired the landmarks of our order; when I see it silently like a ministering angel relieving the wants of the needy, administering comfort to the broken-hearted, inculcating the cardinal virtues, and enjoining “peace and good will to men,” I am forced to exult in the badge of a Mason, and to admit that it is more ancient than the Golden Fleece or Roman Eagle, more honorable than the Star and Garter, and more lasting than the pearls of princes or the diadems of kings.

Will it then any longer be contended that this institution is injurious, and ought to be discontinued? Can a moral arch, the key-stone of which is benevolence be detrimental to the interests of a community? Can an edifice contrived by wisdom, supported by strength and adorned by beauty, offend the taste of the most fastidious? Will the ignorant and designing, for selfish purposes, continue to aim the shafts of malice against it on account of its supposed danger to republican institutions? The charge carries on its face its own refutation. Look at the long and distinguished list of republicans who have adorned and still adorn our order, and you can no longer doubt. See at the head of it the sage of Mt. Vernon, the warrior of America and the patriot of the world,—who said to his native land, “Let there be light!” and there was light; the man who spoke and fought millions of human beings into the blessings of freedom; who knew how to conquer not only armies, but himself; who would have been deified by the ancients, and is adored by us; and whose monument is built in the hearts of freemen every where. See next on the roll the name of the French Marquis who abjured monarchy for the right of republicanism,—who left the ease and luxuries of the Old World to battle in the cause of the New; and who, after he had seen the “stars and stripes” firmly planted on the ruins of Tyranny, returned to his country carrying back with him his republican principles, and endeavoring to give to the Great Nation of his birth the principles of a rational liberty. Look again and you will see the name of the bold and intrepid Franklin, who at one time seized the fiery bolt of heaven's wrath, and conducted it harmless to the earth; at another when he saw the mountain wave of faction hanging over the little vessel of state, and just about to strike it into the yawning gulf beneath, threw it upon the threatening billow, averted impending destruction, and calmed the elemental fury of the human passions; and yet at another condescending to teach his fellow-citizens the principles of economy, and to communicate in distiches truths which have infused happiness into many a humble cottage, and which of themselves entitle him to immortality. There too, you will find the name of Thomas Jefferson, the friend of man, the foe of tyrants, the author of the sentiment that “Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God;” the man, every event of whose life seemed to act out the proud motto of that untried commonwealth that gave him birth,—“Sic semper Tyrannis.”

I might mention as a remarkable fact, but one perhaps that is not generally known, that every major-general in the Revolutionary War of 1776 was a Mason, except Benedict Arnold, the TRAITOR!! At this sacred font they imbibed draughts which invigorated and refreshed their patriotic zeal—which chastened and restrained private ambition, and controlled it to the advancement of a nation's cause and a people's freedom. Arnold was without the pale of its happy and restraining influence; he fell a victim to his unbridled ambition, and his name has become the very synonym for treachery and baseness throughout the world. Take another view and you will see the names of a Jackson, a De Witt Clinton, a Livingston, a Clay, and a thousand other stars of the first magnitude, which adorn the republican galaxy, and at the same time have been humble votaries at the shrine of Free Masonry. Their patriotism cannot be questioned, and will a calumny be thrown out upon their memories and their names in the shape of an attack on the venerable institution which they adorned by their virtues, and illustrated by their genius? Forbid it justice!—forbid it gratitude!

Abuses no doubt have been committed under the sacred name of Masonry, but it met not with her sanction. Errors will attend the progress of every thing human, and of every institution however good may be its objects. Judas betrayed his master, and yet the other eleven merit neither censure nor execration for his purchased treachery. Christians' so called, have tied to the stake and burned unoffending victims for the exercise of freedom of thought; and yet the religion which they professed and profaned teaches forbearance, mercy and love. The abuses of Christianity have been many and great; and as well for these causes might you proscribe the one as the other. No! such missiles when directed against the shield and panoply of truth are blunted, and fall innoxious at her feet, or recoil upon those that winged their arrowy flight. Whatever may be the trials and tribulations of Masonry, its onward march is certain as destiny:—she follows in the wake of empire, of civilization and of christianity; and wherever their banners are planted her temples will spring up at their side!

It is a melancholy reflection, my dear friends, that we must all soon pass to the cold and silent tomb.—The sands of life are rapidly, though imperceptibly, passing away from the hour-glass of each and every one of us, and “the places which know us now, will soon know us no more forever.” Our young and beautiful country will rise and culminate, but her sun, like that of all other nations, must set. The decline and fall of every nation is as certain as its rise and progress; and although every patriot may pray in his heart “esto perpetua,” yet it is a dream which posterity can never realize. But although we, and nations, must go the way of all living, Masonry will outlive the mutations of man and of empires! Her existence is independent of national compacts! Her home and country are the whole earth! Founded on the affections of the human heart, which are always and every where the same, her temple is unsubjected to the gusts of human passions, the tempest of faction, and the rage of party violence! Their black clouds may lover around and discharge their thunders at her base but eternal sunshine rests upon her head, lifted far above the rage of terrestrial tumult! So will it be! "So mote it be!" Christians! encourage it, for it is the beautiful hand-maid of Religion! Citizens, protect it, for it is conservative of social order. Parents, revere it, for it may reclaim your beloved offspring from vice, and lead them in the peaceful and pleasant path of virtue! Woman, cherish it, for although its labors are not yours, yet you are, and always shall be, the chosen recipients of its bounties! Patriots, foster it, for in the battle's front those who have been taught to wipe away the tear of the widow and orphan, will not be found wanting.

As for you, my honored Brothers, who have been initiated into the mysteries of the temple, who know and appreciate its objects, it is unnecessary for me to urge upon you their importance. I may be permitted however, with great humility, to press upon you the necessity of strictly adhering to its principles. This portion of Masonry's vineyard is committed to our keeping; and oh! may we be enabled to give a good account of our stewardship. We are acting not only for ourselves and country, but for the cause of Masonry throughout the world. Men, as we are, and fallible as we must be, subject to a thousand temptations, may Divine Assistance enable us to avoid them all. May we live together in unity and peace, and may the endeared appellation of brother prove to us something more than a name. May all bickerings and contentions be banished forever from our associations, and may brotherly love prevail in all our lodges. May our light so shine, that others seeing our good works may receive profit thereby. The world is not only regarding our efforts at self-government with anxious eyes, but our brotherhood, every where, view our infatigable efforts in the cause of our order, with the most painful solicitude. On this very day, petitions are sent up in our behalf, by our brothers in foreign lands, mingling a proud recollection of the past with an anxious anticipation of the future. Shall they be disappointed? Your proud and loyal countenances, giving expression to the feelings of manly hearts, answer no! Let us, then, on this the natal day of one of our brightest lights, dedicate ourselves anew to the service of the temple: let us swear, like Hannibal to his country, unchanging fealty to her honor and her laws: let it be a new starting place, an era in our search after light and truth; and let us run with honor, the race that is set before us. May we catch a new inspiration from the enlivening scenes around us, the sanctity of the day, the invocation of Divine Grace, and the sweet strains of music poured forth by woman's voice, softening and mellowing all within their hallowed influence. Heaven has vouchsafed to us these proud privileges; let them not be "as pearls cast before swine."

On to-morrow we will all again be engaged in the various avocations and pursuits of life. Those who are here assembled to consult a nation's interests will soon return to the bosoms of their homes and families, perhaps to prepare for their defence,* or to sit down in the calm sunshine of peace. Whatever may be our country's fate, we have the melancholy reflection to feel that we shall never all meet again. However chequered may be our fortunes, or adverse our various fates, it is the sincere prayer of him who now addresses you, that when time shall be to us no more, and the dull cold ear of death shall be insensible to the pleasures of affection, friendship and love, that we may all meet in that lodge above, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens—"where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

"May freedom, harmony and love
Unite us in the grand design,
Beneath the omniscient eye above—
The glorious Architect divine,
That we may keep th' unerring line,
Still rising by the plummet's law,
Till order bright completely shine,
Shall be my prayer when far awa."

It was reported at this time, that a Mexican army had crossed Rio Grande to invade Texas.

An affray occurred on board the Liverpool ship Joseph Cunard, at New Orleans, on the 5th inst., in which one of the sailors gave another a fatal stab. The murderer then ran out upon the yard, plunged overboard and was drowned.

NO. 13.

REMOVAL OF THE INDIANS.

The sympathies of the philanthropist have always been with the Indians. No unprejudiced mind can trace their history without admiration of the virtues of these native sons of the forest. They were savage indeed—and we consequently look more at their barbarity, which is brought immediately before us than to the finer and loftier feelings of their uneducated nature. Their true character is often hid from our vision by the blood of their enemies—and the scenes of horror enacted around their watch-fires obscure those tender sensibilities that grow as spontaneous as the productions of the forest through which they roamed.

Could it be proved that the whites came in possession of the lands by prior discovery or cession gained without fraud, the right to remove the Indians could not be disputed. But when it is admitted that conquest, which in the light of international law is right—but not justifiable in a moral point of view, was the manner by which they became seized of these lands. It most certainly appears that the absolute right to remove the opposite party belonged to the Indians. Now the impossibility of their removing the whites does not alter the abstract principle of right. The land was theirs, and they should have disposed of it as they pleased. This was acknowledged by treating them as independent sovereignties.

It is an axiom in law that a nation can only govern the inhabitants of their own dominions, that they cannot enact an extra-territorial law, and as long therefore as both were independent, neither could have any authority over the other, and crime itself might go unpunished. Hence we see the necessity of a removal. But where does one obtain the authority to remove the other. It has never been granted, and cannot be effected except by compromise and treaty. Again it was found difficult to civilize, and almost impossible to bring them into subjection to the laws of the United States; they were not sufficiently enlightened to enter into a confederation, and thereby surrender for the general good a part of their rights. We must advance far upon the highway of civilization and improvement, before a confederation of States can be effected. It was the want of development in man's whole nature, his moral, intellectual and social being, which constitute civilization that made the old Feudal system impracticable. The Barons would give to the king paramount, no more than they were obliged to, and would endeavor to regain that little when they thought it possible, and even in our own enlightened country, where the goddess of Liberty and the genius of Christianity are harmoniously united, we see the necessity of approaching with trembling delicacy; the various questions embracing the general as well as States' rights—we see the opinions of our mightiest statesmen arrayed in opposition to each other, and even nullification rearing her hydra head as if to destroy this fair inheritance of ours. And if it is so difficult among enlightened states, it must be absolutely impossible among savages, for they will not yield their personal independence for the good of the state.

It was also impossible for government to restrain the whites from encroaching upon their rights—they would impose upon their ignorance—and administer to their baser passions for the purpose of defrauding them of their possessions. They scattered among them the evils of civilized society, with but few of its benefits, and the Indian race was fast dwindling away before the face of the white man unpitied and almost unperceived. Such being the case it would seem humane in Congress to propose some remedy for the evil, and the only one practicable, was their removal from the immediate presence of the white man; and praiseworthy and justifiable was the act considered in itself to enter into a treaty which should be solemnly ratified by both parties.

Agents of government not only imposed upon the Indian, but retained their offices after it was known to the authorities who appointed them, that fraud was practised in treating with the Indian.

And however good the Law itself might be—and whatever benefits might chance to accrue to the poor Indian by removal beyond the Mississippi—yet if he wished to remain and live where his fathers lived—if he did not choose to bid farewell to the forest through which he had so fearlessly roamed, and leave the home of his childhood as dear to him, as the white man's, he should have been permitted to stay—and base must be the agent and cruel the authority, that would impose upon the ignorance of these simple sons of nature—and take from them their possessions—the tenure of which they held from the God of Heaven.

We have endeavored, to divest ourselves of prejudice as far as possible. But we will not pretend to deny that our feelings and sympathies are in favor of the red man—we cannot but admire even their patriotism, and were we to search for the noblest manifestation of this virtue, we would as soon go to the Indian's battle field, as to the plains of Marathon; and to us the last war whoop of Philip is in perfect unison with the dying groan of Leonidas. Demosthenes himself might have taken lessons in oratory from these wild orators, for their speeches contain all the power of truth, with the simplicity and poetry of nature. The lasting friendship of Logan, and the unrestrained confidence of Pocahontas find no parallel in Greece or Rome. Yet the cry of the avaricious white has ever been "exterminate the savage," and the act has corresponded with the cry. And well may it be feared, that Justice will not long delay. The belt of vengeance will soon come; for nations suffer the penalties of their sins as well as individuals. It is not enough to pursue them according to the rules of warfare, but dogs of war, of Cuba production, must be let loose to drive them from the swamps no white man dare inhabit.

CHRONOLOGY.

The wise man hath said "there is a time for every thing;" and it would be but a fair inference from another saying of the same high authority, were we to assert that "there has been a time for every thing," or, to use a slight degree of inversion, it might be more true that "every thing has had its time."

We will not, especially in this age of supposed wonders, hazard the maintenance of the proverb, "there is nothing new under the sun," or assert its truth in every sense; nor is it essential to our purpose that we should. Let it be understood, at the starting point, in case our lucubrations (not vegeti annorum, for we are modest) which follow, may not disclose it, that the true and bona fide, real and downright intention of this article, when we began it, was and still is, to show, by powerful and irresistible arguments and reasonings profound, that Chronology is useful and necessary. What our purpose may be, at the close, it has not yet entered into our mind to imagine, and the dim and unfathomable future and the indomitable patience of our indulgent and partial readers can alone discover. If we wander from the track on which we have struck, let it be attributed to the faintness of its outline and the tangled brushwood that covers it, and not to any deficiency in our own sight or our negligent attention.

What is history? This is no easy question to answer, if we derive that answer either from most of the books which are dignified with the title of histories, or from the various definitions which have been given of it. Is it the narration of events? Let us see. Suppose we were now to inform our readers, that the United States of America declared war against Great Britain, that Robert Bruce gained a victory over the English army at Bannockburn, that Louis XIV. of France revoked the edict of Nantes, and that Socrates was condemned by his countrymen to drink a cup of hemlock. Would our readers, partial as we may suppose them to be, ascribe to us the dignity of historians.—We imagine not; nor would we gain a right to it by adding the date at which these several events occurred. There is evidently something wanting yet. Suppose we were to arrange these and numerous other events in the order of time, would we approach any nearer the idea of a history? We suppose one would and for this reason, which is the very gist of all these suppositions we have been making. A narration of events in the order of their occurrence is, it is true, not a history in its proper sense, but it is the next thing to it, because this element of time enables us to introduce the only remaining element necessary to fulfil the idea of a history. By means of a chronological arrangement, we are enabled to exhibit the dependency of events upon each other, to point out causes and effects, and trace the motives of action and their consequences. Without this arrangement, it is evident we might mistake effects for their causes, and would certainly be entirely at a loss to determine the motives which produced the actions we undertake to relate, and thus lose every advantage which properly belongs to history. The mere fact that the battle of Waterloo, some one remarks, was fought and that Napoleon Buonaparte was there defeated, would be exceedingly barren of information to us, compared to what it signifies, when we are informed that on this battle hung the fate of empires, the peace of Europe, and it may be, of the world.

Lord Karnes says a perfect history is the relation of interesting facts connected with their motives and consequences. Whether this be a correct definition or not, depends upon the limit ascribed to the word 'interesting'—Sir Isaac Newton seems to have appreciated the importance of the science of chronology, from the labor which he bestowed upon the preparation of his chronological tables. His mind was so accurately constituted, run, as it were, in a mathematical mould, that he was not satisfied in any case with an approximation to truth, and the result of his labor showed how much error had existed unknown in the former chronological tables.

Should we say "such a thing happened to-morrow" every one would laugh at the ludicrousness of the mistake, and would immediately perceive the errors to which it would lead, yet this is trifling in comparison with some anachronisms that have occurred in histories. Locke, in his Essay on the Human Understanding or in that on Education says,—but we know our readers are tired, and therefore we will let them find it for themselves—and find our way home again as quickly as possible.

CHARACTER.

LUCRETIA GRENVILLE.

This exalted female was betrothed to Francis Duke of Buckingham, at the time that he fell in battle by the hand of Cromwell himself, and upon receiving intelligence of the melancholy event, she swore to avenge his death on the murderer. During the three succeeding years she exercised herself with pistols in firing at a portrait of Cromwell, which she had selected as a mark, that she might not be awed by the sight of the original, and, as soon as she found herself perfect, she sought an opportunity to gratify her revenge. But Cromwell seldom appeared in public, and when he did, it was with such precaution, that but few could approach his person.

An occasion at length occurred.—The city of London resolved to give a magnificent banquet in honor of the protector, who either from vanity, or with a political view, determined to make his entrance into London in all the splendor of royalty. Upon this being made public, the curiosity of all ranks was excited; and Lucretia Grenville resolved not to lose so favourable an opportunity. Fortune herself seemed to second her purpose; for it so happened that the procession was appointed to proceed through the very street in which she resided, and a balcony before the first story of her house yielded her full scope for putting her long premeditated design in effect.

On the appointed day she seated herself, with several other female companions, in the balcony, having on this occasion, for the first time since her lover's death, cast off her mourning, and attired herself in the most sumptuous apparel. It was not without the greatest exertions that she concealed the violent emotion under which she laboured; and when the increasing pressure of the crowd indicated the approach of Cromwell, it became so strong that she nearly fainted, but, however, recovered just as the Usurper arrived within a few paces of the balcony.

Hastily drawing the pistol from under her garment, she fearlessly took her aim and fired; but a sudden start, which the lady who sat next to her made, on beholding the weapon, gave it a different direction than was intended, and the ball striking the horse rode by Henry the Protector's son, it was laid dead at his feet.

The circumstance immediately arrested the progress of the cavalcade; and Cromwell, at the same time that he cast a fierce look at the balcony, beheld a singular spectacle. About twenty females were on their knees imploring his mercy with uplifted hands, whilst one only stood undaunted in the midst of them, and looking down contemptuously on the Usurper, exclaimed, "Tyrant! it was I who dealt the blow; nor should I be satisfied with killing a horse instead of a tiger, were I not convinced that, before another twelvemonth has elapsed, Heaven will grant another that success which it has denied to me!"

The multitude, actuated more by fear than by love, was prepared to level the house to the ground, when Cromwell cried aloud, with the most artful sang froid, "Desist, my friends! alas, poor woman, she knows not what she does," and pursued his course; but afterwards caused Lucretia to be arrested and confined in a mad house.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

WAR ELEPHANTS.

The number of elephants employed in the armies of the Mongol sovereigns appears almost incredible, when we recollect the quantity of food necessary for the support of each individual. The grand Khan Kublai is said to have possessed five thousand, and capt. Jenkins, who was at Ayga in 1607, and delivered a letter from King James to the Emperor Jehangir, relates that the Emperor had "twelve thousand elephants, about five thousand with teeth, the rest females and young ones." The Emperor Akbar, the predecessor of Jehangir, allotted two hundred elephants to every toman, or ten thousand of his cavalry.

These huge and powerful animals were trained to the dreadful business of war, and seemed to acquire a pleasure in aiding the wishes of their masters. They were covered with armour formed of plates of steel joined together by chains, so as especially to defend the trunk, head, and other parts of the body. On the back of these animals wooden towers filled with archers were secured, who poured down their missiles upon the infantry, being almost out of danger themselves, as the elephants were protected not only by their dense skins and superadded armour, but by their formidable trunks, wielded with death-dealing force against the assailants.

Can anything be conceived more dreadful than a field of battle covered with several hundred thousand combatants, armed with swords, spears, axes, and missile weapons, while a host of elephants are rushing on their ranks? At their irresistible onset, thousands are dashed to the earth and trampled under foot—a blow from the trunk sends the stunned horseman to the earth—a thrust with the tusk hurls the terrified steed among his comrades, while the huge beast, urging forward his enormous weight, strews the ground with horrible carnage. Still he is under the government of the rider who sits upon his neck, and his work of destruction is systematically pursued. But his trunk is thrown aloft, his ear erected, his mouth expanded, and a protracted, shrill, and piercing scream uttered; the appearance of a horseman has entered his neck—frantic with pain, he seizes his conductor with his trunk, and flings him into the air; he breaks from the ranks and plunges onwards through the field, regardless whether friends or foes are destroyed, and continues his devastating course until exhausted by wounds and agony he sinks at last among the slaughtered, destroying in his fall all those who may have been safely conveyed through the previous horrors in the towers upon his back! To render the elephants more efficient in fight, large sabres, daggers, and other offensive weapons were fastened to their tusks, and every care was taken to inspire them with fury against their opposers.

VARIETY.

WALPOLE'S BRIBERY.

Sir Robert Walpole is accused of having been more guilty of bribery than ministers in general. A well-known phrase is attributed to him, that "every man has his price;" but he also declared, that ministers were often tempted than tempting.

In a warm debate in the House of Commons, Sir Robert, who was standing next to Mr. Levison, said to him, "You see with what zeal and vehemence these gentlemen oppose, and yet I know the price of every man in this house except three, and your brother is one of them." The brother was Lord Gower, who soon, however, lessened the number of incorruptibles, by his defection.

On another occasion, Sir Robert wanted to carry a question in the House of Commons, to which he knew there would be great opposition, and which was disliked by some of his dependants. As he was passing through the Court of Requests, he met a member of the contrary party, whose avarice he imagined would not reject a large bribe. He took him aside, and said, "such a question comes on this day; give me your vote, and here is a bank bill of £2000," which he put into his hands. The member made him this answer: "Sir Robert you have lately served some of my particular friends; and when my wife was last at court, the king was very gracious to her, which must have happened at your instance. I should, therefore, think myself very ungrateful (putting the bank bill into his pocket) if I were to refuse the favor you are now pleased to ask of me."

Improvement in the Daguerreotype.—Hitherto it has been found impossible for the Daguerreotype to fix the impression of any moving object, such as the clouds the sails of vessels, &c. M. Daguerre, however, has authorized M. Arago to announce to the Academic des Sciences that he has succeeded in overcoming this great difficulty, and has discovered the means of catching a complete image of any moving object in less than a second.—Galleggi.

"An English engineer named Coppet, arrived in France with the plan of a tunnel from Dover to Calais, which is not to cost more than a thousand millions of francs. The tunnel is to consist of a series of iron tubes, eighteen feet in diameter and three feet in thickness. The next step will be to build a bridge over the Atlantic to New-York."

POPULAR TALES.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

THE INVALID OF ALICANT.

A TRUE STORY.

"Who is that most interesting pair?" said I to a friend, as we paced slowly along one of the most retired portions of the public walk or alameda at Alicante. As I spoke, I pointed to two persons, who had for some minutes past rivetted my whole attention. These were a gentleman and lady, both extremely young, the first being seemingly little more than twenty, and his companion still considerably under it. The customary order in which the sexes usually walk together, was in this case reversed. The gentleman leant upon the lady's arm, and in truth, his looks betokened greatly the want of support. He was sadly emaciated in person, and his countenance, though it appeared ever to bear a smile for her by his side, had entirely lost the hue of health and strength. Yet his pale features and wasted figure were still full of beauty and elegance; and one could see that if unaffected by illness, or restored to convalescence, his form would be a model of manly grace. The youthful lady on whose arm his own rested, was also of most attractive appearance; but the most captivating point about her was the deep interest and constant attention she showed towards her invalid companion. She hung upon his every look, watched avoidingly every little inequality of ground, and seemed, in short, as if she would fain have prevented the winds of heaven from visiting his face too roughly.

Such were they who arrested my eye on the walk at Alicante, and respecting whom I put the question, "Who is this interesting pair?" to the lady who was my companion. That lady was the wife of an English gentleman, resident for many years at Alicante, and who was well acquainted with the society of the place, as well as with its manners and customs. She looked at the gentleman and lady to whom I directed her notice, and immediately exclaimed, "Ah, my dear friend, your eye has indeed alighted on an object of real interest. That is no common pair, and their story is no common one." "Then, I pray, let me hear it, if it is in your power to do so," said I, still following with my eye the slow onward motions of the pale invalid and his fair supporter. "All Alicante can tell the story, as you would soon have learned, had you been longer here," returned my companion; "yet few, I believe, know the particulars so fully as I myself do; a circumstance arising from my being acquainted with a most intimate friend of the unfortunate gentleman whom you have now seen. Turn aside to this shady seat below the lime-tree, and you shall hear the story." I obeyed my kind friend, though still glancing after the objects of my sympathy—and not of mine only, for I could plainly see that every passing group on the walks cast on them looks of the deepest respect and pity.

"The worn and wasted figure, whom you have looked on with so much interest," began my companion, when we had seated ourselves, "was but a few years ago, the gayest and most admired of the officers of the First Royal Horse Regiment, stationed at Valencia. Signor Cazalla, for such was his designation, had distinguished himself almost in boyhood in Ferdinand's service, and having the advantages of birth and family to back him, rose, by the time he was twenty, to the rank of colonel. Shortly afterwards, his duties brought him to Alicante, not far from which his family lived. In Alicante, where he found both friends and relatives, he mingled freely with the society of the place, and won the love and respect of all, by his personal qualities and winning manners. His friends wished him to marry, but the individual whom they selected for him, though young and beautiful, was not she towards whom his affections tended. He had been but a short time in Alicante, when he saw and loved a young lady, a member of one of the first and wealthiest families of the place. Baltazara Perez, was perhaps the most perfect specimen that could be any where seen of true Spanish beauty—a lustrous, glowing daughter of the south, with features charmingly formed, and an eye dark and reflective as a pool by night. In the favorite national dance, where her exquisite, though almost girlish proportions were finely displayed, Baltazara was first seen and admired by Cazalla. Observing her afterwards to be addressed by Don Pedro de Rivar, a gentleman whom he knew the colonel seized the opportunity, and gained an introduction through the medium of this acquaintance. He danced with the young beauty, talked with her, and loved her.

Opportunities frequently occurred afterwards, in the course of the assemblies and parties of the town, for the confirmation of the colonel's passion, as far as such a circumstance depended on the mere sight of the object in the company of others. But it was a much more difficult matter to obtain any chance of private conversation. The parents of Baltazara received few visitors, although they did not forbid the junior members of their family from appearing in public. Yet, though the colonel could see the object of his love only in crowds, he saw enough of her to give him some hopes that she was not insensible to his attentions. His anxious eye was ever comparing her conduct to himself with her behaviour to others, and in spite of all his fears he could not help believing that she distinguished him from the host of flatterers around her. This encouraged him to hope, and to make his manner more and more expressive of his feelings: for it was by his manner alone, under the circumstances, that he could express them. He observed no displeasure, but the reverse in consequence. At length he ventured to seize a favourable chance of revealing his passion in whispered words, and though no return was made in the same way, he had the delight of being satisfied that his meaning, while undeniably understood, was by no means distasteful to Baltazara Perez.

I am thus particular, my dear friend, in detailing these circumstances, because they bear sadly upon the sequel of the story." I interrupted the recital here. "Tell me one thing," said I, "for my curiosity can be no longer restrained on the point. Was the lady whom we saw supporting Cazalla, Baltazara Perez?" "She was not," replied my friend. "Psha!" muttered I, "the old story. A case of jilting—and a broken heart! And that must have been merely his sister; I see it all!" "You see it not; you cruelly wrong the sex by these words," said my friend, with some asperity; this is a tale for man to blush at, but for woman to glory in. However, pray let me go on. I had told you that Cazalla became at length satisfied that his passion was returned by Baltazara, and he resolved to bring matters to an issue. But this was no easy task. He had never visited at the house of Baltazara's parents, and the strange etiquette of Spanish life prevents the lover, if he appears acknowledge in that character, till accepted and affianced, from having domestic interviews with his mistress. Colonel Cazalla wished to know Baltazara's mind decisively, and in this emergency he bethought himself of using the services of a friend, the same Don Pedro de Rivar already mentioned, who was intimate with the father and family of the object of Cazalla's affection. Don Pedro was a man of middle age, one who had long led a loose single life. He had ever courted the society of Cazalla, and professed a great friendship for him. As de Rivar was a man of birth, mixed in the best society, and bore a fair character with the world, Cazalla had not repelled his advances. To this personage the Colonel had now recourse. "My dear Don Pedro," said he, when he had got de Rivar seated, by invitation, at his table, "you can do me a great, an unappreciable favour." "You have but to name it, Colonel, and, if practicable, it is done." "I love Baltazara Perez," returned Cazalla, succeeding by an effort in opening the business which lay at his heart. "This is no secret, Colonel," replied Don Pedro: "no secret, at least, to me." "Others, I am certain, have no idea of it," said the Colonel, somewhat startled; "you must have observed closely, de Rivar." "I am a friend of the family," returned Don Pedro, hastily, "and of course—" "And it is because you are a friend to the family," interrupted the young Colonel, "that I now speak to you of this. I love Baltazara; I hope, nay, I have the blessed belief that she loves me also; but it is through you that I trust to become assured of it beyond all doubt, and to make her mine." The ice thus broken, the lover found no difficulty in detailing all his wishes.

Don Pedro de Rivar promised ultimately to do all that the ardent and ingenuous lover required. He engaged to seek an interview with Baltazara Perez, to make an unreserved declaration of Cazalla's passion for her, and to bear back to him the lady's reply. Confident almost, from the feelings he conceived her to have evinced towards him, that the answer of his mistress would be favorable, and such, in short as would permit him to avow his passion openly, and make advances for their union, Colonel Cazalla saw Don Pedro depart after the interview, with elation and hope. He knew that the stayed age of de Rivar, and his intimacy with the family, would render it an easy task for him to procure the desired interview with Baltazara. And that interview Don Pedro did obtain. But most unlooked-for was the result. When the emissary returned he announced to the lover that Baltazara had rejected his suit with haughty scorn. Don Pedro declared himself to have pled warmly, but without any other effect than producing reiterated expressions of contempt. The lady's last words, he said, were "The suit and the suitor I alike scorn and despise." It would be difficult to describe the shock which Cazalla received at this news. The blow was the more stunning because truly unexpected. The unsuccessful messenger attempted to console the lover, but the colonel could only wring his friend's hand, and entreat to be left alone. When he was in solitude, it is possible that the assurance which he felt of Baltazara's having, tacitly at least, encouraged his passion, might have led him actually to doubt the reality of all that he had been told, had not an unfortunate piece of evidence presented itself in corroboration of the statement of Don Pedro. Previously to having recourse to the aid of that individual, Cazalla ever occupied with the attempt to discover a mode of corresponding with the object of his love, had been tempted to endeavor to effect his purpose through one of the servants of the family. This personage fell in his way immediately after he had seen Don Pedro, and unhappily was enabled to confirm the latter's statement, by having overheard the last words of Baltazara, "The suit and the suitor I alike scorn and despise." Though this corroboration was scarcely needed, it confirmed Cazalla's despair. He thought the circumstances clear beyond doubt, and, still mindful of the encouragement he conceived himself to have received, he concluded Baltazara Perez to be a 'coquette—a heartless, worthless flirt.' The issue was—although he struggled against it with his whole strength of mind—that for a time he was an inmate of his chamber and bed.

His friends gathered around him, and when he recovered partly from the shock, he tacitly and almost passively followed their advice and wishes, and became the wedded husband of Donna Inez, the young lady whom they had previously chosen for him. Before he had met Baltazara, he had seen much of this lady, having at the time something of the feeling of Juliet.

"I'll look to life, if nothing liking more."

Though the sight of Baltazara, had utterly banished the idea of Inez from his mind, yet from her mind the impression left by him had not fled so readily, and it was with deep though silent joy that she became his wife, trusting, by the depth of her loving kindness, to remove the cloud that seemed to hang upon his brow. Such were the circumstances under which their union took place.

The irrevocable step had not been many weeks taken, and the married pair were living at a short distance from Alicante, when common report brought into their circle the intelligence that Baltazara Perez was ill—not expected long to live. Cazalla could not hear of the circumstance without agitation, though he was far from dreaming of the whole truth. But he did learn it. While alone one day in his dwelling, he was surprised by the announcement of a visitor—and that visitor the father of Baltazara. The old man was usually calm and grave in deportment, but on this occasion there was also a sternness in his manner. "Colonel Cazalla," said he, disregarding the seat offered to him by the Colonel, "my child—I need not say which—is ill—dying. Her mother's prayers have at length wrung from her the secret that has blighted her young heart, and is bringing her to the grave. You, sir, professed to love her, won her whole affections, and then left her to die!" "Hold, sir," exclaimed the Colonel, "this is an error. There has been, if you speak truth, an awful, a killing mistake." "Are you not now the husband of another? (resumed the old man;) but I come not to reproach you with vain words, nor shall I, or kinsman of mine, lift hand against you. I have but told you what has been the result of your conduct. If you have the heart of a human being in your bosom, the knowledge that you have taken from her parents the sweetest, the most dutiful—” The father could not continue, and was about to turn abruptly away, when Cazalla exclaimed, “For the love of heaven, stay and hear me, old man! This is error—madness! Baltazara cast me off—scorned me and my love, ere I wedded another! Pedro de Rivar, your own and your family’s friend, bore to your daughter the open avowal of an affection, which had been often before evinced by look and manner—Had the answer been other than it was, I should then have addressed myself to you; but Baltazara rejected and despised me.” “Pedro de Rivar!” said Perez; “he sought and obtained, I know well, an interview with my child, but it was to proffer his own hand, nor did we blame her for rejecting it. Your words, young man, may be true—” “They are too true,” cried the Colonel, pacing the apartment in a state of agony. “Oh, fool that I was to believe in the inconstancy of one so sweet, so lovely! I have been miserably duped—and now your daughter and myself—and others also, are irrevocably lost and wretched, through the arts of a villain—a treacherous villain, whom I was a madman to trust!”

Cazalla’s distraction was too plainly sincere to allow the father of Baltazara to entertain any further doubt of his fidelity, or of the wickedness of de Rivar. Painful as the subject was, a full explanation took place, and when they parted, it was on terms of sad and strange friendship, and with the understanding, felt rather than expressed, that the truth should be explained to her who had suffered most from the grievous misconception. For some time afterwards the Colonel remained buried in grief; but rage at the villain who had deceived him, by degrees gained the ascendancy over more depressing feelings, and restored him for the time to his wonted energies. Avoiding the sight of his poor wife, he left his house, mounted his horse, and took the way to Alicante, determined to wring the truth from the wretch’s heart. He was not long in finding Don Pedro, and in explaining his business.—The heartless, hardened traitor only laughed at the charge. “How could you be so silly, Colonel,” said he, sneeringly, “as to imagine I would take the trouble to plead any man’s cause? I loved the girl myself, and for myself I spoke.” “Wretch!” exclaimed Cazalla, “why then accept the pledge which I was mad enough to give you?” “Oh, my good Colonel, all stratagems, you know, are fair in love. I never had confidence, I confess, to speak my mind till I saw you coming forward.” “Draw, infamous villain,” cried the Colonel, almost exasperated to madness, “draw, if you would not be beat like a dog on the public walk!” Don Pedro retained his coolness; “there is no occasion for that, Colonel. Only let us retire a little way, where we may be more comfortable.” They did so, and fought.

On that night Colonel Cazalla was conveyed to his home, wounded in the chest by the sword of his adversary. Don Pedro also was wounded, and much more seriously to appearance. But, alas! the Colonel’s proved the more permanent injury. His unfortunate lady was rendered almost frantic by the event, which she understood only to arise from a casual quarrel. For many months Cazalla lay on a bed of sickness. Ere he arose, Baltazara Perez was in her grave. Though ignorant of her father’s intent to visit Cazalla, which maidenly pride could not have permitted her to sanction, she blessed the occurrence afterwards, when it proved the means of assuring her of her lover’s unbroken faith and truth. But it could not avert her doom. Consumption had laid its withering hand upon her, and she sank into the tomb, happy, and breathing wishes of happiness for Cazalla and those around her. Of the encounter of the Colonel with de Rivar, and its consequences, she died in ignorance.

Nearly two years,” continued my friend, “have passed since that event. Cazalla still lives, but his lungs sustained a fatal injury by the wound—he is wasting away by degrees. Nothing, in truth, but the unparalleled care and devotion of his wife, could have so prolonged his days. That matchless creature has long known the whole truth from her husband’s own lips. But the disclosure changed not her feelings towards him. He tells her now that he would fain live for her sake; but it is obvious, nevertheless, that the expected approach of death gives him no pain. Alas! for that wretched deception. Three of the noblest-hearted beings that ever breathed, fated to perish by it!—For Inez lives only on her husband’s looks; her whole soul is bound up in him; and when the thread of his existence snaps, hers is too closely entwined with it to sustain the shock. Surely, surely, these three unfortunates will yet be happy together in a world to come!”

A silence of some minutes followed this recital.—“And the scoundrel—the villain—” said I, after a long breath. “Don Pedro de Rivar recovered, and still lives. Many of the friends of Perez and Cazalla would have again called him to account, but both the colonel and the old man forbade it. And they have done well to leave him to his own feelings and public odium. For, though he long endeavored to brave the matter out, he found it impossible ultimately to endure the aversion and hatred of all around him. He has been compelled to shut himself up in his house, and there lives almost a prisoner. Men will scarcely even take his money for the necessaries of life, much less associate with him.” “It is a deplorable condition,” said I, “but who can pity him?”

MISCELLANY.

THE MAN IN THE CAGE.

At the Mont St. Michael was preserved, until lately, the enormous wooden cage, in which state prisoners were sometimes confined under the old regime.—The most unfortunate of the poor wretches who inhabited this cage was Dubourg, a Dutch editor of a newspaper. This man having, in the exercise of his duty, written something which offended the Majesty of Louis XIV. or some one of his mistresses, was marked out by the magnanimous monarch for vengeance and the means, which according to tradition, he employed to effect his purpose, was every way worthy of the royal miscreant. A villain was sent from Avanches to Holland, a neutral state, with instructions to worm himself into the friendship and confidence of Dubourg, and, in an unguarded moment, to lead him into the French territories, where a party of soldiers was kept perpetually in readiness to kidnap and carry him off. For two years this modern Judas is said to have carried on the intrigue, at the end of which period he prevailed upon Dubourg to accompany him on a visit into France, when the soldiers seized upon their victim, and hurried him off to the Mont St. Michael. Confinement and solitude do not always kill. The Dutchman accustomed perhaps to a life of indolence, existed twenty years in his cage, never enjoying the satisfaction of beholding the “the human face divine,” or of hearing the human voice, except when the individual entered who was charged with the duty of bringing him his provisions, and cleaning his cell. Some faint rays of light, just such as enable cats and owls to mouse, found their way into the dungeon, and by their aid Dubourg, whom accident or the humanity of his keeper had put in his possession of an old nail, and who inherited the passion of his countrymen for flowers, contrived to sculpture roses and other flowers upon the beams of his cage.—Continual inaction, however though it could not destroy life, brought on the gout, which rendered the poor wretch incapable of moving himself about from one side of the cage to the other; and he observed to his keeper, that the greatest misery he endured was inflicted by the rats which came in droves, and gnawed away at his gouty legs, without his being able to move out of their reach, or frighten them away.—Constable’s Miscellany.

How to be Loved.—One evening, Maria’s father related in her presence, an anecdote of a little daughter of Dr. Doddridge, which pleased Maria extremely.—When this child, about six years old, was asked, what made every body love her? she replied, “I don’t know indeed, father, unless it is because I love every body.” The beautiful simplicity of this reply struck Maria forcibly. “If this is all that is necessary in order to be loved,” thought Maria, “I will make every body love me.” Her father mentioned a remark of John Newton, that he considered the world to be divided into two great masses, one of happiness, and the other of misery; and it was his daily business to take as much as possible from the heap of misery, and add it to that of happiness. “Now,” thought Maria, “I will begin to-morrow to try to make every body happy. Instead of thinking all the time about myself, I will ask every minute what I can do for some body else. Father has often told me that is the best way of being happy myself, and I am determined to try.”—Parson’s Daughter.

THE PRINTER.

“I pity the Printer,” said my uncle Toby.

“He is a poor creature,” rejoined Trim.

“How so?” said my uncle.

“Because, in the first place, (continued the Corporal, looking full upon my uncle,) because he must endeavor to please every body. In the negligence of a moment, perhaps a small paragraph pops upon him; he throws it to the compositor—it is inserted—and he is ruined to all intents and purposes.”

“Too much the case, Trim,” says my uncle Toby, with a deep sigh, “too—much—the—case.”

“An please your honor,” (continued Trim, elevating his voice, and striking in an imploring attitude,) “an’ please your honor, that is not the whole.”

“Go on, Trim,” said my uncle feelingly.

“The printer sometimes (pursued the Corporal) hits upon a piece that pleases him mightily, and he thinks it cannot but go down with his subscribers; but alas, sir, who can calculate the human mind? He inserts it, and it is all over with him. They forgive others, but they cannot forgive a printer. He has a host to print for, and every one sets up for a critic. The pretty Miss exclaims, ‘Why don’t he give us more poetry, marriages, and bon mots?’—away with these stale pieces.” The politician claps his specs on his nose, and runs it over in search of violent invectives; he finds none; he takes his specs off, folds them, sticks them in his pocket, declaring the paper good for nothing but to burn. So it goes. Every one thinks it ought to be printed expressly for himself, as he is a subscriber; and yet, after all this complaining, would you believe it, sir, (said the Corporal, clasping his hands beseechingly,) would you believe it, sir, there are some subscribers who don’t hesitate to cheat the printer out of his pay! Our army swore terribly in Flanders! but they never did any thing, so bad as that.”

“Never!” said my uncle Toby, emphatically.

From the London Court Journal.

THE QUEEN AND THE QUAKERS.

In the autumn of 1818, her late majesty, queen Charlotte, visited Bath, accompanied by the princess Elizabeth. The waters soon effected such a respite from pain in the royal patient, that she proposed an excursion to a park of some celebrity in the neighborhood, then the estate of a rich widow, belonging to the society of Friends. Notice was given of the Queen’s intention, and a message returned that she should be welcome. Our illustrious traveller had, perhaps, never before held any personal intercourse with a member of the persuasion whose votaries never voluntarily paid taxes to “the man (George, called king by the vain ones.” The lady and gentlemen who were to attend the august visitants, had but feeble ideas of the reception to be expected. It was supposed that the Quaker would, at least, say thy majesty, thy highness, or madam. The royal carriage arrived at the lodge of the park, punctual to the appointed hour.—No preparations appeared to be made, no hostess or domestic stood ready to greet the guest. The porter’s bell was rung, he stepped forth deliberately, with his broad brimmed beaver on! and unobsequiously accosted the lord in waiting with “what’s thy will, friend?”

This was almost unanswerable.

“Surely,” said the nobleman, “your lady is aware that her majesty—Go to your mistress, and say the queen is here.”

“No truly,” answered the man, “needeth not, I have no mistress nor lady; but friend Rachel Mills expecteth thine; walk in!”

The queen and princess were handed out and walked up the avenue. At the door of the house stood the plainly attired Rachel, who, without even a courtesy, but with a cheerful nod, said, “How’s thee do, friend?”

I am glad to see thee and thy daughter. I wish thee well! Rest and refresh thee and thy people before I show thee my grounds."

What could be said to such a person? Some condescensions were attempted, implying that her majesty came, not only to view the park, but to testify her esteem for the society to which mistress Mills belonged.

Cool and unawed, she answered, "Yea, thou art right there. The Friends are well thought of by most of folks; but they heed not the praise of the world; for the rest, many strangers gratify their curiosity by going over this place; and it is my custom to conduct them myself; therefore, I shall do the like by thee, friend Charlotte! Moreover, I think well of thee as a most dutiful wife and mother. Thou hast had thy trials, and so had thy good partner. I wish thy grandchild well through hers." (She alluded to the princess Charlotte.)

It was so evident that the Friend meant kindly, nay respectfully, that offence could not be taken. She escorted her guests through her estate. The princess Elizabeth noticed, in the hen-house, a breed of poultry hitherto unknown to her; and expressed a wish to possess some of these rare fowls, imagining that Mrs. Mills would regard her wish as a law; but the Quakeress quietly remarked, with characteristic evasion, "They are rare, as thou sayest; but if any are to be purchased in this land or in any other countries, I know few women likelier than thyself to procure them with ease."

Her royal highness more plainly expressed her desire to purchase some of those she now beheld.

"I do not buy and sell," answered Rachel Mills.

"Perhaps you will give me a pair?" persevered the princess with a conciliating smile.

"Nay, verily," replied Rachel. "I have refused many friends; and that which I have denied my own kinswoman, Martha Ash, it becomes me not to grant it to any. We have long had it to say, that these birds belonged only to our house, and I can make no exception in favor of thine."

This is a fact. Some friends, indeed, are less stiffly starched, but old Quaker families still exist who pique themselves on their independent indifference to rank, and respect to their fellow mortals only in proportion to the good they have done in their generation.

AN UNFAITHFUL SWAIN.

The Supreme Court of Rhode Island, on Wednesday, was occupied with the consideration of a bench of promise case, brought by Miss Ruth H. Eldridge, aged 32, against Samuel Phillips, aged 22. The parties in the case both belonged to the Methodist connection, and Samuel was a man of repute as an exhorter and expounder of the word and a powerful prayer-maker. A number of the defendant's letters were read in court, and the Providence Journal says, "nothing in all literature, from Ovid to Fielding, or from Tom Jones to the epoch of gilt edged annals, could equal the force, or the ludicrous character of Mr. Phillips' protestations of love, or the minglings of his moral sentiment with the journal of his pious labors." We think the following extract will sufficiently establish the truth of the Journal's assertions:

"I shall enclose my letters and you can mention it to them (brother and sister Cook) and then they will know the reason, as my intention is to marry you next spring, I do not much care about brother Cook's knowing about it, as I suppose my sending letters to you they will think there is something in the wind."

You will pray for your poor Bube that he may be contented and resigned. I must stop, for I cannot see for the tears fill my eyes. Tell Elder — I am yet alive, and by the time I come to pay a visit I hope he and — will have all the region converted. I wished you had put three more buttons on my new shirt — poor Sis forgot, she thought so much about Bube going away."

You must make me two shirts and two pair of drawers by next Christmas; for I cannot get them made here. Take care of my old hat till I come tell sister Cook the sugar is good, and I wished I had some more. It cost me five dollars to get here which leaves me 25 cents on hand that will pay Scoat and what I get this year will do to get moved with next spring.

Signed, SAMUEL PHILLIPS.

The Jury in the above case assessed damages for the plaintiff in the sum of five thousand dollars.—Sun.

An elderly gentleman walking along the street took hold of a cow's tail, and placing it over her back, exclaimed "Madam, you have dropped your boa."

A pail full of ley, with a piece of copperas half as big as a hen's egg boiled in it, will color a fine nankin color, which will never wash out. This is very useful for the linings of bed quilts, comforters, &c.

Mr. Timms, said a wag, "how do you keep your books?" "Oh, by double entry." "Double entry, how's that?" "Oh, easy enough: I make one entry and father makes another."

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1841.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—We find ourselves unable to furnish any back numbers prior to No. 26.—the FIRST SIX MONTHS, and we wish our Agents, on obtaining any new subscription to inform the subscriber of this fact. Any money sent to us, will be applied to this volume, and should there be any excess, it will be passed to the credit of the subscriptions on the next volume.

GRAND LODGE OF THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY.—The Ceremony of receiving the Representatives of foreign Grand Lodges, forms a new feature of deep interest in the transactions of the Grand Lodge of this State. We gave some account a few weeks ago of the reception of the Representative from Hamburg, but the public recognition of the Representative from the Grand Lodge of New Jersey, which took place at the quarterly meeting on the 3d ult., was not less interesting. We are informed by a Brother, who was present, that between two and three hundred Brethren were assembled on the occasion. The Representative wearing the appropriate jewel and apron of the Grand Lodge of New Jersey was conducted from the West to the East, by the Grand Secretary, through an avenue of Brethren standing at least six deep on each side, all clothed and in white gloves. We have not been furnished with the speeches delivered, but understand that on both sides the strongest language of assurance was used that the two Grand Bodies were determined to stand shoulder to shoulder in support of each others' sovereignty and honor.

We hope to witness the reception of some of those representatives who have been appointed, but have not yet received their credentials, jewels &c., when we visit the Grand Lodge at its next annual meeting.

ALBANY MUSEUM.—This establishment has passed into the hands of Mr. GEO. RANDALL, who will in future assume its supervision. Many of even our own citizens are not aware that during the past season a spacious saloon has been added for vocal and scenic representations, which is arranged and decorated in the most tasty and gorgeous manner—combining the essentials of a perfect theatre with the retirement and quiet of a private lecture room. Mr. Randall is a gentleman well known, and the public have the utmost confidence, in his intention and abilities to do justice to the undertaking. As the warm season is approaching, the saloon being cool and airy, will be a delightful medium of whiling away an evening in an agreeable manner. The entertainments are of that order that cannot but find favor with the most fastidious. Talent of the first order will be introduced, and we feel assured that that the present proprietor will in all things redeem any promise he may make the public in behalf of their amusement.

One dollar bills of the Bank of the State of New York have been altered to tens. Look out.

J. FENNIMORE COOPER.—We regret to see that this gentleman, is again the subject of news-paper obloquy and petty malignity. That there are many points in the character and disposition of this distinguished writer, to be deeply deplored, admits of no doubt.—Of an impetuous and irascible temperament, he has been far too careless of the individual opinions of those with whom he has come in direct contact, and from his inability to accommodate himself to the prejudices or peculiarities of those whose good opinions it was his duty to have gained, he has frequently arrayed against himself, powerful and vindictive foes, from the most trifling and unimportant causes.

The most unfortunate feature of his life, was the circumstance of his taking the field as a political writer. To one of his rare literary abilities the troubled sea of politics can have but few attractions, and can offer the acquisition of little glory. A genius like his, should have been free and unshackled—as his worst enemies confess that as an imaginative and descriptive writer he has few superiors. His works have been read with praise and avidity by his own countrymen, and translated into several European languages. He has shed a lustre on American literature, which should go far in extenuation of a few personal faults. He is still in the vigor of life, and much may still be expected to emanate from his gifted pen. It therefore becomes the editors of the American press, to encourage, rather than irritate. We hope these bitter animosities are at an end, as their tendency is detrimental to the interest of our literature.

"HOBBIES."—We are a queer people beyond a doubt, and are eternally semi-insane on some particular point. A few years since we were "corner lot" mad, and the demand for paper for "mapping" was so great, as to exhaust the supplies of all the manufacturers in the country. This gave place to the "morus multicalus" fever, gardens were annihilated, fruit-trees prostrated, and geraniums in pots were cast aside to make room for "the rage." This passion was speedily rooted out, by a new candidate for public favor who reared his bristling front, and with a hideous grunt "Berkshire Pigs" became the especial "mode."—There was at all events some utility in this fashion if it did betoken a swinish propensity. "Short Horned Durhams" "Beckwell Sheep" "Rohan Potatoe" and "Ruta Baga" next filled the public eye. Then came a three days calm and the people became restive and impatient, when in a lucky hour providence sent in the Amistad Negroes to vary the monotony of existence. First it was the trial of these poor wretches, then the Amistad Negroes again—again—again—that was one of the standing captions of half the newspapers in the country, but even this "sweet smelling savor" was worn thread bare, when the McLeod mine was sprung, and where or when this will end Heaven only knows.

We are waiting with the utmost impatience for the advent of the next absorber of the public mind, and dare not even venture a guess relative to its nature or dimensions.

MELANCHOLY.—The National Intelligencer says, that late intelligence from Pensacola bring to light the loss of a brig, supposed to be the Three Friends, from that port, bound to New Orleans. The body of Mr. George Moshen of Baltimore had drifted to the shore. On him was found a considerable sum of money, and a draft, negotiated at Tallahassee. Should the brig prove to be the Three Friends, many lives have been lost, several of whom were ladies.

"STRAWS SHOW WHICH WAY THE WIND BLOWS."

This sentiment has passed into a proverb, and may with some plausibility be applied to the acts of Great Britain, at the present moment. She is not only throwing obstacles in the way of the settlement of the Boundary Question, and seeking to wrest from our violated laws, a man charged with murder, but she has in repeated instances endeavored to play the old game of a right to search and detain our vessels, on the most flimsy pretences. The Salem Register notices the detention of a brig lately, and says:—"This is the fifth Salem vessel that has been searched by English cruisers within a few months." These occurrences would not take place, did not the commanders take their tone from the spirit of their government, which, disguise the fact as we may, is anything but pacific. We ask no better evidence of her intentions than is to be found in her preparations; and after she has given us the quantum suff. of opiate, to get us completely asleep, until all her plans are fully matured, we shall perhaps at last be awakened by the roar of her cannon, and then, forsooth, we shall begin to prepare! The considerations which prompt us to avoid a war, will have no influence with Great Britain: Her aristocracy have no feeling as to its horrors, other than what is felt through their pockets. A war between the two countries would be popular in the Canadian provinces, and the impression has gone from there across the water, that the Eagle would be made to crouch at the feet of the Lion; or in other words, that in such an event, Great Britain could dictate her own terms. This is the language of the Canadian press, with scarce an exception. Does it not then behove our government to look ahead—to be prepared for the worst. The case of M'Leod will bring matters to an issue immediately, should he be convicted. We are aware that feelers have been thrown out to make his case a national one, but we much mistake the people of the State of New York, if they will allow any set of men to interfere with the sovereignty of their laws. By them, M'Leod will be acquitted or condemned.

We repeat, let us be prepared.

AMPHITHEATRE.—The proprietor of this establishment has effected a short engagement with the celebrated equestrian Le Tort, and Sweeney and his pupil. These engagements, connected with the other attractions at this establishment, cannot fail of drawing large audiences.

The Sackett's Harbor Journal states that a steam frigate of one thousand tons burthen is under contract to be built for the Colonial Government at Kingston, Canada.

[The following extract of a letter from a friend at New Orleans, is full half true, no doubt. "To what base uses may we come?"]

New-Orleans, March, 1841.

Dear Hoff.—After a tedious journey, I arrived here, &c. The way they do things here in this big city, is a caution. The "Divine Fanny" is among us; and "such a gittin up stairs" to see her throw her pretty feet, puts the Baltimoreans as far in the shade, now, as they on a former occasion, were beyond any of Tom Moore's "Fire Worshippers." To say that Caldwell has contracted for Fanny, at $12,000 for 12 nights, smacks too much of the pecuniary, to be mentioned in the same sentence with "the Elster." Our Bucks have run stark mad. The tariff, of prices for relics of St. Elster, may be said to be now established, and are as follows:

For a single Hair of her Head,	$100
For a cast off pocket Kdff.	75
do Slipper,	80
For a fine tooth comb once used,	50
and $10, for each additional use.
For a basin of water, after she has washed her divine hands,	200
[This water is carefully put in ornamented vials, holding about 5 drops, enclosed in gold, and wore in the bosom, by those of her adorers who wear their hair after the Cromwellian cut.
For the parings of a toe or finger nail,	30
Any price is given for a Snuff box, in which her divine fingers have been thrust.

On the first of April, a day, peculiarly adapted to all glorious enterprises, one of Fanny's garters, will be raffled for,—900 chances, at $10 each. A friend of ours, who has enthusiastically invested his last X, says he wants to leave no other legacy to his children.—Great was Diana of the Ephesians, but she never saw the day she could hold a two-penny candle, to the "Divine Fanny." Glorious Fanny! Republicans can appreciate thy boundless perfection. Let gaping Europe look down on our Democracy. America's illustrious son, the immortal Patch has told us from the foaming cataract, that "some things can be done as well as others," and long after our Republic shall have been forgotten—after century has been heaped upon century, sober history shall record the spot, where perhaps lies incurred a relic of the Divine and immortal "artiste".

Yours
W. C.

Intelligence.

Indian Quarrels.—A letter to the St. Louis Republican, from Fort Leavenworth, gives an account of a most cowardly and bloody massacre committed by some Kansas upon some Pawnees:

The dastardly Kansas—sixty-five in number—took advantage of the absence of the Pawnee warriors from their encampment and massacred all but 11 of the women and children found in it.

One woman sold her life dearly. She sprang upon one of the Kansas warriors, like a tigress—clutched his throat, and would have strangled him if her arms had not been hewn from her body.

The Pawnee prisoners were rescued by a detachment of the American force stationed at Fort Leavenworth, and had been brought into Bellevue.

This massacre will be a signal for a fierce war between the Pawnees and Kansas.

A Royal Baptism.—The duke de Chartres, (says a Paris letter,) was baptised yesterday afternoon by the Archbishop of Paris, in the presence of the King and Queen, and the Princes and Princesses, with the water of the river Jordan. "The water of the Jordan," says the Slecle, "with which the Duke de Chartres was baptised, is said to have been given to the Archbishop of Paris by M. de Chateaubriand, who brought it with him from Palestine."

The Houston (Texas) papers state that the remains of a large city have been found in Sabine county about seventeen miles east of San Augustine. The ruins consist chiefly of the stone foundations of houses, arranged along a street more than a mile in length.

POETRY.

RICH AND POOR.

When God built up the doom of blue,
And portioned earth's prolific floor,
The measure of his wisdom drew
A line between the rich and poor;
And till that vault of glory fall,
Or beauteous earth be sacred with flame,
Or saving love be all in all,
That rule of life will rest the same.

We know not why, we know not how,
Mankind are framed for weal or wo;
But to th' eternal law we bow;
If such things are, they must be so,
Yet, let no cloudy dreams destroy
One truth outshining bright and clear;
Yhat wealth is only hope and joy,
And poverty but pain and fear.

Behold our children as they play!
Blest creatures, fresh from natures hand;
The peasant boy as great and gay
As the young heir to gold and land.
Their various toys of equal worth;
Their little needs of equal care;
And halls of marble, huts of earth,
All homes alike endeared and fair.

They know no better! would that we Could keep our knowledge safe from worse;
So power should find and leave us free;
So pride be but the owner's curse;
So, without marking which was which,
Our hearts would tell, by instinct sure,
What paupers are th' ambitious rich!
How wealthy the contented poor!

Grant us, O God, but health and heart,
And strength to keep desire at bay,
And ours must be the better part,
Whatever else besets our way,
Each day may bring sufficient ill;
But we can meet and fight it through,
If hope sustains the hand of will,
And conscience is our captain too.

HOME.

There the scattered rays of affection concentrate.

LONGFELLOW.

BY W. H. C. HOSMER, ESQ.

Though fair the forms that greet the sight
In the happy realm of dreams,
When the golden lamps of mystic night
Shoot forth unclouded beams—
Oh, fairer far—oh, fairer far,
To those who widely roam,
Than visions bright, or twinkling star,
Is a distant glimpse of Home!

The guerdon of heroic deed,
Triumphal crown and bay,
Far from his native land may lead
The warlike boy away;
But trophies won by high emprise,
Beyond the salt sea foam,
Forgotten are when round him rise
The green-robed hills of Home.

The son of Mammom, absent long
From that dear spot of earth,
Where eyes of love and lips of song
Made glad the household hearth,
His glittering purse of priceless store
Regards but "gilded loam,"
When breaks upon the view once more
His old ancestral Home.

Oaks planted by our perished sires—
The green mounds where they rest—
Halls where their hospitable fires
Cheered wanderer and guest—
More beauteous to the glance appear

Than pile or pill'd dome,
Although the lapse of many a year
Hath mossed the roof of Home.
Avon, N. Y. Jan. 15, 1841.

[Poets have done infinite mischief by giving a false colouring to pernicious pleasures, casting an air of grandeur and sublimity around the worst passions, and concealing the deformities of vice under the flowers of their own imagination. But when these things are described, as in the example below, in their real character and colours, the poet not only exercises a favourable influence upon society, but makes his own fame to rest upon the sure and permanent basis of truth.]

BY PRIOR.

I drank; I liked it not: 'twas rage; 'twas noise;
An airy scene of transitory joys;
In vain I trusted that the flowing bowl
Would banish sorrow and enlarge the soul.
To the late revel and protracted feast
Wild dreams succeeded and disordered rest;
And as at dawn of morn, fair reason's light
Broke through the fumes and phantoms of the night,
What had been said, I asked my soul, what done?
Perhaps the jest, that charmed the sprightly crowd,
And made the jovial table laugh so loud,
To some false notion owed its poor pretence,
To an ambiguous word's perverted sense,
To a wild sonnet, or a wanton air,
Offence and torture to the sober ear.
Perhaps, alas! the pleasing stream was brought
From this man's error, from another's fault;
From topics which good-nature would forget,
And prudence mention with the last regret.
—Add yet unnumbered ills that lie unseen
In the pernicious jest—the word obscene,
Or harsh, which, once elanced, must ever fly.
Irrevocable! the too prompt reply,
Seed of severe distrust and fierce debate,
What we should shun, and what we ought to hate.
Add, too, the blood impoverished, and the course
Of health oppressed by wine's continued force.
Unhappy man—whom sorrow thus and rage
To different ills alternately engage.
Who drinks, alas, but to forget, nor sees
That melancholy, sloth, severe disease,
Mem'ry confused, and interrupted thought,
Death's harbingers, lie latent in the draught,
And in the flowers that wreath the flowing bowl,
Fell adds his hiss, poisonous serpents roll.

This sweet little love song is not unworthy of Burns
We cut it from an English Magazine. The author is John Imlah, a young poet we need not add of high promise.

THE BLUE E'D LASSIE.

I lo'e thee lassie! ah! how weel,
Nae thocht can reach—nae word reveal—
As nane hae felt—as nane can feel,
My bonnie blue e'd lassie, O.

I lo'e thee mair, sweet Isabel,
Than sign can shew, or tongue can tell,
My love, my life, my second sel',
My bonnie blue e'd lassie, O.

O! then by lip or look convey,
How I may wile thy heart away,
And I will bless thee night and day,
My bonnie blue e'd lassie, O.

Say, shall I roose thy roughish mou',
Or praise thy pawkie e'en sae blue,
What shall I say? what can I do?
My bonnie blue e'd lassie, O.

Should cares combine, and ills increase,
To wreck my pleasure, rest, and peace,
Were life but torment—death release,
My bonnie blue e'd lassie, O.

For thy sweet sake—for thine alane,
Through toil and trouble, grief and pain,
I'd live to lo'e, and ca' my ain,
My bonnie blue e'd lassie, O.

IT SPOILS A MAN TO MARRY HIM.

Believe, dear girls, this maxim true,
In precepts and in practice too,
That it spoils a man to marry him:
The creatures never ought to go
Beyond a honeymoon or so;
If they survive that, they will shew
That it spoils a man to marry him.

When first he kneels before your feet,
How soft his words! his looks how sweet!
But it spoils a man to marry him:
When once a late consent he'll wring,
And get your finger in the ring,
Oh! then he's quite another thing,
It so spoils a man to marry him.

Have you a fancy?—You must drop it.
A will, it may be?—You must lop it
Before you think of marrying:
And, even if you venture then,
Select the very worst of men;
If not, nine chances out of ten,
Twill spoil the wretch to marry him.

Our correspondent who sends us the above, adds the following gratifying intelligence:

"The cause of Masonry with us is onward, as much so as the most zealous could desire. Our Chapter has been in operation a little over a month, and already have 30 Petitions been received. Our Lodges also are in a healthy state; at every meeting, there are from three to six Petitions or applications,—and not only is it so with us, but throughout the State do we hear of the same spirit having been awakened. The world at last is about to appreciate the cause of Masonry; and most earnestly do we wish, that in every quarter its good effects may be felt, and rightly valued."

DESULTORY THOUGHTS ON FREE-MASONRY.

1.—In its original institution, and perhaps centuries after, it is probable that Freemasonry was an association of operatives united together for mutual assistance, and for the preservation and advancement of the arts connected with Architecture. At a subsequent period it was divested of its strictly operative character, and assumed a spiritual or speculative form, and men were admitted to its privileges, not for their skill in Architecture, but their virtues, and their knowledge of the arts and sciences. As civilization advanced, the Society continued to attract public attention, and its beneficial effects were felt in the alleviation of human misery, and relieving individual distress.

2.—Freemasonry, from the nature of its organization, and the principles upon which it is founded, is essentially a moral and charitable institution, and all its rites and ceremonies tend to produce the results indicated by the terms "moral" and "charitable," and reject every thing of a contrary tendency. It does not profess to be a religious institution, except so far as the great and fundamental principles of morality, the foundation of religion, are concerned. Every degree of Masonry prescribes some duty to be performed, or some vice or error to be avoided, and when its rules are observed, it is a sure foundation amidst the various disappointments to which all men are exposed, in their earthly pilgrimage. We are all liable to misfortune, and we know not what a day may bring forth—under such circumstances, how gratifying it is to the broken spirit, to be cheered by the kindness of a brother! It is then that masonic friendship exercises one of its highest and noblest attributes—it is as an "ointment which perfumes and rejoices the heart."

3.—That the privileges of the Society have been used by bad men for base purposes, we do not deny; but the abuses of the privileges of any Society, by one or a thousand of its members, is no argument against its intrinsic excellence. In every Society, however rigid may be its rules, and however carefully its avenues may be guarded, improper persons will obtain admission, and sully the emblem of purity with which they may have been invested. In every association, whether it be of divine or human origin—whether it have its foundation in divine wisdom, or in the imperfection of human reason—there are to be found men who dishonor their profession—who disregard every social tie, and trample with sacrilegious feet upon the most sacred obligations; but all this does not establish that the Society of which they are members is immoral in itself, or that it encourages violations of public and private duties. It only proves that all men are not influenced by the force of moral obligation.

4.—Freemasons have been charged with being hostile to free governments. If there is one political principle more fondly cherished by them than another, it is that of attachment to the government and laws under which we live; and to protect and defend the Constitution and laws, every mason is solemnly enjoined, even on his first entrance into the lodge—nor is there a single principle ever inculcated, of an opposite tendency. Masonry has never raised the standard of rebellion; it has never resisted the civil power; its true disciples cheerfully submit to the laws, and peaceably abide its decisions.

5.—If Masonry were dangerous to the peace of the community; if under any circumstances it were capable of being used for the destruction of the liberties of the people, would the immortal father of his country have countenanced it, or favored it? Would he have declared that "its principles were founded on the immutable laws of truth and justice?" Would he have designated the lodge as "the sanctuary of brothers?" The character of Washington was too pure, his sense of honor too elevated, his patriotism too devoted, his attachment to free institutions too sincere, to have countenanced for a moment an institution adverse to those principles of civil liberty for which he contended with so much glory, and so much success. To controvert this testimony, it is in vain to say that the principles of the institution have changed; its principal features, its fundamental doctrines remain unaltered.

6.—Brotherly love, temperance and charity may be called the cardinal virtues of Freemasonry. In their wide and extended signification, they include other virtues but little less important, and while their habitual practice elevates and ennobles the character of a mason, the institution itself is elevated and dignified. The neglect or disregard of these cardinal virtues degrades the character of the mason, and shakes the pillars of the edifice to their foundation.

7.—The stately pillars of wisdom, strength, and beauty would exhibit nothing but deformity, if surrounded by ill-will, uncharitableness, and intemperance. What mason would desire to look upon the great pillars of his order thus disfigured, when it is in his own power, by the exercise of his own will, to preserve their beauty and harmony of proportion?

8.—Within the lodge there is no virtue more frequently inculcated than that of brotherly love. It is the first lesson a mason is taught, when he enters within the porch of the temple, nor does it lose its value as he ascends the masonic ladder. There is no virtue which ought to be more deeply impressed upon the mind of every mason of every degree, if we regard the usefulness and permanence of the institution.

9.—Brotherly love is the chief cement which unites the building into one common mass. If it be removed, its beauty is defaced, its symmetry destroyed. Masons may be separated by degrees; but the sentiment of brotherly love and friendship should pervade the whole.

10.—The necessity of cherishing this virtue and practising upon it, within the lodge and without it, must be apparent to every mason, who reflects upon and venerates the principles of his order. We look with pleasure upon the friendship of individuals, but all animated creation cannot present a more beautiful picture for the contemplation of the philanthropist, than that of a band of brothers, united for purposes of charity and benevolence, and the grand design of promoting each other's welfare.

11.—If every mason acted in conformity with the dictates of brotherly love, as they are inculcated in the lectures and charges of Freemasonry, the tongue of slander would be still, and we might point with honest pride to the lodge as the abode of peace, and the residence of every kind, generous, and noble sentiment.

12.—As the Masonic institution occupies high ground, it behoves every mason to observe its commandments as far as human frailty will permit, and guard its portals from the approach of whatever may impair its beauty, or disturb its harmony. The true principles of Freemasonry enjoin upon its members to "keep the soul embalmed and pure,

In living virtue, that when both must sever,
Although corruption may his frame consume,
The immortal spirit in the skies may bloom."

ORDER IS A FEATURE OF MASONRY.

The good order that prevails at public meetings of masons, however large and crowded, over that of every other sort of meeting whatever, is very striking even to the eye of a careless observer, and leads the world to suspect the truth, that there is a secret power in our institution, by which that marked, superior, and unparalleled regularity is maintained. It is even so. Brethren, for the integrity of our masonic character, for the honor you have pledged, for the reputation of our institution, let the power of that secret never be diminished among you.

How to make a strict subordination of rank and station consistent with that perfect equality upon which all men naturally stand, was long a problem very difficult of solution. And little does the world know or dream how much it is indebted to free masonry for its happiest forms of political institutions, and for all the most successful experiments in rational and practical liberty.

I have often contemplated the commencement of the American Revolution with amazement. When the leading men of that day had been exasperated by the delay of justice, and by repeated but unavailing threats—when the public mind was heated even to desperation—when the oppressive fabric of provincial government had crumbled away—when the yoke of established authority was thrown off, and no provision made for a substitute—when the civil arm was paralyzed—when the judiciary was in effect abolished—when every man was left to do that which was right in his own eyes, amenable to no law, liable to no apparent authority—what strong unseen influence at that critical moment laid its silent and salutary authority upon this whole mass of excited, discordant materials? What invisible tie bound them together? What did link the machinery then, so that one impulse should give motion to the whole? What effectual checks had those master spirits upon each other, so that no one could overstep the bounds of due influence, and snatch the sword of ambition, and seize upon the prize of arbitrary sway? What light illumined, and what genius inspired them? The leaders of that struggle were mostly masons—and it was in the lodge that they inhaled and cherished the spirit of liberty; in the lodge they cemented their indissoluble fraternity. The power of masonry was a curb on ambition, and the light of masonry disclosed the true principles of freedom, and the happiest models of free government, when our own was constituted.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

SINGULAR CUSTOM AT ROUEN.

The chapter of Rouen, (which consists of the archbishop, a dean, fifty canons, and ten prebendaries,) have, ever since the year 1156, enjoyed the annual privilege of pardoning, on Ascension day, some individual confined within the jurisdiction of the city for murder.

On the morning of the Ascension-day, the chapter having heard many examinations and confessions read, proceed to the election of the criminal who is to be pardoned; and, the choice being made, his name is transmitted in writing to the parliament, which assemble on that day at the palace. The parliament then walk in procession to the great chamber, where the prisoner is brought before them in irons, and placed on a stool; he is informed that the choice has fallen upon him, and that he is entitled to the privilege of St. Romain. After this form, he is delivered into the hands of the chaplain, who, accompanied by fifty armed men, conveys him to a chamber, where the chains are taken from his legs and bound about his arms; and in this condition he is conducted to a place named the Old Tower, where he awaits the coming of the procession. After some little time has elapsed, the procession sets out from the cathedral; two of the canons bear the shrine in which the relics of St. Romain are presumed to be preserved. When they have arrived at the Old Tower, the shrine is placed in the chapel, opposite to the criminal, who appears kneeling, with the chains on his arms. Then one of the canons, having made him repeat the confession, says the prayers usual at the time of giving absolution; after which service, the prisoner kneeling still, lifts up the shrine three times, amid the acclamations of the people assembled to behold the ceremony. The procession then returns to the cathedral; followed by the criminal, wearing a chaplet of flowers on his head, and carrying the shrine of the saint. After mass has been performed he has a very serious exhortation addressed to him by a monk; and, lastly, he is conducted to an apartment near the cathedral, and is supplied with refreshments and a bed for that night. In the morning he is dismissed.

MISCELLANY.

A GOOD FELLOW.

The secretary of a literary society being requested to draw up "A definition of a good fellow," applied to the members of the club, individually, for such hints as they could furnish, when he received the following: Mr. Golightly.—A good fellow is one who rides blood horses, drives four-in-hand, speaks when he's spoken to, sings when he's asked, always turns his back on a duet, and never on a friend.

Mr. Le Blanc.—A good fellow is one who studies deep, reads trigonometry, and burns love songs; has a most cordial aversion for dancing and D'Egville, and would rather encounter a cannon than a fancy ball.

Hon. G. Montgomery.—A good fellow is one who abhors moralists and mathematics, and adores the classics and Caroline Mawbray.

Sir T. Westworth.—A good fellow is one who attends the Fox-dinners, who goes to the Indies to purchase independence, and would rather encounter a buffalo than a boroughmonger.

Mr. M. Sterling.—A good fellow is a good neighbor, a good citizen, a good relation; in short, a good man.

Mr. M'Farlane.—A good fellow is a bonnie braw John Hielandman.

Mr. O'Connor.—A good fellow is one who talks loud and swears louder; cares little about learning, and less about his neckcloth; loves whiskey, patronizes bargemen, and wears nails in his shoes.

Mr. Musgrave.—A good fellow is prime—flash—and bang-up.

Mr. Burton.—A good fellow is one who knows "what's what," keeps accounts, and studies Cocker.

Mr. Rowley.—A good fellow likes turtle and cold punch, drinks Port when he can't get Champagne, and dines on mutton with Sir Robert, when he can't get venison at my lord's.

Mr. Lozell.—A good fellow is something compounded of the preceding.

Mr. Oakley.—A good fellow is something perfectly different from the preceding—or Mr. Oakley is an ass.

TREADING THE WINE PRESS.

A letter from John Tappan, of Boston, who has recently travelled in Europe, gives the following description of the process of treading grapes. Fastidious wine drinkers will not fancy the fact.

We passed through the finest wine countries in Europe, in vintage time; and having witnessed the treading out of the grapes, it may interest you to know the process. On an appointed day, all the inhabitants of a hamlet assembled early in the morning, and with carts containing baskets, tubs and casks, proceed to gather all the grapes, sound and in every stage of decay, in large tubs resembling in size and cleanliness the tubs in which hogs are scalded and dressed in America.

When the tubs are sufficiently filled with grapes, spiders, spiders' webs and flies, a lad jumps into it, and drawing up his pantaloons to his middle, commences, sometimes with his bare feet, and at others with his barnyard shoes, to jump upon the grapes, and force the juice through the holes in the centre of the bottom of the tub into a large tunnel, which is inserted in a cask. When the cart is filled it is rolled away and carted to the village, from whence it goes to the wine merchant, and is manufactured, which means adulterated, and sent to market. Nothing can be more filthy and nauseating than the dirty, slovenly way, wine is made. Could wine drinkers, who so much extol the cockroach flavor of their wine, in our country, once realize that it is the spider flavor, they would loathe what they call the pure juice of the grape. It is a well known fact, that no pure wine is exported from wine countries.

MEDICAL.

DYSPEPSIA.

This term, which has become incorporated into every day's conversation, is the malady of indigestion and might also be appropriately called the vice of indolence. When nature is curtailed her fair proportion of exercise, fresh air, and sound aliment—when she is loaded with superfluous meats and drinks—or when she is stunted in muscular action, or doomed to languish under oppressive sleep,—debility and obstruction seize on the vitals, and dyspepsia comes among the first in the train of disorders, to prey upon the human system. What is the remedy? Return to nature—abjure all aliments which are not fitting in a child—taste the fresh air of heaven in long walks and regular exercise—give to slumber but six out of the twenty-four hours—abjure all quackery, your soot tea, your lie solutions, your blue pills, your antacids, your roborants and stomachics. In the use of wholesome exercise on foot or on horse, more may be accomplished than from all other remedies together. It is to be used generally, till sweating is induced—not perspiration, but till briny drops stand on the forehead. Exercise propels the blood throughout the small vessels of the system, and gives to the skin that kind of action which sustains the equilibrium of vital power; the lungs inspire more air in a given time, when excited by muscular motion, than when the body is at rest—and the blood is thus enabled to part with its excreted and receive its vivifying principles.

"To cure the mind's wrong bias spleen—
Some recommend the Bowling green;
Some hilly walks—all exercise;
Fling but a stone—the giant dies."

We confidently recommend the following prescription to dyspeptics, is the best we know for their disease.

Take a walk from five till six in the morning.

Make your breakfast on a cup of black tea, and a tumbler of milk with crackers.

Take a walk from ten till twelve before dinner.

Take your dinner of boiled mutton or beef, without butter or gravy, with any simple vegetable; a tumbler of milk, with a cherry pie, will do for a dessert—be moderate.

Beware of sleep after dinner—dose a little on an arm-chair.

Take exercise two hours after dinner, freely; very freely; and let your supper be the most moderate repast during the day. If you are hungry during the interval between meals, eat crackers or stale bread, or a little ginger-bread—drink nothing stronger than mead, or spruce-beer—beware of the ardent.

DISPLAY.

Wear your learning like your watch, in a private pocket, and don't pull it out to show that you have one; but if you are asked what o'clock it is, tell it.

WOOD, THE VOCALIST, left the packet ship Washington, when off Wales, and landed at Milford, whence he posted to London, with his shares of the U. S. Bank in his pocket, all of which he sold at 60. The Washington reached Portsmouth two days afterwards, with the news of the stoppage of that institution.—This is "coming Yorkshire" with a vengeance.

Gen. Jackson.—It is said that Gen. Jackson has become insolvent beyond his means, by endorsing for his nephew, Maj. Donelson, who has been engaged in extensive speculations that have proved unsuccessful. We hope that this report is untrue, and that the old hero will not be stripped of his property in his old age.

A great many anecdotes are related of personal bravery. We should like to see that man who would deliberately allow a woman to catch him making mouths at her child!

Millers Bank of Clyde.—The Mortgages deposited with the Comptroller by the Millers Bank of N. Y., were sold yesterday at the Merchants' Exchange.—The amount of the whole, principal and interest, was $95,372. They sold for $64,705 in cash. The dividend to the bill-holders will be over 90 per cent.—Exc. Jour.

SIR THOMAS LITTLETON.

Major haeret itas venit unicusque nostrum a jure et legibus, quam a parentibus —Cicero.

It is often our misfortune to know the least about those men, the greatness of whose reputation raise a desire to enquire the most minutely into every event of their lives. We naturally want to trace the causes of their greatness, and watch its progress, from its first developement to its perfect maturity. No case will illustrate this more strikingly than that of Sir Thomas Littleton, who may with justice be called, the father of English law. He has, it is true, a formidable rival for this title in his illustrious commentator, but his work written at so early a period in the history of English law, has maintained through several centuries, a permanent reputation which its own high intrinsic merits could alone have secured. He labored too, under disadvantages which do not attach to later writers. The science of law was in his day, comparatively in its infancy, its principles not yet ascertained and few decisions of legal tribunals existing before his time, to assist an author in the arrangement of his subject, or the illustration and confirmations of the principles which he might endeavor to establish.

The path which he had chosen to pursue was in a measure, as yet, untrodden; it was angled with much brushwood, which must first be cleared away, and the landmarks which designated its directions, were so faint and obscure, that any mind which had not clearly marked out to itself and kept constantly in view, the ultimate object of its journey, would infallibly have been lost in the mazes of the forest. Such a mind however the venerable Littleton possessed; always clear, ever bent upon the great principles of the common law, and shapening its course constantly towards their illustration and establishment. Sir Thomas Littleton was born about the beginning of the 15th century. His father was Thomas Westcote, Esq. a gentleman of ancient descent, who married Elizabeth the only child of Thomas De Littleton, lord of Frankley. According to a practice common to those days, their eldest son, Thomas and his brothers took the name of their mother, thus preserving the honorable name of Littleton, and the large possessions which had devolved upon their mother, then the sole representative of her ancient family.

Littleton belonged to the Inner Temple, and for his worthiness was made, by Henry VI. his serjeant. Edward IV. in the sixth year of his reign, made him one of the judges of the court of common pleas, and afterwards in the 15th year of his reign, conferred upon him, the Knighthood of the Bath.

It is uncertain at what period he wrote his great work on Tenures, but it is supposed to have been not very long before his death, which happened in 1482, in the 21st year of the reign of Edward IV. as it appears to be incomplete.

He married one of the daughters of William Bury of Broomscraft Castle, and by her had three sons, Sir William, Richard who afterwards became a distinguished lawyer, and Thomas.

It is not known when his work was first published, but the most plausible conjectures render it probable that it was printed some years before 1487, though according to Lord Coke, it does not seem to have been commonly cited until about 1533, "since which time," he observes, "he had been commonly cited and (as he deserves) more and more highly esteemed," and accounts for this by saying, "and yet you shall observe, that time doth ever give greater authority to works and writings that are of great and profound learning, than at the first they had." It may be interesting to transcribe the opinion which Lord Coke entertained of our author and his work. He says: "he that is desirous to see his picture, may in the churches of Frankley and Hales-Owen, see the grave and revered countenance of our author, the outward man; but he hath left this book, as a figure of that higher and nobler part, that is, of the excellent and rare endowments of his mind, especially in the profound knowledge of the fundamental laws of this realm. He that diligently reads this his excellent work, shall behold the child and figure of his mind, which the more often he beholds in the visual live, and well observes him, the more shall he justly admire the judgment of our author and increase his own. This only is desired, that he had written of other parts of law, and especially of the rules of good pleading (the heart-string of the common law) wherein he excelled; for of him might the saying of our English poet be verified:

Thereto he could indite and make a thing;
There was no wight could pinch at his writing:

so far from exception, as none could pinch at it. This skill of good pleading, he highly in this work commended to his son, and under his name to all other students, sons of his law.* He was learned also in that art which is so necessary to a complete lawyer; I mean, of logic, as you shall perceive by reading of these institutes, wherein are observed his syllogisms, inductions and other arguments; and his definitions, descriptions, divisions, etymologies, derivations, significations and the like. Certain it is, that when a great learned man (who is long in making) dieth, much learning dieth with him."

His work on Tenures was written in a species of legal French, frequently employed at that time, though it was never spoken. The excellence of this work was not conceded by several foreigners of high reputation, who speak of it and its author, in terms of severe censure. It would be an act of injustice to the memory of this great man to pass these by without explaining the reason of these dissenting opinions.

Hottoman, in his Treatise, on "Feudal words," says that "stupidity contends, in" this book, with malice and the desire of calumniating"—and Gravina, while admitting his great endowments, both natural and acquired, complains loudly of his abuse of other judicial writers.

Hottoman's general disposition to abuse, would sufficiently account for the violent expressions which we have quoted. But there are other reasons which betray the secret of the attack. He was blindly attached to the feudal doctrines of his own country, and desired to see the same unlimited reverence paid to them by others which he was himself so much disposed to concede. He forgot that though the principal institutions of the different countries of Europe, as derived from the feudal polity, were in many respects similar, yet the particular laws and customs of England, especially (about which Littleton principally treats) were and had for a long time, been strikingly dissimilar.—

"Know, my son, that it is one of the most honorable, laudable and profitable things in our law, to have the science of well pleading, in actions real and personal; and therefore I counsel thee especially to employ thy courage and care to learn this"—Tenures, sec. 434.

The English people had never, even under William the Conqueror, permitted the introduction of the more minute feudal doctrines and principles, inconsistent as they appeared to them, with those maxims to which they had stubbornly adhered and upon the maintenance of which they relied for the preservation of their liberties.

We will farther detain our readers only by a brief enquiry into the cause of the reputation of our author, and in what consists the excellence of his work, upon which that representation is founded, and this is the more difficult, since it is conceded by his greatest admirers, that it is remarkable neither for an accurate arrangement, very apt division of the matter, nor a strict adherence to the plan proposed by its author, "by preserving a close connection between the matter and title of a chapter;" but "the excellence of Littleton seems to consist in the great depth of his learning and simplicity of his manner, in a comprehensive way of thinking, and a happy method of explaining; with a certain plainness yet significance of style, that is always clear and expressive."

In accordance with the practice of his time, he quotes no authorities. He states fully and impartially the different opinions upon any mooted point and concludes with his own opinion and the reasons upon which it is founded. This mode of discussing points, together with his known and admitted abilities, secured him the confidence of posterity, and his dictum is now taken for law. His subject too contributed to maintain his reputation for so long a period, and this remark is best illustrated by the remark of Littleton himself upon his work. "Though certain things which are moved and specified in the said book, are not altogether law, yet such things shall make thee more apt and able to understand and apprehend the arguments and reasons of the law."—Litt. Epilog.—His fame was not confined to Great Britain. He has found a Commentator in M. Howard, a distinguished advocate of the parliament of Normandy, who has selected his work on Tenures, as the best help towards illustrating the customs and laws of that Duchy.

Smoking Hams in a Pork Barrel.—A correspondent of the Farmer's Cabinet prepares his hams as follows:—He inverts his barrels over a pan or kettle in which hard wood is burned seven or eight days, keeping water on the head of the barrel, to prevent drying. He then puts in two hundred hams, and pours upon them a pickle, made by mixing, boiling, and skimming, in a boiler, 6 gallons of water, 12 oz. salt-petre, and 2 quarts of molasses. In one week he has "well smoked hams, very tender, and excellent flavor." Will some of our readers try it, at least on a small scale? There appears no possibility of injuring the hams, and they can be smoked over in a smoke house if not done.

LINKS.—"Honest industry has brought that man, to the scaffold," said a wag, as he observed a carpenter upon a staging.

Speaking of wags, what is more waggish than a dog's tail when he is pleased?

By the by, speaking of tales, we always like those that end well—Hogg's for instance.

Speaking of hogs, we saw one of these animals reclining in the gutter the other day, and in the opposite one was a well-dressed man (!) The first had a ring in his nose; the latter a ring on his finger. The man was drunk—the hog was sober; 'a hog is known by the company he keeps,' thought we—so thought Mr. Porker, and off he went.

Speaking off going off, forcibly reminds us of a gun we once owned; it went off one night, and we haven't seen it since.

POPULAR TALES.

ALICE HERBERT, THE BANKER'S DAUGHTER.

There was once a great banker in London, who had a very fine house in Portland Place, and a very dirty house in the city; and if the latter looked the image of business and riches, the former looked the picture of luxury and display. He himself was a mild man, whose ostentation was of a quiet, but not the less of an active kind. His movements were always calm and tranquil, and his clothes plain; but the former were stately, the latter were in the best fashion. Holditch was his coachmaker in those days; Ude's first cousin was his cook; his servants walked up stairs to announce a visitor to the tune of the Dead March in Saul, and opened both valves of the folding doors at once with a grace that only could be acquired by long practice. Every thing seemed to move in his house by rule and nothing was seen to go wrong. All the lackeys wore powder, and the women servants had their caps prescribed to them. His wife was the daughter of a country gentleman of very old race, a woman of good manners and warm heart.

Though there were two carriages always at her especial command, she sometimes walked on her feet, even in London, and would not suffer an account of her parties to find its way into the Morning Post.—The banker and his wife had but one child, a daughter, and a very pretty and very sweet girl she was as ever my eyes saw. She was not very tall, though very beautifully formed, and exquisitely graceful. She was the least affected person that was ever seen: for, accustomed from her earliest days to perfect ease in every respect,—denied nothing that was virtuous and right,—taught by her mother to estimate high qualities,—too much habituated to wealth to regard it as an object—and too frequently brought in contact with rank to estimate it above its value,—she had nothing to assume. Her face was sweet and thoughtful, though the thro' were evidently cheerful ones, and her voice was full of melody and gentleness. Her name was Alice Herbert, and she was the admired of all admirers. People looked for her at the opera and the park, declared her beautiful, adorable, divine; she became the wonder, the rage, the fashion; and every body added, when they spoke about her, that she would have half a million at the least. Now Mr. Herbert himself was not at all anxious that his daughter should marry any of the men that first presented themselves, because none of them were above the rank of a baron; nor was Mrs. Herbert anxious either, because she did not wish to part with her daughter; nor was Alice herself—I do not know well why,—perhaps she thought that a part of the men who surrounded her were fops, and as many more were libertines, and the rest were fools, and Alice did not feel more inclined to choose out of those three classes than her father did out of the three inferior grades of our nobility.

There was, indeed, a young man in the Guards, distantly connected with her mother's family, who was neither fop, libertine, nor fool—a gentleman, an accomplished man, and a man of good feeling, who was often at Mr. Herbert's house, but father, mother, and daughter all thought him out of the question; the father because he was not a duke, the mother because he was a soldier; the daughter, because he had never given her the slightest reason to believe that he either admired or loved her. As he had some two thousand a year, he might have been a good match for a clergyman's daughter, but could not pretend to Miss Herbert. Alice certainly liked him better than any man she had ever seen, and once she found his eyes fixed upon her from the other side of a ball-room with an expression that made her forget what her partner was saying to her. The color came up in her cheek, too, and that seemed to give Henry Ashton courage to come up to ask her to dance. She danced with him on the following night, too; and Mr. Herbert, who remarked the fact, judged that it would be but right to give Henry Ashton a hint. Two days after, as Alice's father was just about to go out, the young guardsman himself was ushered into his library, and the banker prepared to give his hint, and gave it plainly too. He was saved the trouble, however; for Ashton's first speech, "I have come to bid you farewell, Mr. Herbert. We are ordered to Canada to put down the evil spirit there—

I set out in an hour to take leave of my mother, in Staffordshire, and then embark with all speed."

Mr. Herbert economised his hint, and wished his young friend all success. "By the way," he added, "Mrs. Herbert may like to write a few lines by you to her brother at Montreal. You know he is her only brother: he made a sad business of it, what with building and planting and farming and such things. So I got him an appointment in Canada just that he might retrieve. She would like to write, I know. You will find her up stairs. I must go out myself. Good fortune attend you."

Good fortune did attend him, for he found Alice Herbert alone in the very first room he entered.—There was a table before her, and she was leaning over it, as if very busy, but when Henry Ashton approached her, he found that she had been carelessly drawing wild leaves on a scrap of paper, while her thoughts were far away. She colored when she saw him, and was evidently agitated; but she was still more so when he repeated what he had told her father. She turned red and she turned pale, and she sat still and said nothing. Henry Ashton became himself agitated. "It is all in vain," he said to himself. "It is all in vain. I know her father too well;" and he rose, asking where he should find her mother.

Alice answered in a faint voice "in the little room beyond the back drawing room."

Henry paused a moment longer; the temptation was too great to be resisted: he took the sweet girl's hand; he pressed it to his lips and said—"Farewell, Miss Herbert! farewell! I know I shall never see any one like you again; but at least it is a blessing to have known you—though it be but to regret that fortune has not favored me still farther! farewell! farewell!"

Henry Ashton sailed for Canada, and saw some service. He distinguished himself as an officer, and his name was in several despatches. A remnant of the old chivalrous spirit made him often think when he was attacking a fortified village, or charging a body of insurgents, "Alice Herbert will hear of this!" but often, too, he would ask himself, "I wonder if she be married yet?" and his companions used to jest with him upon always looking first at the woman's part of the newspaper—the births,—deaths and marriages.

His fears, if we venture to call them such, were vain. Alice did not marry, although about a year after Henry Ashton had quitted England, her father descended a little from his high ambition, and hinted that if she thought fit she might listen to the young Earl of—. Alice was not inclined to listen, and gave the earl plainly to understand that she was not inclined to become his countess. The earl, however, persevered, and Mr. Herbert began to add his influence; but Alice was obdurate, and reminded her father of a promise he had made, never to press her marriage with any one. Mr. Herbert seemed more annoyed than Alice expected, walked up and down the room in silence, and on hearing it shut himself up with Mrs. Herbert for nearly two hours.

What took place, Alice did not know, but Mr. Herbert looked grave and anxious, from that moment.—Mr. Herbert insisted that the earl should be received at the house as a friend, though he urged his daughter no more, and balls and parties succeeded each other so rapidly that the quieter inhabitants of Portland Place, wished the banker and his family, where Alice wished to be—in Canada. In the meantime, Alice became alarmed for her mother, whose health was evidently suffering from some cause; but Mrs. Herbert would consult no physician, and her husband seemed never to perceive the state of weakness and depression into which she was sinking. Alice resolved to call the matter to her father's notice, and as he now went out every morning at an early hour, she rose one day sooner than usual, and knocked at the door of his dressing-room. There was no answer and unlatching the door, she looked in to see if he were already gone. The curtains were still drawn, but through them some of the morning beams found their way, and by the dim sickly light Alice beheld an object that made her clasp her hands and tremble violently. Her father's chair before the dressing table was vacant; but beside it lay upon the floor something like the figure of a man asleep.—

Alice approached, with a heart beating so violently that she could hear it; and there was no other sound in the room. She knelt down beside him; it was her father. She could not hear him breathe, and she drew back the curtain. He was as pale as marble, and his eyes were fixed. She uttered not a sound, but with wild eyes gazed round the room, thinking of what she should do. Her mother was in the chamber at the side of the dressing room; but Alice, thoughtful even in the deepest agitation, feared to call her, and rang the bell for her father's valet. The man came and raised his master, but Mr. Herbert had evidently been dead some hours. Poor Alice wept terribly, but still she thought of her mother, and the valet was silent too; for, in lifting the dead body to the sofa, he had found a small vial, and was gazing on it intently.

"I had better put this away, Miss Herbert," he said at length in a low voice; "I had better put this away before any one else comes."

Alice gazed at the vial with tearful eyes. It was marked Prussic acid! poison!

This was but the commencement of many sorrows. Though the coroner's jury pronounced that Mr. Herbert had died a natural death, yet every one declared he had poisoned himself, especially when it was found he had died utterly insolvent. That all his late great speculations had failed, and that the news of his absolute beggary had reached him on the night preceding his decease. Then came all the horrors of such circumstances to poor Alice and her mother,—the funeral.—The examination of the papers,—the sale of the house and furniture,—the tiger claws of the law rending open the house in all its dearest associations,—the commiseration of friends,—and scoffs of those who envied and hated in silence.

Then for poor Alice herself, came the last worst blow, the sickness and death bed of a mother—sickness and death in poverty. The last scene was just over—the earth was just laid upon the coffin of Mrs. Herbert—and Alice sat with her tears dropping fast, thinking of the sad "WHAT NEXT?" when a letter was given her, and she saw the handwriting of her uncle in Canada. She had written to him on her father's death, and now he answered full of tenderness and affection, begging his sister and niece instantly to join him in the new land which he had made his country. All the topics of consolation which philosophy ever discovered or devised to soothe man under the manifold sorrows and cares are not worth a blade of rye grass in comparison with one word of true affection. It was the only balm that Alice Herbert's heart could have received; and tho' it did not heal the wound, it tranquilized its aching.

Mrs. Herbert, though not rich, had not been altogether portionless, and her small fortune was all that Alice now condescended to call her own. There had been indeed a considerable jointure, but that Alice renounced from feelings which you will understand.—Economy, however, was now a necessity; and after taking a passage in one of the cheapest vessels she could find bound for Quebec,—a vessel that all the world has heard of, named the St. Lawrence—she set out for the good city of Bristol, where she arrived in safety on the 16th of May, 183—

We must now, however, turn to the history of Henry Ashton. It was just after the business in Canada was settled, that he entered a room in Quebec, where several of the officers of his regiment were assembled, in various occupations—one writing a letter to go by the packet which was just about to sail, two looking out of the window at the nothing which was doing in the streets, and one reading the newspaper. There were three or four other journals on the table, and Ashton took up one of them. As usual, he turned to the record of the two great things in life, and read, first the marriages, then the deaths; and, as he did so, he saw:—

"Suddenly, at his house in Portland Place, William Anthony Herbert, Esq."

The paper did not drop from his hand, although he was much moved and surprised; but his sensations were very mixed, and although he said truly, he gave his first thoughts, and they were sorrowful, to the dead, the second were given to Alice Herbert, and he asked himself, "Is it possible she can ever be mine? She was certainly much agitated when I left her."

"Here's a bad business," cried the man who was reading the other newspaper, "the Herberts are all gone to smash, and I had six hundred pounds there."

You are in for it too, Ashton. Look there! They ask of three shillings in the pound."

Henry Ashton took the paper, and read the account of all that had occurred in London, and then he took his hat, and walked to head quarters. What he said or did there is nobody's business but his own; but certain it is, that by the beginning of the very next week, he was in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Fair winds wafted him soon to England; but in St. George's Channel all went contrary, and the ship was knocked about without making much way. A fit of impatience had come upon Henry Ashton, and when he thought of Alice Herbert and all she must have suffered, his heart beat strangely. One of those little incidents occurred about this time that make or mar men's destinies. A coasting boat from Swansea to Wiston came within hail, and Ashton, tired of the other vessel, put his portmanteau, a servant, and himself, into the skimmer of the seas, and was in a few hours landed safely at the pleasant watering place of Wiston, super mare. 't wanted yet an hour or two of night, and therefore a post chaise was soon rolling the young officer, his servant and his portmanteau toward Bristol, on their way to London. He arrived at a reasonable hour, but yet some of the many things that fill inns, had happened in Bristol that day, and Henry drove to the Bush, the Falcon, and the Fountain, and several others, before he could get a place of rest. At length he found two comfortable rooms in a small hotel near the port, and sat down to his supper by a warm fire, when an Irish sailor put his head into the room, and asked if he were the lady that was to go down to the St. Lawrence the next day? Henry Ashton informed him that he was not a lady, and that as he had just come from the St. Lawrence, he was not going back again, upon which the man withdrew to seek further.

Ten, eleven, twelve o'clock struck, and Henry Ashton pulled off his boots and went to bed. At two o'clock he awoke, feeling heated and feverish; and to cool himself he began to think of Alice Herbert. He found it by no means a good plan, for he felt warmer than before, and soon a suffocating feeling came over him, and he thought he smelt a strong smell of burning wood. His bedroom was one of those unfortunate inn bedrooms that are placed under the immediate care and protection of a sitting room, which, like a Spanish Duenna, will let nobody in who dares not pass by their door. He put on his dress gown, therefore, and issued out into the sitting room, and the smell was stronger—there was a considerable cracking and roaring, which had something alarming in it, and he consequently opened another door. All he could now see was a thick smoke filling the corridor, through which came a red glare, from the direction of the staircase; but he heard those sounds of burning wood which are not to be mistaken, and in a minute after loud knocking at doors, ringing of bells, and shouts of "Fire! fire!" showed that the calamity had become apparent to the people in the street. He saw all the rushing forth of naked men and women, which generally follows such a catastrophe, and the opening all the doors in the house, as if for the express purpose of blowing the fire into a flame. There were hallooings and shouting, there were screamings and tears, and what between the rushing sound of the devouring element, and the voice of human suffering or fear, the noise was enough to wake the dead.

Henry Ashton thought of his portmanteau, and wondered where his servant was; but seeing, by a number of people driven back from the great staircase by the flames, that there was no time to be lost, he made his way down by a smaller one, and in a minute or two reached the street. The engines by this time had arrived; an immense crowd was gathering together, and the terrific flames of the inn were rushing forth, in the midst of whom Henry Ashton remarked one young woman wringing her hands, and exclaiming, "Oh, my poor young mistress! my poor young lady!"

"Where is she, my good girl," demanded the young soldier.

"In number eleven," cried the girl, "in number eleven! Her bedroom is in the sitting room, and she will never hear the noise."

"There she is," cried one of the bystanders, who overheard; "there she is. I dare say."

Ashton looked up towards the house, through the lower windows of which the flames were pouring forth, and across the casement which seemed next to the very room which he himself had occupied, he saw the figure of a woman, in her night dress, pass rapidly.

"A ladder," he cried, "a ladder, for God's sake! There's some one there, whoever it be!"

No ladder could be got, and Henry Ashton looked round in vain.

"The back staircase is of stone," he cried, "she may be saved that way."

"Ay, but the corridor is on fire," said one of the waiters; "you'd better not try, sir, it cannot be done."

Henry Ashton darted away; into the inn, up the staircase—but the corridor was on fire, as the man had said, and the flames rushing up to the very door of the rooms he had lately tenanted. He rushed on, however, recollecting that he had seen a side door out of his own sitting room. He dashed on, caught the handle of the lock of the side door, and shook it violently, for it was fastened.

"I will open it," cried a voice from within, that sounded strangely familiar to his ear.

The lock turned—the door opened—and Henry Ashton and Alice Herbert stood face to face.

"God of Heaven," he exclaimed, catching her in his arms. But he gave no time for explanation, and hurried back with her towards the door of his own room. The corridor, however, was impassable.

"You will be lost! you will be lost!" he exclaimed holding her to his heart.

"And you have thrown away your own life to save mine!" said Alice.

"I will die with you at least!" replied Henry Ashton; "that is some comfort—but no! thank God, they have got a ladder—they are raising it up—dear girl you are saved!"

He felt Alice lie heavy on his bosom, and when he looked down, whether it was fear, or the effect of the stifling heat, or hearing such words from his lips, he found that she had fainted.

"It is as well," he said; "it is as well!" and as soon as the ladder was raised, he bore her out holding her firmly yet tenderly to his bosom. There was a death-like stillness below. The ladder shook under his feet—the flames came forth and licked the rounds on which his steps were placed—but steadily, firmly, calmly, the young soldier pursued his way. He bore all that he valued on earth in his arms, and it was no moment to give one thought to fear.

When his last footstep touched the ground, an universal shout burst forth from the crowd, and even reached the ear of Alice herself—but ere she could recover completely, she was in the comfortable drawing-room of a good merchant's house, some way further down the same street.

The St. Lawrence sailed on the following day for Quebec, and, as you well know, went down in the terrible hurricane which swept the Atlantic in the summer of that year, bearing with her to the depths of the ocean every living thing that she had carried out from England. But on the day that she weighed anchor, Alice sat in the drawing room of the merchant's house, with her hand clasped in that of Henry Ashton; and ere many months was over, the tears for those dear beings she had lost, were chased by happier drops as she gave her hand to the man she loved with all the depth of first affection, but whom she would never have seen again, had it not been for THE FIRE.

MYSTERIOUS PROFESSIONS.

"Now, Tom," said the printer of a country newspaper, in giving directions to his apprentice, "put the 'foreign leaders' into the galleys, and lock 'em up—let 'Napoleon's remains' have a larger head; distribute the 'army in the east'—take up a line and finish the 'British Minister'—make the young Princess' to run in with the 'Duchess of Kent'—move 'the Kerry hunt' out of the chase—get your stick and conclude 'the horrid murder' that Joe began last night—wash your hands and come in to dinner, and then see that all the pi is cleared up." Some printers are devils—and no mistake.

The most important question for a young lady to ask, when a man pops the question, is, Do you take the newspaper and pay for it? Always have a dish of hot water handy in case he says no. But if he says yes, pin him—he's your man by all means.

THE GATHERER.

THE AGE OF WONDER.

Extraordinary Case.—The "Seren Gomer," a Welsh publication, contains the narration, for the authority of which it vouches, and gives names in support of its truth: "There is at present a young woman 21 years of age, residing in Clydey, Pembroke (daughter of Mr. John Davis, Hendre-Gwilym.) to all appearances quite dead, having been in that state for nearly a twelve month past, but awakes once every 24 hours, precisely at 10 o'clock at night, and will converse with the family and others for about twenty minutes, when she will again relapse into the same state, and remain so till 10 o'clock the following night at which hour she revives to the minute, throwing out her arms and folding her hands together, and rising up in her shoulders until the spectators imagine that her bones are cracking. She continues in that laborious state for a space of 10 minutes when she comes to a perfect self-possession of her faculties. She eats and drinks little or nothing. After conversing for a short time, she will suddenly clasp her hands together, throw her arms into the same manner as when awaking, and will return into the same state as before, until the following night."

HONOR AMONG THIEVES.

That there is sometimes honor among thieves, is proved by the following circumstance:

A lady walking across some fields, observed two very suspicious fellows, who seemed watching an opportunity of robbing her, as they took the same road with herself, and kept at a very little distance from her. Her alarm was increased by observing a fellow, with a similar appearance in the path way at a distance; but as the case did not admit of hesitation, she beckoned him to stop, and addressed him with an air of confidence; "Sir, you look like a gentleman; I don't like the appearance of those fellows behind us, I think they intend to rob me; will you protect me?" Madam replied the man, I will attend you until you are out of danger. You will see when I wave my handkerchief, the two men who have alarmed you will sheer off.—They are my companions, and we intended to rob you; but when confidence is reposed in me, I am not scoundrel enough to betray it. He attended her until they came in sight of her own house, where she offered him a guinea as a reward for his protection; but he refused it, adding, he had more honor left, than to sink his character to the level of a lawyer's. Let the black robe gentry take fees—I am above it.

THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

Col. Despreaux, in a late pamphlet on the Police of Paris, remarks, that there seems to be different periods for different crimes. He had always observed the summer months to be comparatively months of low riot. November began the burglaries, January and February the stealing of pocket-handkerchiefs and snuff-boxes, probably from the conflux to the theatres at that time. But, that swindling transactions, and all other frauds that require peculiar dexterity, were prevalent about March.

SERENADING.

Some sentimental young gentlemen lately serenaded a house in New Orleans, with the belief that there was a young lady in it. After they had sung and played for some time, a black wench looked out of the window, and accosted them thus:

"Look hea, gemmeni, taint no use to be foolin away your time round hea, kase, dar aint no body in dis house 'cept Bess, and dat's me. I aint no 'jection to you playin 'Jim-along Josey, Cooney in do Hol-ler,' or any ting dat's fashionable and nice, but dem 'tahn and oder foolish tunes you's performin' round here aint no account. Go way, white folks."

ONE OF THE BLUE LAWS.—Among the early laws enacted in Connecticut, the following is the substance of one:—"No man shall carry to meeting, for a Sabbath luncheon, a dough-nut so long that while he is eating at one end he cannot keep the pigs from eating the other.—Pic

ALBANY, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1841.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—We find ourselves unable to furnish any back numbers prior to No. 26.—the first six months, and we wish our Agents, on obtaining any new subscription to inform the subscriber of this fact. Any money sent to us, will be applied to this volume, and should there be any excess, it will be passed to the credit of the subscriptions of the next volume.

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT.

Our readers, long ere this, are probably acquainted with the death of our venerated President, with all its melancholy particulars. We clothe our paper in the habiliments of sorrow, not only in pursuance of the laudable custom on occasions of such magnitude, but also in testimony of our sincere regret for the loss of a good man, as well as in respect to the memory of one whom the sovereign people elevated to the chief magistracy of this Union.

The news of the death of Gen. Harrison came upon our citizens like an electric stroke. None were prepared to receive it; and we are happy to have it in our power to say, to the better feelings of our nature, that notwithstanding all the bitterness of party feeling which the recent election has exhibited, there has been but one sentiment, and that is, deep and heartfelt sorrow for our national loss.

The disease with which Gen. Harrison was afflicted was a bilious pleurisy, which hourly grew more alarming in its aspects, from the time when he was taken, up to the moment of his death.

On Saturday, the day of his death, bulletins were issued every hour, so great was the public anxiety in respect to the termination of his disease. Three hours before his death, while Dr. Worthington, his physician, was at his side, he spoke for the last time. At half past 12 o'clock, he expired without a struggle.

The following are the testimonials of respect which have been, and are to be observed:

THE COMMON COUNCIL, ALBANY.

Whereas, It has been officially announced that the funeral of the late President will take place at the city of Washington, this day at 12 o'clock at noon:

Resolved, therefore, that the bells of the Churches of the city be tolled from 12 o'clock until 2 o'clock P. M. That minute guns be fired during that time from the Capitol Park, and the flags of the vessels in the port, and at the public places throughout the city be displayed at half mast, and that the citizens be requested to close their stores and places of business during the hours aforesaid.

Resolved, That the Common Council Chamber be hung with black, and that the members and officers of the Board wear crape on the left arm for 60 days, and that the citizens generally be requested to adopt the same badge of mourning.

Resolved, That Friday next be set apart for appropriate funeral solemnities, in respect to the memory of the late President, and that a civic and military procession be formed on that day, and such other proceedings be had as shall be adopted by the Committee of Arrangements.

Resolved, That the different military corps, societies, associations and fire companies of the city be requested to join in the procession, and to appoint committees of their respective bodies to confer with the committee of this Board in relation to carrying into effect the necessary arrangements.

Resolved, That the Governor and Officers of State, and the Members of the Legislature, now in session, be invited to unite with the citizens in the observance of the ceremonies of the day.

Resolved, That it is requested that all the stores and places of business, and all places of public amusement be closed during that day.

BY THE CABINET—WASHINGTON.

The funeral to be solemnised on Wednesday, the 7th inst. at 12 o'clock. The religious services to be performed according to the usage of the Episcopal church in which church the deceased most usually worshipped. The body to be taken from the President's to the Congress burying ground, accompanied by a military and civic procession, and deposited in the Receiving tomb.

The military arrangements to be under the direction of Major General Macomb, the General commanding in chief the army of the United States; and Major General Walter Jones, of the militia of the District of Columbia.

Commodore Morris, the senior Captain in the Navy now in the city, to have the direction of the naval arrangements.

The Marshal of the District to have the direction of the civic procession, assisted by the Mayors of Washington, Georgetown and Alexandria, the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, and such other citizens as they may see fit to call to their aid.

John Quincy Adams, Ex-President of the United States, members of Congress now in the city or its neighborhood, all the members of the Diplomatic body resident in Washington, and all officers of Government, and citizens generally, are invited to attend.

And it is respectfully recommended to the officers of Government that they wear the usual badge of mourning.

BY THE COMMON COUNCIL—NEW-YORK.

The funeral of the late President of the United States will take place on Wednesday, the 7th inst. at 12 o'clock at noon, it is resolved, by the joint committee of the Common Councils of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, That our citizens of the said cities are requested to close their stores and places of business to-morrow (Wednesday) from the hour of 12 at noon until sunset, and also all places of public amusements in the respective cities to-morrow evening—that the bells of the several churches and the fire alarm bells in the two cities, be tolled from noon till 2 o'clock, P. M. and that 68 minutes guns (being the number of years of the late President,) be fired from the Battery, and also from such place in the city of Brooklyn as the committee from that city may designate—that the owners and masters of vessels in the harbor, and the proprietors of all public places in the said cities are requested to display their flags at half-mast during the whole day—and that our fellow-citizens are requested to wear the usual badge of mourning for sixty days:

Resolved, That the Common Councils of the cities of New York and Brooklyn will solemnize the death of the late President of the United States by a civil and military procession, to be composed of the military and different societies of our respective cities—and that such procession take place on Saturday next.

Resolved, That the different societies, trades and associations, and fire departments of our cities, are requested to send delegates to meet a committee of this body on Thursday next, at 12 o'clock, at the Common Council Chamber, to make the necessary arrangements to carry out the views of the Common Council in an appropriate manner.

BY THE LEGISLATURE.

That the Chaplains of the Legislature are requested to select one of their number to deliver an appropriate discourse in the Assembly Chamber, before the two Houses, on some Sabbath during the present session to be designated by him.

That the chairs of the President of the Senate and of the speaker of the Assembly be shrouded in black and that the Members and Officers of the two Houses wear the usual badge of mourning for the residue of the session.

That when the two Houses adjourn, they will adjourn to meet on Friday next.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Whether the Lines on the loss of the Gov. Fenner, would be acceptable or not, we have no means of determining, being unable to decipher more than one third of the manuscript. We have not time to copy the articles of correspondents.

APPRENTICES' LIBRARY.

At a meeting of the Trustees of the Apprentices' Library, held on Wednesday evening last, on motion it was

Resolved, That the books of this Institution be removed to the Commercial Buildings, (first flight of stairs,) corner of Hudson and Market streets.

Mr. Gould having declined the re-appointment of Librarian, it was Resolved, That the thanks of the Trustees be given to Mr. JAMES S. GOULD, for his devotion to the Library, during the number of years which it has been under his charge.

Resolved, That HESSEL E. BROWER be appointed Librarian.

Resolved, That from and after the removal of the Library, the price for the reading of each volume be reduced to ONE CENT.

FOREIGN PAUPERS.—The N. Y. American says that 60 or 70 paupers, natives of Malta, arrived at that port, shipped from Denmark, on board the British brig Helen Mar. Now-a-days, it is not only unfashionable, but very anti-republican to say any thing about a foreigner, whether he be good, bad or indifferent—whether he is to earn his own bread, or eat ours. We do not believe however, that the patriots, and sages who framed our government, when they declared America to be an "Asylum to the Oppressed," ever intended that Europe should have the privilege of shipping a load of paupers for us to take care of. Our laws, both in humanity to the pauper, as well as in justice to our citizens, cannot be too strictly observed on this point. If each captain offending, was severely punished, and his vessel forfeited, our foreign neighbors would find the game a losing one, and consequently abandon it.

We learn from the Atlas that the arrangements for the funeral will be completed under the direction of the committee of the Common Council. The exercises will consist of a procession similar to that in honor of Lafayette, but greatly increased. Dr. Potter will officiate as chaplain, and Dr. Sprague as eulogist, Gen. John Taylor Cooper acting as Marshal of the Day.

THE FOREIGN NEWS.—We are neither a prophet, nor the son of a prophet; but the recent news from England is confirmatory of what we said last week, that the intentions of Great Britain are any thing but pacific. If the rumour is true, that a fleet has been ordered on our coast, and troops have been sent to Halifax, the British will find us as fully—unprepared to meet them as they can well desire. We are now beginning to see the wisdom of those sages, who voted away our means of defence. England will bully us out of M'Leod, guilty or not. Mark the prediction.

NOMINATIONS.—The Whig party have nominated Teunis Van Vechten, esq. as their candidate for Mayor, of this city.

The Democratic party have nominated Gerrit Y. Lansing, esq. as their candidate for the same office. The election of either of these gentlemen will be creditable to our ancient city. We really hope, in the ensuing election, that competency for the stations, will take the place of party spirit.

Four million and six hundred thousand persons have signed the temperance pledge in Ireland.

Look out.—Twenty dollar bills of the State Bank at Newark, N. J. have been altered into 50's; and are said to be extremely hard of detection.

A MOTHER'S APPEAL.—Hannah Wadsworth, of Mantua, Portage county, Ohio, appeals to the humane to assist her in recovering two children, who are deformed, and who were decoyed from her by a Joseph Morris, of New York, to exhibit around the country as a show. It is to be hoped, if Morris is found with the children, that he will not be lynched.

TEMPERANCE.—The "West Troy Catholic Total Abstinence Association," which has been in existence only about two months, already numbers ONE THOUSAND members.

Our Correspondent T. of Louisville, will always find a welcome with us. His present excellent article contains the whole gist of Masonry.

BIRTHS.—The Poughkeepsie Journal, is introducing the English fashion, of publishing a list of Births, as well as Marriages and Deaths. We shall follow the fashion, after it has become fairly started, provided the ladies make no objection. We borrow many worse European fashions, than this is likely to be.

The London Police, have sent word to the Police of New York, that the most artful robber they had ever to contend with, is now on a professional visit to this country. Particulars, probably, at some future period.

THE END OF THE BEGINNING.—The Hon. Chas. F. Mitchell, late a member of Congress from Niagara, has recently committed forgery to a large amount, and fled the country. Mitchell, in a letter to the editors of the Courier and Enquirer, which truly exhibits the "gambler's fate," assigns the speculations of 1836, as the cause of his ruin.

A splendid Catholic Cathedral, is about being erected by Bishop Purcell, at Cincinnati, O. It is said that three-fourths of the German population of that city, are of the Catholic persuasion.

We suppose that the Anti-masonic patrons of the Jefferson county Carthaginian, would be offended should the Editor of that paper, credit any article to a Masonic paper. "Just step'd in—hope I don't intrude."

Intelligence.

Temperance in Ireland.—Mr. Kennagh, the Secretary of the Irish Temperance Society, at a recent meeting of the friends of Temperance in Cork, stated that the number of persons now enrolled in Ireland, as pledged to a total abstinence from the use of intoxicating liquors, amounts to four millions six hundred and forty-seven thousand—among whom are eight Roman Catholic Bishops, and seven hundred Roman Catholic clergymen.

"Ven you're a married man, Samivel, you'll understand a good many thing as you don't understand now; but vether it's vorth while goin' through as much to learn so little, as the boy said ven he got to the end of the alphabet, is a matter o' taste."—Pickwick.

Awful Occurrence.—A few nights since, says the Tallahassee (F.) Sentinel, 12 negroes belonging to the Rev. Wesley Adams, of Jefferson co., were burnt to death. They were all in on building and it is supposed were suffocated, and rendered insensible, as they gave no alarm, and when the doors were opened, uttered not a groan. The building was entirely destroyed.

Death of Mr. Chitty.—This distinguished law writer, whose works on Pleading, Bills of Exchange and Practice, have been so extensively used in our country, died on the 16th of February, 1841, in Southampton street, Fitzroy Square, London, in the 66th year of his age.

Gov. SEWARD has issued his proclamation, ordering an election for a member of the twenty-seventh Congress, for the twenty-sixth district, to take place on the 11th of May, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Granger.

Trading in Human Flesh in England.—The Sunderland Herald says—On Saturday last a country-woman was sold publicly, by auction, by her husband, for 7s 6d, in the Pavement, in the cathedral city of York!

UNITED CANADA.—The population of Lower Canada is estimated at 800,000; of Upper Canada over 400,000. The House of the united legislature will consist of eighty-four members—42 from each province. The election for these has recently taken place, and so far the returns from Upper Canada are more favorable to the republican cause than was anticipated; those of Lower Canada less so. Of 32 members, known to be elected, 19 are reported as liberals and thirteen are classed as Tories. Sir Allen McNab (we believe he was the commander in the Caroline affair, and has been recently knighted) has lost his election, and consequently his place as Speaker of the House, and is succeeded by a liberal.

Shocking Calamity.—In North Stonington, on the night of Friday, the 5th inst., two sons of Mr. George Geer were burnt to death. They went out about 10 o'clock, P. M., as usual, to watch a coal pit, and not returning at the usual time in the morning, another little son of Mr. G. was sent for them. He came running to the house, saying they were burnt to death.—The father immediately started for the pit, and a few of the bones were found where the cabin had been situated. One of them was aged 19, and the other 14 years.—Norwich Aurora.

Melancholy Catastrophe.—A small dwelling house was consumed in Amherst village, Lorain co., Ohio, on the morning of the 11th inst. Two young ladies, Miss Bivins and Miss Cunningham, perished in the flames.

Between 30 and 40 persons were baptized last Sunday in New Haven Harbor, by Elders Knapp and Teasdale, and nearly as many on the Sabbath previous.

Look out for Burglars.—A house in Jay street was entered on Sunday night and robbed of a large amount of silver ware. The thief effected an entrance through a basement window, and is yet undetected. "Safe bind, safe find."—Alb. Atlas.

M. Chaveau Legrade, a distinguished French advocate, who defended Charlotte Corday when tried for the assassination of Marat, died in Paris last month, in his 76 year.

A FRAGMENT—ENVY.

How pale with thought, and haggard, meets the eye
Yon sickly visage, lean, and most uncouth;
'Tis the meagre front of starving Envy!
With complexion yellow'd in redundancy
Of o'erflowing bile, it stalks along, breathing
A blighting pestilence; and most upon
The things, and deeds it cannot imitate.
How like a reptile will it worm along
The path where virtue treads, and smear the way
In all the stench of rank pollution; and
'Twill court the bower of beauty, and pour
Into the ear of blooming innocence,
The rank, corroding lie. But for the mire
That clogs its flight, 'twould on the golden sun
A tarnish bring, and straight make dim his light
To all the wonderers, who'd but believe
The tale; for naught would Envy have, with robe
Not borrow'd from its self-esteem'd Dominion.

A voracious beast, it wends
Along, and naught within its wake is seen,
But barrenness, the tatter'd skeletons
And fragments of character despoil'd.—
Reeking yet in the hot blood of suffuse
Prey, its eye is wilder bent on more. Gore
Alone its appetite can sate, and the cold
Carcase leaves to the venomless insect,
That feeds, alone, its hunger full, and then
Is satiate. Oft, in rage malicious,
'Twill ope the sacred precincts, where repose
The crumbling atoms of the shells of men,
And drag from thence a putrid form before
The gadding multitude—of one, perhaps,
In which a breath of life, a sigh, into Eternity would pack, in quaking fear,
The sacrilegious assailant; but now
It kicks about the mass in rudest sport,
Or tramples o'er its worth to power.—It
Will greet thee in smiles ineffable; aye,
And frame the comely look of truth; preludes
To some new "pending act," put on to win.
The more to damn; to sup upon thy fame,
And fatten on the keener relish, thus Bestow'd for foul detraction. No spouse
It has, of honest heart and pure intent,
But like the grisly form of imag'd death,
Robs, itself bereft, of all attachment;
That when from virtue it has stript the name
She bore, or stolen from chastity her
Inheritance, or spread an idle tale,
With inventions new, at each new telling,
It naught can lose, though the specious libel
Be as foul as e'en its larger self. C.

THE MEMORY OF JOYS THAT ARE PAST.

BY MRS. FELICIA HEMANS.

There is a tear of sweet relief—
A tear of rapture and of grief;
The feeling heart alone can know
What soft emotions bid it flow.
It is when memory charms the mind,
With tender images retired;
'Tis when her magic spells restore
Departed friends and joys no more.

There is an hour—a pensive hour;
And oh! how dear its soothing power!
It is when twilight spreads her veil,
And steals along the silent dale;
'Tis when the fading blossoms close,
When all is silence and repose.
Then memory wakes and loves to mourn
The days that never can return.

There is a strain—a plaintive strain,
The source of joy, and yet of pain;
It is the song whose dying measure
Some friend I belov'd has heard with pleasure;
Some friend who never again may hear
The melting lay to memory dear;
Ah! then her magic spells restore
Visions of blissful days no more.

From the Quarterly Review.

TO A GIRL THIRTEEN YEARS OF AGE.

Thy smiles, thy talk, thy aimless plays,
So beautiful approve thee,
So winning light, are all thy ways,
I cannot choose but love thee:
Thy balmy breath upon my brow
Is like the summer air,
As o'er my cheek thou leanest now,
To plant a soft kiss there.

Thy steps are advancing towards the bound
Between the child and woman;
And thoughts and feelings more profound,
And other years are coming;
And thou shalt be more deeply fair,
More precious to the heart;
But never canst thou be again,
That lovely thing thou art!

And youth shall pass, with all the brood
Of fancy-fed affection;
And care shall come with womanhood,
And wake with cold reflection;
Thou'lt learn to toil, and watch, and weep
O'er pleasures unreturning.
Like one who wakes from pleasant sleep
Unto the cares of morning.

Nay, say not so! nor cloud the sun
Of joyless expectation,
Ordained to bless the little one,
The freshling of creation!
Nor doubt that He who now doth feed
Her early lamp with gladness,
Will be her present help in need,
Her comforter in sadness.

Smile on, then, little winsome thing,
All rich in nature's measure;
Thou hast within thy heart a spring
Of self-renewing pleasure;
Smile on, fair child, and take thy fill
Of mirth, till time shall end it;
'Tis nature's wise and gentle will,
And who shall reprehend it?

TO A BRIDE.

Pass thou on! for the vow is said
That is never broken:
The hand of blessing hath trembling laid
On snowy forehead and simple braid,
And the word is spoken
By lips that never their words betrayed.

Pass thou on! for thy human all
Is richly given,
And the voice that claimed its holy thrall
Must be sweeter for life than music's fall
And this side of heaven
Thy lip may never that trust recall.

Pass thou on! yet many an eye
Will drop and glisten,
And the gushing heart in vain will try
To still its pulse as thy step goes by,
And we vainly listen
For thy voice of witching melody.

Pass thou on! yet a sister's tone
In its sweetness lingers,
Like some twin echo sent back alone,
Or the bird's soft note when its mate is flown,
And a sister's fingers
Will again o'er the thrilling harp be thrown.

And our eyes will rest on their foreheads fair,
And our hearts awaken,
Whenever we come where their voices are—
Ere of thee forsaken,
The mingled voices we listed there.

Pass on! there is not of our blessing one
That may not perish—
Like visiting angels whose errand is done,
They are never at rest till their home is won,
And we may not cherish
The beautiful gift of thy light—Pass on!

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY
NIGHT IN.—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Ulica, and by adding hereto the South America a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany at intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptability to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprize, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock. Mr. 12

MASONIC APR. NS. of the Degree of Master and Royal Arch, splendidly engraved on satin, can be obtained on application to this office. Likewise, have elegantly engraved Diplomas of Master and Royal Arch, suitable for framing.

DEWITT CLINTON.

It is always refreshing, when we can get hold of any thing from the pen of this gifted man. The following is extracted from an Address, delivered many years ago, before the Grand Lodge of this state. It will be new to most of the Masons of this generation:

The principle of association, which is implanted in our nature by the author and dispenser of all good, is calculated to produce the same beneficial end in the moral, that the power of attraction does in the natural world. The propensity to associate may be observed in every stage of society, from the rude hunter of the forest, to the polished inhabitant of the city; from the first elements of simple societies, to the more complicated and expanded associations. Whether it is an instinct or a habit; whether it is the dictate of powerful unerring nature, operating for the benefit of the subject, or the result of prudence and reason, consulting individual as well as general good, it is not necessary to investigate. We feel and we know that it predominates over our species; that it operates with the power of both these causes; and that, whether it exhibits itself in families, in literary and benevolent institutions, or in nations, its spirit is good and its object beneficent. The absence of this principle in men, or in other animals, is generally attended with ferocious and sanguinary propensities: and wherever it prevails, we find our nature improved, our felicities increased, and the general condition of society ameliorated. The gloomy anchorite, the unfeeling fanatic, and the repulsive misanthropist, always inshroud themselves in solitude, and seek in vain for that happiness which they failed of obtaining on the busy theatre of the world. Independent of those associations which may be denominated natural, we observe voluntary societies springing up in a thousand shapes, for the improvement of our physical, mental, or moral faculties. Of all the institutions however, which have been established for the purpose of proving our condition, none are more numerous and more beneficial than charitable ones, which are as diversified as the various wants or miseries of man.

Amongst associations of this description, freemasonry stands as pre-eminent in usefulness as it is in age. Its origin is lost in the abyss of unexplored antiquity. No historical records, no traditional accounts, can point out the time, the place, or the manner of its commencement. While some have endeavored to discover its footsteps amongst the master-builders and artists engaged in the construction of the first Jewish temple, others have attempted to trace it to the Eleusinian mysteries, which are said to have taught the immortality of the soul, and again have ascribed its rise to the sainted heroes of the crusades, while others have endeavored to penetrate the mysteries of the Druids, and to discover its origin amongst the wise men of that institution. Amidst this uncertainty which must ever result from the absence of written history, our safest course is to avoid a particular conclusion, and to rest satisfied with the general conviction, that our society is the most ancient benevolent institution in the world. It is remarked by an elegant and profound delineator of nature, that no other species but that of man is generally diffused over the globe. The assimilation of his nature to every clime and country indicates his excellence and demonstrates his superiority.

This remark may be applied, with some modification, to our institution. While other societies are either ephemeral in point of duration, or limited in respect to place, freemasonry is co-extensive with the enlightened part of the human race, and has raised its insignia in every quarter of the globe. Wherever man in his cultivated state fixes his habitation, freemasonry may be seen enlightening and consoling him. No diversity of religion or form of government opposes barriers to her progress. Amid the dark clouds of fanaticism and despotism she may be seen shining with unobscured brightness, diffusing light and imparting joy. In countries where one man's happiness is the cause of all men's misery, we observe with astonishment the ardour with which our institution is cultivated, and the eagerness with which it is embraced by all descriptions of men; but our astonishment must cease when we reflect that it inculcates the natural equality of mankind: it declares that all brethren are upon a level: it admits of no rank except the priority of merit, and its only aristocracy is the nobility of virtue. The avidity therefore, with which men resort, in despotic countries, to the standard of freemasonry, is the effort of nature to recover her original rights, and to surmount the corruptions of society.

Amidst the pleasing intercourse of brethren, the artificial distinctions of rank and office, and the adventitious advantages of wealth, are lost. Seeing the strong hold which masonry has upon the human heart; that it intertwines itself with the best sympathies of our nature, and is approved by the most enlightened faculties of the mind; that all the terrors of punishment—that even the horrid inquisition has not been able to destroy the institution; that like the true religion, it has flourished on the bloodstained soil of persecution: the despotic ruler, perceiving these striking characters of freemasonry, and despairing of extirpating it, has endeavored to make it an engine of state, or to regulate it in a way most conformable to his interest. Hence he has frequently descended from his throne, approached with reverential awe our sacred altars and mingled freely among the brotherhood. The beneficent and enlightened ruler, although clothed with unlimited power, yet anxious for the good of his subjects, cannot fail of countenancing an institution calculated to produce so much benefit to mankind. Hence, from different motives, and with various views, our society has been encouraged and fostered in the most ungenial climes. Its progress in free nations, where law, liberty, and good order prevail, has been singularly great; but, in these United States, it has attained an elevation and a perfection unequalled in other countries. It travels with our population from the Atlantic to the Michigan; from the Michigan; from the St. Lawrence to the Missouri: it flourishes in the sequestered hamlet as well as in the wealthy city—it is embraced by all descriptions of men as a softener of the cares and an improver of the felicities of life. In this country, where there is so little poverty, masonry in the restricted sense of pecuniary beneficence is not so essential as in other countries, where man is reduced to the most abject state; but in its more comprehensive signification of benevolence in general, and as a school where all the friendly affections of the heart, and all the delightful charities of life are taught and cherished, it is deservedly ranked amongst the most important establishments.

The state of society, of government, and of knowledge with us, is admirably calculated to countenance and encourage freemasonry: like seed thrown into a congenial soil, it has flourished accordingly. Some of its most important doctrines are here practically illustrated in the condition of our species. Man here recovers his dignity: he no longer exists a slave. All institutions which enoble his nature, which elevate his mind and purify his heart, must be cherished by him in proportion as he feels, in his own experience, the importance of those objects: and he is certainly better qualified to receive and to foster the doctrines of masonry, than if he were the slave of ignorance and despotism. There can be no doubt but that much of our flourishing condition is to be attributed to this source. Masonry considered as a moral benevolent institution, will unquestionably prefer those stations she observes man in his most dignified and happy form: and as an intellectual establishment, where she can be more gratified in beholding the diffusion of knowledge and the supremacy of mind, than in this country?

The purity of freemasonry, here, has no doubt, had an auspicious tendency in promoting its prosperity. It is vain to conceal that our institution has in various countries been adulterated and degraded by the arts of designing and interested men. The distinction between ancient and modern masonry, which occurred in England a long time ago, is well known; but Germany has been the prolific parent of a thousand devices, intended to sport with public credulity, and calculated to degrade the simplicity and beauty of our society. The great landmarks have been broken down: the genuine degrees of freemasonry have been considered as initiative steps into more elevated orders, and more sublime mysteries; with a view of gain or gratifying that taste for frivolous parade which is the natural companion of frivolous minds, orders have been invented as connected with and more exalted than freemasonry. They are decorated with stars and ribbands and garters, and other insignia—all calculated to mislead the weak, the frivolous and the vain. They are attended with the pomp and mystery and solemnity which the imagination can invent. They are imposed upon their credulous votaries as the offspring of heroic achievements—as the establishment of sages who administered before the oracles of God—or as the invention of heaven-endowed philosophers, possessed of all the secrets of nature—of the immortal elixir—the philosopher's stone, and the powers of invisibility and ubiquity. Such gross impostures being invented and practiced in most instances by unworthy brethren and being ingrafted upon our institution, have tended to degrade and debase genuine freemasonry. In this country, ancient masonry, as used and taught for ages, exists in its pure unsophisticated shape: its venerable simplicity has not been invaded by the rude hands of modern barbarians; its sublime doctrines have not been sullied by the ridiculous fables of wretched adventures—nor have its beautiful ceremonies been ridiculed by the empirical parade and disgusting mumery of recreants and cowans.

The exertions of some individuals, have had a signal effect in exalting the institution. At the close of the revolutionary war, some distinguished brethren applied themselves with zeal and industry in rebuilding the masonic temple, which had been nearly destroyed.—This generous spirit was communicated to others; and to this original and continued impulse, we are indebted for much of the ground we now occupy. Some of the brethren of whom I now speak, have gone to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns. Many of us have witnessed—all of us have heard of their laudable exertions. No pains were spared—no talents were unemployed by them in their honorable career: that enthusiasm which they felt they communicated; and before they descended to the silent tomb, they had the satisfaction of seeing their efforts crowned with success, and their most sanguine anticipations surpassed. Had I time or the talents, I would pronounce their eulogium—but I cheerfully submit the task to the grateful feelings which animate the bosoms of all who hear me: that they will enjoy the rewards of benevolence in another and a better world cannot be doubted.

But turning from a subject, calculated to operate so much upon our sensibility, and to excite the mingled emotions of sorrow and joy, let us render the justice due to the paternal and superintending care of the grand lodge and its officers. A good government, a flourishing community, cannot exist without good laws. It is impossible that our institution could have attained such an elevation in feeble and unworthy hands. The success of your past efforts, will doubtless serve as a stimulus to future exertions.

MASONIC REMINISCENCE.

In the year 1781, a young American merchant, settled in France, employed several Nuns in a Convent at Nantes, to execute a variety of masonic ornaments, including aprons, with the American and French flags entwined, emblematical of the happy union subsisting between the two countries. They were elegantly executed, and were sent as a present to General Washington, accompanied by a masonic address. The year following (being the last year of the revolutionary war) the same merchant, while travelling in England, received a letter of which the following is a copy, which had made the tour of England in pursuit of him. Had the various post offices through whose hands the letter passed, known they were transmitting the signature of the immortal Washington, at that crisis of the Revolution, what would have been their sensations?

State of New York, August 10, 1782.

"Gentlemen—The masonic ornaments which accompanied your brotherly address of the 23d January last, though elegant themselves, were rendered more valuable by the flattering sentiments, and affectionate manner in which they were presented.

"If my endeavors to avert the evil with which this country was threatened by a deliberate path of tyranny should be crowned with the success that is wished, the praise is to the Grand Architect of the Universe, who did not see fit to suffer his superstructures and justice to be subjected to the ambition of the Princes of this world, or to the rod of oppression in the hands of any power on earth.

"For your affectionate vow permit me to be grateful, and to offer mine for true brothers in all parts of the world, of whatever nation, and to assure you of the sincerity with which I am yours.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

Messrs Watson & Cossard, East of Nantes, France.

LABOR LOST.—A learned man of Naples, Martorelli, occupied himself for two years in writing a long memoir, in order to prove that the ancients were unacquainted with the use of glass for windows; and fifteen days after the publication of this folio, a house discovered in Pompeii, all the windows of which were paneled with glass.

SCIENCE.

INDICATIONS OF RAIN.

1st, By Birds. When the large black sea-mew, the cormorants, aquatic birds, and birds generally, go to the river and water and bathe noisily; ducks, geese and moor-hens plunge into the water, flapping it about with much noise; wild geese fly high in the air and in disorder; the plovers become restless, flying here and there, and uttering their peculiar cry; the ravens and the rooks assemble in groups, and then almost immediately separate; the ravens in the morning, and the rooks in the evening, utter continual cries, and walk solitarily on the ground; the swallows fly low in the air; the magpies cry much at other seasons than at pairing time; domestic birds rub themselves in the dust; partridges, pigeons and smaller birds bathe themselves in sand; the cock crows immediately after sunset (when, on the contrary, the cock walks about during rain, it is a sign it will not continue long); the melancholy cry of the chaffinch is heard; the wood-lark, linnet, sparrow, and robin, cry or sing during the mornings; the peacocks and owls cry more frequently and strongly than usual during the night; the poultry are longer engaged searching out the insect beneath their feathers the latter penetrating deeply into the skin.

2dly, By other animals. When the cattle pant for air toward mid-day pastured cattle, sheep and goats, leap much and quarrel with each other; pigs are restless, and disperse their food; cats rub their ears and press their bodies against obstacles; dogs become restless, scratch the ground, eat grass and bark in a growling manner; the foxes bark; the wolves howl;—the moles raise the earth higher than ordinary; the frogs croak much, and hide themselves in meadows; the bats do not leave their retreats in the evening; the spiders work but little; spin short threads, and retire to their corners; the flies bite horses and cattle on the legs, are agitated and fly confusedly together; the fish (corbitis fossilis) trouble the water; and the worms disturb the earth.

It is considered as a presage of wind, when aquatic birds of the sea and marshes fly together towards the land and play especially in the morning; birds at sea take shelter on vessels; wild geese fly very high, and in bands, going toward the east; water-fowls cry, and are agitated; the lapwing cries loudly: the king-fisher flies towards the earth; the (corvus frugilegus) pass rapidly through the air, and play on the borders of water. It is well known that hares have a presentiment of wind and will often set ten hours in advance on the place where it will blow.—Sylvan, jahrbuch fur Fast Maenner.

ADIPOCIRE.

When the exhumation of the dead bodies from the burial ground of St. Innocent's, at Paris, led to the discovery of adipocire, or rather to its re-discovery, for it was known to Sir Thomas Brown and Lord Bacon, it produced a strong sensation among the men of science in England. Some went so far as to believe that adipocire might be made on a large scale, and a joint stock company was actually formed for that purpose; several nobleman and men of property subscribed 20,000*l.*, and an establishment was constructed at Bristol, containing a number of locks, each large enough to hold several dead horses, through which a stream of water was constantly flowing. The experiment failed, and the money, of course was lost; but I am told that the principal superintendent, an able chymist and eminent physician of the present day, asserts, that it failed, not from any absurdity or impracticability in the scheme, but from the impracticable and unmanageable men he had to deal with; and that he is still convinced that, if properly conducted, it would be possible to transmute dead horses into spermaceti candles. If this had been known in the year 1825, we should have had an Adipocire company, and the shares at a premium.

A gentleman, married, and, in embarrassed circumstances, suddenly disappearing, it was concluded that he had gone off to avoid his creditors; on which they met, declared him a bankrupt, ascertained the amount of his property, and declared a dividend. Among the property was, a jointure of 200*l.* a year to his wife, which they could legally claim if he was a bankrupt, but if not it continued the property of the widow.—Five weeks and four days from the morning of his disappearance, his body was found floating in a neighboring river, and so putrid that it was identified chiefly by the dress, and the contents of the pockets. And here arose a question, was he dead at the time he was declared a bankrupt, and if so can a dead man be made a bankrupt? One of his relatives, a veterinary surgeon, discovered, on carefully examining the body, that part of the flesh of the loins had been converted into adipocire—this he cut out, carried off, and showed it to Dr. Gibbes, who was at that time superintending the Institution for the Production of Adipocire, and the result of whose extensive experience was, that it was never formed in less than six or eight weeks.—This evidence was produced on the trial, and was conclusive—it was clear that the drowned man must have been under water ever since the morning of his disappearance, and consequently, that he was dead at the time when he was declared a bankrupt. In law, a dead man cannot be made a bankrupt—the bankruptcy was set aside, and the jointure of 200*l.* a year, restored to the widow.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

TAHITI MARRAIGES.

Marraiges among the higher orders were often contracted in the following manner. A person who had a beautiful daughter brought her, while yet a child, to a chief, saying, with the utmost frankness, "Here is a wife for you." If the great man liked the girl's appearance he took her off her father's hands, and placed her with some trusty dependant, to be trained and fattened, like a calf for the slaughter, till she had attained a snitable age. When her master chose to take her for his wife, the dethrothed and their friends met at the marae. The girl appeared there with a cord about her neck, supported by one of her nearest kin, accompanied by a man holding some leaves of sweet smelling fern in each of his hands, which he pressed on either side of his head, above the ears. When the procession reached the altar, these leaves were cast upon the ground. The priest having muttered his prayers, took up one of the sprigs of fern, and, while each of the dead ancestors of the bride (as far back as they were remembered) was named, he doubled down or tore off one of these side leaflets. Then, while the names of her living relatives were mentioned in due order, one of the remaining leaflets was successively pointed out as the number of each. When that which represented the nearest in blood of those who were at hand occurred, that kinsman stepped forth, loosed the rope from the bride's neck, and delivered her to her husband. The friends on both sides then presented the couple with hogs, bundles of cloth, wooden dishes, canoes, &c. according to their rank and ability. In less time than the honey-moon requires to fill and empty her horn, the chief grew weary of his spouse, and said to her, Aluia (it is enough) haere a jo (go away.) The woman was then abandoned, and what often became of her may easily be guessed. In this manner the great people took and put away as many wives as they pleased, or could get.

AUCTION OF LADIES.

An auction of unmarried ladies used to take place annually in Babylon. "In every district," says the historian, "they assembled on a certain day of every year, all the virgins of marriageable age." The most beautiful was first put up, and the man who bid the largest sum of money gained possession of her. The second in personal appearance followed, and the bidders gratified themselves with handsome wives, according to the depth of their purses. But, alas! it seems there were ladies in Babylon for which no money was likely to be offered, yet these were also disposed of, so provident were the Babylonians. "When all the beautiful virgins," says the historian, "were sold, the crier ordered the most deformed to stand up; and after he had openly demanded who would marry her with a small sum, she was at length adjudged to the man who would be satisfied with the least; in this manner the money arising from the sale of the handsome served as a portion to those who were either of disagreeable looks, or that had any other imperfection." This custom prevailed about 500 years before Christ,

RIDICULOUS FOLLIES COMMITTED BY SOME ANCIENTS.

Xerxes having made a bridge of boats over the sea, to convey his army out of Asia into Europe, which by a furious tempest, and the rapidity of the current, broke to pieces, he was so angry at it that he sent a defiance to the sea, commanding his officers to give it 600 stripes, and to throw fetters in it to produce calmer behavior; but as if all these rigours was not a sufficient chastisement, with hot irons he branded ignominious stamps upon it. "O, unruly and stubborn waters, your sovereign lord has assigned you these punishments, in revenge of the injuries you have done him, and now will pass over you in spite of all opposition."

The great Cham of Tartary, every day when he had dined himself, caused a noise of trumpets to sound at the gate of the palace, to notify to all the kings and sovereign princes in all parts of the universe, that the great Cham had dined, and now gave them leave to go to dinner.

A woman of very nice apprehension complained to the minister of the parish, with tears in her eyes, of an unsupportable affliction she daily underwent, which was, that in the morning she was necessitated to put on her clothes, and at night when she went to bed, was obliged to put them off again.

Caligula, the Roman emperor, excessively delighted in a horse he had that was named Swift, whom, by a solemn message he invited to supper with himself at his own table, caused his provender to be given him in a vessel of gold, and wine in basins of the same metal; swore by his health and fortune, promised to make him consul of Rome, and was vain enough to have done it, if the horse had lived to the next election.—He made the horse a priest, colleague with him in the empire; his stable was a sumptuous palace, built with marble, his manger was made of ivory, his harness purple with a jewel of precious stones hanging at his breast, and had a family, servants, and his house richly furnished.

Miscellany.

EMMET'S LAST MOMENTS.

One day, previous to the trial, as the Governor was going his rounds, he entered Emmet's room rather abruptly; and observing a remarkable expression in his countenance he apologized for the interruption.—He had a fork affixed to his little deal table, and appended to it there was a tress of hair. "You see," said he to the keeper, "how innocently I am employed.—This little tress has long been dear to me, and I am playing it to wear on the day of my execution." On the day of that fatal event, there was found, sketched by his own hand with a pen and ink, upon that very table an admirable likeness of himself, the head severed from the body which lay near it, surrounded by the scaffold, the axe, and the frightful paraphernalia of high treason execution. What a strange union of tenderness, enthusiasm and fortitude did not the above traits exhibit. His fortitude, indeed never forsook him.

On the night previous to his death, he slept soundly as ever; and when the fatal morning dawned, he rose, knelt down and prayed, ordered some milk which he drank, wrote two letters—one to his brother in America, and the other to the Secretary of State enclosing it; and desired the sheriff to be informed that he was ready. When they came into his room he said that he had two requests to make; one that his arms might be left as loosely as possible, which was humanely and instantly acceded to. "I make the other," said he, "not under any idea that it can be granted, but that it may be held in remembrance that I made it; it is that I may be permitted to die in my uniform." This of course could not be granted; and the request seemed to have no other object than to show that he gloried in the cause in which he was to suffer. A remarkable example of his power over himself and others occurred at this melancholy moment. He was passing out, attended by the sheriff, and preceded by the executioner—in one of the passages stood the turnkey, who was personally assigned to him during his confinement; this poor fellow loved him to his heart, and the tears were streaming from his eyes in torrents.—Emmet paused for a moment; his hands were not at liberty—he kissed his cheek—and the man who had been an inmate of a dungeon, habituated to the scenes of horror and hardened against their operation, fell senseless at his feet. Before his eyes had opened again upon the world, those of the youthful sufferer had closed forever.

(a) The color of the rebel uniform was green,

THE EGYPTIAN YEAR.

It appears that the first people that formed themselves into states after the deluge, gave only to their year 360 days. The Egyptians soon perceived that this year was shorter than the revolution of the sun; they therefore prolonged it by five more days, which they added to the end of the twelve months, without making a part of either of them. In Egypt each of these days received the name of one of their divinities. But the Egyptians still saw that their year was yet too short, and that it was necessary to add a day more to every four years, in order to make it correspond with the movement of the sun; from religious scruples, they would not calculate among the other days, this sixth added day, in order that the commencement of their year should be definite. Thus each day of the year was sanctified successively by fetes and rejoicings which happened in the course of a cycle of 1460 days. It was not until the time of Augustus, that they adopted the Julian year, and they made it to commence in the month of August: twelve gods presided over the twelve months. They divided the year also in 36 parts of ten days each, and placed each of these divisions under the protection of inferior divinities. These genii or spirits were called Decans, Impeteurs, or watchers over portions of time of ten days; they had their names, and particular functions allotted to them, and their astrologers attributed to them the most extensive influence over diseases and health. It has been supposed by some, that the Egyptians divided their year into 36 parts; after the divisions of their country, which was divided into 36 Nomes or governments. The lucky and unlucky, or happy and unhappy days formed a part of the legends of the ancient Egyptians. They observed them with the utmost exactness, and it is from them the superstition of lucky and unlucky days arose, which the councils had great difficulty to abolish. They are still indicated in the calendars of the 9th century, and the influence of them has descended to our own times, as we frequently see among certain classes of people.

Egyptian names of the months: 1. Troph, beginning 29th Aug.—signal of the opening year—time of the vintage. 2. Paophi, beginning 29th Sept.—the equinox—time of fishing. 3. DR. PARR'S ECCENTRICS IN THE PULPIT.

Attending Hatton Church one Sunday before he rebuilt it, I came in, with a lady while he was reading the lessons. Fixing his eye upon me, he stopped, and called aloud in the full congregation to his man Sam who stood in the aisle, "Sam, show that Lady and Gentleman into my pew."—One Sunday, on mounting into the pulpit, he, to my surprise, produced a printed volume of sermons, and addressed the congregation—"My beloved friends, I have been neglectful of my duty, by not having a sermon of my own ready for you to day, but I will read you a better than I could make for you. It is Dr. Rees, a Dissenter; but there is nothing in it to which we of the Establishment do not subscribe." He then read it through and closed the service as usual.

LEGAL CRUSHING TO DEATH.

At the assizes in Sussex, August, 1735 a man who pretended to be dumb and lame, was indicted for a barbarous murder and robbery. He had been taken up upon suspicion, several spots of blood, and part of the property being found upon him. When he was brought to the bar, he would not speak or plead, tho' often urged to it, and the sentence to be inflicted on such as stand mute, read to him in vain. Four or five persons in the court, swore that they had heard him speak, and the boy who was his accomplice, and apprehended, was there to be a witness against him; yet he continued mute; whereupon he was carried back to Horsham jail, to be pressed to death, if he would not plead—when they laid on him 100 weight, then added 100 more, and he still continued obstinate; they then added one 100 which made 300 lb. weight yet he would not speak; 50 lb. more was added, when he was nearly dead, having all the agonies of death upon him; then the executioner, who weighed about 16 or 17 stone, laid down upon the board which was over him, and adding to the weight, killed him in an instant.

Giving the Bag.—This is well known to be a cant phrase among the galls, equivalent to discharging a beau: A young gentleman went to make an evening visit to a young lady and upon entering the room found her laughing right merrily at something—of course he inquired the cause—she told him her mother had just been making a pillow case and sewed up both ends! Well, said the gentleman, it is a pity she han't sewed you up in it—yes, perly answered Miss, and then I suppose you would have wanted her to give you the bag.—Bangor Whig.

A Precious Family.—At a sitting of the Special Sessions yesterday, Margaret Mack and Anna Mack, mother and daughter, were tried for stealing, earrings, dress, quilt, red-cape shawl, &c., from Mrs. Ellen McGrath, found guilty, and sent to the penitentiary for ninety days each. The husband and father, and one daughter of this family, are now in the state prison, a son in the penitentiary, another son in prison for felony, awaiting his trial, and now the wife and another daughter are sent to the penitentiary, leaving only one child, a little girl of 7 to 8 years old, out of prison.—Sun.

Borrowing.—The Egyptians had a very remarkable ordinance to prevent persons from borrowing imprudently. An Egyptian was not permitted to borrow without giving to his creditor in pledge the body of his father. It was deemed both an impiety and infamy not to redeem so sacred a pledge. A person who died without discharging that duty, was deprived of the customary honors paid to the dead.

PRIVILEGES OF THE LADIES IN LEAP YEAR.—In an ancient Anglo-Saxon law, which still remains in force, it is enacted:

"Albeit as often as Leape Yeare doathe occurre, the women holdeth the prerogative over the menne, in matter of courtshippe, love, and matrimonie; soe that when the ladie proposeth, he shall receive her proposal in all good courteship."

A beggar asked Dr. Smollet for alms, he gave him, through mistake, a guinea. The poor fellow, on perceiving it, hobbled after him to return it; upon which, Smollet return it to him, with another guinea, as a reward for his honesty, exclaiming at the same time, "What a lodging Honesty has taken up with!"

A geranium at a window sweetens the air, rejoices the eye, links you with nature and innocence, and is something to love. The very feel of the leaf has a household warmth in it—something analogous to clothing and comfort, says Leigh Hunt.

Brazilian Introduction.—The warmest manner in which one Brazilian can introduce another to a family is: "This is my friend, if he steal anything, I am accountable for it."

POPULAR TALES.

A P E L L E S,

A ROMANCE OF GREEK HISTORY.

"What can be the cause of this?" soliloquised the painter Apelles, as he sat alone one morning before his easel, on which appeared the half-finished semblance of a beautiful female countenance. "What, in Apollo's name can be the cause of this? Hath my right hand utterly lost its cunning, that I cannot complete this portrait? A full hour have I now been here, and yet my work stands precisely where it did yesterday. Nothing—nothing can I do but sit like an idle dreamer, and gaze on those lovely eyes? Campaspe has been most kind—most patient with me, tho' she might well have complained of my delay, after having sat here thrice a-day for so long a time. Oh had I but left those eyes—those glowing smiling eyes—to the last moment! I must dash them out yet.—There is no other way to break the strange charm they have cast upon me. Yea! they must be effaced." So speaking, the painter took his brush, dipped into his darkest colors, and raised his hand to effect his meditated purpose. For a minute he gazed on the basilisk-like orbs looking upon him from the canvass, and then, with the exclamation, "It would be sacrilege!" threw the brush aside, and began hastily to pace the floor of his painting-room.

For a time he walked with his arms folded, and his eyes cast on the ground. "Can it be possible," continued he, "that my heart has been so mad as to attach itself to the object of my sovereign's—of the generous Alexander's love. No, no, surely not; surely not. Besides, have I not sat face to face with the majestic Olympias—nay, have I not figured forth the lineaments of Venus herself, and in such manner that men have knelt before the portraiture, and confessed the visible presence of the immortal queen of love—have I not done this, and felt no harm—kept my head cool, my hand steady, and my heart at ease! And can a mere woman—a girl—have chained me, whom a divinity and a queen have failed to move! No, no, it is impossible—it is impossible! Gratitude to my master alone would have prevented it. Let me endeavor at once, then, to throw off this inexplicable fancy or rather phrensy, and proceed with my task." With these words he resumed his seat before his easel, still uttering, with a tone of determined conviction, the words, "It is impossible!" But the smiling, charming eyes again met his gaze, and again he sank back in his chair, still muttering "it is impossible" but in a fainter and fainter tone at each successive repetition.

"What is impossible, Apelles?" said a remarkably soft voice at his ear. The painter started from his reverie, and beheld the owner of the enchanting orbs standing behind him. "Campaspe!" said the confused artist; "I—I was—" "You were idling, Apelles, you would say, if you spoke the truth," replied the beautiful visitor; "look at the canvass; not one touch added since I was here yesterday! Why you most indolent of painters, what have you to say for yourself?" "I deserve your severest displeasure, Campaspe," said the painter, looking sadly on the ground. "Nay, Apelles. I meant not to chide or be angry with you," returned the lady, approaching him, and laying her hand upon his arm; "truth to say, Apelles, I care not although the portrait were never finished. Never were these poor features put on canvass before, and, somehow or other, I love to sit so well, that I run away from every thing to come here." The ardent look which the artist turned upon the speaker's ingenuous countenance at these words, caused a blush to rise upon her cheek, and her eye in turn to drop its gaze on the floor. "But come Apelles," continued she after a pause, "let us resume our sitting; Alexander hath ordered this painting, and his will—(a gentle sigh here interrupted her words)—must be obeyed." The name of the Macedonian struck a chill through the painter's frame, and served to recall him once more to his senses. He sat down at his easel, while the beautiful original of his half-completed sketch took her allotted seat by his side.

For a considerable period the artist retained his place, striving manfully to commit to the canvass the yet unportrayed lineaments of the lovely countenance before him. But by degrees he became agitated; his hand trembled, and his eye grew dim. At length exclaiming, "No, no, it is vain—it is impossible!" he threw down his brush, and fell back in his seat, in a passion of tears. Campaspe sprang in an instant to his side. "Apelles, dear Apelles!" she cried soothingly, "you are ill—you are fevered; your hand and brow are burning hot; you have overtasked your frame by these midnight labors at the easel!" "No, Campaspe," exclaimed the painter, as losing all control over himself, he fell at her feet, and retained her hand in his own, "no, Campaspe! I am well in body, but I love—I adore you. In vain have I struggled against this passion, and but now, before your entry into this apartment, I declared it impossible that my heart should have fallen into this snare. Alas! I feel now that it is impossible for me to resist loving you—that it is impossible for me to pursue this task, unless it can be done without your being before my eyes!"—the poor painter let go the hand which he had held during this speech, and again threw himself into his seat, burying his face in his hands. Campaspe meanwhile stood motionless and speechless. "Campaspe!" said the painter, raising himself once more, "you are angry with me for this madness?" The beautiful girl sighed as she answered, "I am not angry, Apelles! Your words give me pain, but, alas! they also give me pleasure—more pleasure than pain." The painter again knelt before her. "You love me, then, Campaspe!" cried he passionately. "Alas! I fear it Apelles!" was the reply of Campaspe, as she averted her gaze from the kneeling artist.

"Vipers! ungrateful vipers! I shall have your bodies thrown to the dogs!" This terrible exclamation sounded in the ears of Apelles and Campaspe like the knell of doom. It was the voice of Alexander, who had entered the apartment unperceived by the pair, entranced as they were in their own emotions. His eye glaring like that of a tiger made cubless, his lofty brow contracted and discoloured with passion, and his whole features bearing the impress of the most violent rage, the young conqueror of Asia seemed to the unfortunate pair like one animated with the spirit of the avenging furies. "Begone from my sight!" continued Alexander, striding hurriedly up and down the chamber, and addressing himself to Apelles; begone! ere I am tempted to defile a monarch's hands by tearing thy wretched body in pieces!" The unfortunate painter knelt before his sovereign. "First let me say, sire, that the fault is mine! Spare Campaspe!" The trembling lady also sank on her knee, and cried, "Mine was the crime, Alexander! Let thy anger fall on me alone!" The monarch's wrath was ought but appeased. "Away from my sight, ingrate!" he again exclaimed to Apelles; "and, mark me, I swear by the head of Philip, that thy body shall feed the dogs, if thou art found within the walls of Halicarnassus—ay, on the same soil which I tread—after this day's sun goes down! Begone!" "Oh, fly, Apelles!" murmured the weeping Campaspe.

Within a few hours after this scene took place the miserable Apelles had left Halicarnassus, where the Macedonian king and court were then stationed. The city of Halicarnassus was situated on the sea-coast of one of the ancient provinces of Asia Minor. Within sight of the shore lay the island of Rhodes, and thither Apelles bent his course, reckless whether he went but led accidentally in this direction by finding a Rhodian fishing-boat about to sail homewards, across the strait dividing the island from the mainland. At first the exiled painter sat moodily in the stern of the little boat, heedless of all around him, and racked with fears for Campaspe, as well as grief for his separation from her. But by degrees his mind cleared up. He was young and hope is the inseparable attendant of youth. He remembered, besides, after his thoughts grew calmer, that the character of Alexander was too noble a one to render Campaspe's fate a cause of alarm. It was true that he himself was divided from her—for ever; but what chance had there ever been of his love being fortunate? "It was a dream at best," said the painter. He had spoken unconsciously aloud, and the old fisherman, who, with his son, was engaged in rowing the boat, exclaimed, "Dream, master! why, you don't dream with your eyes open, do you?" "Nay, good friend," replied Apelles, I was but communing when I said so with my own unhappy thoughts." "You are not like one," returned the fisherman, looking at the painter's handsome attire, "to whom fortune has been very cruel, and no damsel, surely, can have been hard-hearted to a youth with so fair a form and face as yours. By Neptune, you might receive a mint of money were you to go and hire yourself as a model to our 'Protopogenes.' 'Protopogenes!' cried Apelles, 'what, the famous painter! Methought he was not in Rhodes at present but at the Olympic Games.'" "Nay, master," replied the fisherman, "true, he meant to have gone thither with his incomparable picture of Venus; but when he heard that Apelles—the painter of Cos, you know—had gone to attend on Alexander; and was not to be at the festival, Protopogenes said that 'no other painter, in Greece or all her isles, was worthy of contending with or going to see,' and so would not stir. It was well for Apelles, for no living painter could rival our Protopogenes." "Say you so!" was the reply to this remark; "I must see this unparalleled painter."

Accordingly, soon after his arrival at Rhodes, Apelles, whose griefs faded for the time before his interest in his art, sought out the house of the painter Protopogenes. The dwelling was a mean one, yet the visitor knew that the most illustrious artists were often compelled to live in penury. An old woman received Apelles. "My master is not at home, noble sir; he has gone out with some pious lords who came to borrow our Venus—you must have heard of our Venus, sir—for the great festival to-morrow. I warrant me, now, thou wouldst have thy sweet features pictured to please some love-lorn fair one. Our lady Venus make thee kind to her!" No bad portress this (thought Apelles) for a painter. "Nay, dame," said he aloud, "I would only at present see your master's work-room. Could you show it but for a moment to me?" "It is against rule," returned the old woman; "but bless thy comely face, I can refuse thee nothing. Ah! it was ever my weakness—from my youth upward!" With these words, the dame conducted Apelles to her master's painting-room, where finished and unfinished pieces of various descriptions rested against the walls. Apelles could not refrain from repeated exclamations of delight, as his skilful eye scanned the splendid coloring and execution of the paintings around. "Oh, could you but have seen our Venus!" cried the old woman. "Nay, good dame," replied Apelles, "I see enough to tell me I am in the workshop of a master." The gratified housekeeper, on seeing her visitor about to depart, said, "My master will be glad to see one who knows and loves the art. Will you give your name, sir?" Apelles looked around him for a moment, and then seizing a board and brush, placed the one on the easel, and at one stroke drew a circle, so perfect in outline that the patient labor of years could not have improved it. "Show this to Protopogenes," said he to the dame, "and tell him that thus the painters of Cos write their names!" He then departed.

The adoption of this way of introducing himself to his brother artist and rival in celebrity, was the dictation chiefly of a momentary fancy. Apelles waited till some time after the hour when Protopogenes was to return home, and then he again bent his steps to the Rhodian painter's dwelling, anxious at once to see him, and curious to know the impression made by his own fanciful mode of displaying the professional touch and character. The old housekeeper received Apelles with a look of great importance as well as respect. "Follow me, gentle stranger," said the dame, as she led the way to the painting-room, "There," continued she, pointing to the same board on which Apelles had drawn the circle, "there is a specimen, my master bade me say, of the style in which the painters of Rhodes write their names!" Apelles looked, and beheld his circle filled up with more beautiful colors than ever nature laid on the apple of the tree. "What tints! what light and shade!" exclaimed Apelles with rapture; "I can design—Protopogenes can paint!"

As Apelles uttered these words, a side-door opened, and a thin tall man of middle age, issued from it, bearing on his lofty brow and in his glowing eye the stamp of genius and enthusiasm. "Thou," cried this personage on entering, "thou art Apelles!" "And thou, Protopogenes!" was the reply. The two painters embraced each other warmly, and speedily plunged into an animated converse on the art they both loved so well. "To what chance," said Protopogenes at length, "do I owe this happy sight of one I have longed for years to see!" The question awoke Apelles rudely.

from the forgetfulness into which his professional enthusiasm had for a time immersed him. His countenance darkened, and this so visibly, that the Rhodian painter exclaimed, "Pardon me, my friend, if my abrupt question has given thee pain." "It hath pained me, Protogenes," replied the other, "but no fault rests with thee." Apelles then laid open the whole history of his unfortunate love, and its more unfortunate issue. The artist of Rhodes had no sooner heard of the ire of Alexander, than he struck his hands together, and cried in a tone of great distress, "Thou art lost, Apelles—utterly lost, unless thou canst immediately escape from Rhodes, or be closely concealed within its bounds! Before returning home even now, I witnessed the arrival of a Macedonian galley in the harbor. It came from Halicarnassus, and bore a party hither in search of a fugitive; I heard the description—alas! it was thine, Apelles! Come, my brother, thou must be concealed instantly!" Apelles stirred not, but raised his hand to his brow, and remained in thought for a moment. "Come, come!" cried Protogenes. "we must not delay, for assuredly they will soon seek thee here." "No, my friend," replied Apelles calmly, "I will not fly, nor will I stoop to hide me even from the lion's wrath. If Alexander seeks me, he shall find me. Never will I fly, and leave Campaspe to bear the punishment that should have fallen alone on me!" Protogenes wrung his hands. "I have loved thee long, Apelles, though my eyes beheld thee not, and I but love thee the more for these noble sentiments. If thou art taken before Alexander, I also will go, and it may be, will move him not to strike this blow at the arts of Greece—of his country. Yea Apelles, I will share thy fate." "My generous brother," was all that Apelles could say in reply.

It was not long ere the resolves of Protogenes was put to the test. But a few minutes after this conversation had passed, a band of Macedonian soldiers entered the house of the Rhodian painter. Apelles was indeed the object of their search; and when they notified their orders to bring him to Halicarnassus, the painter only said, "I submit to the will of Alexander," and gave himself up to their charge. Protogenes besought and received permission to accompany his friend. Without delay, although the shades of evening had already fallen in, the party went on board the galley with their charge, and rapidly proceeded on their way across the strait. The moon was riding high in the heavens ere they landed, Apelles and Protogenes were then left temporarily under the guard of the soldiers, until the commander of the party went to learn the further orders of Alexander. He soon returned, and thus addressed the unfortunate painter. "Apelles, it gives me pain to say that the king hath commanded thee to be thrown into the deepest dungeon of the guard-house, there to await thy fate on the morrow." Protogenes, who was more moved by this stern command than the object of it, entreated so earnestly, that the commander of the party was prevailed upon to permit him to bear the prisoner company. "I may lose my head for it," said the reluctant captain, "but I honor thee for thy warmth of friendship, and will take the risk." The party then conducted the two painters to the guard-house, and lodged them in a vaulted cell, dark, damp, and miserable in the extreme. Here the friends passed the night.

Alexander the Great sat in his chamber of audience surrounded by his courtiers, on the morning succeeding the day that had proved so lamentably eventful to Apelles. The king's looks were thoughtful and gloomy and the aspect of his courtiers was not less so, partly because they followed the old use and wont of dressing their faces by that of their sovereign, and partly because they loved Apelles (whose flight and capture, though not his crime, were known,) and feared for his fate. "Why comes not the prisoner, Clitus?" said Alexander, suddenly breaking the long silence that had been preserved. "My lord, the guard-house is at some distance. But I delivered your commands, and he will be here anon." Silence again followed the reply of Clitus, and nothing occurred to disturb it until Apelles was led into the hall. The unfortunate painter retained his eyes fixed on the ground as he moved towards the footstool of the throne on which the king sat. When at the distance of a few feet, Apelles knelt down, without raising his eyes. Protogenes followed his example, but at a short distance behind him,---

Without noticing the presence of the prisoner's companion, Alexander turned to his courtiers, and said, in a low but stern tone. "What deserves the man who has stolen the affections of one whom he knew to be the object of his king and master's love?" The courtiers were silent, until the king repeated with vehemence, "Say, what doth such a man deserve?" "Death!" was the reply that passed from lip to lip. "You have spoken well," said the king, "and as I expected from you. The man is now before you, and has heard the doom you have pronounced." Protogenes could bear this scene no longer; he started forward, and exclaimed, "Royal Alexander! do not, for an involuntary error, take away the crown and glory of Grecian art, Apelles—" "Who art thou?" interrupted the monarch. "I, great king, am Protogenes, a painter of Rhodes." "I have heard of thee," replied Alexander; "thou too speakest well. But it is vain to intercede for this man. His doom is fixed! It is right, however, that the partner of his crime should share that doom. Clitus, bring hither Campaspe!" Apelles had not opened his lips to pray for himself, but he now exclaimed, in accents of agony, "Oh, royal, noble sovereign, spare her! She is innocent!" "Silence, one and all!" was the king's reply. In a few moments, Campaspe was led into the hall by Clitus. The king left his throne, and advanced to meet her. The lady sank at his feet. "Mark the doom, all of you," cried the king in a loud and clear voice, "which I pronounce upon these two unfortunates. Let them for daring to love each other, be instantly bound—together for life! And be the bonds," he continued, with a smile, "the golden ones, which Hymen forges!"

Snatched thus unexpectedly from the brink of the grave, as it were, Apelles and Campaspe were in an instant pouring forth broken expressions of gratitude before the feet of their sovereign; while, at the same time, all the courtiers, who had but the instant before devoted the pair to death, were crying out, "Generous, mageanimous monarch!" "Nay," said the hero of Macedon, "if Alexander cannot control himself, how shall he presume to govern and command others? And yet, believe me, the concession is not without its merit, since the struggle to accomplish it was a more arduous one than any the conquest of Asia shall ever cost to the king of Macedon. But it was short, and is over. Take her, Apelles," continued Alexander, joining the hands of the painter and Campaspe, "and learn that thou servest a master who loves his friends more than himself."

THE GATHERER.

AN IMPRESSIVE INCIDENT.

Within his house in a great arm chair before the fire sat an old grey headed man ripe for the grave. 'Twas winter, and the cold wind whistled among the leafless branches of the trees, and the snow and sleet rattled against the windows. The old man chuckled, for he was warm and comfortable, and the biting blast touched him not. He said, "I have enough—I am rich—so blow ye winds, and drift ye snows, I am safe." A servant entered and said: "Sir, a woman is at the door trembling in the cold—has no where to sleep—no home to go to. She begs for a corner of your kitchen to pass the night in." "Away, I've no room for thieving beggars—there is a tavern close by; tell her to go there." "She says she has no money, and begs you to give her enough to buy a meal and lodging." "Begone! drive her off. What I've got's my own, and I'll keep it too. I've got none to squander on worthless meddants."

The next morning the old man stepped out into the porch, and there upon one of the benches, sat the poor beggar woman. His rage was kindled.

"Did I not tell you I have nothing for you, impudence! Come, come, tramp! Leave my house I say, d'ye hear?" She heard him not. She was dead! The old man smote his breast and entered his house. He never left it again, for he also died miserable, though rich.

A man is supposed to be tolerably well occupied when he has a wife on one arm, a baby on the other, carrying a basket and a cane in his hand, a cigar in his mouth, and his hopeful heir holding on to the skirt of his coat.

THE TAR AND THE WHALE.

The following curious anecdote, told me by the captain of a whale ship which was at Valparaiso, shows us of what unshaken fortitude the hardy sons of Neptune are possessed, and what indifference they evince under the greatest misfortunes.

"One morning," says he, "as we were cruising about in search of whales, we espied a fine looking one, and at no great distance from us. We immediately manned four boats, and soon came up with this monster of the deep, which proved to be a whale of the sperm kind. We attacked him, and in return for the death wound which we inflicted, he, as is frequently the case with these ferocious animals, stove one of the boats. In the confusion which ensued, one poor fellow unluckily came within reach of the whale, who, although in the agonies of death, made a shift to draw one of his legs into his mouth. The thigh was pierced by one of his tusks, and consequently broken. Luckily for the sailor, however, the whale began to gasp, which afforded him an opportunity to escape from the jaws of immediate death. On being carried to the ship, it was found necessary to amputate the leg above the joint, which operation was borne with the greatest equanimity. Shortly after," continued the captain, "I asked him what were his feelings when he was in the whale's mouth; 'why,' (says he,) 'I thought he might furnish sixty barrels of pretty good oil.'"

THE FIRST DUEL IN ENGLAND.

The first duel in New England, was fought with sword and dagger, between two servants. Neither of them was killed, but both were wounded. For this disgraceful offence they were formally tried before the whole company, (the first settlers,) and sentenced to have their "hands and feet tied together, and so to be twenty-four hours, without meat or drink." Such, however, was the painfulness of their situation, and their piteous entreaties to be released, that upon promise of their good behavior in future, they were soon released by the governor. "Such was the origin," says Mr. Morse, "and such, I may almost venture to say, was the termination of the odious practice of duelling in New England, for there have been very few duels fought there since."

A GENUINE ONE.

A lady in this city perceiving her maid, a raw Irish girl, who had arrived only a few weeks before from her own swate land, throwing the end of a rope into the cistern and moving to and fro, went into the yard to inquire the cause, and found that she had lost the pail and was trying to recover it. The lady told her to take the cistern pole and she would soon get it. "Och, madame," said she, "I know better nor all that sure, for on me passage from me own country, Pat Dougherty fell overboard, and sure they did nothing at all, but jist threw the end of a rope to him, and he took a hold directly, and jump't aboard again."

DEATH.

The Prince de Ligne finely remarks, that to paint Death as we generally do, is a great injustice. We should represent death in the shape of a venerable, mild, and serene matron, with traces of beauty in her countenance, and arms gracefully expanded to receive us. This is the emblem of an eternal repose after a melancholly life harrassed by anxieties and storms.

A PUFF DIRECT.

An itinerant pedlar wishing to recommended his razors to the gaping crowd, thus addressed them:

"Gentlemen, the razors I hold in my hand were made by the light of a diamond, in the famous province of Andalusia. They cut as quick as thought, and are as bright as the morning star. A word or two more, and I am certain you will buy them. Lay them under your head at night, and you will find yourself clean shaved when you wake in the morning."

A person speaking with indifference of Byron's poetry, a gentleman who heard him, said, "Aye, that is a man now, who could see nothing in St. Paul's dome but a large tumbler turned upside down."

GLASS IN GRASS.

One of Mr. Coate's children accidentally discovered that two bonnet canes rubbed together produced a faint light. The novelty of this phenomenon induced me to examine it, and I found that two canes, on collision, produced sparks of light as brilliant as those from the flint and steel. On examining the epidermis, I found, when it was taken off, that the canes no longer gave light on collision. The epidermis, subjected to chemical analysis had all the properties of silex. The similar appearances of the epidermis of reeds, corn and grasses, induced me to suppose that they likewise contained silex. By burning them carefully, and analysing their ashes, I found that they contained it in rather larger proportions than the canes. The corn and grasses contain sufficient potash to form glass with their flint. A very pretty experiment may be made on these plants with the blow-pipe: if you take a straw of wheat, barley, or hay, and burn it, beginning at the top, and heating the ashes with the blue flame, you will obtain a perfect globe of hard glass fit for microscopic experiments.

Double Letters.—A pretty little maid of Erin presented herself at the grate of the Post Office the other day, and handing in a letter, modestly asked how much was to pay, as, she said, the letter was to her mother, and she wished to pay in advance. The clerk asked the usual question, 'single or double?' when she replied, with the most bewitching naivete, at the same time blushing up to the eyes, "double, sir—I was married last week."

THE LATE OBSEQUIES.—The papers from all sections of the Union, are adorned with the customary emblems of grief, and their columns continue filled with the details of the last melancholy rites in honor and veneration of the illustrious dead. The universal and absorbing sorrow, which the demise of President Harrison has elicited, does honor to human nature. It will elevate our National character abroad, and exhibit our Republic in a new guise. What a sublime spectacle it presents to the world, a vast nation who are proverbial for the bitterness of their party strife, merging all political considerations in one sincere and deep demonstration of sorrow.

In many places eulogies were delivered, and odes sung, which were written for the mournful occasion, all of which should be collected and carefully preserved for future reference. Our circumscribed limits debar us from even a recapitulation of the funeral honors, if it were necessary, which it is not, as every feature of it is indelibly impressed on the memory of the American people.

THE 24TH OF JUNE.—We understand that Evening Star Lodge, of West Troy, will celebrate the natal day of our Patron Saint, in a suitable manner, on the ensuing 24th. All Brethren in standing, are invited to participate in the festivities incidental to the occasion.

While noticing this subject, we cannot but express the hope that this day will be generally observed throughout the land by the brethren. We think, that the time has arrived, to revive this ancient custom.—A masonic celebration, in almost every place, if judiciously arranged, would be attended with happy results. Will our "well informed brethren," turn the matter over in their minds.

PREMIUMS FOR MASONIC ESSAYS.—In another column, our Masonic friends will observe an advertisement for Masonic matter. It was our intention to have extended the premiums to a prize tale, and also to a poem. But the mortifying delinquency of a large number of "Patrons,"—who have not paid us a farthing since our commencement, deprives us of the means of carrying out our intentions. We would feel particularly obliged to our Agents, and others, if they will induce the press in their immediate neighborhood to copy the advertisement. We are anxious to give it all the publicity possible: and our Agents, who have manifested so lively an interest in the welfare of the paper, will, we are sure, aid us all in their power.

A man named Thomas T. Rowe, has been mulcted in $1000 damages for seducing Rachel Schermerhorn, in Lockport.—N. Y. Sun.

[The said Thomas, has been one of our subscribers, and the last mail brought us a letter from the postmaster, stating that Tommy had absquatulated to parts unknown, leaving us minus some $2. It is no wonder, therefore, that Thomas was given over to the buffetings of Satan. Great darkness of mind, usually follows the cheating of a printer.

REPORTER.—A proposition is before the Assembly, to abolish the present system of Legislative and Legal Reports. The office of State reporter has been a heavy burthen to the legal profession, as it is now constituted. The new proposition is to furnish the session laws and decisions of the Courts of Law and Equity at an advance of five per cent on the costs of compilation and publication. It appears to be an excellent proposition and should commend itself to the favourable consideration of the Legislature.

ORATORIO OF DAVID.—This great musical prodigy was performed at Dr. Sprague's Church, in this city on Tuesday evening for the first time. The attendances (we regret to say) were not so general as could have been desired or expected. It was admirably performed in all respects, and will be long remembered by those who heard it.

WAR.—The Press and Parliament of Great Britain are exceeding "wolfish about the head and shoulders;" they threaten the most dreadful retaliation in the event of the execution of McLeod. If the threatened war depends on that event, we opine, all parties will long chew the quid of peace. The bellowings of John Bull fail in provoking Jonathan from his propriety; he will pursue the even tenor of his way, regardless of all considerations save those of strict justice.

AMPHITHEATRE.—Elaborate preparations are being made to give Mr. Nichols, the proprietor of this establishment a complimentary benefit. Mr. N. with a munificence which was by many deemed prodigal constructed that place of amusement, and since its opening has conducted it on a scale of the most extended liberality. No expense or trouble has been spared in the production of attractions and novelties worthy of the attention of our citizens.

Mr. Nichols, unasked, has in all cases volunteered benefits, to many deserving charities, and has at all times, contributed liberally, to our different societies by the loan of horses, carriages &c. The public will in due time be advised of the arrangements, programme, &c.

At a meeting of the canal commissioners on the 12th inst., it was resolved to open the canals on the 24th of this month.

THE CHARTER ELECTION.—The quiet and harmonious manner in which the recent charter election passed off, is a new era in our city politics—the division of the five Wards into ten, makes the number of votes at each poll so small that the former throng and confusion are entirely obviated.

The Election in this city, has terminated in the choice of twelve Whig, and eight Democratic Aldermen. The Whig Mayor was elected by a majority of 8 votes.

In New York, we understand that Mr. Morris (democratic) is elected Mayor by about 1000, and that there is a majority of Democratic Aldermen.

President Tyler, has, by proclamation, recommended Friday, the fourteenth of May, as a day of Fasting and Prayer, in reference to the decease of General Harrison.

THE 1ST OF MAY.—Those of our subscribers intending to change their residences in the city of New York, are requested to give notice to our Agent, Mr. Wm. Boardman, 33 Jones-st.

Those changing residence in this city, will please inform the carrier.

NEW STEAM BOAT.—The South America, Capt. L. W. Brainard, made her first trip on Thursday last. The S. A. is connected with the People's Line, and she is said to be a perfect floating palace. The S. A. takes the place of the Rochester in the regular line, while the latter boat hauls off for new boilers.

Intelligence.

Coroner's Office—Culpable Negligence.—The Coroner on Saturday was called to the house of Henry B. Knapp, 504 Fourth-st. (N. Y.) to hold an inquest on the body of Elizabeth Knapp, a native of Connecticut, aged 29. The deceased and her sister Ann had gone on Thursday on a visit to some friends at Hoboken and neighborhood, and on Friday evening about 7 o'clock embarked on board the ferry boat plying between the latter place and the foot of Barclay street, on their return home. As they neared the bridge at the head of the dock, some person apparently somewhat intoxicated, removed the bar at the bow of the boat, and it being very dark, and there being no light on that end of the boat or on the bridge, the sisters Knapp supposed the boat was at the wharf, and stepping off fell into the water when the boat was 3 or 4 yards from the bridge. The boat was immediately backed, and a long bench and the bar of the boat were thrown over to the sinking females, both of whom laid hold of the latter, and were a short time upheld, when the deceased, becoming exhausted, said, 'I must go,' and instantly sunk and drowned. The other sister was happily supported by the cloak, and by the bar she held fast to until rescued by three or four gentlemen who came to her aid. The body of deceased was found between 11 and 12 o'clock on Friday night by grappling. The jury found that she was accidentally drowned, from on board one of the Barclay st. ferry boats, and that there was culpable negligence on the part of the proprietors, in not providing sufficient lights and hands at the bow of the boat.

We understand that orders have been received here for the completion and arming of Fort Ontario on the east side of the river. It is also stated that Fort Niagara is forthwith to be put in condition of defence.—Oswego Com. Herald.

Lee, Mass.—There are 12 paper mills in Lee that manufacture 1200 tons of stock annually, producing paper to the value of about $300,000.

Large Crop.—The crop of Tobacco raised in Kentucky last year amounted to two and a half millions of dollars in value.

Intemperance, thou curse!—Died at the Orphan Asylum in Rochester, April 4th, Sarah Jane Davy, aged 1 years. The sufferings and death of this child afford another melancholy proof of the horrors of intemperance. She was born of an intemperate mother, from whom she received a series of abuses, until both body and mental faculties, were exceedingly impaired, and she left entirely prostrated—a mere wreck—akin to an idiot. After reposing several nights beside a drunken mother, on the cold ground, until her limbs were frozen, with no other covering than the canopy of heaven, she was rescued by the civil authorities, and taken to the Orphan Asylum, to receive from strangers that fostering care and tenderness, denied by maternal love. There for six months she struggled under her varied afflictions, until death brought a sweet release.—Democrat.

Sentence of Death.—Madison Johnson, a youth scarcely of age, convicted of murder at the Fall term of the Superior Court at Raleigh, has been sentenced to death. He is to be executed on Friday, the 30th inst.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—We learn from the Keene Republican that the dwelling house of Mrs. Martha Wood, of Westmoreland, N. H., was destroyed by fire on the 3rd inst. and that Mrs W. perished in the flames. She was 84 years old.—Boston Post.

Prisons and Palaces.—Viscount Jocelyn who was in the N. Y. Bridewell in 1834, is about to marry Lord Palmerton's youngest daughter, Lady Fauny Cowper.

The N. O. Bulletin of the 30th ult. says, the steamboat Cinderella, on Sunday morning, struck a snag in Bayou Plaquemine, and sunk, and it was feared the boat at least would be a total loss.

Amistad Africans.—S. S. Jocelyn, Joshua Leavitt, and Lewis Tappan, the committee who have been charged with the legal defence of these people, make an earnest appeal to the people for money to enable them to support, educate and return them to their native land.

Cute Thieves.—A gentleman who resides at Covington Ky. being at Cincinnati, went to the river, and called for a ferry boat to take him across. Two men appeared in a skiff—he got in, and after arriving in the middle of the river, they turned down stream—rubbed him of his watch, money, &c., and landed him on the same side from which he started about five miles below.

JOHN TYLER, who is now President of the United States, is a widower. His son married a daughter of Thomas A. Cooper, the distinguished tragedian.—She is a grand-daughter to the late Major Fairlie, formerly of New York, an officer of the revolution, one of whose daughters was the wife of Mr. Cooper. Mrs. Tyler (formerly Miss Cooper) will preside as the lady of the White House. She is one of the most amiable and accomplished ladies in the country, and will do honor to the station to which she is elevated.

LIBEL.—The following libel is going round. Never entrust a secret with a married man who loves his wife, for he will tell her, and she will tell her sisters, and her sisters will tell her aunt Hannah, aunt Hannah will impart it as a profound secret, to every one of her female acquaintances.

Gen. Jackson in Pecuniary Distress.—The following paragraph from a late number of the Louisville Journal, will be read with pain:—"A few weeks ago, we saw a very long letter from Gen. Jackson to a gentleman, who had drawn on him for one hundred dollars. He acknowledged that the money was due; but stated that he was so miserably embarrassed by his security debts as to be utterly unable to raise the small sum necessary to meet the draft. He said he had some blooded stock which he was willing to give up to the drawer of the draft, but that $100 in money was out of the question."

CASUALTY.—Jonathan B. Stuart, a merchant at Barton, in this State, was accidentally drowned in the Nanticoke dam on the 4th inst. He was a highly respected citizen, and was three years ago nominated for the state assembly, by the Whigs of Tioga Co.

Incidents during the Funeral Procession.—A woman who must have been nearly ninety years of age, and almost bent double, leaning on a staff, followed the procession through the entire route. She appeared deeply affected, and in reply to a gentleman who made the inquiry, she said that had known and nursed Gen. Harrison when he was an infant and never thought to have lived to witness his funeral.

General Morgan Lewis, who acted as one of the pall bearers, has served in that capacity in the funeral solemnities of three Presidents.

New Pills.—A Yankee is making his fortune in the valley of the Mississippi by selling purely vegetable pills for the cure of fever and ague, and other diseases. The pills are Peas, soaked in a solution of liquorice!

Airful!—A philanthropist, by way of illustrating the horrors of solitary confinement, stated that out of one hundred persons sentenced to endure this punishment for life in an American prison, only fifteen survived it.

Seasonable Indulgence.—In an advertisement for a young gentleman who left his parents, it is stated, that "if master Jacky will return to his disconsolate parents he shall no more be put upon by his sister, and shall be allowed to sweeten his own tea."

Bonaparte's Economy.—Napoleon, in the zenith of his glory, had his stockings darned, and even grafted. We have in our possession his tailor's and bootmaker's bills: there are charges for new cuffs and collars, and for soleing and heeling his boots.

Married.

On Thursday evening last, by the Rev. Mr. Hodge Mr. Christopher Warner, of Berne, to Miss Margaret Gould, of this city.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved Diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

THE OUTCAST'S LAMENT.

O talk not to me of the beauties of spring,
Or the pleasing enjoyments of summer's gay hours,
Of the warbling of birds, as they joyously sing, [ers:
On the leaf-covered branches of nature's green bow-
Of evening's soft twilight—of bright rosy morn,
As it comes in its glory o'er valley and hill,
Or of nature's green mantle that carpets the lawn,
Or the sweet gentle sound of the murmuring rill.

Sad, lone, and forsaken, an outcast on earth,
Far from the lov'd scenes of my childhood I roam,
An exile, I am from the land of my birth,
Bereft of friends, kindred, and dearly love'd home;
No more shall the accents of love in my ear,
To my care troubled breast, consolation impart,
Nor shall the lov'd voices of those I held dear,
Send comfort and peace to my sad, broken heart.
Albany, April 12th. 1841. C.

TO REDELIA.

BY PAYNE KENTON KILBOURN.

I have sung of wit and beauty,
Glowing cheeks, and glossy curls—
'Tis a poet's pride and duty
To immortalise the girls!
But my harp too long hath slumbered
To repeat such sounds again—
All its gayest notes are numbered,
I must wake a graver strain.

May the bower of bliss be over
Her for whom my harp is strung—
Oh, what dreams of glory hover
Round the beautiful and young!
Fair Redelia! Heaven smiles o'er thee,
Thou art in thy spring time now—
The bright summer is before thee,
Deck'd with roses for thy brow!

Youthful beauty round thee lingers,
But its transient hues will fly;
Time and age with frosty fingers
Touch its blossoms, and they die!
Yet rejoice, while hope is keeping
Watch upon her emerald throne—
Ere thy cheek is pale with weeping,
Ere the birds of love have flown!

Round the bloom life's richest flower,
Seek them while they may be sought;
Build thy castles and thy towers,
Treasure up each happy thought,
When in distant years thou turnest
To survey the glorious past,
Many a star which now thou spurnest,
Will a hallowed radiance cast.

Though the light of love be glowing
On thy spirit's inmost shrine,
To some kindred heart bestowing
Bliss and rapture half divine;
Yet to me its glory seemeth
Like some pure and distant star—
Fixed and brightly though it beameth,
I must worship from afar!

Glorious sights enwrap thy vision,
Voyager on the fleeting hours!
Far in fancy's bright Elysian
Wave its ever-blooming bowers!
Thou art gay and joyous-hearted,
But my sweetest dreams are o'er,
Time is flying—we have parted,
And perchance to meet no more!

Then, with swift and gentle motion,
Down life's summer stream will glide;
I, upon the world's great ocean,
Warring with the wind and tide.

Yet, whate'er our lot or station,
Wheresoe'er our barks are driven,
May the pole-star of Salvation
Guide us to the port of Heaven!

Wilmington, Del.

I HEAR THY VOICE, O SPRING!

I hear thy voice, O Spring!
Its flute-like tones are floating through the air,
Winning my soul with their wild ravishing,
From earth's heart-wearying care.

Divinely sweet thy song—
But yet, methinks, as near the groves I pass,
Low sighs on viewless things are borne along,
Tears gem the springing grass.

For where are they, the young,
The loved, the beautiful, who when thy voice,
A year ago, along these valleys rung,
Did hear thee, and rejoice!

Thou seek'st for them in vain—
No more they'll greet thee in thy joyous round;
Calmly they sleep beneath the murmuring main,
Or moulder in the ground.

Yet peace, my heart, be still!
Look upward to yon azure sky, and know
To heaven lies music now their bosoms thrill,
Where balmy breezes blow.

For then hath bloomed a Spring,
Whose flowers perennial deck a holier sod,
Whose music is the song the seraphs sing,
Whose light the smile of God!

THE MASON,

When life becomes a scene of woe,
Of pain and poverty;
When sighing man is doomed to know
Too much of misery;
Who then will seek his humble door
And smooth his nightly bed?
Ah, who will pity then the poor,
When all his friends have fled?

The Mason.

When he is doomed to death, nor knows
His wife and children's fears,
Who then will soothe the widow's woes
And dry the orphan's tears?
Ah, who will then a father be,
To those in deep distress—
Extend the hand of charity,
And sorrow's sighs suppress?

The Mason.

If to the grave the mother fall
The victim of despair,
Who then the orphan boy will call,
His bounteous board to share?
Who will bind his bleeding heart—
His little hands extend—
And bid him breathe, with lips apart,
His thanks unto his friends?

The Mason.

And who will bend his little knees
Before his God on high—
Teach him to reverence Heaven's decrees,
And fit him for the sky?
Yea, teach him to shun paths of shame,
And honor virtues laws—
A patriot on the page of fame,
In his dear country's cause?

The Mason.

Yet man denies the garland green—
The blooming bay of praise;
But calls the Mason's motives mean,
And tho' convinced, inveighs,
Thus prejudice thro' time hath been
The scourge of Masonry.
Of all—the worst of I have seen,
Is mental tyranny.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE.—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place on the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the convenience of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptability to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 6 o'clock P. M.
For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock.

GRAND LODGE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

We have been favored with the recent proceedings of the Grand Lodge of this state, from which we make such extracts, as will be of interest:

Application having been made to the Rt. W. D. G. Master to lay the corner stone of a Methodist Church, at Brushville, Long-Island, the R. W. deputed the W. Alexander Copeland, of Naval Lodge, No. 69, as his representation on this occasion.

The customary ceremonies having been performed, the W. Joseph P. Pirsson pronounced an appropriate address, which was followed by prayer, and an address by the Rev. Mr. Chery, and the ceremonies were closed by prayer by the Rev. Br. Matthias, both of the M. E. Church.

The following petitions were received: for a warrant for a Lodge at Schodack, Rensselaer county; for the revival of the Masonic labors of Hamilton Lodge, at Palatine Bridge, Montgomery county; and for the revival of Montgomery Lodge, at Stillwater, Saratoga county, which were referred to the Grand Officers.

The commission from the M. W. Grand Master, constituting the W. Anton Daniel Pehmoller, P. M.

of the Lodge "Ferdinand zum Felsen," the representative of this Grand Lodge, in the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, was then read.

Extracts from the Minutes of the Grand Lodge of Mississippi, Texas, and New Jersey, were then read by the Grand Secretary, all of them expressive of the determination of those Grand Lodges to sustain the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, in the exercise of the sole and supreme jurisdiction over the lodges in this State.

The Grand Secretary stated that he had been informed by several Brethren present, that reports had been circulated in this city, and in New-Jersey, that the permanent fund belonging to this Grand Lodge had been squandered or used for the private purposes of himself or some other officers of this Grand Lodge; that he considered it due not only to himself and the other Trustees of that fund, and the Grand Treasurer, but to the whole of the members of the Grand Lodge then assembled, that the utter falsehood of those reports should be made manifest upon the spot. The Grand Secretary therefore requested the Grand Treasurer, in whose custody the property of the Grand Lodge is placed by the Constitution, to produce the Scrip of the Bank Stock belonging to the Grand Lodge. The Grand Treasurer then produced the inventory of property transferred to him by his predecessor in 1835, and the Bank certificates of the stock standing in the name of the Trustees of the Grand Lodge, in the Mechanics', Greenwich, and Butchers' and Drovers' Banks, amounting to $9775, at par value, as reported by him in June, 1837, and published in the extracts of proceedings of that year, being an increase of $250 on the amount owned by the Grand Lodge, as reported by the Grand Treasurer in June 1833. The Brethren present were invited by the Grand Master to examine the scrip if they thought proper.

The Grand Secretary asked permission to present the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing, under the title of the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and history of the Masonic Institution in the United States.

Resolved, That this Grand Lodge highly approve of the proposed work of the Rt. W. Grand Secretary, entitled the Portrait Gallery of eminent American Freemasons, and recommend it to the patronage of the Fraternity.

The D. G. Master called the attention of the G. Lodge to the report from the Grand Stewards Lodge on the state of the finances; whereupon it was Resolved,—

That the Grand Secretary notify the Lodges in arrears for dues to the Grand Lodge, that the funds of the Grand Lodge are in an embarrassed condition, and call upon all the said Lodges to remit or pay to the Grand Secretary, the amount of their indebtedness without delay.

The Grand Secretary reported that on the 5th of June, a warrant had been issued to constitute a Lodge at Mixville, in the county of Alleghany, by the name of Mixville Lodge, which had been constituted by the W. Blanchard Powers, on the 7th of October last; that the Lodge held no election since, and they supposed the officers hold over. This principle having been repudiated by the Grand Lodge in other cases, cannot be allowed in this, and as this case is attended with an extra difficulty, the Master and Senior Warden named in the warrant having refused to be installed, the G. S. considered it a proper case for the Grand Lodge, whereupon it was Resolved, That the W. Blanchard Powers, G. V. in the county of Genesee, be instructed to hold an election for officers in Mixville Lodge at the earliest convenient time, and report to the Grand Lodge in June next.

The G. Secretary further reported that the Most W. Grand Master had issued a dispensation on the recommendation of Mount Vernon Lodge, No. 3, to George S. Gibbons, M. John Owens, S. W. Thomas Stewart, J. W. and others, to hold a Lodge at Albany, by the name of the Washington Lodge; returnable at annual meeting in June next, with their proceedings and by-laws, for the examination of the Grand Lodge.

The G. Secretary read a communication from the Grand Lodge of Georgia, on the adoption of the representative system, and requesting this G. Lodge to nominate some Br. to represent the G. Lodge of Geo. Whereupon the W. Joseph Pirsson, Master of Hibernia Lodge, No. 57, was nominated by the Grand Lodge.

The Grand Secretary informed the Grand Lodge that the Grand Lodge of New-Jersey, had appointed the W. Sylvester Spencer their representative, and that the W. Brother was now in waiting for reception. The G. Master requested the G. Secretary to introduce the W. Brother. The W. Brother Spencer being clothed in the peculiar costume of the G. Lodge of New Jersey, was conducted to the East, through the dense ranks of the fraternity assembled, who remained standing through the ceremony of reception. The G. Secretary addressed the Grand Master as follows:—

Rt. Worshipful Brother,

I have the honor to present our worthy and Worshipful Brother, Sylvester Spencer, Past Master of Manhattan Lodge, No. 62, who at the annual communication of the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of New-Jersey, in November last, was appointed to represent that body in this Grand Lodge, of which official information has been received. I am confident this appointment will prove highly satisfactory to the members of both Grand Lodges, as his appointment and reception, as well as the appointment and reception of the W. Brother Kerwood, our representative in the Grand Lodge of New Jersey, affords the surest evidence that the two Grand Lodges are determined to stand, not only geographically but masonically side by side, in support of each other's integrity, honor, and independence.

The G. Master then greeted the Representative of New-Jersey in the following words:—

W. Bro. Spencer,

The firm and decided stand which the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of New Jersey has taken in support of the rights and honor of this Grand Lodge, has secured our warmest welcome to their Representative.—Between two masonic governments, so contiguous as those of New Jersey and New-York, the utmost harmony and friendship ought to be cultivated and cherished, as well for the honor and repose of our noble Institution, as for the prosperity and happiness of the Fraternity under the jurisdiction of each. Whatever occurs within the Territory of either Grand Body for good or for ill, must affect the other equally. A common interest, therefore would seem to require a more intimate correspondence than has hitherto existed, and I fervently hope that the measures which have been adopted, may secure the union of both Grand Lodges in friendship and brotherly love. I present the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, to the Representative of the Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey.

To which the W. Bro. Spencer made the following reply.

Rt. W. Grand Master,

The right hand of fellowship so feelingly tendered, I most gratefully receive as a symbol of the masonic governments which we respectively represent. The allusions you have been pleased to make relative to the course taken by the Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey, through the trying seasons of rebellion with which this Grand Lodge has had to contend, call on me to return you my sincere thanks on their behalf, and to express the feelings of pleasure which animate my breast, at the proud position of this G. Lodge, in having maintained a stand which has proved so signally triumphant, and which has elicited not only the approval, but the admiration of the Grand Body, as the Representative of which, I now address you.

I shall deem it a pleasing duty at all times, to be the medium of communication between the two Grand Bodies, and beg leave Rt. W. in behalf of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-Jersey, to wish you a long career of undisturbed repose, and to pledge you the aid and co-operation of my constituents in all the trials whether present or to come, so long as you pursue the same firm and incorruptible course that has heretofore marked your career.

The Representative of the Grand Lodge of N. Jersey was then seated in the East, in front of the Grand Officers.

MEDICAL.

[Such in our estimation is the importance of a well conducted and thorough system of medical education to the welfare, safety and happiness of community, that we most cheerfully give place to the following suggestions, (from as we suppose an industrious and successful physician) to raise the standard and increase the amount of knowledge and experience among the votaries of this highly responsible profession.

It is in our humble opinion the only antidote to the bare-faced and disgusting empiricism that now stalks abroad at noon-day, and sets at defiance all laws, reason, and common decency, and at once robs the credulous and unsuspecting of health, property, and often life itself.

In these days of general improvement, the titled Physician clothed with a Diploma, must possess more general knowledge, professional experience, and a higher sense of honor than the itinerant quack, otherwise the one cannot be held in higher estimation than the other, by an educated and enlightened community.]

From the Evening Journal.

MEDICAL EDUCATION.

Among all the professions in which a prescribed course of education is required, either by the laws of the country or by established custom, none is more important to the welfare of community than that of Medicine. And at the same time in proportion to its importance to the preservation of health and life, none it is believed, is more frequently neglected and imperfectly attended to than this all-important occupation, upon which the welfare and happiness of community so much depends.

As I have observed during the winter that there are before the Legislature a number of applications for aid to the Medical Institutions of the State, it has occurred to me that now is a favorable time to require from these Institutions a higher standard and improved system of education in this important profession, as a condition upon which the bounty of the State can alone be bestowed.

It is a subject of every day's observation to those in the slightest degree acquainted with the condition of the profession, that at least double the number are now educated, or rather in part educated, than can under ordinary circumstances find employment as physicians and surgeons.

Hence it would seem that encouragement is by no means needed merely to increase the number, but it would be a highly commendable and laudable object either for public or private enterprise, to elevate the standard and increase the amount of knowledge in the profession.

To this all-important object I most sincerely hope the State authorities will especially direct their guardian care and attention; and when proper, appropriate the necessary endowments to our Medical Schools and more especially our Hospitals and Infirmaries, an attendance upon which should always be considered indispensable to the completion of a medical education.

Now, for the purpose of raising the standard, especially of preparatory as well as medical studies I would respectfully submit the following plan, viz:—

Unless the candidate for this highly responsible and important profession be a graduate of some of our Colleges, let him be required to undergo an examination before some competent Board entirely disconnected with the Medical Schools, or interested directly with Medical Education, upon his literary and scientific qualifications. If he should sustain such an examination as would generally entitle him to enter the junior classes of our Colleges, or an amount of knowledge in reference to his intended profession that should be deemed an equivalent, give him a certificate of his proficiency thus far, which should entitle him to admission to the Medical College, or to commence the study of medicine under private instruction.

Continue this medical course of instruction three years—during which time two courses of lectures in some of our medical colleges should be attended—then if he sustains an examination before a medical board appointed by the Regents of the University, entirely independent of the medical colleges, grant him a license which will entitle him to practice medicine and surgery in this State.

Then let him continue his practice in connection with his studies for two years longer, six months of which time must be in connection, with some established hospital, and then submit himself to examination for the degree of M. D. If he sustains this examination, which should be principally upon the practical departments of the profession, grant him its highest academical honors as a reward in the first place for the acquisition of general as well as medical science; but more especially for his successful application of this invaluable knowledge to the prevention and cure of diseases.

The advantages of this course over the one now generally pursued are so manifestly superior as to seem to require no comments. The preparatory course of studies which is now so often neglected, or very imperfectly pursued, is absolutely indispensable to acquire that degree of mental discipline without which it will be impossible for the student to pursue the complicated and intricate science of medicine with facility or chance of final success.

I am well aware that not so many students will commence the study, under the restrictions I propose; but then the number will be sufficient—as many as can find employment with an adequate compensation for the arduous and responsible services which the well-educated physician will be called upon to perform.

THE HUMOURIST.

From Bell's Life in London.

THE FIRST OF APRIL.

Sir—As I know many of your readers "love fun," in the hopes that I may contribute to the frolics of the day, and afford some useful hints to the admirers of practical jokes, I send you a short sketch of my own sport on the first of April:—

Got up early, and placed a large basin of cold water close to my wife's side of the bed, laid down on the hearth-rug, and screamed ten thousand murders. Poor Betsey seeing me, as she thought, in dreadful agony, jumped out to my assistance, when popping both her feet into the basin in her alarm, she overturned the unexpected bath, slipped on her back, and was completely soured. Scrambled up laughing, and ran out crying "April fool." Rushed up stairs, and calling the cook, told her her mistress was in a fit, and desired her to go to her assistance. Down ran cooky, in chemise, and rushing into the room, received the empty basin full in her face, intended as the "retort courteous" for me. Her nose was split, the basin broke, and I had to pay the doctor's bill, but then I had my joke. Went into the parlor, and seeing my brother's boots at the fire, dropped an egg in each.—Was delighted to see him crack them both, and draw out his feet covered with the yolk. Laughed heartily, and exclaimed, "April fool." Threw his boot at my head, but ducking, the iron heel smashed a pier-glass. "Who's the fool," cries Jem. Heated the handle of the poker, and told Molly to stir the fire. In ecstasies, at seeing her drop it with about four inches of the skin off her fingers. Unfortunately, it fell on a valuable china plate filled with toast—the former was broken and the latter spoiled, but then it was the first of April. Looked demure when my wife came to breakfast. Said nothing, but thought it was d—d bad. Took another cup and complained, when Betsey consoled me by observing that it was the first of April, and she thought a little jalap would do me good.—Didn't relish such jokes. Heard an old Irish woman crying mackerel. Called her several times. Highly amused to see her turn round, and scream "coming." Twiggd me at last, and flung her pattern at the window to the detriment of two squares. Wrote a note to Alderman Gobble to dine with his friend Thompson, who I knew was in the country. Gobble took the bait, but unfortunately, finding Thompson abroad, he just "dropped in" upon me at dinner time, and nearly devoured a whole dish of smelts, which I had got as a treat for self and rib. Met Mrs. Williams. Asked if she had heard of her son's accident. "Good God! no," said she; in great alarm; "what is it?" "He has broke—" "Broke what? in the name of Heaven?" she shrieked with increasing alarm. "His walking stick," said I, and trotted on in a roar of laughter; but, not noticing where I was going, stepped into a milk-pail, to the great injury of my black silk stockings, as well as to the annoyance of the vender, who called me all the fools she could lay her tongue to.—Went into Baston's, called for a basin of soup; drank it, emptied the ink-bottles into the basin, and then asked the waiter how he could bring me such stuff. He begged pardon, and I left him to find out his mistake. Sent my son with a bottle to Apothecaries' Hall, for six-penny worth of pigeons' milk. Came back in half an hour, and said they had none made. "Where's the sixpence," said I, "I spent it in oranges," said the young rogue and had the grin of me.

Brushed into my neighbor's, and told him I was sure there was a fire in his house. Dreadfully alarmed, he ran into every room on the premises, but returned with an assurance that I was mistaken. Called him "April fool," and bid him look in the kitchen. Sent Molly to Spital-square to see a master silk-weaver roasted. Came back in a hurry, and said he was only "in a stew." Vexed with Alderman Gobble about the smelts. Asked him to take a glass of Madeira, and accidentally, on purpose, poured him out a glass of vinegar.—Burst into a snort of laughter to see his wry face. My own wife went the wrong way, and I was nearly choked. Filled a blind nut with cayenne pepper, and gave it my wife to crack. Had her a second time. I thought she would have spit out her eye teeth in getting rid of its effects. Knew my brother was going out to an evening party, and had soaped the soles of his shoes. Was delighted to hear him come hump down on his crupper, overhead. Went up to have my laugh, and found him crying with a sprained ankle. Run down to send for a doctor, but nobody would go, believing I only meant to make them "April fool." Went myself, and came all haste back with Dr. Bolus. Found a cat tied by the tail to the knocker, kicking up a precious clatter. Couldn't go near for fear of my eyes. At last, she worked the skin off her tail, and bolted.—Cook opened the door, all consternation. Scrambled up stairs to my brother's room, with Bolus at my heels, but he was not there. Came running down again; trod on some peas which my son Jack had placed to overturn the maids, was launched forward like a seventy-four, and rose majestically with all the skin off my back. Limped into the drawing-room, and found my brother had only been gamming. Made a virtue of necessity, and laughed with tears in my eyes, and pains in my bones. Not done yet. Sent cook to the linen-drawer's for two yards of ell wide pack-thread. Came back, and said, "they an't got none so narrow." Had another hearty laugh; but changed my tone on old dripping coming back, and saying she had left the door ajar while she was gone for the ell wide pack-thread, and some fool or other had walked off with my great coat, and Alderman Gobble's hat. No such fool either, thought I. Wanted to get rid of Gobble, and told Jack to tell Tom to get some one to come and say that his mother was dead. The news came, but Gobble took it very easy. "I know it," said he "for I was at her funeral when I was fourteen. No go," and he had the smile in his favor. Determined to be even with him, and after supper filled the kettle with gin, and put a bottle of the same on the table. Swore it was fine strong spirit, and tried in vain to weaken it with water from the kettle. Go blind drunk, played the devil with the Turkey carpet and I was obliged to send him home in a coach. Slipped alyly up stairs, while my wife was gone to see all right in the kitchen.

and made "apple pie" with the sheet by turning it up half way with the tail towards the head. Thought I should have died of laughing to see her getting in.—Called me an old booby, got out to make the bed again. Put out the candle, and got in myself, but found to my great dismay, that there were two sorts of bed-pies, for Betty had actually placed a large dish of hare-pies under the clothes, into which I jumped, but was very well content, in the end, to find it was nothing worse.

THE NATURALIST.

FIERY FLYING SERPENT.

In the early part of 1833, a native chief of Limbo Manis, in the vicinity of Padang, named Tam Basar, in company with another person, mentioned to Mrs. A. F. Vandenbergh and myself, that they had just before seen a serpent flying, and, as it was considered dangerous, had killed it. We smiled at them as romancing, but they affirmed positively that they had seen it fly, and offered to take us to it. We accordingly went and finding no appendage of the nature of wings, we again laughed at them, as attempting to impose on our credulity. They, however, continued positive that they had seen it fly, and explained the mode of flying, by saying it had power to render the under part of the belly concave, instead of convex as far as the ribs extended, whence it derived its support in the air, whilst its propulsion was produced by a motion of the body, similar to that of swimming in water. We, however, continued incredulous, and took no farther notice of the circumstance.

In January, 1834, I was walking with Mr. Rogers in a forest near the river Radang Bessie, about a mile from the spot where the above was killed, when stopping for a moment to admire an immense tree, covered as with a garment of creepers, I beheld a serpent fly from it, at the height of fifty or sixty feet above the ground, and alight upon another at the distance of forty or fifty fathoms. Its velocity was as rapid as a bird, its motion that of a serpent swimming through water; it had no appearance of wings. Its course was that of a direct line, with an inclination of ten or fifteen degrees to the horizon. It appeared to be three or four feet long. The one killed by the native chief was about the same length, was of slender proportions, dark colored back, light below, and was not characterised by any peculiarity which would make it remarkable to a stranger.

Thus was I convinced of the existence of flying serpents; and, on inquiry, I found some of the natives, accustomed to the forests, aware of the fact. Those acquainted with the serpent call it, "Ular rampay hari," or, "Ular apie," (the fiery serpent,) from the burning pain, and mortal effect of its bite. So that the fiery flying serpent of the Scriptures was not an imaginary creature, though it appears now extinct in the regions it formerly inhabited.

I have delayed the present notice, in hope of obtaining a specimen, which I could offer as a more convincing proof than my bare assertion, but further delay may possibly, with some, weaken even this testimony on a point which appears to have been long disputed, and which has not been credited by any of the Dutch gentlemen employed in collecting specimens of the natural history of these parts, to whom I have mentioned it. I learn from the natives, however, that this is not the only species that flies. There is one called "Ular Tadung," with a red head, and not exceeding two feet long, seen sometimes about cocoa-nut trees, whose bite is instantly mortal, and which has the power of flying or rather leaping a distance of twenty fathoms, for it is described as not having the waving motion through the air of the one I saw.

OTTY MOTTY.

An amusing anecdote is related of that great equestrian, Otty Motty. During his recent engagement in Philadelphia, the managers gave out that "any spectator who doubted the genuineness of the cannon balls which the daring performer cast up and received upon his neck, chest, and arms," might bring along one with him to the circus, and he would perform the feat with it. Accordingly, when the evening came, a sail of from the Navy Yard produced in the arena a large fifty pound shell, which the undaunted German unhesitatingly cast up at a height of fifteen feet, and received the immense globe of iron on its decent upon the nape of his neck, to the satisfaction of all. Motty, who felt somewhat hurt that his reputation should be thus put to the test, offered to charge the shell with powder, and suffer the sailor to light the fuze, alleging that he would perform the feat and extinguish the fire before the shell would explode. The audience, not considering themselves bomb-proof, objected to the experiment, and the intrepid horseman left the ring amid thunders of applause.

Motty is expected shortly in New York, to perform a short engagement at the Bowery Theatre. The most novel feature in his performance now is the introduction into this act of a living tiger, one of the largest and most beautiful in the country, which he has taught to run about the ring and stage in a variety of performances. The animal is perfectly tame and inoffensive.—N. Y. SUN.

CHARACTER.

TOL LOL PENNY.

Towards midnight, as the company began to drop off, I found myself seated almost alone in my corner, where I was in a manner fastened on by a rough span kind of character, in a rather shabby coat, with a purser's button, whose peculiar mode of speech had rendered him an object of my particular observation during the last hour. He knew every body, and every body seemed to know him. He had acquired the habit of adding 'Tol lol' to almost every sentence; but it was not so much the absurd words themselves that excited attention, as the very impressive and varied tone in which he uttered them which gave them so much force. He had a Tol lol of glee, another of surprise, another of sorrow; but his Tol lol of anger was really terrific. This man's name was Penny, a purser in the navy, known at every port in England by the cognomen of "Tol lol Penny." This curious character took post directly opposite to me, in the box in which I was taking my negus and a bit of bread and cheese; and without further introduction than having been in the same room together for nearly two hours, entered into familiar conversation with me, commencing with—'No intrusion I hope, tol lol?' None in the least, Sir. I regret that I have nothing before me to offer you to partake of; but if you will allow me to—' 'No! no! my young gentleman,' interrupted the purser, 'swig your own tittle; and poor stuff it is, I guess tol lol! Let every man crack nuts out of his own bag. Here, waiter, bring me a glass of grog; and, d'ye hear let it be double shotled, tol lol.' On the arrival of his grog, 'My service to you Sir,' said he, and gulped down half the magnum at a draught. I returned the compliment by drinking his good health in my bottom of negus, and called for another for the honor of the cloth. On asking him to eat a crust of bread and cheese—'What! cheese!' said he; 'cheese to a purser! Why you might as well offer physic to a doctor!—But dam'me! with submission, I will have some at with you in the grubbing way, too, for I like the cut of your mug, though it is a little coxcomical or so. Don't be angry!—tol lol! And then your handkerchief, bleached as white as the royal of a home-ward-bound Indian, swells like Sidney Yorke's of a frosty morning. * * * Waiter! walk a kidney three times around the fire, and bring it me with a shallot as hot as the first broadside; and d'ye hear, put a bit of butter not bigger than a bee's knee on the bilge of it; mind that!—tol lol! Your general, young'un, is an out and out good'un, they say; but dam'me! he has been hardly hit. That's his look out—tol lol!—' 'How?' said I. (with my curiosity strongly excited.) 'I know nothing of his affairs!' 'Bah!' said the purser, with an incredulous smile. 'Tell that to the marines! tol lol!'—'Upon my honor, Sir,' I replied, 'I really know nothing whatever of my general's affairs nor ever saw him before this morning. His character as a brave officer is sufficiently established; and of that alone I can speak.' 'Well, then, I can tell you,' eagerly interrupted the purser, 'that a finer or more generous-hearted fellow never breathed. But he has a wife—worse luck for him!—tol lol!' 'And what of her?' I anxiously inquired. 'Oh! nothing very uncommon now-a-days! only that they were not of the same—' 'Kidney, Sir!' said the waiter, as he laid the smoking relish before the purser, three revolutions of whose jaws served to demolish it.

Miscellany.

A GOOD BUSINESS, AN EXCELLENT BUSINESS.

We heard a story the other day which amused us not a little, and one we consider altogether too good to be lost. A few weeks since, a person of respectable exterior and gentlemanly deportment made his appearance in a little village not a thousand miles from New Haven, where the inhabitants are somewhat proverbial for keeping a closer eye to their neighbor's affairs than to their own. The stranger took lodgings at the village inn, and having no visible employment to perplex or disturb him, his time passed off, apparently quite agreeably to himself, but much to the disquiet of the neighborhood. Curiosity, that ever restless tormentor of the village, was all agog to learn the stranger's business and means of support, and many were the wise guesses and sage surmises as to both, until a pretty general consultation and thorough canvassing of the pros and cons, by the board of gossips, it was concluded that he had neither, and that he would eventually leave the landlord with an uncanceled score as a token of remembrance.

At length one of the most inveterate of the meddlers resolved in his own mind to broach the subject to the stranger, and thus by performing an act of kindness for his neighbor unsolicited—whose easy nature he was certain was being imposed upon—he would have an opportunity to satisfy himself as to the stranger's real character.

He accordingly introduced himself, when the following dialogue ensued:

"Well stranger, you've been in these here parts considerable time now, I reckon?"

The stranger nodded assent.

"Pretty dear travelling now; cost you a good deal to live at the taverns, I guess."

Another nod.

"Must have some business to pay it, pretty good business, eh?"

"Yes, sir, you are correct there; I have business—and it is good business—excellent business."

"Thought so. How much might it bring you a month?"

"Forty dollars, sir."

"Forty dollars a month! well, 'tis good business any how that pays you that. What is it, if I may be so bold?"

"Not bold at all, sir—I take pleasure in informing you. You must know, in the first place, I make twenty dollars a month simply by minding my own business, and again, I make twenty dollars by letting other people's alone!"

Our informant adds that the interrogator forgot to impart the result of his enquiries to his curious neighbors.

EXECUTION OF ROBINSON.—This inhuman monster paid the forfeit of his crimes yesterday in the yard of the jail at New Brunswick. At half-past 9 o'clock he was led forth from the jail dressed in a shroud and cap. The gallows was erected within a small enclosure which had been built in front of the prison. A guard of military was drawn up around the enclosure to preserve order and to keep off the immense crowd of people, who had assembled in hopes to see the execution.

The culprit mounted the platform with a firm step, and till the fatal noose was adjusted, manifested the same stoical indifference which has characterised him throughout since his arrest.

At a given signal the drop fell, and, owing to some inexplicable carelessness in adjusting the noose, the rope slipped over the head of the wretched victim of the law, and he fell to the ground, a distance of some four feet, apparently unhurt. He was raised up by the sheriff's officers, and as he rested upon his knees, he exclaimed, "Oh! Lord have mercy."

The noose was re-adjusted, and with fatal accuracy. All things being prepared—another fall of the drop, and all was over. The soul of Peter Robinson was in eternity. The body, after hanging over half an hour, was taken into the prison, and the gates of the enclosure were thrown open for the admission of the spectators, who after satisfying their curiosity, and proclamation being made by the Mayor, that nothing more was to be seen, the crowd of people dispersed, and all was again quiet.—Courier.

POPULAR TALES.

THE POOL OF THE DROWNED.

A STORY OF ANCIENT BAGDAD.

One evening, during the month of the Ramadan, the Caliph Haroun Al Raschid, accompanied by his vizier, set out on a ramble throughout the city of Bagdad, according to his accustomed practice during many years of his glorious reign. The dress of both parties was of the plainest order, consisting of a yellow woollen turban, and a craftan of striped silk and cotton, with an outer robe of common cloth. By such means did Haroun trust to conceal his true character, till the fitting time came to reveal it, if it was his pleasure so to do. 'Giafar,' said the Caliph, as they left the palace, 'shall we again turn our steps to the Pool of the Drowned?' 'Commander of the Faithful,' answered the Barmecide, 'might thy slave dare to advise, we should not so often visit that melancholy scene. Why should the sounds and sights of woe be permitted to grieve the soul of the Prophet's vicar, into whose presence Allah designed happiness only to enter? Let us rather seek the bazaars—' 'Enough, Giafar,' interrupted the Caliph, 'thy words have determined me—but it is to go to the Pool. If sorrow does haunt the place, it becomes the Prophet's vicar also to be there, that he may, if possible, administer relief.—Thou knowest that once already hath he been able to do so.' As the Caliph spoke, he turned aside from the course which they had been pursuing during this conversation, and entered on a path which led directly to the side of the Tigris.

The Pool of the Drowned was a remarkably deep part of the river, situated below the more closely inhabited suburbs of Bagdad. The bank of the Tigris was here low and sloping, and covered with smooth and beautiful green turf. Opposite to the Pool, and divided from it only by this narrow grassy place, was a cemetery, containing many elegant marble monuments, the white cupolas of which were overhung by tall cypresses, which, waving in the breeze, sang a continual requiem for the dead below. The spot was altogether of a melancholy character, for the Pool had not received its common appellation without memorable cause. The place was retired, and more suicides had been perpetrated in the waters of the river, within sight of the numerous tombs of the cemetery, than might have sufficed to fill them with inhabitants. It was on this account that the Commander of the Faithful had latterly come thither more than once, having on one occasion accidentally met and saved a desperate man who was about to cast himself into the depths of the river, there to end his life and woes. Gloomy as the associations were that accompanied the place, the Caliph on approaching it, could not restrain his admiration of the effect produced by the rich moonlight on the river, the trees, and the tombs. 'Thou hast no soul for poetry, Barmeki,' said Haroun to his companion, 'else thou wouldst turn to this spot with more pleasure than to the crowded streets of Bagdad. Let us take up our station here,' continued he, entering the porch of one of the tombs nearest to the Tigris, on which side the cemetery lay perfectly open. 'I could be well content, methinks,' said the Caliph, after gazing for a time on the glittering surface of the waters, 'to spend the hours till dawn here in lonely musing; but there is an impression on my soul that the Prophet hath something this night for his servant to perform.'

The Caliph had scarcely, in truth, uttered these words, when his eye caught the figures of two persons approaching by the same path which had led himself and the vizier to the place. Haroun drew his companion into the shaded side of the porch, and motioned him to be silent. The two new-comers drew nigh, and at length stood still within a few feet of the Caliph's station. The one was a female, and the other of the opposite sex, both of them seemingly young, and plainly dressed, as far as the moonlight permitted them to be seen. 'Here,' said the man, after a pause, pointing at the same time to the Pool, which lay but a few paces from them; 'here, Fatima, is the spot to which I wished to lead thee.' The tones of the youth were deeply melancholy. 'And why, Hassan, my beloved,' said the female, in a voice which the Commander of the Faithful thought more sweet than any that sounded within the walls of his harem, 'why hast thou brought the wife of thy bosom to a place so secret—to a place of tombs?' 'Fatima,' replied the youth, 'I have come hither—to die!' 'To die, Hassan!' exclaimed his companion. 'Ay, to die! and thou also, and our babe must die with me!' returned the young man. The woman uttered a shriek, and the Caliph now saw that she had an infant below her mantle, which she clasped wildly to her bosom. The husband and father stood with his arms folded, and his eyes turned to the ground. 'Oh, my dear husband,' said the female, after a pause, broken by her sobs, 'I have ever obeyed thee faithfully; I have borne poverty and want with thee; nor will I survive thee. But our babe—to destroy our babe, Hassan! What fit of despair hath seized thee? Thou hast ever been cheerful and hopeful under all our misfortunes. How has this change taken place so suddenly?' 'Fatima, I was hopeful while I had ground for hope. Thou knowest that I expected to be the heir of my uncle Ali Meeram, and so to be restored to the comfort and wealth that were formerly mine—' 'And which thy love for me, Hassan,' said the female, tenderly, 'caused thee to lose. But speak on; hast thou not that hope yet?' 'No, dearest; my uncle is dead—I did not tell thee of this event when I first learnt it, because I wished to make thy restoration to happiness the more pleasant from being unexpected. But, alas, my uncle has made another his heir.' 'And cruelly broken faith with thee, my husband!' said the wife. 'Did he not tell thee, Hassan, that although he had sworn never to pardon thee during his life, he had so far repented of his cruel oath, as to be willing that thou shouldst enjoy all at his death?' 'He did say so, Fatima,' returned the young man, 'and I believed him. But a will was found in his repositories, dated several years back, which gave all he had to the Imam, his friend and attendant at death.' 'The Imam, Hassan!' cried Fatima, 'that Imam is a villain! I feared to tell thee before; but know that this Imam has dared to make professions of love to thy wife! There has been villainy practised, my husband!' 'No, Fatima,' said the young man sadly, 'there has been no deception. I could not stay to peruse the whole, but it was enough for me that Misnar, the aged and most trusty servant of my uncle's house, and who has been my friend, gave me his assurance that he had witnessed the deed drawn up in favor of the Imam. I fled—and now I have come here to die!'

The unfortunate pair were now silent for a few moments, till the young man turned and embraced his wife fondly, and repeatedly kissed the brow of the infant, which slept soundly in the warmth of its mother's bosom, unconscious of impending evil. 'There is no hope for us, Fatima,' said her husband, 'no way but to die! I cannot bear to think of a whole life of poverty and want for one so lovely, so tender as thee!—Nor can I endure the thought of perpetual toil to thee, my beloved!' returned Fatima. 'Yet, my boy—my flower of paradise—the light of my eyes! Oh, it is piteous! But he too would suffer want and hardship. Hassan, I am ready!' The miserable couple embraced each other, cast their eyes up to heaven, as if beseeching forgiveness, and with slow steps moved closer to the Pool. At this instant the Caliph burst from the entrance of the tomb. 'Hold, rash, unhappy creatures!' he cried; 'would ye thus deface the work and image of Allah, and deny the justice of his Prophet?' The commanding tones of Haroun, and the stately majesty of his figure, as he stood on the bank in the moonlight, with his arm outstretched, caused the wretched pair at first to think that Mahomet himself had interposed to stop their purpose. They shrunk together, and were silent, confounded by such an unlooked for interference, coming as if from the tombs of the dead. 'Advance,' said the Caliph, guessing partly at their feelings. 'I am human like yourselves, and am here but by accident—or what men may call accident, though it may be indeed the guidance of heaven. Advance!'

There was in the voice of the speaker so much kindness mingled with dignity, that Hassan and his wife moved slowly forward, as if led involuntarily, to the spot where the Caliph stood. 'I have heard your story,' said Haroun, 'and pity you. But if injustice has been done, as there seems some reason to suspect, why would you fly to this last guilty resource of the miserable, without being more assured that there is indeed no hope of better fortune? Has the Prophet not a viceregent on earth—may Allah guide and preserve him?—and here he slightly raised his turban, as if in reverence—'whose duty is to redress all the wrongs of his people!' 'My lord,' said Hassan, using the term of respect instinctively, 'if you have indeed overheard the tale of the unhappy person before you, it must have been apparent that the law is against us—that the wealth which was promised to us seems to have been truly and rightly given away to others.' 'The man who has supplanted you,' returned the Caliph, 'is wicked. You have been told so. Is not there some reason in this to make you believe him capable of wickedness and deceit in this matter.' The wife, who had hitherto kept her eyes on the ground, now raised them and exclaimed, 'Yes Hassan! listen to this noble stranger, who surely has been sent by heaven, this night to save us, and our child, from death! Do not let us sink beneath our load, when it may be, there is no cause!' 'What would our generous preserver counsel us to do?' said her husband, after a pause. 'Make an appeal to the Caliph, and demand an examination into these deeds in his presence,' was Haroun's reply. 'Alas, my lord we are poor, and can command the services of do one to procure us an audience of the Commander of the Faithful,' said Hassan. Giafar had been standing in silence behind the Caliph during this scene, and when the last remark was made, Haroun pinched his vizier sharply on the arm, as he observed in answer to Hassan, 'Surely gold is not required to open the way to the presence of Mahomet's vicar! But here,' continued he, 'is a ring, I am an inmate of the palace—an attendant on the Caliph. Show this, and it will procure you admittance to-morrow to the hall of audience. Be there, both of you, immediately after the hour of morning prayers, and give an early summons to the Imam to meet you there, and answer your appeal. Are you willing to follow my counsel?' 'I am, noble, generous stranger,' replied the young man; 'whether we succeed or not, may Allah shower blessings on your head for having saved three unfortunates from falling a sacrifice to rash despair?' 'Farewell, then,' said the Caliph; 'to your home, and hope till the morrow!' The young man and his wife knelt and kissed the Caliph's hand, for although they did not suspect his true character, they felt conscious they were in the presence of some one of high rank.—Hassan and Fatima then departed by the path they came, leaving Haroun Al Raschid and his vizier once more alone. After a little conversation on this adventure, the Caliph and Giafar also took their way to the palace, which they reached without meeting with any thing further to arrest their attention.

When Hassan and his wife reached their home, they spent some time in giving grateful thanks for the almost miraculous prevention of an act, the intention of which they now entirely repented. Early in the morning the husband rose, and prepared to fulfil his promise of summoning the Imam. Hassan, however, had strongly in his mind the remembrance of what Misnar, his uncle's old servant, had said to him, in corroboration of the authenticity of the deed, and he doubted of the issue. When he reached the Imam's door, it was opened by Misnar himself, the very object of Hassan's thoughts. 'Go away, young man,' said Misnar, before the other could speak, 'I pity thee; but I am now the Imam's head servant, and dare not give any thing to thee.' Hassan was irritated at being taken for a beggar. 'I seek nothing from thee, Misnar, or from thy master,' said Hassan; 'but I come to summon the Imam to appear before the Caliph this day, immediately after morning prayers, and to bring the necessary means to prove his right to the property left by my uncle Ali Meeram.' Misnar stared at the speaker, and at length said in a compassionate tone, 'Poor youth! His loss hath taken away his reason.' 'Let me warn thee not to believe so, but either to do my message to the Imam, or suffer me to speak to him myself.' Misnar replied, 'I will deliver thy summons; but the Imam will surely laugh at and despise it, as a freak of a weakened brain.' 'Let me again caution both the Imam and thee not to think so.' With these words, the young man departed, leaving Misnar still fixed to the spot, in amazement, seemingly, at his insanity.

Having dressed himself as well as his poor choice of clothing would permit, while his wife did the same for herself and babe, the pair set out after the hour of prayers for the palace of Haroun Al Raschid. Fatima looked so lovely even in her mean attire, that Hassan felt a momentary sensation of pain at the thought of exposing her to the gaze of a court, but the remembrance of her faithful tenderness speedily banished the feeling. On reaching the entrance of the palace, Hassan presented the ring. At sight of it the keeper of the gate, prostrated himself on the ground, and led the visitors through the court, and into the inner buildings of the royal dwelling. The long flights of marble steps up which Hassan and his wife were now taken, and the grandeur of the apartments which they traversed, dazzled their eyes, and created an impression of awe in their minds. On reaching the door of the audience hall, the ring was shown to another attendant, who also bowed himself to the earth, and exclaimed, "The bearers of this ring will be the first persons received by the Commander of the Faithful this day. Enter the hall, and wait his appearance." Hassan and his wife entered. They were not alone in the hall. Various splendidly dressed officers of the household stood around and before the throne, which was placed at the end of the room, and blazed with massive gold and many colored stones of price. Hassan and Fatima did not recognise their friend of the previous evening in any of these officers, and retired modestly to the farther end of the apartment. Ere long, Haroun Al Raschid appeared, and all present bent their bodies to the ground. When at the Caliph's gracious command, the husband and wife raised their eyes, they did not recognise in the magnificently robed monarch their former friend; but when he addressed them by name, they at once knew the truth, and again fell prostrate. The Caliph caused them to rise, and spoke kindly to them. "Is the Imam here?" said he at length. "Commander of the Faithful, I obeyed your orders, and summoned him to appear at this hour," was Hassan's reply. Haroun sent a messenger to the common waiting room to learn if the Imam had appeared. The officer returned with the intelligence that the Imam was not there. "Dog!" said the Caliph, "does he dare to think that the Prophet's viceregent will not hear the poor! Go! drag him hither. Hassan, do thou direct them to his house."

Ere long, the Imam, Misnar, and Hassan, stood face to face before the Caliph, while poor Fatima shrunk behind, trembling she knew not why for the issue of this case to her beloved husband. Hassan was first called upon to speak, and he modestly related "that he had been left when a boy, to his uncle's care, and had been brought up by him, along with an orphan girl, the daughter of Ali Meeram's friend. That Fatima and he had ever loved each other, and had finally been wedded, but contrary to the will of Ali Meeram, who wished to force a wealthy match upon his nephew. That Ali Meeram had sworn deeply never to bestow an asper upon the pair while he lived; but that he had afterwards repented, and had said to Hassan, that the latter should inherit all his wealth at his death. Ali Meeram died a few moons afterwards, and all his wealth appeared, by a will produced, to have been left to the Imam, who had been his friend, and who attended his death-bed." When Hassan mentioned Fatima, every eye was turned on her, and it was thought by all that the blushing beauty who stood in unveiled poverty before them, might well excuse such a trespass as the old man's nephew had committed.

When the Imam, who was a middle-aged ill-favored personage, and exhibited no emotion, was commanded to speak, he declared that he knew nothing of Ali Meeram's intentions to make him his heir, until the will was produced, disposing, all in his favour. They had long been friends, and the deed was dated five years previous to Ali's death. "Did you not observe, in your intercourse with the deceased uncle of Hassan any change of feeling recently towards his nephew?" asked the Caliph. "Commander of the Faithful," said the Imam, "I knew of my lamented friend's anger at his nephew on account of the marriage, and I never observed that that anger had ceased." The Imam spoke these last words emphatically, and there was a bitter glance of his eye shot at the same time at Hassan and his wife. "Where is this deed?" said the Caliph. "It is here, great king," replied the Imam, kneeling down and presenting it to the Caliph. Haroun glanced over the writing, and enquired after the witnesses. The Imam answered, that one of the witnesses was dead, but the other, Misnar, was now in presence. Misnar was then beckoned forward by the Imam. Haroun looked intently, as did all around at the old servant, of Ali Meeram. Misnar was a venerable-looking old man, with hairs as white as snow, and a countenance expressive of calmness and resignation. On looking at him, almost every one became assured that the Imam's cause was just. The Caliph seemed to have the same feelings, as after demanding of Hassan, if the signature seemed to be that of Ali Meeram, and receiving an answer in the affirmative, he turned over the deed again and again in silence. He at last chanced to notice, that, altho' the paper was open, the seal was yet unbroken, the parchment having been cut around it. He mentioned this, and inquired if "there was any cause for it." The Imam immediately advanced a step and exclaimed, "There is a cause, oh just and munificent prince!—and since thy piercing eye hath noticed this circumstance, it may now be explained, as it will afford a final and conclusive proof in this matter." At the call of the Imam, Misnar now stepped forward, and said, Commander of the true believers, it was I who caused the Imam to preserve the seal, when the deed was opened in the presence of witnesses; and I requested him, at the same time, not to cause me to explain the reason, unless it appeared absolutely necessary. I made this request, mighty prince, because I was unwilling to appear an active agent against Hassan, my dear master's kinsman and the sharer of his blood. But the explanation now seems unavoidable. When that deed was executed, foreseeing that it might be yet the subject of dispute, I placed a sequin below the seal, as a token that might be of avail. The deed has never since been in my possession, and if the seal be now broken, it will prove my words."

The Caliph immediately broke the seal, and the sequin dropped out! All present uttered an involuntary murmur, as if fully satisfied, and the Imam wore a look of triumph. But the feelings of all speedily changed, when the Caliph, who had looked intently for a moment on the coin, started to his feet, and bent a terrible look on the Imam and Misnar. "Wretches!" he said, "you have overreached yourselves! This conclusive artifice, as you esteemed it, has overthrown the whole fabric of your deceit! This deed," continued the Caliph, striking it with his hand, "is dated five years back, and, though this piece of gold be without a date, there is upon it a private mark, known but to ourselves and our servants of the mint, which tells us that three years have not yet passed since it was coined! Slaves, do ye confess your monstrous villainy?"

The picture which the Imam and Misnar presented at this most unexpected detection, cannot be described—terror overcame all their presence of mind, and they fell prostrate before the Caliph, and cried, in abject tones, for mercy! Haroun was not cruel, but he was nevertheless so enraged at their treachery, that, after having made them confess the forgery of the deed for their joint benefit, and the suppression of the true will which was in Hassan's favor, he would have instantly sent them to death, but for the intercession of him who had been their chosen victim. They were, however, banished forever from Bagdad.

Hassan and Fatima were now restored to the enjoyment of every worldly comfort. They did not regret their misfortunes, which had been the cause of bringing upon them the sunshine of the Caliph's favor. Their children, also, were taken under the royal protection, and more than one of them rose to rank and honor in his service.

RECIPE FOR THE LADIES.—Ladies who cultivate flowers in their parlors, will gratefully receive the following recipe for destroying a very troublesome reptile.—Worms in pots may be easily destroyed, simply by watering the soil with lime water, which may be made by putting about two pounds of lime into a pail of water—when the whole is slacked and well stirred up, it should be allowed to settle; the clear water may then be turned off, and the soil in the pots liberally watered with it. The worms will soon leave the premises by crawling upon the surface, when they may be taken off and destroyed. If any remains, another watering may be applied. We have never found any difficulty in destroying them by this method.

THE GATHERER.

Snaring Alligators.—During the Mahratta war, says Major Napier, the British camp lay on the banks of a large tank swarming with alligators, and he proposed the following way of destroying those disagreeable neighbors:—There were numerous bamboos growing round the tank, possessing all the elasticity of a yewbow; one of these was to be bent to the ground and fastened to a tent peg, driven in sufficiently to make it retain that position. This done, a dog was to be next tied down close to the peg, and a rope with a running knot fastened in such a manner to the bamboo that the alligator must insert his head into the noose before he could reach the cur, which he would seize, and attempting to bear away, tear up the tent peg; the bamboo released from its hold, immediately rebounding with such violence as to carry aloft the whole trio—dog, peg, and crocodile. Twenty or thirty bamboos were accordingly baited; and so successful was the experiment that not an eye was closed that night in the camp, from the dreadful bellowing of the monsters as they were swung to the winds of heaven.—Next morning there was displayed the finest crop of bamboo fruit ever witnessed, every tree bearing its burden of a tent peg, a Pariah dog and an alligator, some already dead, others in their last agonies. The disturbance caused by their roaring had, however, been so great that the General put a stop to the sport in next day's orders.

PARALLEL OF THE SEXES.—Man is strong; woman is beautiful. Man is daring and confident; woman is diffident and unassuming. Man is great in action; woman in suffering. Man shines abroad; woman at home. Man talks to convince; woman to persuade and please. Man has a rugged heart; woman a soft and tender one. Man prevents misery; woman relieves it. Man has science; woman taste. Man has judgment; woman sensibility. Man is a being of justice; woman an angel of mercy.

SINGULAR.—One of the workmen attached to the Baltimore shot tower, while passing through Howard's Park, at an early hour yesterday morning, heard a flock of wild geese passing over him, and looking up saw something white descending towards the ground. He took off his hat containing his handkerchief, and was thus enabled to catch unbroken a large goose egg, which had been sent down by one of the aerial party referred to.—Balt. Amer.

We learn that in Richmond, an "Anti-borrowing-your-neighbor's-newspaper-every-day-and-thus-cheating-the-printer-out-of-his-honest-and-hard-earned-dues-Society," is about to be formed.

TALL BUSINESS.—The editor of an inland paper offers five cent premium for the best original conundrum for his paper—and a pair of second hand mittens for the best anecdote—and a jewsharp, minus the tongue, for the best dozen wellerisms. He will also give a set of new horse shoes for the best original tale. Truly, this is the age of liberality.

BENEFIT OF EARLY RISING.—There is a class of people in London, whose profession it is to rise before day and commence their peregrinations about the city, searching for objects lost the previous night and eve, by the million and a half who swarm the streets.—These persons often make fortunes.

Death of a Philanthropist.—The Portsmouth Gazette records the death in that town, on Friday evening, of William Ladd, well known throughout this country and Europe, for his noble and persevering exertions for many years, to extend the principles of peace.—Atlas.

DESCRIPTION OF A BALL AT PARIS.

Fancy a scene of perfect enchantment. A suit of fifteen rooms laid out for the amusement of the guests. We were first introduced into the Salon de la reception, furnished in the first style of splendor; from thence we joined the dancers in the ball-room, which was resplendent with lustres, mirrors, &c. When fatigued with "tripping it on the light fantastic toe," or incommoded with the heat, we took refuge in a gallery filled with the most choice and fragrant plants: all along this gallery were rooms, which, if you will follow me, we will visit in their turn.

The first by the means of scenery and other embellishments, was fitted up in the style of a Swiss Dairy. Here a lovely young dairy maid wearing her national costume, presented us with the most delicious cream you ever tasted, in beautiful little china bowls. I assure you it was a thousand times more refreshing than ices, sorbets, &c.: quitting the Laiterie Suisse, we entered the library, over the door was written Salon de Lecture, here we found a long table covered with green cloth, and on it books of prints, annals, albums, drawings, caricatures, &c., and every thing that should be in such a place. Our next visit was to the cell of a forbidding looking astrologer, with a long white beard, who, examining your palm, would predict the most extraordinary destinies. We next turned into a tent where a cantiniere offered us liquors from a number of pretty little barrels, and gave us slices of rye bread with the most excellent butter. Next door was a Chalatan who distributed, in place of nostrums, beautiful little cut glass bottles filled with scent. And next to this was a lottery office, with the prizes (for there were no blanks) arranged on tables, etageres, &c. here you chose a ticket and went on to a theatre, where a thunder storm in a forest was represented, when this was over the scene changed to a ballet of the reign of Henri III. This concluded, the scene changed to the gardens of Versailles, where the brilliant Louis IV., was seen walking, surrounded by his court in full costume. As the monarch and his suit vanished from our sight, the public crier announced the drawing of the lottery, when we hastened to see dame fortune distribute her gifts with that want of perception which proved the propriety of representing her as blind, for to the gentlemen she gave work-boxes, Chinese figures and the thousand little trifles we run after, and to the ladies snuff-boxes, pipes, tobacco, pouches, &c. at five in the morning we seated ourselves at the supper table, after which we retired.—Ladies' Book.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

ALBANY, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1841.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—We find ourselves unable to furnish any back numbers prior to No. 26.—the FIRST SIX MONTHS, and we wish our Agents, on obtaining any new subscription to inform the subscriber of this fact. Any money sent to us, will be applied to this volume, and should there be any excess, it will be passed to the credit of the subscriptions of the next volume.

THE 1ST OF MAY.—Those of our subscribers intending to change their residences in the city of New York, are requested to give notice to our Agent, Mr. Wm. Boardman, 33 Jones-st.

Those changing residence in this city, will please inform the carrier:

"THE GARLAND OF THE MILLS."—That portion of the female population of Lowell, Mass. usually denominated "Factory girls" in addition to their monthly Magazine, propose publishing an annual under the above title, the matter of which is to be entirely written by girls in actual employment in the factories of that place, aside from the novelty of such a publication, it will doubtless possess much literary merit, judging from the character of former effusions from the same source.

This announcement will sound strange abroad, where the name of female operative is synonymous with degradation and misery. What a proud refutation the mental, and moral acquirements of these young ladies present to that narrow minded prejudice which has engendered this opinion. What an illustration of the fact that but a brief portion of human existence is necessary to arrive at eminence. These girls are confined to the loom and spindle, probably ten hours in the day, and they yet find time to enrich their minds, and render themselves capable of conveying instruction to the pampered daughters of affluence, and to elevate the standard of female character, in the estimation of mankind.

PERCUSSION.—In the course of a debate on the M'Leod question in the Assembly a few days since, Mr. Culver of Washington co., made some allusions to the character and competency of the leaders in the late Canadian troubles. Within a few hours after, Mr. C. received a challenge from Gen. Sutherland, of patriot memory. Mr. Culver being a man of peace lodged a complaint with Justice Kane, and caused the Gen. to be held to bail, to keep the peace.

DANCING TO SOME TUNE.—The correspondent of the Baltimore American, under the date of April 3d, says:—

"Fanny Elssler's benefit took place last night—and such a benefit. There were fully $6000 in the house. The fair danseuse was literally pelted with roses. In one of the wreaths thrown to her there were a pair of diamond bracelets which cost $1,500. Others contained valuable presents. So that the gross receipts of the night could scarcely have been less than from $8,000 to $10,000. She has probably netted $20,000 by her engagement in this city. It is doubtful whether she will be re-engaged at the St. Charles or will dance at the Theatre d'Orleans. She has set the enthusiastic population of the sunny South almost delirious by her performances.

The above is but one among the many evidences of the peculiar species of insanity prevailing throughout our country, in relation to the "divine danseuse;" and such waste of means upon a wanton, whose only merit consists in rendering what is proper and graceful, extravagant if not indelicate, is a national reproach. The public taste must be greatly depraved to enable a dancing adventurer to absorb such an amount of money. But it is idle to rail at folly. The tens of thousands of dollars lavished upon this woman, instead of relieving and benefitting the distressed and deserving in our own country, will be taken to Europe to pamper the appetites of those who live in idleness and voluptuousness. We hope the day will speedily arrive when people will awaken to a sense of such folly, and refrain from such preposterous exhibitions of it, as indicative of anything but plain republicanism or sound sense.

COLLECTOR OF ALBANY.—Alderman Thomas L. M'Elroy has been appointed Collector and Inspector of this port, in place of Mr. William Seymour removed.

IMPORTANT.—A Col. Umbrella, of New Orleans, has won Fanny Elssler's side-comb in a raffle. Lucky man, what an inheritance to transmit to the unborn generations of umbrellas?

FIRE AT NORTH BEND.—The late residence of Gen. Harrison at North Bend, was entirely consumed on the 11th inst. It was occupied by Mrs. Harrison, the widow of the deceased President; the fire was accidental; most of the furniture was saved. This unexpected visitation will renew the sympathies of the people for the lone widow, who so recently had the cup of happiness dashed from her aged lips.

Colonel Davies has been elected mayor of Cincinnati.

SENSIBLE.—A Mr. Farnsworth of St. Louis, on being nominated for a lucrative office by his political friends declines the favor in a card, in which he expresses his thanks and "only desires to be a candidate for their favors at the old established stand 50 Main st. nearly opposite the auction houses, where he continues in the copper, tin and sheet iron line, and the manufacture of matchless Paste Blacking."—If his blacking is as shining in its qualities as his judgement is sound, Day & Martin will be obsolete in a month. If our political parties could boast of a few more such men it would be a happy thing for our country.

AMPHITHEATRE.—COMPLIMENTARY BENEFIT.—We are happy to perceive that a complimentary benefit is to be tendered to Mr. S. H. NICHOLS, the enterprising and liberal manager of the Amphitheatre. We have not yet learned the particulars, and are unable to furnish a bill of the performances, but we are confident that the public will give him their undivided support upon the occasion.

WOODEN PAVEMENTS.—We understand that a project is on foot to test the experiment of wooden pavements in this city, and that the vicinity of the Exchange, is the place designated. Wherever this mode has been substituted for the old old one, it has been attended with success, and could State street, be thus paved it would add materially to the appearance of the city, and to the comfort of our citizens.

OPENING OF THE CANAL.—The canal opens today. During the past winter it has been thoroughly repaired, and now opens for the season, with every prospect of an extensive and prosperous business.

DISGRACEFUL.—A Mr. Sparry, has been recently lecturing in our churches against "Popery" and has attracted great numbers to hear him, many of whom holding antagonist opinions have manifested their disapprobation by unmanly interruptions and noisy declamations.

Not having heard Mr. Sparry, we are entirely ignorant of his merits as a man or as a lecturer; but we have fallen on evil times indeed, if discussions on sectional or doctrinal points are to be prevented by a turbulent mob. The true and manly course of opposition is to stay away. None are compelled to go but if they do so, they are bound to behave as men. This species of incipient rebellion against good order and decency should be reformed at once.

AUBURN AND ROCHESTER.—The cars of the Auburn and Rochester Railroad will commence running on Monday the 26th instant.

COINCIDENCE.—Of the six deceased Presidents, four have died on the fourth of the month; Adams, Jefferson and Monroe, on the 4th of July, and Harrison on the 4th of April.

The report that President Tyler is a widower, is said to be a mistake. Mrs. Tyler, his wife, is living and in good health. He has two sons and two daughters married, and one son and one daughter unmarried.

EX-PRESIDENT JACKSON.—We learn from the Natchez papers that Gen. Jackson is confined to his bed by severe indisposition. The nature of his disease is not stated.

The Advantage of Reading.—'Here,' said the librarian, of a mechanics' and apprentices' library, 'here's a book which will set you a-thinking.' 'Lord bless you,' replied the hard-working mechanic, 'I want something that will keep me from thinking.'

APPRENTICES' LIBRARY.

This institution has been removed to No. 1 Commercial Buildings, and the Librarian will deliver Books on Saturday evening, at 7 o'clock 24th inst., and the following Monday, Thursday and Saturday evenings of each week.

I would inform the Patrons, readers and apprentices generally, the Trustees have enlarged the Library, by adding over 200 Volumes among which are, many of the late productions, with other interesting and standard works, and reduced the fees to one cent per volume.

H. E. BROWER, Librarian.

Albany, April 23rd, 1841.

N. B. Those having books belonging to the Library, will please return them. Donations of Books thankfully received.

Intelligence.

Another Sad Rail Road Accident.—On Thursday afternoon, ten of Mr. Dodd's stone cars with a locomotive, were sent out on the Rail Road, for a load. In Wilbraham, the engineer noticed some cattle on the track, so near him that in order to save them, he reversed his engine; by which sudden re-action, the cars were so jammed up together, that seven of them were broken. Six men were on the cars. One of them, John Whipple, of this town, aged 19 years, was instantly killed in the crash; a Mr. Powers of Palmer, dangerously wounded; and another man slightly injured. The other three escaped without injury. The mangled remains of Whipple were soon after brought to the house of his afflicted parents in this town.—Springfield Republican.

Shipwreck.—The Charleston Courier says the steamer Anson arrived at Georgetown on Wednesday last having in tow the Spanish brig Idefonsa, mentioned in our paper last week, as being off Pawley's island in distress. The I. was from Havana, with a cargo of sugar and coffee to Hamburg; she had three feet of water in her hold, and was about being abandoned when fallen in with by the Anson.

Drought.—By advices from Jamaica, W. I., to the 22d ult., we learn that there had been great suffering on the island, by reason of a drought—so much so that water was doled out by masters of the plantations to their hands in very short allowances.

A little son of John Duncan, at Princeton, N. J., was instantly killed at that place on Friday. A cart was passing through the street with a roller attached; the little fellow jumped upon the roller, and falling before it was crushed to death. He was 9 years old, and a child of great promise.

Marriage in the Police Office.—A young Jewess named Delia Phillips, having sued a young Israelite named Isaac Steinberg, for breach of promise of marriage, laying her damages at $5000—the faithless swain was lodged in the debtors' prison, in default of bail.—There he had time to reflect, and then agreed to marry when the lady refused, but the counsel and friends of both parties interposing, they became re-united again, and proceeding into the police office with their witnesses, were duly married by Justice Matsell.

Monstrous Wolf.—A wolf was taken a few weeks since, on the Kenebec, of a grizzly grey color which measured from his nose to the tip of his tail, 6 feet 4 inches. The Maine Cultivator says: "Such an animal must have been a frightful acquaintance to meet in the woods alone."

Pocket Picking.—A gentleman of this city had his pocket picked at the depot of the Boston railroad, of a copy of the New Testament, which from its size and form, was probably mistaken for a pocket book. The gentleman is reconciled to his loss in the hope that this thief may be benefitted by the book of which he has obtained possession in such an unexpected manner.—Prov. Jour.

Cincinnati.—The annual exports of Cincinnati are estimated at $9,000,000, viz. Pork and Beef, in all forms, $3,000,000; flour, $1,200,000; whiskey, $800,000; manufactured articles of all kinds, $3,000,000; and the residue articles of produce.

National Fast.—The Governor of New Jersey has issued a proclamation recommending that the 14th of May be observed in that state as a day of fasting and prayer, in view of the recent severe affliction which the American people have sustained in the death of the lamented William Henry Harrison, late President of the United States.

Suicide.—A servant to the Hon. J. McNab, in Halifax, committed suicide last week, by hanging himself in his master's stable.

Singular Death.—The N. Y. Herald of Wednesday says that Dr. Archer of that city was called to the house of Michael Burns, No. 3 Washington-st. to hold an inquest on the body of James Porter. It appeared that the deceased was of Albany, and a shoe maker by trade, but came to this city in consequence of the hardness of the times, to follow the profession of an oysterman. For some days past he had complained of ill health, and on Tuesday morning, after breakfast, retired to his room very weak and faint. On the servant going to see him, a short time afterwards, he was in a dying state. A medical man was sent for, when it was discovered that Porter had been bled recently in the arm, that the bandage had been removed and he bled to death.

A Maiden Lady.—A Miss Mary Prince, aged 100 years and 1 month, lately died at Philadelphia, having attained that advanced age in a state of "single blessedness."

Lake Erie.—The ice is out of the Buffalo harbor, and a steamboat, the Anthony Wayne, arrived at that port on Wednesday last.

Rail-Road Accident.—Henry Goulding, an engineer on the Pontchartrain rail-road, was passed over by the cars on the 24th March, and died from the loss of blood as he was being carried to the New Orleans hospital.

Married.

In this city, last Sunday evening, by Rev Mr Kelly, Mr George Olney to Miss Mary Doyle.

On Wednesday evening last, by the Rev Mr Kissam, Mr James Litchfield, to Miss Julia Ann Latta.

By the Rev Mr Wyckoff, Mr. Peter Smith to Mrs Jane Cameron, all of this city.

In Groveland, New York, on Thursday evening last by the Rev Mr Atwater, Hon James G Birney, of the city of New York, to Miss Elizabeth Fitzhugh, daughter of the late Col Fitzhugh.

DIED.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North R. ver, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptedness to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock. mr. 12

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved Diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

POETRY.

WHAT IS HOPE?

The flowret in its brightest bloom,
The blue sky on it shining,
Filling the air with sweet perfume,
Its tendrils gaily twining;
Such—such is hope.

The flowret fallen from its stem,
Its leaves all scatter'd round.
Its beauty and its bloom with them
Storm-stricken to the ground:
Such—such is hope.

The sea—the deep, the dark blue sea,
No breeze its mirror breaking,
Across whose waters, noiselessly,
The bark its course is taking;
Such—such is hope.

The sea its waves in fury lashing,
Its billows deep and dark—
O'er its black waves the lightning flashing,
While onward sweeps the bark:
Such—such is hope.

The sky—the star-bespangled sky—
Its pure and solemn beauty
Inspiring thoughts of Him on high,
And calling us to duty:
Such—such is hope.

The sky, its face with fury clouded,
The lightning flashing o'er it,
The moon, the stars in blackness shrouded,
All vanishing before it:
Such—such is hope.

Yes, such is hope; the lovely flower,
The blue sea, azure sky,
All—all may fade within an hour—
All mock us as they fly:
And such is hope.

But there is hope beyond the tomb,
Unchanging and enduring,
Where flowers of deathless beauty bloom,
With no vain charms alluring:
Such be thy hope!

From the Albany Daily Advertiser.

H O P E .

Hope animates dejected man,
Buys up his broken heart;
Assures him that his present plan
Will future joy impart.

With hope the disappointed rise,
And onward bravely press,
Till they shall gain the wish'd for prize
They've long sought to possess.

'Tis hope that stays the struggling hand,
When fortune deigns to frown;
Conducts, when wisdom doth command,
Its vot'ries to renown.

When gloomy prospects greet the sight,
And dismal scenes appear,
Hope's voice is heard—the way is bright,
And coming pleasures near.

Oh Hope! But for thee what were man?
Despondent soon to die!
'Twere but for thee, with sorrow's clan,
No mortal e'er would vie.

'Tis thou that swells the heart replete
With all that joy inspires;
That bids despair and grief retreat,
Gives life to our desires.

Are we depressed, borne down by sadness?
Oh Hope, thy favor lend!
Fill full our cup with gladness,
That troubles all may end!

Are we the objects of thy care?
Then Hope, we do implore
That thou wouldst grant a double share,
That joy be ours the more.

THE GRAVE.

BY EDWARD C. PINCKNEY.

Oh! to possess such lustre—and then lack! Don Jan.

Beneath these rankly spreading weeds,
This lowly mound, and dreary stone,
The sordid earth worm darkly feeds
On one men loved to look upon:—
Of gentle race and beauty rare,
The land delightfully she ranged,
And now she slumbers deeply here;
Ah! the heart aches to think how changed!

I saw her once in life, and said
So beautiful a thing could not
But breathe awhile, and then be made
To share in death the common lot;—
'Twas idly thought! her form so fair
Is buried in this narrow cave;
But late she lit this upper air,
And now, I look upon her grave!

I mourn for her, though nought to me
In kindred, or indeed in heart;
Save something that I liked to see
And wished not ever to depart:
A pleasant sight—a creature I
Gazed on in no unquiet mood,
And turned from most unwillingly
To glance on things of meaner blood.

A selfish grief! she lies within
A place of solitary rest;
Where care shall never entrance win,
Nor anguish wring her lovely breast!
Light hearted girl! I would that thou
Could'st change thy state with me,
That I might sleep the tomb below,
And the sun shine again on thee!

From the Cannoharie Radil.

ON VISITING MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

Here,
Within the silent chamber of the tomb
Thou art. My mother—
This, the last mansion of mortality,
Is thy resting place.

And can it be,
That this is all of noble man!
This cold corpse. This, the silent tomb!
Is this all of him who is scarce beneath—
Those just spirits,
Who do the bidding of our God?

It cannot be.
Where that mind, whose aspirations
The things of time and sense
Ne'er could satisfy.
Does this too, bear the signet of relentless death?
No. A voice from within seems to say,
It lives, unshackled by human nature
In that realm where it can feast
Upon the mysteries of eternity.
Ere the sun of life passed its meridian height
Thou left this, thy earthly tabernacle,
For that land, from whence no traveller returns.

We felt thy loss,
But I would not call thee back.
No! Sleep on; for while here, thou did'st drain
The bitter cup of affliction to its very dregs.
Yet there is consolation in the hope
That we shall meet again.
Not within the narrow bounds of time,
But at the resurrection's promis'd morn
We meet to part no more.

WRITTEN IN A GENTLEMAN'S ALBUM.

Like one, who in some coronet,
Where fairest pearls are found;
Would seek some paler gem to set,
Than those that shine around;

So I, where beauty's pen hath placed
The words to Friendship dear,
Where beauty's fairy hand hath traced
Its wish for thee, sincere—

I can but do, as they have done,
Although with feebler force,

And wish thee, pleasure's shadeless sun
To shine upon thy course.

The smiles of youth, without its tears,
Its brightest smiles be thine,
And manhood's hopes, without its fears
Their wreath for thee entwine.

TO FANNY ELSSLER.

Fanny! O Fanny! you may take my hat,
And ev'ry thing I've got; I'm fairly smitten,
I'm Fanny-phobia struck and Elssler bitten;
Herewith my will and testament is written;
And I'm descended to requiescat;
Upset, turned round, tipp'd over, broken flat!
Just be my heiress, Fanny, I implore you,
My large possessions I now lay before you.
I'll serve you, laud you, follow and encore you,
If you will just permit me to adore you!
Would I had more for you a thousand times,
But my plantation, situate—somewhere,
All my estates and castles—in the air,
I give—and throw in these immortal rhymes!

THE AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER.

Devoted to Masonry, Literature, and Useful Knowledge.

[VOL. II—NO. 36]

MASONIC.

Masonry is a system co-eval with the first rudiments of civilization and refinement; nay, some who have ministered to the altar, have, without compromising their orthodoxy, ventured to trace its origin to that momentous period, when man, by the Almighty fiat, was spoken into existence when "the spirit moved upon the face of the waters, and God said let there be light." Its antiquity, however, cannot, will not be disputed; history confirms the fact that it has existed in all ages, and flourished in all countries; nor can its Tuscan pillars and Corinthian columns, which are based on the deep foundations of immutable truth, be destroyed, until they are swept into the abyss of universal desolation.

It was not until king Solomon built the temple at Jerusalem, on Moriah's mount, where first the destroying angel was appeased, that masonry assumed its stability of form, and beauty of proportion; it was not until that memorable epoch, that a regularity of working, and symmetry of structure, were established.

Such was the wisdom and forecast of the royal architect, that notwithstanding his visible fabric has long since mingled with the dust, still the towering speculative edifice, whose Mosaic pavement stands upon holy ground, whose tessell encompasses the living springs of refined and plastic enterprize, and the head of "whose corner is made of the stone which the builders rejected," remains unimpaired by the ravages of time.

It has survived the reign of barbarism, the rude shocks of Gothic violence, and the convulsions of exterminating war. Societies, systems, cities, nations, and empires, have successively disappeared. Nought but broken columns and dilapidated temples designate the site where once stood Rome's illustrious rival; and Rome herself, proud Rome, is almost a pile of ruins; the lofty spires of her four hundred temples, are nodding to the earth; the brazen statues have fallen into decay; the villas of the Fabii and the Cæsars have become the lurking retreats of brigands and desperate assassins; the mistress of Asia is blotted from the face of empire: yet masonry exists in all its pristine vigor and beauty scattering blessings to the four corners of the habitable globe.

Wherever the liberal arts and sciences have flourished, they have been made tributary at the mystic behest, and perhaps at no period since the distinguished era, to which allusions have been made, could the annals of Masonry more justly than at present boast of its imperishable grandeur. Indications of decay, have it is true, in the lapse of ages, apparently threatened the demolition of the noble structure, but it was only the mould of neglect, forming for a season, over the rough ashlers of the building, which were exposed in the shades of ignorance, the damps of superstition, and the mildews of vandalism. The corrosive incrustation has long since yielded to the gravel of science, and the chisel of refinement. The polished fabric on whose key-stone is "written the new name, which no man knoweth saving him that receiveth it," at this day presents to the admiring view of the accepted, its original Ephesian aspect, bearing upon its pilasters the stamp of duration, and containing within its spacious apartments, the incense of devout gratitude, and the hidden manna of life. The nations of the east are gradually emerging from heathenish darkness. The day star seems to proclaim that light is beginning to dawn again in that once favored land which gave birth to masonry, and which received the impress of a Saviour's feet.

Our sublime institution has, for its fundamental principles, universal benevolence, and brotherly love; it stimulates its professors to deeds of charity, and offers to them dignity and respect; it illustrates those awful truths which

"point out an error, and
"and intimate truth to man."

To a corrected mind, and a faithful heart, it furnishes a balm for every affliction. There is no selfish inclination which it is not calculated to banish; no generous sentiment which it is not intended to inculcate; it discourages defamation, it tempers the passions, and fortifies the heart; it enjoins us to be faithful to our trusts; to let the words of our mouths express the thoughts of our hearts; to renounce error; to avoid rash engagements, but what we do promise, religiously to perform.

It would, however, be useless to declaim upon the excellence of the virtues, which are constantly arrayed before us in the most captivating manner. Every maxim of the craft breathes with them; every example of our distinguished sages illustrates them; every admonition contained in our mystical pages, eloquently enforces them; every tenet learned from the oral lectures of our enlightened compeers, teaches the bright lesson of love, charity, and universal benevolence.

When the direful blasts of war assail an unhappy country, and embattled legions of kindred men are engaged in the strife of blood; when thousands perish by the victor's sword, and humanity shudders at the sight, the mason's well known sign preserves the captive from chains. Instead of receiving the fatal weapon in his bosom, he finds himself encircled within the arms of an affectionate brother, and his heart is gladdened by the generous sympathies of a kind friend.

We have innumerable legends, which are treasured in memory, and constitute a species of intellectual heritage. Tradition has preserved and transmitted them from antiquity, in a manner which makes them indelibly more impressive than the modes of communication adopted by other institutions. They are not the day-dreams of a romantic imagination, but a pleasing reality; the banquet of chastened thought, combined with the fruits of tender meditation, which are equally delightful, interesting, and permanent.

Our entire system is conceived in a strain of beautiful allegory, and furnishes hieroglyphics to remind us constantly of our imperative duty to ourselves, to our neighbor, and to our God. The ark of innocence will waft its inmates in triumph over the tempestuous billows of adversity; and the anchor of well grounded hope, which has been cast in the furnace of affliction and repentance, will safely moor them in the peaceful haven of felicity "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

Masonry has ranked among her votaries, men most prodigal of good gifts to the human family, and celebrated for their sterling virtues: philosophers and statesmen, heroes, kings, and princes, both in ancient and modern days, have been proud to divest themselves of the ermine robes of power, in order to put on the more honorable badges of our order; and have thought it no disgrace to bring themselves to the level, which knows no rank but that attained by superior wisdom and parity; and acknowledges no distinction but that which untiring zeal, and masonic devotion secure to their possessor.

Solomon, who preferred wisdom to all other earthly blessings: Hiram, who erected the temple of the living God; and St. John the Baptist, and precursor of him "who spake as never man spake," have consecrated our annals. But without resorting to antiquity, or adverting to the many living ornaments who at this day adorn the ecclesiastical and civil departments of the world, our own favored country furnishes a splendid list of our departed worthies, who yielded not their attachment except with their last breath. Warren, the martyred hero, who fought, and bled, and died, under the first ensign of liberty which America bravely unfurled, was a mason; so was Franklin, the philosopher who could wrest the lightning from heaven, and make it familiar with the instruments of his laboratory. And so also was Washington, "that blazoned star amidst the bright constellation of the universe, which eclipses the splendor of every surrounding luminary."

Well indeed may the institution which can boast of such champions, dispense with the meed of a studied eulogium; "recorded honors shall gather round their monuments, and thicken over them; they are solid fabrics, and will support the laurels that adorn them."

Masonry knows of no geographical boundaries; its residence is the universe: the sons of India and America alike share upon its existence: mysteriously bound by the unbroken compact, it ranges resistless, thro' every region and through every clime. The thunders of the Vatican, the receipts of imperial despotism, the terrors of the Auto de fe, and the tortures of the inquisition, have in vain essayed to check its illimitable progress. "no tint of words can spot its snowy mantle, nor chemic power turn its sceptre into iron."

Religious and political disputes enter not our portals: every sect (acknowledging a Supreme Being) is equally respected by our order: all are left free to pursue whatever they deem important to Zion, or to the world; never forgetting, however that we are to keep within the square with all men, and to regard the sacred volume as the only sure guide to eternal happiness.

The principles and privileges of the order are open to all, whose capacities qualify them for exercising the one, or exhibiting the other: but let it not be vainly supposed, that therefore every individual who enters our mystic sanctuary is necessarily a free and an accepted Mason; and, brother Masons, however humiliating the reflection, too true it is, we must acknowledge to the world the lamentable fact, after long trial, and strict examination, have come out of the furnace, seared and scarred: disqualified and unworthy: many too, many have been "weighed in the balance and found wanting:" they only who hold out to the end, who in all situations, and in defiance of every temptation, prove themselves true and trusty: they alone catch the unquenchable element which animates the craft, and incites them to deeds of honor, and noble daring.

He who can faithfully represent that certain point, within the circle, embroidered by the parallels of Christianity, on whose vertex rests the volumes of inspiration and wherein are contained the commandments on which hang the law and the prophets, may well exclaim with the philosopher of Socrates, Ureka, I have found it; and it will require the sacrifice of a hectacomb to secure to him the benefits of the discovery.

I am aware that many persons, strangers to the inviolate principles which unites the craft, make the misconduct of some of our associates, a radical objection to the institution.

Without intending to enter into a labored strain of polemical disquisition with such fastidious cavilers, it may be answered, that even the inspired precepts of the Mediator have not been secure from abuse and profanation. When Moloch fell, his defection left no blemish, on the white throne where sits Supreme Majesty. Shall Religion, that sacred principle (without a reverence for which it is morally impossible to become a Mason) be neglected and rejected? Shall the house of, prayer and worship be avoided, because apostates and pretenders have for aken the glories of perfection, to wander in the mazes of infidelity? No; forbid it genius of masonry: forbid it every promise which keeps alive the hope set before us, and intimates to fallen man, the bright prospect of immortality and salvation.

However numerous, however flagrant may be the instances which furnish cause of regret for the aberrations of frail human nature, I boldly maintain, and I call upon every brother within the sound of my voice, to support the declaration, that whilst on the one hand, masonry has confirmed the wise determinations of the virtuous and the pious; and the other, our history, our records, and our tradition, abound with memorable instances, where a misguided fellow-mortal has been entirely reclaimed from the haunt of vice, and suddenly arrested from a course of self destroying depravity, after every suggestion of native pride or intuitive principle had failed.

Masonry is founded in the fitness of things, relative to men exclusively, which forbids the idea of subjecting female tenderness to the preparatory dispositions for initiation, and to the labors required to secure advancement. Besides, the implements of the craft are not adapted to the delicacy of the female hand.

The plan of the Diet has designed the fair for a different, and no less enchanting sphere in the wide range of intelligent existence. The advancement of female happiness, the protection of widows and orphans, the defence of "injured innocence," and "suffering virtue," peculiarly allotted to the hardier sex, and among none, more than masons, have these laudable objects been cherished with more devoted zeal, from time immemorial.

All that is lovely, all that is virtuous, all that is dignifying to the most charming, and amiable part of creation, is held by us in sacred reverence. Eden was a wilderness, its fragrance was wasted in the "sad solitude" of man's companionless hour, "till woman smiled. She is the glory of the man."

The mantle which surrounds the female character, is made of so delicate a texture, that even the breath of surmise will sullies its purity; and that secrecy, which gives value to our indispensable labors, would render it, in the eyes of a censorious world, obnoxious to the blasts of suspicion. Man is formed of coarser materials, and in a rougher mould; he is doomed to encounter dangers and difficulties; he is apt to become morose, vindictive, and inexorable: he needs all the influence of masonic discipline to soften the ruggedness of his nature; to quiet his angry passions, and to render him mild, tolerant, and humane. But how different the attributes of the last, and more perfect part of creation! Who that has seen the seraph form of beauty bending with fond anxiety over the cradle of sleeping innocence, and guarding with a mother's care its infant slumbers; who that has beheld the tender wife, soothing the sorrows, encouraging the hopes, and whispering comfort to the bosom of an afflicted husband; or the affectionate daughter supporting the tottering steps of declining age, and smoothing the pillow of sickness; who that has seen woman ever susceptible of generous emotions, dispensing blessings with "a hand open as day to melting charity;" who that has known her as the ministering angel of health, and in sickness, in weal, and in woe; who that has seen, and known, and felt all this would willingly subject her to vocations, appointed by Providence exclusively for masculine exertions? Among the foremost ranks of her guardians and protectors, will masons ever be found—they cannot be accessory to a violation of the laws of nature.

It would ill comport with the situation or duty of any reflecting craftsman, to attempt to cull the meretricious decorations of fancy, or to scatter the flowers of persuasion among those who are not masons, for the purpose of procuring an accession to the numbers of the fraternity! Masonry needs no resort to such means, to give it either strength or durability. We expect, nay we wish, no one to approach our mystical altar, who comes not spontaneously, to undergo the severe difficulties and dangers which beset and embarrass the most courageous candidate at every gradation. That there are difficulties and dangers, and those of the most unexpected and trying nature, a regard to truth will not allow us to deny. We who have surmounted some of them unhurt, may well exclaim, cold must be that bosom, which has not been warmed by the electrifying ordeal! and obdurate indeed must be that heart, which has not been softened by the trials and tribulations.

TALENT.—Homer was a beggar: Plautus turned a mill, Terence was a slave; Boetius died in Goal; Tasso was often distressed for five shillings; Cervantes died of hunger; Milton ended his life in obscurity; Bacon lived a life of meanness; Spenser died of want; Dryden lived in poverty and died of distress; Otway died of hunger; Lee in the streets; Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield was sold for a trifle to save him from prison; Fielding lies in the burying ground of an English Factory; Savage died in prison; Chatterton destroyed himself, and Keats died of a broken heart.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

THE LEECH FISHERY.

The country about La Brenne is, perhaps, the most uninteresting in France. The people are miserable looking, the cattle wretched, the fish just as bad; but the leeches are admirable.

If ever you pass through La Brenne, you will see a man, pale and straight haired, with a wollen cap on his head, and his legs and arms naked; he walks along the borders of a marsh among the spots left dry by the surrounding waters, but particularly wherever the vegetation seems to preserve the subjacent soil undisturbed: this man is a leech fisher. To see him from a distance, his woe-begone aspect, his hollow eyes, his lived lips, his singular gestures,—you would take him for a patient who had left his sick bed in a fit of delirium. If you observe him now and then raising his legs, and examining them one after the other, you might suppose him a fool; but he is an intelligent leech-fisher. The leeches attach themselves to his legs and feet as he moves among their haunts; he feels their presence from their bite, and gathers them as they cluster about the roots of the bulrushes and sea-weeds, or beneath the stones covered with green and grey moss. Some repose on the mud, while others swim about, but so slowly, that they are easily gathered. In a favorable season it is possible, in the course of three or four hours, to stow ten or twelve dozen of them in the little bag which the gatherer carries on his shoulder. Sometimes you will see the leech fisher armed with a kind of spear or harpoon: with this he deposits pieces of decayed animal matter in places frequented by the leeches: they soon gather round the prey; and are presently themselves gathered into a little vessel half full of water. Such is the leech fishery in spring.

In summer the leech retires into deeper water; and the fishers have then to strip themselves naked, and walk immersed up to the chin. Some of them have little rafts to go upon: these rafts are made of twigs and rushes, and it is no easy matter to propel them among the weeds and aquatic plants. At this season, too, the supply in the pools is scanty; the fisher can only take the few that swim within his reach, or those that get entangled in the structure of his raft.

It is a horrid trade, in whatever way it is carried on. The leech-gatherer is constantly more or less in the water: breathing fog and mist and fetid odours from the marsh, he is often attacked with ague, catarrhs, and rheumatism. Some indulge in strong liquors, to keep off the noxious influences, but they pay for it in the end by disorders of other kinds. But, with all its forbidding peculiarities, the leech-fishery gives employment to many hands; it is both pernicious, it is also lucrative. Besides supplying all the neighboring pharmacies, great quantities are exported, and there are regular traders engaged for the purpose. Henri Chartier is one of those persons, and an important personage he is when he comes to Meobecq, or its vicinity; his arrival makes quite a fete—all are eager to greet him.

Among the interesting particulars which I gathered in La Brenne relative to the leech trade, I may mention the following:—One of the traders—what with his own fishing and that of his children, and what with his acquisitions from the carriers, who sell quantities second-hand—was enabled to hoard up 17,500 leeches in the course of a few months; he kept them deposited in a place where, in one night, they all became frozen en masse. But the frost does not immediately kill them; they may generally be thawed into life again. They easily, indeed, bear very hard usage. I am told by one of the carriers, that he can pack them as closely as he pleases in the moist sack which he ties behind his saddle; and sometimes he stows his cloak and boots on the top of the sack. The trader buys his leeches pete-mêle, big and little, green and black—all the same; but he afterwards sorts them for the market. Those are generally accounted the best which are of a green ground, with yellow stripes along the body.—Medical Gazette.

FAROESE METHOD OF CATCHING SEA FOWL.

The most common mode of catching sea-fowl, in Faroe, is by letting a man down from the top of the cliffs by a rope. This is about three inches thick, from 600 to 1200 feet long, and is fastened to the waist and thighs by a broad woollen band, on which he sits. The fowler is let down by this over the perpendicular rocks, the rope being prevented from chafing by a piece of smooth wood on which it slides. The daring adventurer soon loses sight of his companions, and can only communicate with them by a small line attached to his body. It requires great skill to prevent the turning round of the cord, the inexperienced being wheeled about in a circle, and thus exposed to great danger. When he reaches the terraces, often not more than a foot broad, he frees himself from the rope, fastens it to a stone, and commences his pursuit of the feathery natives. Where the nests are in the hollow of the rock, the bird-catcher gives himself a swinging motion, by means of his pole, till the vibration carries him so close that he can get footing on the cliff. He can communicate a motion to himself of thirty or forty feet; but, when the shelf lies deeper, another rope is let down to his associates in the boat, who can thus give him a swing of 100 or 120 feet. When the labor is over, the man is drawn up by his companions.—Where the rocks are less elevated one person can fasten a line to the top and let himself down alone. This occupation is attended with many dangers. The greatest care cannot prevent the rope from sometimes breaking; a stone detached from the cliffs falls on the unfortunate fowler, or, in swinging himself, he misses his footing and is dashed against the rock. When landed on the terrace new dangers await him—he may lose his balance and fall into the sea, or the projection on which he rests may itself give way. The number of fowls, however, caught in this manner, is sufficient to induce the hardy natives to risk their lives.—Edinburgh Library.

REVOLUTIONARY ANECDOTE.

A story is told of a sergeant who travelled through the woods of New Hampshire, on his way to the American army, which well shows the character of the Indians. He had twelve men with him; their route was far from any settlement, and they were obliged every night to camp in the woods. The sergeant had seen a good deal of the Indians, and understood them well. Early in the afternoon, one day, as they were marching on, over bogs, swamps, and brooks, under the great maple trees, a body of Indians, more than their own numbers, rushed out upon a hill in front of them.

They appeared to be pleased at meeting with the sergeant and his men. They considered them their best friends. For themselves, they had taken up the hatchet for the Americans, and would scalp and strip those rascally English for them like so many wild cats.

"How do you do, pro?" (meaning brother) said one, and "How do you do?" said another; and so they went about shaking hands with the sergeant and his twelve men.

They went off at last; and the sergeant having marched a mile or two, halted his men, and addressed them thus: "My brave fellows, we must use all possible caution, or before morning we shall all be dead men. You are amazed, but depend upon me, these Indians have tried to lull suspicion. You will see more by and by."

They concluded finally to adopt the following scheme for defence. They encamped for the night near a stream of water, which protected them from behind. A large oak was felled, and a brilliant fire kindled. Each man cut a log of wood about the size of his body, rolled it up nicely in his blanket, put his hat on the end of it, and laid it before the fire, that the enemy might take it for a man.

Thirteen logs were fitted out in this manner, representing the sergeant and his twelve men. They then placed themselves, with loaded guns, behind the fallen tree. By this time it was dark, but the fire was kept burning till midnight. The sergeant knew that if they ever came, they would come now.

A tall Indian was seen through the glimmering of the fire, which was getting low. He moved towards them, skulking as an Indian always does. He seemed to suspect at first that a guard might be watching, but seeing none, he came forward more, rested on his toes and was seen to move his finger, as he counted the 13 men sleeping, as he supposed, by the fire. He counted them again, and retired. Another came up and did.

the same. Then the whole sixteen in number came up and glared silently at the logs, till they seemed satisfied that they were fast asleep. Presently they took aim, fired the whole number of guns upon the logs, yelled the war-whoop, and rushed forward to murder and scalp their supposed victims. They were fired upon by the sergeant and his party, and not one of the Indians was left to tell the story of that night. The sergeant and his party reached the army in safety.

CAN SHE SPIN?

This question was asked by King James 1st, when a young girl was presented to him, and the person who introduced her boasted of her proficiency in the ancient languages. "I can assure your Majesty," said he, "that she can both speak and write Latin, Greek and Hebrew." These are rare attainments for a damsel," said James, "but pray tell me, can she spin?"

Many of the young ladies of the present day, can boast of their skill in the fine arts and polite accomplishments in music, painting, dancing, but can they spin? or what is more appropriate to the times and the modern improvements in labor-saving machinery, it may be asked, can they perform the domestic duties of a wife? do they understand the management of household affairs? Are they capable of superintending in a judicious, prudent, and economical manner, the concerns of a family?

A young lady may be learned in the ancient and modern languages, may have made the extraordinary proficiency in every branch of literature; this is all very well, and very creditable, and to a certain class of the community, who are not obliged, as was St. Paul, "to labor with their own hands," is all that is absolutely requisite, but to a much larger portion of the community, it is of far greater consequence to know whether they can spin?

It is of more importance to a young mechanic, or a merchant, or one of any other class of people who depend upon their own industry and exertions, if he marries a wife, to have one who knows how to spin or perform other domestic duties, than one whose knowledge does not extend beyond a proficiency in literature and the fine arts.

It has often been said that the times are strangely altered; and certain it is that the people are. It was once thought honorable to be constantly employed in some useful avocation; but now-a-days it is thought more honorable to be idle. People complain of the high prices of the necessities of life, and with much truth. But if the amount of idleness could be calculated accurately throughout the community, allowing the drones half price for their services, which they might perform, and which others are paid for, it might be a safe calculation to estimate it equal to all that is expended for provision and marketing in the United States. So it is not a little inconsistent to hear parents complain about the price of provision, while they bring up their daughters to walk the streets and expend money.

Let the fair daughters of our country imitate the industrious matrons of the past. The companions of those who fought our Revolution were inured to hardships, and accustomed to necessary toil, and thus did they educate their daughters. Health, contentment, and plenty smiled around the family altar. The damsel who understood most thoroughly and economically the management of domestic affairs, and was not afraid to put her hands into the washtub, or to "lay hold of the distaff," for fear of destroying their elasticity, and dimming their snowy whiteness, was sought by the young men of those days as a fit companion for life, but in modern times to learn the mysteries of the household would make our fair ones faint away; and to labor comes not into the code of modern gentility.

Industry and frugality will lead to cheerfulness and contentment, and a contented wife tends greatly to soften the asperities and smoothen the rough paths in a man's journey through life. It has been truly said, a pleasant and cheerful wife is a rainbow in the sky, when the husband's mind is tossed with storms and tempests; but a dissatisfied and fretful wife, in the hour of trouble, is like a thunder cloud, charged with electric fluid.

The Newspaper Press.—"Saturday night," writes Captain Marryatt, in his new work, Olla Podrida, (and we could tell him that this is a very frequent exception,) "appears to be the only night on which those connected with these immense undertakings can be said to have any repose from year's end to year's end. What a life of toil! What an unnatural life must theirs be who thus cater, during the hours of darkness for the information and amusement of the mass who have slept soundly through the night, and rise to be instructed by the labor of their vigils! It can be effected in no other country in the world. It is another link in the great chain of misery which proves the greatness of England. The editors of these papers must have a most onerous task. It is not the writing of the article itself, but the obligation to write that article every day, whether inclined or not, in sickness or in health, in affliction or distress of mind, winter and summer, year after year, tied down to one task, remaining in one spot. It is something like walking a thousand miles in a thousand hours."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—The population of New Hampshire falls somewhat short of 300,000 inhabitants; and a more persevering, thrifty, intellectual and moral community—a more brave, hardy, industrious people, remarkable for their fidelity, and their zealous attachment to the liberties of their country, is not to be found in the world. There is a primitive simplicity of manners, an open and unaffected frankness, and an invincible spirit of freedom, which I never have found in any other State in the Union. It is remarkable that the countries the least fertile are the most beloved by their inhabitants. An Italian or a Spaniard may be contented in exile, but a Swiss peasant, or a New Hampshire farmer, never; and altho' the young men often leave the State after they arrive at their majority, yet when they have acquired a competence, neither the luxuries of the cities, nor the rich prairies of the West can content them, while away from their sublime but unproductive mountains.—Knickerbocker for April.

VERY POINTED.—The following is from an exchange paper.—"I wonder how any body can eat his breakfast before reading a newspaper," said an old borrower of this article. "I wonder how any one can eat his breakfast after reading a borrowed paper," said his more conscientious wife.

The man who attends promptly to his own business, will never have to rely upon that of other people for support.

CHARACTER.

THE WAITER.

He attributes all virtues to every body, provided they are civil and liberal; and of the existence of some vices he has no notion. Gluttony, for instance, with him, is not only inconceivable, but looks very like a virtue. He sees in it only so many more "beefs," and a generous scorn of the bill. As to wine, or almost any other liquor, it is out of your power to astonish him with the quantity you call for. His "Yes, Sir," is as swift, indifferent, and official at the fifth bottle as at the first. Reform and other public events he looks upon purely as things in the newspaper as a thing taken in at taverns, for gentlemen to read. His own reading is confined to "Accidents and Offences," and the advertisements of Butlers, which latter he pursues with an admiring fear, not choosing to give up "a certainty." When young, he was always in a hurry, and exasperated his mistress by running against the other waiters, and breaking the "neguses." As he gets older, he learns to unite swiftness with caution; declines wasting his breath in immediate answers to calls; and knows, with a slight turn of his face, and elevation of voice, into what precise corner of the room to pitch his "Coming sir." If you told him that, in Shakspeare's time, waiters said "Aoon, aoon, sir," he would be astonished at the repetition of the same word in one answer, and at the use of three words instead of two; and he would justly infer that London could not have been so large, nor the chop-houses so busy in those days. He would drop one of the two syllables of his "Yes, Sir," if he could; but business and civility will not allow it; and therefore he does what he can by running them together in the swift sufficiency of his "Yezzir." "Thomas!" "Yezzir." "Is my steak coming?" "Yezzir." And a pint of port? "Yezzir." "You'll not forget the post-man." "Yezzir." For in the habit of his acquiescence Thomas not seldom says, "Yes, Sir," for "No, Sir," the habit itself rendering him intelligible.—Leigh Hunt.

THE ITALIAN PEASANTRY.—"The temper of the lower Italians, their customs, and their morality, present, even in the same persons, contradictions of the most curious kind. The impression which the hasty traveller receives is almost unavoidably unfavorable. In visiting the northern lakes, he is surrounded by as mercenary a race as those who inhabit the other show countries of Europe. From Lombardy to Calabria, if he travels with a display of wealth, he is passed from hand to hand through a series of postmasters, postboys, couriers, innkeepers, shopkeepers, and valets-de-place, who successively try which can cheat him most. Inclination or curiosity may unfortunately lead him into those scenes of deauchery, which, in Italy, are nowhere glaring except at Naples; and if, on his way to the luxurious city, he happens to be robbed in the Pontine marshes, his experience of low life is completed. And yet his harsh opinion of the people would be utterly unjust. If he were to reside long among them, and mix familiarly with the laboring classes, either in the country or in town, allowing their character room to develop itself, he would be not unlikely to commit injustice in the opposite way. That class of men who revenge their nation on foreigners, by universal though petty spoliation, will not indeed improve much on further acquaintance (although even their cheating is oddly limited by a few traditional rules;) and the general character can scarcely be estimated fairly in any districts much frequented by travellers.—But the observer will discover honesty and purity even in the towns; in the country he will have difficulty in detecting any thing else; and every where, when he has contrived to step within the line of separation, he will be met with a warmth of heart, as originality and independence of character, a picturesqueness of ideas, and in several provinces a marked fertility of wit, which will inspire him with true affection for the fallen nation, and make it no easy task for him to represent their faults clearly, either to himself or others.—Edinburgh Cabinet Library.

IRONICAL RULES FOR GOOD BREEDING.

If you walk in State-street, or any other public place with a superior, always observe to take the upper hand yourself; and if three or more be in company, be sure to place yourself in the middle.

If two companies be passing each other, it is a proof you are acquainted with the principles of politeness, when you look over the shoulder of your friend with a fashionable grin, lisping out at the same times, a fine woman; or, a queer quiz, egad.

In walking, to keep up a conversation with yourself has a fine effect, particularly if you accompany it with extravagant gestures. If you are too well dressed for a poet or an actor, you will probably be taken for a member of congress.

It is very becoming to run along the street, like a little shop-keeper to a ready-money customer, or a dancing-master on a new pupil. It also looks very well to stop and loiter at every object you pass, like a printer's errand-boy, who is sent with a proof-sheet to an impatient author.

I would particularly recommend to all dashing young men to assume a contemptuous look, if an old acquaintance in adversity should pass, especially if he is a little shabby in his appearance: this shows humanity, generosity, good sense, and discrimination.

To gape into a dining-room, or parlor, where a company is assembled, as you pass along the streets, is presumptive evidence of your politeness.

If you meet a fine woman, instantly turn your eye-glass full in her face. The reason is obvious. If modest, you will throw her into the utmost confusion, which heightens her charms.

THE LEGENDARY.

From the "Black-Booker."

MARY HART.

The following narrative was derived from an officer of General Wellborn's corps, who was in battle with the Creek Indians, as below narrated, and an eye-witness of the remarkable events here recorded. The whole affords but another proof, that truth is indeed often stranger than fiction:

The Creek war of 1836-7 was a most barbarous one and continued nearly two years. The Creek population comprehended in the treaty for emigration westward, was twenty-two thousand souls, about two thousand of whom, warriors, broke the treaty, and commenced hostilities in May, 1836, by an attack on the town of Roanoke, in the night, butchering its inhabitants, putting them to flight, and pillaging and setting fire to their habitations. The terrors of an affrighted population, once exposed to Indian barbarities, can hardly be conceived. Rumor follows quick upon the heels of rumor; yet no story can exceed the horrors of Indian warfare, as it is impossible for language adequately to depict its realities. It is stated of a man in flight with his family from a supposed pursuit of Indians in this war, that having got fresh intelligence of alarm by the less hasty flight of others who had overtaken him, he took up his boy from behind his wagon, tossed him in, and ran forward to whip up his team, when lo! at the place of stopping, he found that the violence of his action to save his son, had killed him by breaking his neck!

When General Jessup had reported the Creek war at an end, and drawn off his troops into Florida to act against the Seminoles, contrary to the remonstrances of the inhabitants of Alabama—who assured him that the Indians were not at all subdued, but that some hundreds were still lurking in their hiding places—the war broke out afresh, with increased barbarity; and the Governor of Alabama, the Hon. Clement C. Clay, now Senator in Congress, was forced to act with great vigor in mustering fresh troops for the exigency, by enlisting the citizens of the state into the service of the United States. Gen. William Wellborn received the command, and acquitted himself with great valor and honor, to the end of the war.

Some time in the winter of 1836-7, Gen. Wellborn heard of an encampment of Indians on the banks of Pee River, near its confluence with Pee Creek, between the Forks. With a company of two hundred and ten mounted men, he set off in search of the foe. Having discovered and reconnoitred their position, from the west bank of the Pee, without being observed he left one hundred and twenty of his troops on the higher grounds, about half a mile from the river, at a point by which the Indians must retreat, if dislodged, with instructions to cut them off whenever they should be driven in upon them. With the remainder, ninety men, he descended the river a few miles, and crossed on a bridge below the confluence of the two streams, with a view to come round and attack the Indians by surprise. Having made his way across Pee Creek, he found the access greatly impeded by low and wet grounds, it being a time of high water, and several lagoons or channels, running from one river to the other, and at this time flooded: cane-brakes and palmetto thickets were to be broken through, and various obstacles, peculiar to that wild retreat, interposed. Nevertheless, the bravery and determination of the troops surmounted all impediments, and they arrived at last on the bank of a lagoon, on the other side of which was the Indian encampment, themselves screened from observation by a grove of palmettos and favorable grounds.

At this moment a firing was heard in the direction of the place where the one hundred and twenty troops had been left, and it was manifest, as none but women and children were to be seen on the opposite bank of the lagoon, that the Indians had discovered the whites on the west side of the Pee, and had themselves become the assailants. This was the more painful to observe, that the firing grew rapidly more distant, an indication that the Indians were victorious and in pursuit.

Gen. Wellborn instantly conceived the project, as retreat was impossible, of placing his men in line as near the bank of the lagoon as he could, for a desperate onset on the return of the Indians; and having given his orders, he retired to an eminence about a quarter of a mile, and showed himself to the women, who instantly raised the cry of "Esta-Hadka! Esta-Hadka!" "White man! White man!" pointing to Gen. Wellborn, on the distant eminence. This alarm was rapidly conveyed by runners to the Indians now engaged on the other side of the Pee, and as soon as possible, some three hundred warriors or more came rushing back, flushed with victory, and full of vengeance.—They seemed to know that they had routed the largest body of their opponents, and were eager to find the remainder. It was a critical moment when they stood upon the open ground, within gun-shot of Gen. Wellborn's men, on the other bank of the lagoon, demanding of the women where they had seen the white man. The Indians knew that the lagoon was fordable, but their opponents did not. At the moment they were about to rush in, and at a given signal, a well-directed fire was poured in upon them from the whole line, and they fell back, with a shout of terror and discomfiture, into a pine wood, about forty rods distant, leaving many of their number dead upon the field.

It was evident that the fire told well, but no less certain, that the foe would soon rally, and return with a confidence of victory. They knew there was no escape for the white man, and that they had driven from the field his strongest force. Violent speeches of the chiefs and warriors were heard, and understood. In about forty minutes, a hideous yell of onset rang thro' the forest, and the entire array of the Indian force leaped upon the bank of the lagoon, to cross and drive their assailants by closer fight. At that moment they received a second time the whole fire of Gen. Wellborn's men from behind the palmettos, halted, staggered, and again fell back into the woods, leaving the ground strewn with their slain. Again the rallying speeches were heard, and Gen. Wellborn saw that he and his men must transfer the action to the other bank or perish before a superior force. Believing, from the demonstrations of the Indians, that the lagoon was fordable, he ordered two men, at different points, to make the attempt and if they succeeded the whole corps were to plunge in, form upon the opposite bank, and rush upon the foe.

It was but the work of a moment, and every man was in line. The conflict was desperate and bloody. Women fought and fell with men. A single white man encountered a warrior and two of his wives, all three of whom were laid dead at his feet, by a necessity which he could not avoid, in self-preservation. The Indians fled across a bridge of trees which they had thrown over the Pee, fighting and falling in their retreat; and all that could, were soon out of the battle leaving behind them camp and spoils, the wounded, the dying, and the dead. Seventy-three warriors, averaging six feet and two inches in height, were counted among the slain.

An old chief, Apothlo-Oholo, who afterward escaped in the night, being entirely disabled by the shot he had received in various parts of his body, fell into the river, as he was attempting to cross the bridge of trees. He clung to the branches, and buried himself entirely under water, while the victors were crossing and re-crossing, during and after the action. He lived to recover of his wounds, joined his party, and afterward made the following speech to Gen. Wellborn, at Conchatto-Mecco's Town, when about to emigrate with his people:

"You are a Great Chief. I have fought as long as I could. You have beaten me. You have killed and taken nearly all my people. I am now ready to go: the farther from you the better. We cannot be friends. I thank you for taking care of my women, children, and wounded warriors, and for sending them back to me. You are a Great Chief."

In the sleeve of the coat of Apothlo-Oholo, after the battle, were found twenty-eight hundred dollars, in gold; and many spoils that had been taken from murdered white families, or pillaged from their deserted houses, were recovered. A roll of bank notes was also found. Most of the Indian ponies were left behind, and the whole of the next day was consumed in making arrangements for a vigorous pursuit of the routed Indians. Nine of the ninety engaged in this attack were killed. The carcasses of the Indians, we are sorry to learn, were left without burial. The exasperated feelings of the troops, themselves citizens of a commonwealth doomed to the horrible atrocities of an Indian war, with their families exposed, many of whom had already suffered, must stand as an apology for not paying to a fallen enemy the usual respect of civilized warfare. It was a scene of carnage, left to the face of the sun, and to the eyes of the stars.

On the morning of the third day, a pursuit of the retreating foe was ordered, the trail of which led them down the Pee, to the plantations of two brothers, Josiah and Robert Hart, about forty miles below the battle-ground above described. As they approached these settlements, it needed no prophet's ken to anticipate the fate of these unhappy families. The Indians, still counting scarcely less than two hundred warriors, came upon them the second night.

Josiah Hart had a wife, a son, and two daughters, the youngest of whom, Mary, was nine years of age. The family of Robert Hart, living about a mile from his brother, consisted of himself, two sons, a married daughter, and son-in-law. The log cabin of Robert, as is usual in that country, was built in two separate parts, with an open space or court between, over which the roof of the building extended, the door of each part being in the middle of this court, opposite to each other. Aware of the dangers to which he was exposed, Mr. Hart had "chinked" the logs, before open and admitting of being fired through by the musketry or rifles of an enemy, leaving here and there a port-hole, through which the tenants might be able to repulse assailants. He was also provided with nine pieces of fire-arms, rifles, double-barrel and others kept constantly charged, and ready for a sudden emergency. In one of these buildings, the whole family slept by their arms and ammunitions, while the watch-dog kept his post without.

At the mid-hour of this fatal night, they were suddenly awakened by the earnest barking of the dog, and the simultaneous yells of the Indians. The dog was soon silenced by the rifles of the savages; and the subsequent stillness without, except when interrupted by the occasional light tread or sudden bound of the wily foe around the house, reconnoitring, in preparation for the execution of his purpose, was fearful. Having failed in their usual stratagem of driving out the tenants of the house in affright, by the yells of their onset, in an opposite direction, where they would be sure to fall into the hands of a party in ambush, they sought opportunity to make an attack through the crevices of the logs which composed the walls of the building. Not succeeding in this, for the reason before mentioned, and not venturing yet to enter the court, for fear of a fire from within, which had not yet opened upon them, their next device was, to kindle a fire under the side of the dwelling, by which, if successful they were sure of their prey. This, however, they could not well do in the dark, without becoming marks for an unseen hand. Accordingly, the first attempt proved fatal to those engaged in it, and two or three Indians fell before the sure aim of the rifle from within the walls. Hour after hour, in painful suspense, passed away, with now and then a shot from either party, to little or no purpose, except that a chance ball from an Indian rifle found its way between the logs, and wounded Mr. Hart's daughter in the arm. Not daring to strike a light, they endeavored, as well as they could, to bind it up, and to staunch the blood. At length a lurid light cast upon the clouds discovered to Mr. Hart that his brother's house was in flames, and a yell of triumph broke from the horde of savages by whom he and his children were environed, secure, though less successful hitherto, in accomplishing the same object. The flames rose higher, and threw upon this besieged habitation a flood of light, that compelled the besiegers to retire behind the out-houses for protection, as they would otherwise be exposed to the fire of Mr. Hart and his sons.

Day dawned at last, and a desultory fire was commenced, as chance invited, and as an Indian head was exposed to view. Several of the Indians fell. Exasperated by these failures, they resolved to set the house on fire at any hazard. They collected combustibles, chose their position, and rushed with fire and kindling wood under the stick chimney of the house, where, as it happened, the rifles from within could not be brought to bear. The smoke was soon felt in the house, and not a moment was to be lost. Despair finds weapons; and by the concert of an instant, a bold device was projected, to strike through the frail chimney-back on the heads of the Indians, and by a sudden sortie drive them from the field, to purchase to themselves an opportunity of escape to the Fort, about seven miles distant. It was done. Three or four Indians were killed, and the rest fled. In some two hours after, Mr. Hart and his children were all safely lodged in the Fort, having left their house to pillage and flames, to which it was doomed in the course of that morning, so soon as the Indians had mustered a stronger force, and returned to renew the attack.—Plunder was all they had to enjoy.

About thirty-six hours after the Indians had quitted the plantation of the Hart, which they had left a scene of ruin and of carnage, and descended the river, little dreaming of being pursued by the party whose power they had felt two days before, Gen. Wellborn and his men came in sight of the smoking ruins of Josiah Hart's habitation and out-houses. Not a living creature moved before their eyes, and every aspect was that of desolation. From a party in the advance, so soon as they approached the ruins, a cry of horror and vengeance arose, which broke the awful silence of the place; and each one as he came near, was petrified at the spectacle which was presented. In a yard, a few rods from the house, lay the mangled and naked bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Hart, their son, and eldest daughter; and a little removed from them, the body of Mary, also naked, with her skull apparently broken, in by a pine-knot, which lay by her side, covered with scattered hair and blood. She was lying upon her side, her person stabbed in several places, from head to foot; and the blood of each wound extending in unbroken conglomeration to the ground, which had drunk the crimson streams. The sight of Mary was not so fearful as that of the rest of the family, though sufficiently shocking. It was evident, that she had never struggled or moved, from the moment she was left in that position, thirty six hours before. Save her wounds, her appearance was that of an innocent, marble repose.

The mutilated and mangled condition of the other members of the family was too horrible to be recorded. Mr Hart had been pierced with many balls; Mrs. Hart with less; each had been shot; and all were covered and disfigured with ghastly wounds. The spectacle filled the men with absolute madness. They raved, stamped, ran to and fro, struck the trees and stones with their clenched hands, until the blood followed from their blows, without seeming to feel the wounds they inflicted on themselves; and they cried, "Vengeance! Vengeance! Vengeance!" till all the region rang with it, and loud enough to awake the sleeping dead.

And it did awake the dead! Surrounded at this moment by a throng of exasperated beholders, who were looking upon her innocent countenance, and raising these fearful cries, but not having yet presumed to touch this relic of mortality, little Mary Hart opened her eyes, turned up her face, and said, audibly and distinctly, "How they did beat us!" and then closed her eyes, and turned back, clasped again in the same silent and death-like repose! The moment was awful, and the feeling of the spectators entirely changed. The innocent victim was carefully approached, tenderly lifted up, her wounds bathed, and the proper surgical applications attached. On examination, it was found that life was not extinct; but she was so literally drained of her blood, that no symptom of reviving animation could be awakened. Wrapped in a blanket, she was carried on horseback in the arms of General Wellborn to the Fort, with little more sign of life than when first taken from the ground, and was committed to the charge of her uncle and his family, whose escape has already been narrated.

The troops started off in hot pursuit of the flying foe, and after two days' march overtook them in Florida. Thirty-nine of them were slain in the engagement that ensued; many prisoners were taken, with the booty from the pillaged houses of the Harts; and the rest took flight to the town of Conchatto-Mecco, where they surrendered for emigration, and the Creek war was ended.

Mary Hart, by means of tender nursing, and the restoring powers of nature gradually recovered. The indenture in the skull proved not to be a fracture, and she is now supposed to be as well as if the massacre had never happened. She is at this time twelve or thirteen years of age, and sole heiress to a great estate.

THE GATHERER.

THE KING'S SPEECH.

It was formerly the custom in London to print the King's speech on a letter sheet upon which was endorsed "King's Speech." Certain printers, to be up to competition, just before the opening of Parliament, procured a large quantity of letter paper, printed the usual endorsement and laid it by, ready for the speech to be clapped on the inside. For some reason, his Majesty on that occasion, gave no speech at all. Here was a waste of Bath Post, hot-pressed! But, to save themselves, the publishers caused the sheets to be folded in the usual way, with the usual label, ready to meet the eye of purchasers. A boy was despatched into the streets to sell them. No sooner did he rush along bellowing "King's Speech!" than all the passers by stopped and bought the precious document.—So eager were they to read it that not a soul thought of unfolding it, but hurried off home or to a coffee-house that he might peruse it at leisure. At last some person, who had just bought of the running boy, tho't he observed a sly twinkle in his eye; and not having heard of any speech from the throne, opened the paper to see what was in it. A blank met his view! A blank like that to which Dr. Franklin "every infant mind." "Hilloa! lad—stop; look there is nothing in this paper!" "Is't there!" replied the boy, increasing the rapidity of his movement, "well—the king said nothing."

CAPUCHIN INTERMENT.

A gentleman, who had resided many years abroad and particularly amongst the Italian Catholics, once described to me the manner in which the Capuchins inter the brethren of their order. These defunct freres are embalmed, arrayed in their peculiar habits, as when living; and in the vaults of their monastic churches or chapels, ranged upright in niches formed for this purpose. On certain days, particularly on the Feast of All Souls, the doors of these cemeteries are opened to the public, who, as a religious duty to flock in to view these singular and affecting relics of mortality. The bodies undergo but little alteration in appearance for centuries; but Mr. M. being tempted to touch the very long nose of one old fellow, who looked "a leathern Pharaoh, grinning in the dark," it disappeared in a shower of dust beneath his fingers.

THE BURNING OF A WORLD.

It is not a little remarkable that the predicted conflagration of the earth and circumstances attending as is foretold in the ancient scriptures are both natural and have a strict coincidence with scientific probability. None but the ignorant would conclude, that because the earth had whirled round the sun in safety for some thousands of years, that therefore, it must forever go on undisturbed. There are principles in the atmosphere which engirds the globe, of sufficient potency, if properly proportioned, to feed a combustion that would liquify the rocks and evaporate the seas.—The two gases which feed the intense flame of the compound blow pipe, are component parts of the air we breathe. Besides the combustibility of the atmosphere, the earth may have central fires that her mountain ribs may not be always able to imprison. Are not the ancient volcanoes the great arteries which lead down to this heart of fire?

It is computed by the French astronomers that more than fifteen hundred fixed stars have disappeared within three centuries past. La Place says that one of these stars situated in the northern hemisphere, gave the most indisputable evidence of having burned. It was so bright as to be visible to the naked eye at mid-day—"first of a dazzling white, then reddish yellow, and lastly of an ashy pale color." The conflagration lasted and was visible 16 months, when the star forever disappeared.—Free Trader.

PRAYERS.—In Placourt's History of Madagascar, is the following beautiful prayer, said to be used by the people whom we call savages:

"O Eternal, have mercy upon me, because I am passing away. O Infinite, because I am weak. O Sovereign of Life, because I draw nigh to the grave. O Omnipotent, because I am in darkness. O All Bounteous, because I am poor. O All Sufficient, because I am nothing."

A JUST REPLY.—"You charge me fifty sequins," said a Venetian nobleman to a sculptor, "for a bust that only costs you ten days labor." "You forgot," replied the artist, "that I have been thirty years learning to make that bust in ten days."

FROM THE ESSAY OF WILSON'S ESSAY.

DEATH OF BURNS.

On the near approach of death he returned to his own house in a spring-cart, and having left it at the foot of the street, he could just totter up to his door. The next day he was delirious, and the next day after too, though on being spoken to, he roused himself into collected and composed thought, and was, ever and anon, for a few minutes himself—Robert Burns. In his delirium, there was nothing to distress the listeners and the lookers on—words were heard that to them had no meaning—about incidents and events unnoticed in their happening, but now strangely cared for in their final repassing before the closed eyes, just ere the dissolution of a dream.

Nor did his death-bed want for affectionate and faithful service. The few who were privileged to tend it, did so tenderly and reverently—now by the side of the sick wife, and now by that of the dying husband. Maxwell, a kind physician, came often to gaze in sadness where no skill could relieve. Findlater, supervisor of excise, sat by his bedside the night before he died; and Jessie Lewars, daughter of a gauger, was his sick nurse. Had he been her own father, she could not have done her duty with a more perfect devotion of her whole filial heart. His children had been taken care of by friends, and were led in to be near him, now that his hour was come; and the great poet of the Scottish people, who had been born "in the auld clay biggin" on a stormy night, died in a humble tenement on a bright summer morning, among humble folk, who composed his body, and, according to custom, strewed around it flowers brought from their own gardens.

A BRAVE IRISHMAN.—An Irishman who was a soldier of the Revolution, was suddenly stopped near Boston by a party, during a dark night; a horseman's pistol was presented to his breast, and he was asked to which side he belonged. The supposition that it might be a British party, rendered his situation extremely critical. He replied, "I think it would be more in the way of civility, just to drop a hint which side you are pleased to favor." "No, (testily said the first speaker) declare your sentiments or die!" "Then I will not die with a lie in my mouth; American to extremity! Do your worst, you spalpeen." The officer replied, "We are your friends; and I rejoice to meet with a man so faithful to the cause of his country!"

RETORT.—Lord B. wore his whiskers very large. Curran meeting him, "Pray, my lord," said he, "when do you intend to reduce your whiskers to the peace establishment?" "When you, Mr. Curran," said his lordship, "put your tongue upon the civil list!"

A DESPERATE LOVER.—A despairing swain, in a fit of desperation, recently declared to his unrelenting lady-love, that it was his firm intention to drown himself, "or perish in the attempt."

A burst of Eloquence.—A down east orator, declaiming upon the power and grasping disposition of England, breaks forth as follows:—

"The youthful and sovereign Queen of England, now stands facing the South—with one foot upon the shore of Asia, and the other upon that of Western America; while the deep swelling Pacific rolls in its spherical form beneath, in the broad expanse. Bending forward, she is grasping with her right hand the tree soil of Eastern America—with her left, that of benighted Africa; shading with her form the great Atlantic—while she calmly surveys her hundred fleets upon the ocean-wave, and her own native England, with its thousand isles."

A drunken woman at Richmond, Va., a few nights since accidentally set fire to her bed, and burned herself to death.

New Plan of Courtship.—At a wedding recently celebrated, were present some twenty-five persons, all of them in a condition which, for various reasons, they generally concurred in regarding as undesirable—the “unengaged.” One of the gentlemen of the party suspected the prevalence among them of feelings that might easily be exchanged for others infinitely more fixed and agreeable. He accordingly proposed the choosing of a President, a person worthy of all confidence, whose duty it should be to receive from each individual a folded paper inscribed with the name of the person handing it in, and also with the another person of the other sex whom the first would be willing to marry. The President, in addition to the restraints of his own sense of honor, was to be put under a solemn pledge of eternal secrecy. All refusing to accede to the proposition were for the time to leave the room. Those whose choice was reciprocal—that is, whose papers contained the same two names—were to be privately informed; while the selections of the others were to remain undisclosed. The result was that the trial was made: all shared in the experiment, and eleven couple were found to have made themselves happy—and their several unions were afterwards consummated.

Anecdote.—A worthy old sea-captain of our acquaintance once took on board a large number of passengers at a port emerald isle, to bring to this country. On approaching our coast he as usual sounded, but found no bottom. “And did ye strike the ground, captain?” inquired one of the Irishmen. “No,” was the reply. “And will ye be so good as to tell us,” rejoined Pat, “how near ye came to it?”

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1841.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—We find ourselves unable to furnish any back numbers prior to No. 26.—the first six months, and we wish our Agents, on obtaining any new subscription to inform the subscriber of this fact. Any money sent to us, will be applied to this volume, and should there be any excess, it will be passed to the credit of the subscriptions of the next volume.

MONTGOMERY BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—Is the name of a society which has been recently added to the number of charitable institutions, in which the city of Albany is so prolific. Institutions which have for their object charity, and the promotion of social intercourse are eminently useful, and speak well for the virtues and intelligence of the people, who are instrumental in their organization and support. The Mechanics Benefit Society, is a happy illustration of this fact, that society has been productive of the most happy results, and is the medium through which much human misery is prevented.

THE PRESIDENT.—The prevailing opinion is, that this vessel is lost. If so, the probability is that we can only conjecture in what manner the sad disaster occurred. The president was a staunch vessel, and in all her rig, build, and engine, as perfect as the ingenuity of man was capable of. There is still a fulsome hope of her safety, which those who had friends on board of her, cling to, a few days will suffice to confirm their hopes or fears.

SUNDAY TRAVELLING.—We see that an effort is being made to make the Sabbath a day of rest indeed. Every philanthropist, will rejoice in the consummation of this event, a just observance of good order and morality requires it. The physical constitution of man, requires it; but it must be accomplished by the force of public opinion, anathemas and coercion will avail nothing, penal statutes and inflictions, will inevitably increase the evil, the public sense of propriety must be appealed to. Let the press take the matter properly in hand, and the desired end, will be speedily accomplished.

HUMBUG.—This “oft-quoted, oft repeated” term, though apparently unmeaning and absurd, is nevertheless very significant. We are not prepared to account satisfactorily for its origin, any more than for the origin of the thousand and one other singular and inexplicable terms, with which our language abounds. We suppose, however, that the individual who first uttered it, had reference to some humming insect; and therefore its application to certain extravagant absurdities of the present day, which, though creating considerable noise, are nevertheless deficient in strength and stability.

This is, emphatically, the age of humbug. We wish not to insinuate aught against the practicability of establishing a line of balloons between this country and Europe, as has been suggested—neither do we hint at the impossibility of propelling rail-road cars with the swiftness of thought, merely by substituting electricity in place of steam: (another sage suggestion;) but we wish, simply, to advert to individual humbugs—and these are numerous indeed. First in order comes the medical humbug—an illiterate quack announces to the world, that he has at length discovered the philosopher’s stone, whereby he is enabled to heal every disease incidental to the human system, simply by the use of his nostrums; and thousands are humbugged thereby. Then comes the theatrical humbug;—a fellow, conceiving himself possessed of all the necessary qualifications for the profession, struts his brief hour upon the stage; and is enthusiastically applauded by the enlightened and discerning pit. He is immediately set down as a great actor. A foreign female, of questionable reputation, but of undoubted grace and agility, visits our shores, in a few months amasses a large fortune, and returns to Europe, laden with substantial evidences of the gullibility of the Yankees. We might go on to show the literary, political, and innumerable other humbugs; but our limited space compels us to desist for the present.

COMMON SCHOOLS.—Scarcely a day passes, without some proposition is submitted to the Legislature for an alteration in some feature of our common school system. This is entirely wrong and attended with serious mischief. A matter of such paramount importance, should be instituted on the broadest scale of liberality, and should remain permanent, in its nature and action.

THE BRIDGE.—An abridged report of Mr. Enoch Strong’s bridge exterminator, and English language contortioner, is published in our daily papers. Enoch is terrifically tremendous in his opposition, and his eloquence passeth all human understanding. His speech should be preserved as a literary curiosity. The price of sturgeon has advanced materially since its delivery. Enoch must be put on a low diet, and take cooling purges, the homeo pathic system won’t do, large doses must be administered.

ANOTHER VICTIM.—We regret to learn from the Argus, that Mr. Conant of Saratoga, who was one of the sufferers on board the steamboat South America, died on Friday evening, April 30, at Cones’ Hotel in this city. Mr. C. was a worthy young man, aged 22, formerly of Schenectady. This is the second victim. There is also little hope of the recovery of Mr. Glen, of Schenectady, who is also under treatment at the same hotel.

EMIGRANTS TO TEXAS.—In the first quarter ending on the 31st March, 1841, there had arrived at Galveston, 506 white adults, 15 children, 109 slaves: total, 629.

THE WEATHER.—May is not always the season of “sunny skies and fragrant-smelling flowers.” We were visited, on the second instant, (Sunday) by a heavy fall of snow, which continued, with little intermission, until the following morning. As the poet says, this is “winter lingering in the lap of May.”

FALLEN.—Dr. John Loffland, extensively and favorably known as the “Milford Bard,” has been committed to the Baltimore alms-house as an object of charity. Many of our citizens no doubt remember that the first efforts of his muse, and which gave promise of great excellence, were given to the public thro’ the “Masonic Record” formerly published by Mr. E. B. Child, in this city.

☞ The Canal is now navigable, we believe thro’ out the whole line. Boats have arrived from Rochester.

A violent storm was experienced in Philadelphia on Sunday. Two or three houses were blown down, and several vessels were more or less injured. The storm was equally severe in Jersey.

THE NEW-YORK MECHANIC.—This is the title of an excellent weekly paper, devoted to the interests of the American mechanic. From what we have seen of it, we should judge it to be worthy of extensive patronage.

Printers are looked up to as the (*) of intelligence, as well as a ~ of social beings, who frequently put a (:) or a (.) to a writer’s production.—Cosmopolite.

They are a fine (—)ing set of fellows, never backward to lend a helping (☞) to a brother in distress; and though they frequently chase and lock up the forms of many an unhappy author, and are constantly armed with (†) and shooting stick, yet ‘tis their invariable rule to provide a comfortable bed, blankets and furniture, for the needy, in an incredible short space of time.—While we are composing this (¶) we may as well add, that they are subject to unfiled imposition—truly a hard case for so eminently pi-ous a class of citizens.

MC LEOD.—A New-York paper, of May the 6th, says:—In the court room this morning, McLeod seemed totally indifferent at what was going on, and appeared more anxious to ogle some ladies that were there, and pay attention to the fold of the ruffles of his shirt than any thing else.

THE TRUTH is the title of a new evening paper, published in New-York, by E. A. Theller, of patriot memory.

A man named Cheek was a short time since arrested in Cincinnati, on suspicion of firing a feed store on the canal. He must have a hard cheek to commit so rashly a deed to deprive horses of their feed.

WELLERISMS.—“We can’t pass,” as the brass half dollar said to Major Andre ven he vos caught.

“Let’s borrow your light a minute,” as the moon said to the sun.

“This is all downhill work,” as Lucifer said when he was falling from heaven.

“I turn and turn and find no ray,” as the blind organist said.

“I am ticklish there,” as the roast pig said when the fork went between his ribs.

“With all thy faults, I love thee still,” as the loafer said when he went into the distillery.

“I feel down at the heel,” as the old shoe said when a dandy could not get it on.

“I’ll wipe the stain from your reputation,” as the host said to the dandy when he expunged his score.

A novel mode of indulging grief.—A noble lady residing in Paris, leaving a singular example of attachment to the fallen dynasty of France. After the departure of Charles X. from Cheshbrough, she never quitted her apartment, which she had caused to be hung with black cloth, ornamented with tears and fleurs-de-lis of tin. The mournful arrangement was the same in every room, from the ante-chamber to the kitchen. All the furniture and utensils were painted black, and those that could not bear the brush were covered with black crape. It was not until the auction of the lady's effects, that her neighbors were enabled to ascertain the extent of her grief. Amongst the various objects that excited curiosity, was a cage containing a parrot, dressed in deep mourning!

Both Alike.—"You needn't feel so big," said a butcher's man to a young doctor, "for we are both of a trade. We are both paid for killing."

Wooden cakes beautifully frosted, mahogany doughnuts, cast-steel poundcakes, and smooth polished nigger babies, are advertised to be let for parties, at Bangor.

A country editor complains that ladies' bonnets are now made so small that they will hold but one face at a time.

A simile.—Impure people resemble streams, which deposit their mud only where they wind their way between resisting irregular banks.

A Great Pork-eater.—The Boston Mail says there is a man in that city who eats so much pork, that he squeals in his sleep.

He is the victim of animal magnetism.

"Father, what does bursting of hilers mean." "Blowing up folk's tea-kettles, my child."

A gentleman, without a nose was followed by an importunate old beggar woman, who wound up all her speeches, with Heaven preserve your eye sight!—Why so, good woman? said he. Because, sir, your honor has no place to hang a pair of spectacles on.

Intelligence.

Awful Occurrence.—A few nights since we learn twelve negroes belonging to the Rev. Wesley Adams, of Jefferson county, Florida, were burnt to death.—They were all in one building, and it is supposed were suffocated, and rendered insensible, as they gave no alarm, and when the doors were opened uttered not a groan. The building was entirely destroyed.

MITCHELL THE FORGER.—This worthy was pursued as far as Baltimore by two of the New York police. They lost track of him when they reached that city, yet one of them has followed on South, resolved not give over the chase until he comes up with the fugitive.—Ex. Paper

FIRE.—The Cotton Mill owned by Messrs James Rhodes & Sons, at Rhodenville, Thompson, (Conn.) was destroyed by fire on Wednesday night. The origin of the fire is not known.—St. Louis Gaz.

A monument to Richard Houghton, esq., late of the Boston Atlas, is to be erected at Mt. Auburn.

Ice and cold weather.—It is conjectured by many persons that the backwardness of the spring and the continued cold weather, may in a measure be attributed to the quantities of ice off the coast.—Ship masters crossing the Grand Banks represent the quantities as enormous, both in icebergs and sheet ice.

Sudden Death.—The N. Y. American of Tuesday says Mr. Charles Mowatt, formerly a merchant of that city, dropped dead in the street yesterday morning. He had, as was his custom, just drunk some Congress water at Mr. Dodd's apothecary shop, cor. of Broadway and Bleeker street, and was walking homeward, when death overtook him. He was aged 62 years.

Mysterious.—On Tuesday afternoon last, the entire skeleton of a human being was discovered by the workmen engaged in removing an old stable from the premises at present occupied by Dr. Mc Kaig, of this place. The frame, as we are informed, was complete and found stretched at its full length. It was immediately under the stable floor, with a slight covering of manure. The bones indicate a man of large size.—Ohio Pat.

Lamentable Accident.—We regret to record a distressing accident, which befel James W. Ford, Esq., Whig delegate elect of Stafford, and J. B. Ficklin, Esq., merchant of Falmouth, on Monday evening last. They were leaning against the railing of the bridge, between the abutment and the edge of the river, when the rail suddenly broke and they were precipitated backward upon a hard and rocky beach, from a height of about twenty-five feet. Mr. Ford had his thigh broken and was otherwise much injured. Mr. Ficklin had no limbs broken, but has sustained very severe injury.—Fredericksburg (Va.) Arena.

Accident and Loss of Life.—The steamer Victoria picked up a woman and child 25 miles above the mouth of Black River, after having floated on a snag nearly 5 hours. Her name is Mrs. Litterall, and it appears that a party of seven persons were coming down from Powhattan, when the canoe capsized, drowning 5 individuals, viz: a young man of the name of Pebert, a boy named J. Gray, a young woman and a little boy, and a baby of Mrs. Litterall. A subscription to the amount of $50 was promptly made for the latter on board the boat.—N. O. Bee.

In firing the cannon yesterday morning, at Alton, John Adams had one of his arms shot off, and otherwise badly injured. The firing continued, but another like catastrophe was the consequence. Wm. Sheets was the other victim. His right arm was shot off above the elbow—his left hand was also shot off.—St. Louis Republican, April 22.

Sudden Death.—On Wednesday of last week, the New Haven Palladium announces the marriage of Dr. D. Henry Ely—on the Monday following announced his death. This was indeed a short step from the bridal to the tomb.

Horrible Death. We learn by the Morgantown (Pa.) Republican, that a young man by the name of James Weerman, by imprudently trying to jump from one side of a machine to the other, in a rolling mill, on Cheat river, was caught between the rollers and drawn through in the twinkling of an eye, and mashed to a pulp.

Melancholy Accident.—Lieut. Wm. B. Lyne, of the U. S. Navy, while on duty on board the U. S. ship Pennsylvania, during the middle watch on Thursday night, fell from the fore-chains overboard and was drowned.

Lieut Lyne was an accomplished officer, and leaves a wife and child and numerous friends to lament his untimely fate.

Hydrophobia.—A freeman of color died last week of hydrophobia. It was reported that he had been killed but the testimony of Dr. Stone, who attended the deceased at his house in Calliope street, places the matter beyond a doubt that he died of that dreadful disease, having been bitten by a dog, about two months since.—N. Or. Bulletin.

Married.

On the 3d inst. in this city, by the Rev J Castle, Rev Seth Mathison, of Ovid, to Mrs Catherine E. Goodrich, of Newburgh.

Tuesday evening, by Rev Mr Hodge, Mr James Gilkerson, to Miss Elizabeth Ford, all of this city.

Monday evening, by Rev Mr Kelly, Mr Matthew Higgins, to Miss Mary Ann Maher, all of this city.

On Thursday evening last, by the Rev Mr Hodge, Mr Robert Taylor, to Miss Marion, daughter of James Hart, all of this city.

At Washington city, on Sunday afternoon, by the Rev. Mr. Hawley, Lieut. Montgomery C. Meigs, of the U. S. Engineer Corps, to Louisa, daughter of the late Com. John Rodgers.

At Hadley, Mass. on the 27th ult. by the Rev Gordon Dorance, Mr Milo R Eames, to Miss Eliza Ann, daughter of Deacon Ashley Williams, of the former place.

At New York, 30th ult. by the Rev T D Williams, Mr John G Treadwell of that city, to Miss Ellen T Holmes, formerly of New London, Conn.

In Hartford, 27th inst. by Rev Dr Hawes, Rev Prof Jackson, of Washington College, to Emily, eldest daughter of his Excellency Wm W Ellsworth.

DIED.

In this city, on Thursday, after a long illness, Mrs. Rhoda Barker, wife of Charles Barker.

In N. Blenheim, Schoharie co., on the 25th ult., Mrs. Martha Hilton, wife of Wm. P. Hilton, and daughter of the late John Vernor, of this city.

At his residence in Schodack, Saturday, 1st instant, Mr John Link, aged 45.

Saturday 1st inst. Simon Glen, aged 68.

On Tuesday last, at Cummington, Mass. of consumption, Mary Emerson, wife of Rev R Reed, and sister of Wm B Emerson of this city, aged 28.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to be buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved Diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscript will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

POETRY.

INTEMPERANCE.

A sound of woe salutes my ear—
Fell misery meets my eye;
I see the lonely widow's tear,
I hear the orphan's sigh;
And houseless children, shivering, stand,
With brows of haggard grief—
With hunger'd look, and outstretch'd hand,
Sue humbly for relief.

O what, with pestilential breath,
Sweeps thousands to their doom—
(Dread cause of foul disease and death.)
Into an early tomb?
Intemperance! whose fiery waves
Engulf its victims there,
And sink, into its yawning graves,
The old, the young, the fair!

O drink not of the fatal draught,
Avoid the poison'd bowl,
Or soon will keenest sorrow's shaft
Pierce to thy very soul!—
And wretchedness, and dark despair
Shall then thy frame consume—
O be it even then thy care
To shun the drunkard's doom!

LINES.

I love to see upon the ground
The snow-flakes gather fast,
And listen to the solemn sound
Of winter's piercing blast;
There's music in it, sad and drear,
That soothes my lonely breast,
As, faintly murmuring in my ear,
It lulls me to my rest.

I love to listen to the roar
Of mighty-ocean wild,
And see, along the pebbled shore,
Its dashing surges piled;
And when dark storms brood o'er the sky,
How grand—sublime the sight,
To see its waves rise mountain high,
And revel in their might!

THERE'S A STAR IN THE WEST.

There's a star in the West that shall never go down
Till the records of valor decay;
We must worship its light, though it is not our own,
For liberty bursts in its ray;
Shall the name of a Washington ever be heard
By a freeman, and thrill not his breast?
Is there one out of bondage, that hails not the word
As the Bethlehem star of the West?

"War, war to the knife, be enthral'd or ye die!"
Was the echo that woke in his land;
But it was not his voice that promoted the cry,
Nor his madness that kindled the brand;
He raised not his arm—he defied not his foes,
While a leaf of the olive remained;
Till, goaded with insult, his spirit arose
Like a long baited lion unchained.

He struck with firm courage the blow of the brave,
But sigh'd o'er the carnage that spread;
He indignantly trampled the yoke of the slave,
But wept for the thousands that bled.
Tho' he threw back the fetters, and headed the strife,
Till man's charter was fairly restored,
Yet he prayed for the moment when freedom and life
Would no longer be pressed by the sword.

O his laurels were pure, and his patriot name
In the page of the future shall dwell,
And be seen in all annals, and foremost in fame,
By the side of a Hofer and Tell.
Revere not my song, for the wise and the good
Among Britons have nobly confessed,
That his was the glory, and ours was the blood
Of the deeply stained field of the West.

HOME VISIT.

The morning breaks—I stand once more
Upon my own, my native hills;
I raise the prayer, and kiss the soil,
For grateful thought my bosom fills.
Year after year I've roamed abroad,
And sought the wealth of other lands;
Once, home returning, tempest toss'd,
Was dashed on Afric's desert sands.

On other shores—in foreign climes,
How oft I've had my thoughts fixed here;
But now I find they all were dreams
Of what on earth can ne'er appear.
The sky is clear, the trees are green,
And birds sing cheerily around,
As they were wont in former years,
Ere I was tempted from their sound.

The house, the hill, the purling stream,
Are all the same they were before;
But hearts, and feelings, all are changed
From what they never can be more.
Here stands the beech tree, which of yore,
In childhood's hour we sported near,
Ere care had drawn the slightest trace
Across this brow, which now is sore.

'Twas here my mother kiss'd my cheek,
And bade me to the school repair;
At eve, returned—my sisters dear,
With flowrets twined my sunny hair;
And here's the pool, where Ponto oft
Has plunged to bring the useless chip;
And there, the ivy'd bank so dear,
From whence we launch'd our tiny ship.

And this, the church-yard—ah, how sad
To tell the names now gathered here—
Companions—one by one they sped—
Day after day, year after year.
My thoughts by day, my dreams by night,
Have been to rest my troubles here.
But time has sadly changed the hearts,
That once were to this bosom dear.

No! I'll depart, nor seek again
The cold and heartless friends at home;
In other climes, o'er summer seas,
With kindred souls, I'll freely roam.
Then home, farewell—to-morrow's sun
Shall light me on my distant way;
Nor longing wish, nor dreams again,
Of thee, shall through this bosom stray.

MY COUNTRY.

I love my country's pine-clad hills,
Her thousand gushing rills,
Her sunshine and her storms,
Her rough and rugged rocks that rear
Their hoary heads high in the air,
In wild fantastic forms.

I love her rivers, deep and wide,
Those bright streams that seaward glide
To seek the ocean's breast;
Her smiling fields, her pleasant vales,
Her shady dells, her pleasant dales,
The haunts of peaceful rest.

I love the forest dark and lone,
For there the wild bird's merry tone
Is heard from morn till night;
And there are lovelier flowers, I ween,
Than e'er in eastern lands were seen,
In varied colors bright.

Her forests and her vallies fair,
Her flowers that scent the morning air,
Have all their charms for me;
But more I love my country's name,
Those words that echo deathless fame,
"THE LAND OF LIBERTY."

THE GRAVE.

'Tis but a home where all must rest,
Change which to all must come;
A certain, which o'er all must spread
Its deep unfathomed gloom!

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY
NIGHT LINE.—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive arrangements have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Ulrica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptability to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock. mr. 12

MASONIC APRONS of the Degree of Master and Royal Arch, splendidly engraved on Satin, can be obtained on application to this office. Likewise, handsomely engraved Diplomas of Master and Royal Arch, suitable for framing.

ADDRESS.

Delivered at the dedication of St. John's Hall, in the city of Louisville, Ky. on Saturday evening, April 10th, 1841.

BY R. W. WILKINS TANNEHILL, D. G. M.

I have had occasion more than once to remark that Masonry is a moral, not a religious institution; in the usual acceptance of the latter term, but, being strictly moral in all its injunctions, it is closely connected with religion. Morality may be called one of the great pillars of that beautiful temple which Christianity has erected, for if this support be withdrawn, the edifice itself must fall into ruins. Hence certain duties to God, our creator and preserver, are inculcated upon every candidate. On his entrance upon the threshold of the masonic Temple, before he is admitted to the slightest participation in its rights and privileges, he is solemnly required to declare his unwavering belief in the existence, power and goodness of one Supreme and Eternal God, and you all know with what solemnity he is required to repeat the declaration, and how it is enjoined upon him to pay that homage and render that adoration, which is due from the creature to the creator, and the strict principles of the order enjoin upon him to

"—to keep the soul enbalmed and pure
In living virtue; that when both must sever,
Although corruption may his frame consume
The immortal spirit in the skies may bloom."

Man is by nature religious, however this natural feeling may be weakened by a vicious life, by prediginate associations, and by the force of evil examples. His reason, his feelings, his instincts (if I may so speak) prompt him to religious duties in some form. The rudest nations adore a superior Being; they "see God in clouds and hear him in the wind;" they hear his voice in the rolling thunder, and see his footsteps in the lightning's flash. Hence have arisen the various systems of religion that have prevailed in different countries and at different periods. The masonic institution prescribes no form of worship; it neither adopts nor recommends any particular creed; hence every brother is left to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, untrammelled by obligations and uninfluenced by masonic rules. While it inculcates that "there is a being to whom we can look with a perfect conviction of finding that security which nothing about us can give, and which nothing about us can take away" it prescribes no particular system of belief, or form of worship, for reasons that must be obvious to every mason. If it were confined to a particular creed or system of christian worship, its universality, one of its most striking features, would be destroyed, and its general usefulness impaired by limiting its sphere of action to a particular sect or denomination. Although masonry in its principles is closely allied to religion, it does not profess to be religion itself; by its moral influence it aims to correct the vices and restrain the passions of men. It does not profess to change the heart, that must be left to the regenerating influence of the spirit of God. As a human institution it operates by human means; by endeavoring to impress the sound principles of morality upon the mind and heart; by admonition and reproof; by exhibiting the beauties of virtue and the deformities of vice.

So intimate is the connection between morality and religion, that the mason who acts in conformity with the injunctions of the first, if he be not a religious man in the strict sense of the term, he at least lays the foundation on which to erect the more splendid and imposing superstructure of piety and religion.—Morality alone will not save, but the habitual practice of the great moral duties will the better prepare man for that strict accountability for the deeds done in the flesh, which religion not only imposes but demands, and at length clothe him with that righteousness which will waft his immortal soul on seraph's wings to the realms of never-ending life and glory. The duties which we, as men and as masons, owe to the Great Creator, are laid down in that volume which, by all christian nations is regarded as the word of God, and which we regard as one of the great lights of our order, and receive as the rule and guide of our faith. It is our duty to search it that we may know its laws and if we obey not its precepts and injunctions, it is our own fault; if we disregard its admonitions we must suffer the penalty of their violation. That we are not all governed by its rules, is too true. We often forget its sublime precepts in the pursuit of unhallowed desires, and disregard its injunctions in the gratification of improper appetites, and our unsubdued passions too often reject their admonitions when they interfere with some interested purpose, or the accomplishment of some favorite object. On this occasion then, when you are about to resume your masonic labors, after a short suspension, and under the most favorable circumstances, am I asking too much, when I ask you, in the name of our order, seriously and deeply to ponder on the great principles upon which it is founded, and the various duties which are so often and so forcibly presented to your minds, in our various lectures, charges, and ceremonies? Am I asking too much, when I exhort you to practice Brotherly Love, Temperance and Charity, which we rank among the cardinal virtues of our order? Am I asking too much when I exhort you to cherish love of country;—to be firm in your allegiance to the government that protects you; to be undeviating in your attachment to those principles of rational freedom which have exalted this republic to the highest rank among the nations of the earth? Surely not; methinks I see every eye in this assembly beam with love for the order, and sparkle with the fire of patriotism. So long, my brethren, as we are governed by those principles, so long will our order defy the persecutions of its enemies.

So strongly am I impressed, that the permanence and usefulness of our institution depend upon the observance of our masonic duties, that on the present interesting occasion I cannot refrain from adverting to them. The duties we owe to the fraternity at large, and those which attach to ourselves, are contained in the lectures and charges delivered from this chair, as we advance in the order. They are numerous but not complex. When conveyed in symbols they are readily understood; when otherwise, they are so plain that he "who runs may read." They demand of us nothing which may not be accomplished; they require nothing which may not be performed, when the performance is undertaken with a proper spirit. If our masonic obligations restrain us in the indulgence of our desires, or occasionally require some personal sacrifice, the restraint and the sacrifice will be found to tend our comfort and happiness. Who that ever extended the helping hand to an unfortunate brother, even at some cost, that has not felt a gratification in the lively gratitude of that brother which more than compensated for the sacrifice? The various masonic duties when carried into active operation unite men with a "threefold cord not easily broken;" and secure that harmony, friendship and union, which ought ever to reign undisturbed among men, connected as masons are, by the most solemn ties. When carried into the world, they extend the blessings of social intercourse, and improve society, not by the introduction of new elements, but by the courteous application of principles long established. If we wish to maintain the pre-eminence we claim over other societies, the principles of our institution should be subjects of frequent reflection, and our individual and united efforts should be exerted to maintain them in their purity, and extend their benefits. The occasional repetition of masonic duties on public occasions will be of little effect in elevating our order, if we neglect their application in conducting the affairs of our own household.

I see around me brethren of every degree, from that of Entered Apprentice to that of Knight Templar, all of whom, I trust, have entered this Hall, animated by the true spirit of the order, and resolved to persevere in rebuilding the temple, and placing it upon the same elevation it occupied before the blast of persecution swept through its courts. I see before me brethren who guarded its banners, like faithful sentinels, in the day of trial, and who stood forward in its defence when calumny, aided by perjury assailed it. Upon them and other faithful brethren, devolves the duty of restoring the institution to its primitive standing. It may be asked how can this be accomplished? To this I answer, the means are in your own hands; let them be faithfully employed, and the work will be achieved. We have much to encourage us in the prospect before us, and but little to discourage.—On this subject then permit me to offer a few suggestions, which I deem worthy your serious consideration.

First. Let the avenues to your respective lodges, chapters, and encampments, be strictly guarded, so that none may enter but those whom you have good reason to believe will conform to your rules, and properly appreciate the privileges of the order. Be not deluded by the idea that a lodge is prosperous because it is numerous—this idea has been the fruitful source of numerous evils. The respectability of a lodge depends not upon the number, but the character of its members. Remember that carelessness with regard to the admission of members has cast no little odium upon the order, and has caused its privileges to be abused, and employed for unworthy purposes. We have already among us too many who are seldom seen within the walls of a lodge, except upon public occasions. Such members are as drones in the hive; they swell the numerical, but add nothing to the moral force of the institution—they enjoy its privileges, but they contribute nothing to the "feasts of charity," and feel none of the excitement of Friendship and Brotherly Love. To the world they may be known as masons, but they are scarcely known in the "household of the faithful." It should be borne in mind, that it is not the decorated apron, the glittering jewel, the embroidered sash, or the pomp and display of processions, that constitute freemasonry. These are transient and perishable objects; they may be put on and removed at pleasure, without making one valuable or useful impression. The jewels which give permanence, dignity and elevation to the masonic character, are those immovable ones that are impressed upon the mind, and engraven upon the heart, and which reflect lustre upon the order by deeds of charity and pure benevolence.

Second. Encourage by every means a spirit of union and let Brotherly Love and Friendship pervade each bosom, and animate every heart. Friendship and Brotherly Love, are among the cardinal virtues of the order, and their careful cultivation is essential to its preservation. So long, my brethren, as you cherish these virtues, so long as they warm your hearts and regulate your conduct, other and kindred virtues will follow in their train. Then will our order flourish, and our children's children will point with honest pride to the lodge as the abode of peace and harmony. We should often ask ourselves, Do we cherish as we ought these nobler and generous virtues? Do we use our influence to maintain them? Do we cast the mantle of charity over a brother's faults, and kindly admonish him to return to the path of virtue from which he has strayed? Do we endeavor to correct his vices by presenting before him new motives, and urging him to abandon the dangerous path he is pursuing? Do we warn a brother of approaching danger, and protect his reputation when unjustly assailed? Do we feel the influence of "heaven-born Charity," and freely and cheerfully contribute to the relief of the distressed widow and helpless orphan, and thus exercise one of the noblest of the masonic virtues? Do we cheer the desponding, encourage the industrious, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and bind up the wounds affliction has made? These are serious, but by no means irrelevant questions, and if every "master in Israel" could answer them in the affirmative, our order would shine forth in glorious beauty, and stand as pre-eminent in usefulness as it is in age.

Third. Let no ungenerous rivalry exist between brethren. Cultivate peace and harmony, and "good will to men," and not only study but practise the principles of the order, within and without the walls of the lodge. Wear them about your hearts; breathe them into each other's ears; encourage each other in every laudable undertaking, and be courteous and respectful to each other as well in public as in private. In your intercourse with each other, remember the words of the royal psalmist, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Fourth. Let no rivalry except that which can best work, exist between the different lodges. They are all members of our great family; branches of that fraternity whose signs and symbols are recognised in the remotest corners of the civilized world. Every lodge has the same great objects in view, the improvement of the moral and social condition of mankind. In union there is strength; in disunion there are found the elements of decay and dissolution, which must sooner or later overturn the mighty fabric, and leave not a wreck behind. If we admire individual friendships, where soul is united to soul, and heart to heart, with how much more admiration do we contemplate a band of brothers united for the purposes of charity and benevolence, and the promotion of each other's welfare. At no period has our order exhibited in this city a more flourishing aspect. To maintain it in this flourishing state, there should be a continual interchange of courtesy, and of kind and friendly offices, between the different lodges—an interchange of feeling, not of mere ceremony. Then will the tree of masonry grow with vigor, and expand its branches, until every brother shall find shelter under its shade.

Fifth. Suffer not the privileges of the order to be abused with impunity, by the profligate, or trampled upon by the intemperate. No single vice has more deeply affected the character of our order than intemperance, and there is none more odious—none more degrading—none in whose train follow more numerous evils—none more productive of private calamity. An indulgence in this vice is without apology, without justification, while it is a direct and palpable violation of one of the cardinal principles of the order. You have it in your power to wipe from the institution this reproach, so far as you are concerned, by saying to the intemperate when they approach the door, "Thus far mayest thou come but no farther." If there be any among you addicted to this vice, caution them to beware, lest they fall never to rise again.

Sir Knights, Companions and Brethren,

To you who are to occupy this Hall, which has now been solemnly dedicated to masonic purposes, belong important trusts, and you cannot be insensible to the responsibilities which rest upon you. The prosperity and character of the institution, so far as regards this city, rest upon you and the other lodges and chapter, and your united influence may be felt in other parts of the state. Protect the ancient landmarks from innovation, and the principles of the order from corruption and false interpretations. To effect the purposes for which our institution is designed, there should be perfect union, and cordial co-operation between the different lodges. Although you meet in separate halls, never forget that you are one and the same—one and indivisible. Maintain with each other a constant and friendly intercourse, and let no trivial circumstance interrupt that harmony which should ever exist between those who have in view the honor and usefulness of the institution. And now, my brethren, "when the shadows of life shall be dissolved in the realities of eternity" may we all be admitted into the Grand Lodge above, there to enjoy a glorious immortality.

WATCHING FOR A TIGER.

The spot I selected (says the writer) was the edge of a tank where a tiger used to drink. There was a large tamarind-tree on its banks, and here I took my post. A village shikaree accompanied me, and soon after sunset we took up our position on a branch, about twelve feet from the ground. I should first mention that we had fastened an unfortunate bullock under the tree for a bait. Well, we remained quietly on our perch for a couple of hours without anything stirring. It might be eight o'clock, the moon had risen, and so clear was the light that we could see the jackals at the distance of half a mile, sneaking along towards the village, when a party of Brintparries passing by, stopped to water their bullocks at the tank.

They loitered for some time, and becoming impatient, I got off the tree with a single rifle in my hand, and walked towards them, telling them that I was watching a tiger, upon which they started off immediately. I was sauntering back to my post, never dreaming of danger, when the shikaree gave a low whistle, and at the same moment a growl rose from some bushes between me and the tree. To make my situation quite decided, I saw his (the shikaree's) black arm pointing nearly straight under him, on my side of his post. It was very evident that I could not regain the tree, although I was within twenty paces of it. There was nothing left but to drop behind a bush, and leave the rest to Providence. If I had moved then, the tiger would have had me to a certainty; besides, I trusted to his killing the bullock, and returning to the jungle as soon as he had finished his supper.

It was terrible to hear the moans of the wretched bullock when the tiger approached. He would run to the end of his rope, making a desperate effort to break it, and then lie down, shaking every limb, and bellowing in the most piteous manner. The tiger saw him plain enough, but suspecting something wrong, he walked growling round the tree as if he did not observe him. At last he made his fatal spring, with a horrid shriek rather than a roar. I could hear the tortured bullock struggling under him, uttering faint cries, which became more and more feeble every instant, and then the heavy breathing, half growl, half snort of the monster, as he hung to his neck, sucking his life blood. I know not what possessed me at this moment, but I could not resist the temptation of a shot. I crept up softly within ten yards of him, and kneeling behind a clump of dates, took a deliberate aim at his head, while he lay with his nose buried in the bullock's throat. He started with an angry roar from the carcass when the ball hit him. He stood listening for a moment, then dropped in front of me, uttering a sullen growl.

There was nothing but a date bush between us; I had no weapon but my discharged rifle. I felt for my pistols, they had been left on the tree. Then I knew that my hour was come, and all the sins of my life flashed with dreadful distinctness across my mind. I muttered a short prayer, and tried to prepare myself for death, which seemed inevitable. But what was my peon about all this time? he had the spare guns with him! Oh, as I afterwards learned, the poor fellow was trying to fire my double rifle, but all my locks have bolts, which he did not understand, and he could not cock it. He was a good shikaree, and knew that was my only chance, so when he could do no good he did nothing. If Mohadeen had been there he would soon have relieved me, but I had sent him in another direction that day. Well, some minutes passed thus.

The tiger made no attempt to come at me—a ray of hope cheered me—he might be dying. I peeped through the branches, but my heart sank within me when his bright green eyes met mine, and his hot breath absolutely blew in my face. I slipped back upon my knees in despair, and a growl warned me that even that slight movement was noticed. But why did he not attack me at once? A tiger is a suspicious, cowardly brute, and will seldom charge unless he sees his prey distinctly. Now I was quite concealed by the date leaves, and while I remained perfectly quiet I still had a chance. Suspense was becoming intolerable. My rifle lay useless by my side; to attempt to load it would have been instant death. My knees were bruised by the hard gravel, but I dare not move a joint. The tormenting mosquitoes swarmed round my face, but I feared to raise my hand to brush them off.

Whenever the wind ruffled the leaves that sheltered me, a hoarse growl, grated through the stillness of the night. Hours that seemed years rolled on; I could hear the village gong strike each hour of that dreadful night, which I thought would never end.—At last the welcome dawn! and oh, how gladly did I hail the first streaks of light that shot up from the horizon, for then the tiger rose and stalked away to some distance. I felt that the danger was past, and rose with a feeling of relief which I cannot describe. Such a night of suffering was enough to turn my brain, and I only wonder that I survived it. I now sent off the peon for the elephant, and before eight o'clock old Goliath had arrived. It was all over in five minutes. The tiger rushed to meet me as soon as I entered the cover, and one ball in the chest dropped him down dead.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

The following details are as strange as they are true. In the neighborhood of Gloucester, a young lady of highly respectable connexions has experienced a series of reverses in the cause of the heart's best affection seldom equalled. A gentleman of some station in society became by accident acquainted with the maiden to whom we allude, and their affection becoming reciprocal, a day was fixed for their union, which was to have taken place in the city of Gloucester. Agreeably with this arrangement, and as the match was a desirable one, her parent parted with a lucrative business in the country, on which she and her mother lived in respectability and comfort, and went to Gloucester, intending to settle. The day for the celebration of the wedding arrived: but, alas! the bridegroom came not; his parents had peremptorily forbidden the match, and he was already, by their contrivance, on the seas, bound for Jamaica. A letter reached the poor girl, but to confirm her fears; his parents' consent had been withheld, and he had suddenly left the seaport town in the west of England, where he resided, not a faithless, but an unhappy lover. Time passed, and industry on the part of the hapless girl but ill supplied the loss of the comparative independence herself and family had left when they came to the city of Gloucester, with the views and indulging in the hopes to which we have alluded, and though blighted in heart she cheerfully succeeded in helping to support her decrepit mother and aunt in comfort.

Time, the gentle softener of affliction, had many a long day cast its dimming shadow over the great event of her life, and nothing more had been heard of her absent lover, till a week or two ago, when to her astonishment and delight, she received a letter from him breathing the devoted affection, not the less welcome though wafted across the seas. Another and another followed, begging forgiveness for the former apparent neglect—and still another, the last accompanied by the consent of the parents of the absent one. The poor girl's hopes were at the highest point of anxiety, when she received a still more welcome epistle, assuring her that her lover had landed at Falmouth, and was hastening to perform his neglected promise.—The day was looked forward to with delight; it came, and with it the dark tidings of the grave—her lover had been suddenly seized with illness the night before his departure for the city of Gloucester—he was a corpse before morning! As a melancholy satisfaction to the poor disappointed girl, the mother of the intended bridegroom visited her immediately, when his mother confessed that her son had been a voluntary exile and would have remained so, had not his parents, whom he loved and respected, given their consent to his union; after frequent communications, his parents assented, and he instantly quitted Jamaica to claim the hand of his first love; hastening to meet her, death ruthlessly arrested his progress before he had been many hours on his native shore. As a proof of the sincerity of his attachment, the lover, in the hour of dissolution, bequeathed to his bride elect £2000.—Hereford Times.

A SINGULAR SERMON.

Four gentlemen and an old minister, were assailed on the highway by three robbers, who demanded and took possession of all their funds. The old minister plead very hard to be allowed a little money, as he was on his way to pay a bill in London. The highway-men, as our authorities inform us, "being generous fellows, gave him all the money back again on condition of his preaching them a sermon." Accordingly they retired a little distance from the highway, and the minister addressed them as follows:

"Gentlemen---You are the most like the old apostles of any men in the world, for they were wanderers upon the earth, and so are you; they had neither lands nor tenement; that they could call their own; neither I presume, have you. They were despised of all but those of their own profession, and so, I believe, are you: they were unalterably fixed in the principles they professed, and I dare swear so are you; they were often hurried into jails, and prisons; all of which sufferings, I presume, have been undergone by you; their profession brought them all to untimely deaths; and if you continue in your course, so will yours bring you. But in this point you differ mightily; for the apostles ascended from a tree into heaven, where I am afraid you will never come; but as their deaths were compensated with eternal glory, yours will be rewarded with eternal shame and misery, unless you mend your manners."---Methodist Magazine for February, 1791.

ANECDOTE OF GEN. PUTNAM.

During the French war, when the British commander, Gen. Amherst, was marching across the country to Canada, the army coming to one of the lakes, which they were obliged to pass, found the French had an armed vessel of twelve guns upon it. The Gen. was in trouble: his boats were no match for it, and if his men were embarked in them, that single ship might easily sink the whole of them. While he was pondering on the course to be pursued, Putnam came to him and said, "General, that ship must be taken." "Aye," says Amherst, "I would give the world she were taken." "I'll take her," says Putnam, "if you'll give me leave." Amherst smiled, and asked, how? "Give me," says Putnam, "a beetle, (a large wooden maul, or hammer) and some wedges, and a few men of my own choice." General Amherst could not understand Putnam's method of taken armed ships with a beetle and wedges but thought proper to grant him what he required. At night, Putnam put his men, and his beetle and wedges, on board of a boat; then passing silently under the stern of the vessel, in a moment drove his wedges in the little cavity between the ruder and the stern, and made his escape. In the morning, the ship, being adrift in the middle of the lake, with her sails fluttering entirely unmanageable, was presently blown ashore and easily taken.

JOHN BULL AND BROTHER JONATHAN; OR, THE COCKNEY TOURIST.

A young sprig of the London press happened some six months ago, to be travelling in a stage coach, in which vehicle a raw Vermont youth was a passenger. The young boy was not one of your "rad cute" fellows, but a shy, diffident stripling, travelling from a distant school, to spend his vacation at home. To the Londoner he was an object of great curiosity, being the first sample he had seen, and he pestered the boy with questions touching his mode of life, habits, studies, employments, &c., thinking to amuse himself, gather items for his journal, at the same time impress the other passengers with the proper idea of his vast importance. The boy although evidently annoyed, answered politely and displayed none of the characteristics of the Green Mountain youths; so the Englishman thought he could boast as he pleased with impunity. He told the passengers that he heard much of Yankee tricks and Yankee shrewdness, "but for his part he had never seen any thing in them that he could call clever, and indeed he wished very much to be made the subject of one of their tricks, for if they could fool him, he could then believe in what he had heard of their character."

This hint was not thrown away upon young Jonathan. He thought he would set his wits to work, for the honor of 'down East,' and soon hit upon a scheme. He had heard the Englishman enquiring the direction from the town where the coach was to stop, to a residence some five miles distant. This direction happened to be the very path the boy was to take home but he said nothing.

The coach stopped. Little Jonathan trotted towards home, and Johnny Bull, after having deposited his luggage in the tavern, soon followed. There was a lunatic asylum near the town we mentioned. Jonathan told every soul he had met that one madman had escaped, and was coming along the road, and that they would know him by his perpetually enquiring for the residence of Mr. Brown. Not content with this, he turned to every farm house, and told the inmates in great alarm, that a madman had escaped from the asylum, and to be on their guard against a man who would enquire for the residence of Mr. Brown. The thing succeeded to a miracle. Johnny Bull had not advanced far on his way, before he perceived, a man plant himself on one side of the road, brandishing a thick cudgel, and assuming the attitude of one who expects danger, and was resolved to defend himself to the last. Johnny thought it was singular, but nevertheless put the question.

"Sir, can you direct me to the residence of Mr. Brown?"

"Yes, I thought you was the man. Now look here stranger, you just conduct yourself respectfully, and keep your own side of the road, for if you come near me, I swan to man I'll smash you!"

Johnny opened his eyes and his mouth too.

"My dear friend, I don't want to approach you, I honly wish to know where Mr. Brown lived."

"Well now, you just follow your nose, and don't mistel nobody, you tarnal varmint. You'd better go home, and get on your waistcoat."

The man, who seemed in a hurry, passed on. Johnny gazed after him an instant, quite confounded, and then proceeded on his way, saying to himself, "Vell, upon my word, that person's conduct was werry singular!" He turned off to a farm house. A woman was sitting at the door sewing. When she perceived him, she started from her seat, and darting in the door, held it for an instant, while she returned to take a look at the stranger.

"Madam, will you be so kind as to hinform me whether I ham in the right road to Mr-Brown's ouse?"

"I thought so!" exclaimed the woman, slamming the door fast, and bolting it, and the next moment she was seen peeping suspiciously from the upper window.

"Vot is the matter, madam? I merely vant to know---"

"Oh, go away you unfortunate wretch! Don't you attempt to cut any of your tantrums here. Go away now, do---there's a good fellow."

The woman disappeared, and Johnny paused an instant to ascertain if there was any thing frightful about him. He then proceeded and encountered a good humored countryman, coming whistling along the road.

"Pray sir," said Johnny, "can you direct me to Mr. Browns?"

The thoughtless countryman had forgotten little Jonathan's warning, but when he heard the question it recurred to him, and without saying a word, took to his heels in such a hurry that he tumbled over a log; but picking himself up again, he took into the woods, and was out of sight in an instant.

"Vell," said Johnny to himself, "this is certainly werry hextraordinary!" He began to feel strange sensations, and walked half a mile, ruminating awfully upon the unaccountable treatment he had received.---Here he met another traveller, and with very doubtful feelings about getting an answer propounded the question.

The stranger paused right before Johnny, and his hat seemed to be rising off his head. To judge from his looks his feelings must have been like those of a bird fascinated by a rattle-snake. Johnny noticed the frightful appearance of the stranger, and terror now took possession of him. He imagined something dreadful was going to occur, and forthwith took to his heels in the woods.

"God bless my art," exclaimed he aloud, "what can be the matter with the people? Vot kind of a country av I got into? Vy, these inhabitants are wild!---They are Wallentines and Horson's! Houran Houtangs! Regular wild men of the voods!"

He was now completely lost in a thick wood. When he found the road again; he was afraid to ask any more questions, and finally got back to the town, where the next day, our hero visited him with "Look here, stranger, Mr. Brown's house is just where it was yesterday. When you see him, tell him what you think of Yankee tricks."

A LOAFER'S SOLILOQUY.---We saw a gentleman evidently belonging to that respectable and ancient fraternity termed loafers, the other evening, gracefully extended in the gutter, and edifying the spectators with something like the following harangue: "Guzzy's my name---Bill Guzzy; I'm to be found at Jim Thompson's cellar when I'm to home, and when I ain't to home, jist enquire for me at the market; d---n it, they know me at the market, I s'pose! Most men have seen my name in the papers---I ain't ashamed of myself; that's the talk! Bah---talk! I'll tell you what 'tis---if I thought that any man in this crowd had been a-speakin' agin my character, I wouldn't talk---I'd astoosh him without talkin'---that's my way!---Blow me!" Hereupon Mr. Guzzy hit the pavement a very hard blow, and requested the bystanders to go to a certain place that shall be nameless; whereupon we left.

CHARACTER.

THE AMERICAN CHARACTER.

It is a matter of high moment to the young American gentleman to reflect, as he shapes his character for life, on the model by which he would be moulded to future distinction. The republican form of our government, the omnipotence of public opinion in this country of free, unshakled mind, and the high destinies allotted to the elder of the western continent, impose peculiar rules of formation on the rising pillars of American empire. The scholar, the jurist, the statesman, the artist, the mechanic or the cultivators of the eastern continent, may be the models of those of the new world---a world happy, disenthralled and aloof from the despotism of hoary error, the accumulations of many centuries of ignorance and encroachment of social rights.

The young American must make religion the foundation of his character---for here, as to a refuge, the persecuted servants of God, came when the green curtain of the wilderness covered the continent, and their prayers hallowed all the soil and dedicated their unborn posterity to a holier cause than that of earth. The young American should be generous---for here, as to an asylum for cruelty and the whirlpool of revolution, thousands have come, and millions must come as the old continent breaks up under the hammer of convulsion and melts down under the purifying fires of judgment, to a purer and holier type. He must be patient and persevering---for those who have ever breathed the tainted atmosphere of monarchy and hereditary power cannot in a moment be made to understand the nature and the full extent of our national freedom, the lessons of Washington to a young nation are often to be repeated. He must be brave---for too much has been entrusted to him to be in the keeping of a coward. To him has been committed the world's last experiment for liberty---to him belongs the helm of the republican vessel, if his skill and patriotic virtues prove him worthy to guide the ship of state through seas of passion and under the adverse storms of external war. He must be energetic---for the men of America are self made men and gather no honor from birth but the broad, proud honor of citizenship in a country where not a lord nor a lordling, as such, can throw contempt over their plebian origin.

POPULAR TALES

LIFE'S VALUE.

A STORY OF BRITTANY.

The scene of our little story opens in an apartment in an ancient castle in Brittany. The young proprietor is about to quit the abode of his forefathers, to pursue schemes of ambition at court, or in the great world. The family, consisting of the mother and two sisters, with the hero of the piece, are met together on this interesting occasion. But we let the young gentleman relate what passed at the interview.

The time at length came when I should depart; and Joseph, opening the door gently, informed us that the chaise de poste was ready. This announcement was startling to my mother and sisters, who, in an agony of feeling, threw their arms around me.

"It is not yet too late!" they exclaimed with tears; "renounce this intended journey. Oh, do not leave us!"

"My dearest mother," I replied, "at twenty years of age, and the inheritor of a noble name, I must make myself known in my native land. I must open a path to fame, either in the army or at court."

"And when you are gone," said my poor mother, "what will become of me?"

"You will hear with pride and pleasure of your son's success!"

"And should I hear of his death in battle?"

"Well; of what use is life at my age," I replied, "but to gain honor and glory? Think rather of the time when I shall return a colonel—perhaps a marshal of France."

"And then?"—said my mother.

"Why, then, honor and respect will follow my steps wherever I go."

"And then?"—pursued she.

"Then, I will marry my cousin Henrietta; we shall find noble husbands for my sister; and we will all live together in peace and happiness in these ancient halls of my ancestors."

"And why not commence this life of happiness from this moment?" said my mother. "Where is there a wider or fairer domain in Brittany than yours? Who claims a nobler name in the province? In the midst of your faithful vassals, are you not sufficiently honored and beloved? Leave us not, my son!—leave not your friends, your sisters, your aged mother, whom you may never again behold! Go not to waste, in the pursuit of vain glory, or to shorten, by sorrows and disappointments, those youthful days that pass away so rapidly. Life is a treasure, my beloved Bernard; and where can you enjoy it more than under the lovely sky of Brittany?" As my mother spoke, she led me to a window, and pointed out the noble avenues of the ancient park, where the stately chestnuts were mingled with lilacs and woodbines, whose fragrant blossoms perfumed the air. Before the door stood the aged gardener and his family, whose saddened looks seemed to say, "Desert us not, our noble master—desert not those you are bound to protect!" Hortensia, my eldest sister, twined her arms round my neck, while Amelia, the youngest, taking up a volume of La Fontaine, pointed to an engraving, of the Two Pigeons. I started up, and extricating myself from their embraces, again exclaimed, "I must win honor and glory! let me go, let me go!"—and I rushed into the court-yard.

As I was about to ascend the carriage, a female figure appeared at the hall door. It was my cousin Henrietta. She wept not, spoke not; but, pale as marble, appeared sinking to the earth. She held a handkerchief in her hand, with which she waved me a last farewell, and then fell senseless. I rushed to her, raised her, and uttered vows of love and constancy.—But when I saw the color revisit her cheek, leaving her to the anxious care of my mother and sisters, I hastened back to the carriage, without even turning my head. One look more at Henrietta, and I felt I could not have left her. In a few minutes the chaise de poste was rolling along the high road to Sedan.

For some time, my thoughts were entirely filled with my beloved Henrietta, my weeping sisters, my dear mother, and all the happiness I felt I was leaving. But as the ancient turrets of Roche Bernard receded from my view, these saddening images seemed to vanish also, and were succeeded by the brilliant visions of glory and ambition. What airy castles rose before me as I leaned back in the rumbling vehicle! Riches—honors—dignities—nothing did I refuse to myself as the just reward of merit; and the scale ascending as I advanced on my journey, I was a duke, governor of a province, and Marshal of France, by the time I reached the inn at which I was to repose for the night. The voice of my servant, simply addressing me as Monsieur le Chevalier, forced me, unwillingly, to abdicate my newly created dignity.

The next day, and for several succeeding ones, I indulged in the same intoxicating dreams, my journey being of some length. I was repairing to Sedan, to the residence of the Duke of C—, an old and tried friend of my father's and the protector of the family. He had promised to take me to Paris, and introduce me at the court of Versailles. He hoped, also, to obtain for me a company in a regiment of dragoons, by the influence of his sister, the Marchioness of F—, a young and beautiful woman.

I reached Sedan at so late an hour that I could not think of present myself at the ducal chateau, and therefore installed myself for the night at the Arms of France the best the town afforded, and the rendezvous of all the officers of the garrison. Sedan was then a fortified town; the very streets had a warlike appearance, and the citizens a martial air, that seemed to say to a stranger, "We are compatriots of the great Turenne!"

I supped at a table-d'hôte, and took the opportunity of inquiring my way to the chateau, where I intended going in the morning.

"Any one will point it out to you," was the answer; "it is well known in the whole country. In that chateau expired one of our most celebrated men, and bravest of warriors, Marechal."

And hereupon, as was natural amongst so many military heroes, the conversation fell upon the career of the marechal. They spoke of his gallant exploits, and of his singular modesty, which had made him refuse the title of nobility, and the ribbons of several orders, offered to him by Louis XIV. Above all, they expatiated upon his extraordinary good fortune, which had enabled him, without the aid of family interest, he being the son of an obscure printer, to raise himself from a common soldier to the rank of France. It had appeared so extraordinary and unprecedented an elevation, that even during the life of Fabert, popular rumor had not been backward in attributing it to supernatural causes. It was currently reported that he dealt in magic, and it was even affirmed he had made a compact with Satan.

Our landlord, who, to the ignorance of a native of Champagne added the credulity of a peasant of Brittany, gravely assured us, that a few moments before Fabert expired, a black man, unknown to any one in the chateau, had entered the chamber and carried off the marechal's soul, which, indeed, of right appertained to him, he having purchased it long before. Mine host also went on to state, that from that period to the present time, upon each anniversary of Fabert's death the black man was seen at midnight bearing a lighted torch in his hand.

The next morning, at an early hour, I repaired to the chateau of the Duke of C—. It was an immense and gloomy Gothic pile, which would not perhaps, at another time, have made much impression upon me, but I must confess that I now gazed upon it with a singular feeling of interest, as I called to mind the landlord's story.

The domestic who ushered me in told me his master was not yet visible. I gave my name, and was then left alone in an ancient hall, adorned with the trophies of the chase, and hung round with family portraits. I waited a considerable time, but no one appeared. "Is this brilliant career of glory to commence by the ante-chamber?" exclaimed I beginning to conceive the impatience of a discontented place-hunter. I had gone three times the round of the grim portraits, and had sedulously counted all the beams in the lofty ceiling, when I heard a slight noise in the wainscot, and found it proceeded from a half-closed door, moved by the wind. I pushed it gently open, and saw a small room tastefully furnished, and from which a glass door opened into a magnificent park. I advanced, in order to enjoy the view from the window, when another object met my sight. Stretched on a sofa, whose back was turned to the door by which I entered, was a man, who not observing me, rose hastily and rushed to the window. I then perceived that his face was bathed in tears, and that despair was marked in every feature. He remained for a moment motionless, his face buried in his hands, then with rapid steps began to pace the apartment. As soon as his eye fell upon me, he stopped and shuddered, while I, distressed at my intrusion, muttered some words in apology, and was about to withdraw.

"Who are you?—what brings you here?" he exclaimed, in a loud voice, and seizing my arm with violence.

"I am the Chevalier de Bernard, and I come!"

"I know, I know," he said, hastily; and taking my hand warmly, he made me sit down by him, and inquired with much interest about my family; spoke of my father, whom he appeared to have known so well, that I could not doubt my being in the presence of the master of the chateau.

"You are Monsieur de C—?" said I.

He rose, and replied, in an agitated tone, "I was once; but I am nothing now. Hush!—do not speak—do not ask me any questions!"

"Permit me, at least," I ventured to say, "to assure you, that if the most devoted friendship can in any way lighten the affliction of which I have been an involuntary witness!"

"You are right," he replied, abruptly; "though you change my doom, yet you may receive my last wishes. That is the only service you can render me."

He closed the door carefully and returned to his seat at my side, and where I waited in trembling anxiety for the result. There was something awfully solemn in the tone of his voice, and an expression in his countenance I had never seen before. His face was deadly pale, while lightnings seemed to flash from his large dark eyes, and his features, worn by suffering, were frequently convulsed by a demoniac smile.

"What I am about to relate to you," he said at length, in a hollow tone, "will confound your reason. You will doubt—you will perhaps utterly disbelieve. Even I almost doubt at times still—at least to do so; but the proof, the fatal proof, is too strong. Alas! are there not in all that surrounds us, in our very organization itself, mysteries whose existence we are compelled to acknowledge without any powers of comprehending them?" He paused for a moment, as if to recollect his ideas, pressed his hand to his brow, and continued—

"In this castle I first drew breath; and being a younger son, upon the elder born was of course to devolve all the wealth and honors of our house, while I had nothing to look forward to but the cloak and band of an abbe. With a heart burning with ambition and a head filled with dreams of glory, the prospect of this obscure lot made me wretched, and I resolved, by some means or other, to raise myself above it.—Life was distasteful to me; I lived but in the future; and yet what a gloomy future appeared to my aching sight!"

"I thus attained my thirtieth year, and I was still nothing—nothing; while I daily heard of colossal reputations, whose fame reached even this remote province. 'I will try the career of letters!' I exclaimed; let me win fame in any way, for fame alone is happiness."

The only confidant of my chagrin was an aged negro, who had been in the chateau even before my birth. Indeed, he was so old, that no one remembered his coming; and it was said he had been present at the death of Marechal Fabert.

Here an involuntary start of surprise, which I could not repress, made my companion pause. "Go on," I said, "tis nothing; but, notwithstanding, I thought of the black man described by the old landlord."

"One day," continued Monsieur de C—, "I gave way before Yago (so the old negro was called) to the despair of my soul, at the shameful obscurity in which I dragged on my days. 'I would give ten years of my life,' I exclaimed, 'to become a celebrated author!'"

"Ten years," said Yago, coldly, "it is paying dear for such a trifle. However, I accept your offer. The ten years are mine. Keep your promise; you will find me true to my word."

I will not attempt to depict my astonishment at this speech. However, after a moment's reflection, I naturally concluded that age had enfeebled his intellects; and with a smile of pity I left the room, and in a few days after, the chateau. I arrived in Paris, and soon found myself in the most distinguished literary society of the metropolis. Encouraged by their approval, I published several works. My success exceeded my most flattering dreams. The journals of Paris, even foreign nations, rung with my name; yourself, even yesterday, young man, acknowledged the power of my genius."

"How!" I exclaimed, with astonishment; "you are not, then, the Duke of C—?"

"No," he replied, coldly.

"What favored son of genius, then, stands before me?" said I: "Marmontel? D'Alembert? Voltaire?"

The unknown, with a smile of contempt, continued his recital.

"The literary fame I enjoyed, unbought as it was, could not satisfy a soul like mine. I longed for nobler triumphs, and could not help exclaiming to Yago, who had followed me to Paris, 'Oh, there is no real glory but that which is gained on the battle field!—What is a philosopher—a poet?—nothing! Speak to me of a hero! What are the poet's lays compared to the laurel wreath of a conqueror? To purchase that I would willingly give ten years more of life.'"

"I agree to the bargain," said Yago. "They are mine also. Do not forget."

At this part of the narrative, the unknown paused, for he observed the astonishment expressed in my countenance.

"I told you," he said, "you would not believe.—You think it a dream, as I, alas! did once. But the honors I won, the triumphs I gained—squadrons led to meet the fire of the enemy—fortresses carried by skill—standards seized by my bravery—victories that were echoed through the world; these were not dreams—no! that glory was real, and that glory was mine!"

He paced the room with rapid strides, and his cheeks flushed with the vehemence of his discourse, while I muttered to myself, "Who, then, is this renowned warrior?—Coligny?—Richelieu?—perhaps Marshal Saxe himself."

The fever of enthusiasm passed away, and the unknown sunk again into despondency.

"Yago spoke truly," he continued, in a low and mournful tone. "I was soon wearied with the vain incense of military fame, and perceiving there was but one thing real and substantial in the world I purchased by five years more of my existence, the riches I coveted. Yes, young man, it is true, though incredible—I saw my wealth increase beyond my most sanguine desires. Lands, forests, castles, all were mine; even this morning I thought myself—but no matter: you will soon be convinced of the truth—oh, how soon!"

He approached the clock on the chimney, and looked at it with a terrified gaze, then continued, rapidly.

"This morning, on awaking at daybreak, I felt a degree of exhaustion throughout my whole frame that alarmed me. I rang my bell, and Yago answered the summons. 'What is the matter?' I exclaimed; 'I am faint.' 'It is but the course of nature,' he answered, calmly. 'Master, the hour approaches—it is come.' 'What hour?' I cried, in surprise.

"Do you not divine it?" said Yago. "Heaven allotted as your portion sixty years of existence. You had lived thirty of them when I first became your slave."

"Yago," I cried, "you are jesting with me!"

"No, master, no; in five years of life you have expended twenty-five to purchase glory. They became my property, and will be added to the term of my existence."

"That, then," I cried, "was the price I paid for your services?"

"Others have paid dearer," he answered boldly; "for instance, Fabert, whom I served also."

"'Tis false, 'tis false!" I exclaimed, vehemently.

"You will find it true, my master," said the black; "you have but half an hour to live."

"Oh, say not so, Yago; you are deceiving me?"

"Calculate yourself," he answered; "thirty five years that you have actually lived, and twenty-five lost. The account is square. It is my turn now; every one their own, is but justice."

He turned to go, but feeling myself gradually sinking, I exclaimed in despair, "Oh, Yago, Yago! give me but a few hours more!"

"They would be deducted from mine, said he; 'and I know the value of life better than you did. What treasure is equal to two hours of existence?'"

A dark cloud seemed to pass before my eyes, and the chill of death was in my veins. With a last effort, I gasped out, "take back the wealth for which I have paid so dear. Give me but four hours more of life, and I resign my lands, my castles, my gold—all, all!"

"You have been a kind master," said he, after a pause; "I wish to do something in gratitude. I felt my courage revive, and ventured to say, 'Four hours are almost nothing: Yago, Yago, grant me some more in addition and I resign the literary fame that placed my name so high in the world.'"

"Four hours of life for such a bagatelle as that!" said the negro, with disdain; "but for your sake I will not refuse your last request."

"Oh! say not my last," said I, emboldened by his compliance; "give me the twelve hours complete—one more day—and let the fame of my battles and victories be for ever effaced from the memory of mankind. One day, Yago—one day, and I am willing to resign all else."

"You abuse my good nature," he said; "but I will not refuse. I give you till sunset. Farewell—with the last beam of day I come to fetch you"—And left me," continued the unknown, in the accents of despair; "and this is the last day I have to remain on earth." He rushed to the window, and pointed to the park. "I shall never again behold that lovely sky, that verdant lawn, that silvery stream, nor ever again breathe the balmy air of spring. Fool—fool that I was; the blessings that God lavishes upon all were mine also, and I despised them! Now I know their inestimable value; and I might have enjoyed them for twenty-five years longer; and in a few hours I must lose them ever! I have squandered my life for a vain chimera—a sterile fame, that has perished even before myself.—Look!" he cried, pointing to a group of peasants, who on their return to labor, filled the air with their joyous songs; "what would I not give to share their labors and poverty? But I have nothing now to hope for—not even labor and poverty. A bright sunbeam at this moment fell upon his pale and distorted features; he grasped my arm convulsively, and exclaimed, "Look—look at the glorious sun; and I must leave it for ever! Ah! let me lose not a moment of this precious day, to which, for me, alas! there will be no morrow!" Thus saying, he rushed into the park, and disappeared amongst the foliage of a shady alley.

I threw myself upon the sofa, bewildered and oppressed by all I had heard and seen. Was it indeed a reality, or was I under the influence of some fantastic dream? The door was opened, by the servant, who announced the Duke of C—.

A noble looking personage, of about sixty years of age, entered, and cordially taking my hand, apologized for having detained me so long. "He had been compelled," he said, "to attend a consultation of the faculty upon the state of his unfortunate brother."

"He is not in danger I trust?" said I.

"No, replied the duke mournfully, the disease is a mental one. From his youth he suffered the most extravagant ideas of glory and ambition to gain possession of his mind, till his frame, weakened by such violent emotions, was attacked by a fever in which his life was despaired of. He recovered, however—but his reason is, I fear, gone forever. The unhappy illusion under which he labors is, that he has but one day more to live."

All was explained.

"Now, my young friend, continued the duke, let us speak of your future prospects. Towards the end of the month I will be able to accompany you to court."

"I am fully sensible of your kindness, my lord," I replied, "but I have given up all idea of profiting by your generous offer."

"How is this!" exclaimed the duke, in unfeigned surprise; "give up the advantages that are almost within your grasp!"

I resign them all, my lord.

Young man (said the duke) you know not what you do. Good Heavens! such a brilliant career open before you! in ten years—

Which would be ten years of my life lost, said I with a smile.

Lost! cried the duke—would it not be cheaply buying glory, fortune and honors? Come, come, you but jest; you will go with me to Versailles.

No, my lord, I replied in a respectful but firm tone; I will return to Brittany, where I will ever retain a grateful sense of your lordship's goodness and condescension.

This is madness—downright madness! muttered the duke, in a disappointed and angry tone.

I feel it is sound reason, whispered I, as I thought of all I had heard and seen so lately.

The next morning I was on the road. Oh, with what inexpressible delight I beheld again the sweet sky of Brittany; the trees of my noble park; the turrets of my noble castle. There I found my beloved mother, my sweet sisters, my faithful vassals; and there I found true happiness, which I have never since quitted. Eight days afterwards, I was the husband of Henrietta.

THE GATHERER.

THE MARINER'S COMPASS.

Who invented the Mariner's Compass? This is a question not often put, but less frequently answered.

A shepherd of Italy by the name of Magnes, was the first to discover the properties of the loadstone—a mineral which gives polarity to iron, from the circumstance of his walking over a quarry, and small particles of this stone adhering to the iron nails in his sandals.

In the year 1322, John de Groja, a handicraftsman of Naples, first discovered that a piece of iron rubbed with the loadstone, and suspended on its centre of gravity, had the property of pointing to the north star, and he was the first to apply needles on centres for the purpose of navigation. John tried his needles at different places in Italy, and moored a vessel in the Mediterranean, to ascertain whether this magnetic power was the same on water as on land. The name of magnet was given to the loadstone, and to the needle.—The division of the shipman's card was first made into four quarters, then into 16 and 32 points, and ultimately into 360. This gradation was progressive, and marked out upon a movable disk. It was not until the middle of the last century that the needle and card were combined and hung on a common centre.

In the time of Columbus, nearly 200 years after the discovery of the magnetic needle by John de Groja, the card was placed under the needle. It is worthy of remark, that this highly useful instrument, discovered, not invented through any scientific or theoretical deductions, should continue to puzzle and baffle the philosopher, in his attempts to discover the cause of its variation in the different parts of the earth. To the Italians we are indebted for the compass and early enterprise in navigation, and to a Philadelphian for the discovery of the quadrant by Godfrey.—U. S. Gazette

A NECDOTE.

A haughty General, who had risen from obscurity reviewing his troops, took notice of a man in the ranks who was excessively dirty. Going up to him, he said, "How dare you, you rascal, appear on parade with a dirty shirt? It is as black as ink. Did you ever see me so nasty, and with such a dirty shirt, when I was a private man?" "No, yer honor, to be sure I never did," answered the man; "but then yer honor will please to recollect that yer honor's respectable mother was a washwoman!" The General rode off.

SATIN BREECHES.—A Frenchman wanted to purchase a pair of satin unmentionables, but could not tell how to designate the material. At length he inquired of his mercer, "Vat name do you call de devil beside de devil?" "Beelzebub." "Eh bien, Beelzebub breeches! no." "Lucifer?" "Eh bien, Lucifer small clothes! no." "Satan?" "Ah oui, yes; I want a pair of black satan breeches."

CONTENTMENT.—A gentleman had a board put on a part of his land, on which was written: "I will give this field to any one who is really contented;" and, when an application came, he said, "are you contented?" The general reply was, "I am." "Then," rejoined the gentleman, "what do you want with my field?"

HOW TO CHOOSE A WIFE.

"The Patriarch," Magazine just published, offers the following receipt for the selection of a wife:

"A place for every thing and every thing in its place," said the patriarch to his daughter. Select a wife, my son, who will never step over a broomstick." The son was obedient to the lesson. Now, said he, pleasantly, on a gay May day, to one of his companions, I appoint this broomstick to choose me a wife. The young lady who will not step over it, shall have the offer of my hand. They passed from the splendid saloon to the grove; some stumbled over the broomstick and others jumped it; at length a young lady stooped and put it in its place. The promise was fulfilled. She became the wife of an educated and wealthy young man, and he the husband of a prudent, industrious and lovely wife. He brought a fortune to her, and she knew how to save one; it is not easy to decide which was under the greatest obligations. Both were rich, and each enriched the other.

A YANKEE ADMIRAL.

It is stated in a New Hampshire paper that a former citizen of that state Thomas F. Williams, has become an Admiral, Count Zinzechoff, in the Russian Navy.

It seems that he was in early youth a clerk in a store in Meredith Bridge. Being naturally of a generous, bold and ardent temperament, no sooner had he served out his time, than he went to visit a relative in Portland for the purpose of seeing a ship, and if possible of obtaining employment in one. He at length succeeded; after one or two voyages he was taken dangerously ill at St. Petersburg, and upon his recovery, through the aid of the American Consul, obtained a berth on board of a Russian merchant vessel as privileged seaman. After a prosperous voyage, on their return home the vessel was attacked by a piratical corsair;—owing to the bravery and skill of Williams the pirates were beaten off and the vessel arrived at her destined port in safety. The Emperor Alexander hearing of this brilliant exploit, was so much pleased with the bravery and good conduct of Williams, as to send for him to visit his palace; the result of this interview was his appointment as senior Midshipman, in the Russian navy. From this he has risen to his present rank. He has been married for several years to a beautiful and accomplished Russian lady.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

ALBANY, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1841.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—We find ourselves unable to furnish any back numbers prior to No. 26.—the first six months, and we wish our Agents, on obtaining any new subscription to inform the subscriber of this fact. Any money sent to us, will be applied to this volume, and should there be any excess, it will be passed to the credit of the subscriptions of the next volume.

NO NEWS OF THE PRESIDENT.—The Caladonia arrived at Boston on Wednesday last, and up to the time of her starting from Liverpool, on the 4th inst., no tidings had been received of the steamship President. No doubts are now entertained of her fate. All hope with respect to her has been abandoned.

CLOSED.—The N. Y. Bowery Theatre, Thomas S. Hamblin, manager, has been closed, by order of the Chancellor, on the complaint, and at the request of the Managers of the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents. This summary measure has been retorted to, in consequence of the inability of Mr. H. to pay immediately, the sum of $500 for license to keep open his establishment. Some nine years since, the Legislature of this State inflicted a yearly tax of $500 on the performance of the legitimate drama, represented at the New York theatres only—the said sum to be appropriated to the support and maintenance of juvenile thieves and other offenders. Mr. Hamblin states, in a card published in the N. Y. Sun, that he has already paid upwards of $4,000, which has been applied to this purpose.

Without presuming to question the propriety of the above proceeding, we cannot but express our regret at its result. Mr. Hamblin's enterprise as a manager, and distinguish'd abilities as a performer, are well known and acknowledged, and certainly deserved reward and encouragement.

THE AGE OF IMPROVEMENT.—What rapid strides are we of the present generation taking towards the completion of every invention, and the attainment of every object in science, that can possibly contribute to the comfort or convenience of those whose operations such improvements are designed to facilitate!—As the revolving wheel of time continues to bring successive centuries into existence, and to hurry those which are past and the one which we now behold, into deeper oblivion, so will mankind undoubtedly continue to advance in scientific and mechanical improvement, until the climax is attained—and what then?—Will mankind then revert to their state of original barbarism, or will they remain stationary in that state of refined civilization to which the industry of those of their own and preceding ages, has elevated them?—But this is a problem of extremely difficult solution, and one with which we are not disposed to interfere.

"The world now goes by steam." To what purpose cannot that powerful agent be applied? It is steam which enables us to travel with an almost incredible rapidity over the "ocean wave," and accomplish distances in a space of time, which, a century ago, would have been regarded as miraculous; and it is that which, on dry land, transports us from place to place, with a velocity which seems to annihilate both time and space. By the invention of a sub-marine apparatus, a person is enabled to descend to the bottom of rivers and lakes, and explore the caverns of the deep, remaining for almost any length of time beneath the surface of the water, and breathing with almost the same facility as on terra firma. But it would be futile to attempt to enumerate one half the useful inventions and improvements, which have been made within the last half century.

We have heard it prophesied that the time is yet to arrive, when steam will be applied to very many of the operations now performed by hand. When by its agency, a perfect coat is made in the twinkling of an eye, out of a roll of cloth—or when a fashionable boot is manufactured simply by supplying the machine with the quantum suff. of common leather—or, more wonderful still, when steam is made to write and put in type effusions in poetry and prose—then will the days of miracles be revived.

Seriously, however, it is reasonable to suppose that many valuable improvements remain yet to be made, which we of the present age dream not of—improvements which will immeasurably lighten the labor of man, and which will therefore greatly tend to the substantial comfort and happiness of the whole civilized community.

MITCHELL THE FORGER.—Caught at last.—Under the head of "fashionable intelligence," the N. Y. Sun of Tuesday announces the capture of this "honorable absquatulator," by Officer Bowyer, of the N. Y. Police. His honor was accommodated with an apartment at the splendid edifice in Centre street, (the Tombs) in which not a few have for some time past been anxious to see him domiciled. He is said to look very much like just such a character as he is; and as though a little seclusion from the trials and temptations of the world would do him no harm.

THE ST. LOUIS MURDER.—By St. Louis papers of the 5th inst., we learn that Sewell and Warrick, two of the wretches engaged in the recent tragedy in that city, an account of which we published last week, have been arrested. Three of the four implicated by Ennis, have now been taken. Madison is still at large.

Soon after being taken, Warrick acknowledged his participation in the horrible work and corroborated the disclosure made by Ennis. His confession, however, implicated Ennis, who, he says, planned the plot but was not present at its execution.

Sewall confesses that the same gang were concerned in the robbery of Messrs. E. & A. Tracy's store, and that of Sinclair, Taylor & Co., at St. Louis.

HON. DANIEL WEBSTER.—This gentleman arrived at New York on Friday, on his way to Washington.

EZRA WHITE.—The trial of this man, for the murder of Fitzpatrick, has terminated in a verdict of manslaughter in the third degree, and recommended to mercy by the Jury.

It is said that the Marquis of Hereford, is a loser by the failure of the United States Bank, to the immense amount of £500,000.

SIGNS OF DRUNKENNESS.—The Rochester Democrat, in one of its police reports, lays down the following as signs of drunkenness which can hardly be mistaken: "A man is considered drunk when he goes to the pump to light his pipe, or when he can't see a hole through a ladder, or when he lies in the gutter and requests any one to come and tuck him up, or when he goes home at night and can't put the key in the door, and swears some person has stolen the key-hole, or when he attempts to wind up his watch with the boot-jack."

PROPER WORDS IN PROPER PLACES.—A farmer lately wrote to a committee of one of the Eastern Agricultural societies thus: "Gentlemen, you will have the goodness to enter me on your list of cattle for a bull!"

Intelligence.

MURDER.—We learn that Mr. James H. Wright, keeper of the Hotel in Knoxville, was shot down in that village, on Sunday, the 25th ultimo, by a man named Israel Champion. The deceased lingered about 30 hours, and expired. Champion is in the Jail of this county, awaiting his trial at the August term of the Crawford Superior Court.—Macon Telegraph.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—We learn that Mr. John Ward, a wealthy farmer in Withamsville, about 14 miles from this city, was accidentally killed last Thursday. He was out hunting, and in clambering over a fence, his gun got entangled, and its contents discharged into the head of Mr. W. who was killed instantly.—Cin. Reporter.

SUPPOSED SUICIDE.—A person named John Lathrop, of Norwich, Conn., died in this city, on Monday 10th ult., of poison, taken either purposely or accidentally—not known which. He was believed to be a man of wealth, and was evidently wandering in his mind.

A daughter of B. Newton esq., at Palmyra, Wayne county, aged nine years, was burned to death on the 8th inst. While leaning her head upon a table on which was a lighted candle, she fell asleep and her sleeve took fire from the blaze. Before she could be relieved from her burning clothes she was past recovery.

Isaac Haines, an aged colored man 60 years old, committed suicide at Philadelphia on Saturday by putting his throat.

Sentence of Execution.—Judge Barton this morning passed sentence upon Sarah Ann Davis for the wilful murder of Juliana Jordan. The prisoner's guilt was perfectly clear and it is doubted by no one. Judge Barton made the occasion of delivering the sentence more deeply impressive by his remarks and address to the wretched subject of it. She remained composed until the words were uttered, and then swooned. This is the first capital conviction of a woman in this city for at least sixty years.—Phil. Nat. Gazette.

Natal.—A man-of-war was at anchor below Woughby's Point yesterday morning, probably the Cyane, from the Mediterranean.—Norfolk Beacon.

A Fragment of Wreck.—Captain Davis, of the ship Goodwin, from Liverpool, states that about 15 days ago he passed a piece of wreck at sea, and the mate observing it, remarked that it evidently belonged to a steamer. He had no apprehension in relation to the President, or he would have picked the fragment up. Capt. D. arrived at this port on Saturday last.—Phil. Enquirer.

An Earthquake.—An earthquake occurred at Lima, South America, on the 22d December last, which shook off the roof of a school house, and buried twenty scholars and three masters beneath the ruins. All but one were taken out alive.

Capt. Barclay, the celebrated English pedestrian who walked a thousand miles in a thousand successive hours, arrived in this city on Monday and took rooms at the American.

FIRE.—The house of Mr. N. Hill, on the Kennebunk road, took fire on Wednesday morning last. The fire fell upon the bed where the children were lying, and set it on fire—and the shrieks of the children, who were badly burnt, gave the alarm to the parents. In rescuing their children from the flames, Mr. Hill and his wife were badly burnt. The house was not destroyed—and the neighbors turned out on the following day, one and all, and put their neighbor's house in complete repair.—Saco, (Me.) Democrat.

Winter Navigation.—Mr. Mellen Battel, an ingenious mechanic of this city, has taken out a patent for fitting a steamboat so as to force its way through ice of moderate thickness. The curious in such matters can examine the plan at Mr. Battel's machine shop, 15 Quay street.—Daily Adv.

Accident.—A sail boat was capsized in the Hudson river, opposite the village of Newburgh on Wednesday afternoon, and a lad named Hughes aged about 17 years, one of the celebrated musical performers, known as the Master Hughes, was drowned. The deceased, with his two younger brothers, were to have given a concert at the Orange Hotel, on Wednesday evening. The remainder of the party were picked up by the ferry and other boats, and brought to Newburgh in an almost exhausted state. It is a little remarkable that the deceased was the only one of the brothers who could swim, and yet the only one drowned.

Drowned.—A Mr. Austin was drowned in Franklin, N. H. last week. He was thrown from a raft in running Eastman's falls; his body has not been found. Another man was drowned in the same town in the same week, named Cole Chapman, a man of intemperate habits. His hat and jug of rum were found not far from a small brook, in which was found his body, with scarcely water enough to drown him.—N. H. Pat.

Another.—We regret to learn that young Mr. Wm. Coupland, son of Mrs. Coupland, of this city, was accidentally shot a short time since when crossing a river, with his cousin, near his uncle's seat in Canada. The young men were on a shooting expedition, and a willow twig catching the trigger of Mr. Coupland's gun, the load was discharged into his breast. He died in a few minutes.—St. Louis Bulletin.

Fatal Accident.—On Monday the 3d inst., a son of Mr. Hollica Greenwood, of Whitefield, N. H., was killed by a number of logs rolling over him in a Mill yard in that town.—N. H. Pat.

"Sport."—The Savannah Georgian says that during the recent races in Columbus, three men were shot, one of whom it is supposed will not survive. This is one of the certain products of the 'manly sport' of racing horses.

Awful.—From January to April, 1841, there have been chronicled in the newspapers, seventy-four murders and sixty-three suicides.

A Philosopher.—Madame Adolph is doing a world of business at the Lafayette Hotel telling fortunes. The curiosity among the Bostonians for knowing the secrets of the future, is so prevalent, that Madame Adolph would do well to open the business, and instruct some half a dozen of her sex in the mystic art, to attend to her customers. Crowds of anxious visitors wait the live-long day to get a peep at this wonderful Philosopher. The proportion of old maids and married men is nearly equal. One class to find out when they are to get married, the other when they are to get rid of their better halves.—Easton Notion.

Married.

On the 13th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Martin, Mr. John Cochran, to Miss Mary Gott, both of this city.

On Wednesday afternoon, the 12th inst. by the Rev. J. L. Hodge, Mr. James Hart, merchant of Troy, to Miss Louisa J. Martin of this city.

At South Kingston, Washington co. R. 1., on the 11th inst. by the Rev. W. H. Newman, Mr. S. V. R. Watson, of Albany, to Miss Julia, daughter of Elisha Watson, esq. of the former place.

By the Rev. Mr. Levings, Mr. William Trott, to Miss Elizabeth Pladwell, both of this city.

In Greenbush, on Tuesday, 18th inst. by the Rev. James G. Cordell, Mr. Allen Butler, formerly of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, to Miss Lucy Wood of Greenbush.

DIED.

Monday afternoon, Lydia Dutcher, relict of the late Salem Dutcher, in the 63d year of her age.

Tuesday morning, after a short but painful illness, Mrs Almira, wife of A. S. Clark, aged 23.

Tuesday morning, Wm. Henry, youngest son of Edwin Hubbard, aged 2 years and 2 months.

In Salem, Wash. co. last Sabbath, Mrs. Susan Woodworth, aged 71 years.

At Beaver Brook, Sullivan co., on the 11th instant, Col. Benjamin Woodward, formerly of Orange county aged 61 years.

In New York on Thursday evening, 13th inst. Laurence P. Jordan, esq. aged 39 years.

Suddenly, at Utica, Friday 14th inst. James Burk, of Cleveland, Oswego co. N. Y. in the 29th year of his age, formerly of Lower Canada.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

Hudson Lodge No. 7, Hudson R. A. Chapter, No. 6, and Lafayette Encampment, No. 7, will celebrate the coming Anniversary of "ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST," on the 24th of June next. Masonic Brethren, generally, are respectfully invited to unite in the festivities of the day.

By order of the Committee of Arrangements.

Committee of Correspondence and Invitation.

Hudson, May 4, 1841.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved Diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us; if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN—REMOVAL.—The Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the Travelling Public generally, that he has removed from his old stand nine doors below on the same side of the street to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 169 Market st. and for a number of years past, occupied by M. S. Crosby, as a Boarding house. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his friends and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is 4 stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms admirably calculated for Families, men of business, &c. Persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by Rail Road, Steamboat or Stage, will find the New England, well adapted to their accommodation, being within five or ten minutes walk of the Rail Road, and within sixty or seventy rods of the Steamboat landings. Breakfast will be prepared every morning during the season of Navigation, at 6 o'clock, or those wishing it—and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning Boat for New York—also at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is attached to the house with every convenience for those travelling with their teams, &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuation of their favors at his new one. His old Customers and the travelling public generally, are respectfully invited to give him a call; and he pledges himself that every exertion shall be made to make their stay while at his House both pleasant and agreeable. His prices will be moderate so as to suit the times. 75 cts. per day, for Board and Lodging. A. W. STARKS. Albany, May 15th, 1841.

REMOVAL.—JOSEPH CHATTERSON, Draper and Tailor respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has removed to the new store No. 119 Market-st. four doors south of the Eagle Tavern, where he intends to conduct the tailoring business in the latest and most approved fashions. J. C. trusts by his assiduity and attention to business to merit a share of public patronage, and solicits a continuation of the favors of his present customers; he flatters himself by the long experience he has had in the above business to be able to give general satisfaction to those who may favor him with a call. Just received a choice assortment of goods, suitable for the season. my 31st.

CORNING & COOK Book-Binders, 67 State, corner of Jam's street, (formerly Middle Lane), Albany. BLANK BOOKS of every description made to order. Paper of any size ruled to any pattern.

Particular attention paid to the binding of music books, law periodicals, old books, newspapers, &c. &c. They would respectfully solicit a share of public patronage.

By the recent improvements in the above establishment, the proprietors are ready to do all kinds of BOOK BINDING in the most neat and substantial manner. Persons having to bind for their libraries, will do well to call at the above establishment.

General satisfaction warranted. Prices to conform to the times. Albany, 1840.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptedness to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock. my 12.

THE DEAD SEA.

BY SAMUEL CULLEN CLISBE.

I've crossed Asphaltus' turgid tide,—
I've gazed beneath the silent wave,
And mark'd the ruins stretching wide
That fill its dark and fearful cave,
And with the eye of prophet old,
The scroll of time far back unroll'd.

Deep in the bosom of the lake,
(Whose fated waves no life sustain,)
Stand fane, and spire, and moated gate—
The beauteous cities of the plain;
Not quick with life, but silent all,
And shrouded in their watery pall!

The sounds of revelry were high,
Fair woman's eye was beaming bright,
And music, soft as zephyr's sigh,
Stole on the ear—and gushing light,
From festal hall, and lady's bower,
Cast over all a silv'ry shower.

The minstrel pealed the songs of old—
Th' impassion'd lover knelt before
The idol of his heart, and told
His dearest wish—the ceaseless roar
Of moving thousands filled the air,
For joy, and sin, were rev'ling there!

Hark! what sound is that—what burst
Of treasure'd wrath—of awful doom?
Ye children of a land accurs'd,
Look up—behold your fiery tomb!
See through the murky midnight air
The sulph'rous storm's presaging glare!

A cry of horror wild and shrill—
A hasty prayer—a mutter'd curse—
The infant's dying groan—the thrill
Of death—and such a death!—ah, worse
Than where the rod of famine fell—
Thus buried in an earthly hell!

A faint, low cry of misery rose—
A gasp—a thrill, and silence stole
O'er all save where the light'ning throws
A fitful gleam; and thunders roll,
And molten surges lash the walls,—
O'erwhelms the dead in flaming halls!

Three thousand years have roll'd away,
Yet still beneath the sluggish tide,
In low and fearful grandeur lay
The cities of the heathen's pride;
Death holds his courts in Sodom's halls,
And waves of death roll o'er her walls.

THE BRIGHTEST SPOT.

The Brighest Spot that earth can give,
When in thy presence, love I feel
Is not the throne where monarchs live
But here, where at thy feet I kneel;

To sip, as from ethereal spring,
Enchantment from thy honied lip;
And catch the sigh, on truant wing,
That steals, forbidden, as I sip;

To have thy hand in virgin-fear
Trembling o'er my fever'd brow;
To feel thy throbbing pulse so near,
And know it beats more quickly now;

And O! to know that thou dost too
In all my dotting trance, contrive
To wish it were forever new—
To wish it could 'en death survive.

HOUSEHOLD TREASURES.

BY MARY HOWITT.

What are they? gold and silver,
Or what such ore can buy?
The pride of silken luxury—
Rich Robes of Tyrian dye?
Guests that come thronging in
With lordly pomp and state
Or thankless livered serving men
To stand about the gate?

Or are they daintiest meats
Sent up on silver fine?
Or golden chased cups o'erbrimmed
With rich Falernian wine?
Or parchments setting forth
Broad Lands our fathers held?
Parks for our deer—ponds for our fish—
And woodsthat maybe felled?

No, no, they are not these! or else
God help the poor man's need!
Then, sitting 'mid his little ones,
He would be poor indeed!
They are not these! our household wealth
Belong not to degree;
It is the love with our souls—
The children at our knee!

My heart is filled with gladness
When I behold how fair,
How bright are rich men's children,
With their thick golden hair!
For I know, 'mid countless treasure,
Gleaned from the east and west,
These living, loving, human things
Are still the rich man's best!

But my heart o'erfloweth to mine eyes,
And a prayer is on my tongue,
When I see the poor man's children—
The toiling, though they're young—
Gathering with sun-burnt hands,
The dusty wayside flowers!
Alas! that pastime symboeth
Life's after, darker hours.

My heart o'erfloweth to mine eyes,
When I see the poor man stand,
After his daily work is done,
With children by the hand;
And this he kisseth tenderly,
And that sweet names doth call—
For I know he hath no treasure
Like those dear children small.

Oh, children young, I bless thee;
Ye keep such love alive!
And the home can ne'er be desolate
When love has room to thrive!
Oh, precious household treasures!
Life's sweetest, holiest claim—
The Saviour blessed ye while on earth—
I bless ye in his name!

THE WASTED FLOWER.

The storms of heaven have borne thee down;
Thy stem is broke—thy leaves are strown
In wild disorder o'er the plain,
Whence thou shalt never lift again
Thy head to catch the evening dew,
Or charm the lonely wanderer's view.

Yet, wasted flower! thy sweet perfume
Partakes not of thy fearful doom;
It lingers still around the spot
Where erst thy form the sunshine caught;
And pours its incense on the air,
When thou art desolate and bare.

Thou art a type, thou lonely flower!
Of virtue's death-surviving power—
Fit emblem of the fragrance shed
Around the truly virtuous dead—
The hallowed memory of the good,
Which from the grave's cold solitude,
Gives to the thought of parted worth,
A charm unknown to things of earth.

TO THE MOON.

Fair planet, hung out on the azure sky,
Like a rich jewel on a fair girl's brow;
Or like a lovely line of poetry
'Midst worlds of prose—from this cold sphere below
I love to gaze on thee; thy silver beams,
Shining serene, while lightnings round are hurled,
Make thee appear, so wakeful fancy deems,
Like some pure spirit in the angry world.
But most I love to see thee with thy bright
Attendants straying through the midnight skies;
For, whilst I gaze with mingled awe—delight—
Giant emotions in my bosom rise,
Until I almost wish earth's bonds were riven,
That my freed soul might wing its way to heaven.

IMPROMPTU.

Theodore Hook being in company where he had said something humorous in rhyme of every person present, on Mr. Winter, solicitor of taxes, being announced, made the following impromptu:

'Here comes Mr Winter,
Collector of taxes:
I advise you to give him
Whatever he axes;
I advise you to give it
Without any flummery,
For though his name's Winter,
His actions are summer-y.

ADDRESS

Delivered before Warren Lodge, No. 37.

BY JESSE R. JONES, ESQ.

BRETHREN AND COMPANIONS:

By the kind interposition of a beneficent Providence, we have been permitted to convene together on this occasion, to mingle in social converse, and to renew the pledges of our fraternal affection. The time, the occasion and the subject which presents itself for our consideration and reflection, are well calculated to draw upon the deepest fountains of our feelings, and to extract from the inmost recesses of our bosoms, the overflowings of our gratitude, benevolence and love. Though the subject which claims our attention is too deep, too profound, too capacious for the humble ability of your organ on this occasion, yet it is a subject that is intimately interwoven with every ligament of my heart. It is a subject which has shed a shining ray of hope, of bright expectation, of glowing anticipation around the darkest path of life in which it has been my destiny to travel. And I now feel cheered in the confident belief that its light will continue to illumine the residue of life's vanishing and changing scenes. Only take a survey of the Masonic Institution and its principles. What a wide-spread field of improvement both moral and intellectual, does it open on the mind of the Initiated! How does it expand and enlarge as he advances in the several degrees?—How sublime the morality of its precepts, how useful, entertaining and engaging, are the lessons which it teaches? How well adapted to that state of mutual dependence in which we find ourselves placed in social society are the reciprocal duties which it imposes.—How well calculated to nourish a high-souled patriotism in the bosoms of its votaries are that attachment and obedience to our government and laws, which it so solemnly enjoins? How unbounded its charity, how universal its benevolence? How sure, how unerring, how salutary the guides which it points out to us to guard our wavering steps along the thorny road of this world's dreary pilgrimage. How bright the light which it sheds on our destiny here, and how gloriously it hallows this life's dreary darkness with the sunbeams of an immortality beyond the grave.

Yet no Institution on the face of God's earth, no society of men that ever breathed the vital air of life or walked beneath the shining rays of the benignant sun have ever suffered such vile and unmeasured abuse as have the members of the Masonic fraternity. All that fanaticism could imagine, or ingenuity invent, all that superstition in her darkest dreams could conjure up, or bigotry promulgate. All that infamy from her gloomy cavern could rake or vengeance from her den-den, could fulminate have been poured in one continual stream on this devoted Institution. It has been invested with something supernatural by the ignorant and superstitious. They have imagined that infernal spirits, fiends or devils preside or have some agency in the nocturnal meetings of the Lodges. They have dressed it up in all the trappings of horror, disgust, and every thing that is revolting and repelling, not only to the finer, and more refined sensibilities of our nature, but to human nature itself in all its natural depravity. They have uttered proscriptions against the brethren, no matter what may have been their moral and religious worth, and the purity of their lives and conduct. Yet notwithstanding the slanders, misrepresentations, and vile abuses which it has suffered, notwithstanding the mighty efforts which have been made to put it down, and the infamy and degradation which have been heaped upon it, the Masonic Institution has survived the mighty wreck of thrones and altars, dynasties and temples, and rears its time-worn summit above the ruined grandeur of the most solid, the most permanent and the loftiest structures that the mind of man could invent. The mighty flood of ages which has buried in its bosom the monuments of the great, and the trophies of the valiant has rolled its desolating wave over this venerable Institution, leaving it unscathed, unimpaired, and undemolished. Will you ask me how this has come to pass. How this Institution has survived the angry storms which have raged around it, and the awful thunders that have threatened to rend it asunder. Why has it been exempted from that mutability and decay which have swept into dust and oblivion all other human Institutions?

Do not indulge the expectation for a moment that I will pretend that Masonry is of divine Institution. No, it is of terrestrial origin. But the principles upon which it is established are immutable. The foundation upon which this ancient Masonic fabric is erected, cannot be shaken neither by all-trying time with its desolating influence, nor by the combined powers of ignorance, bigotry nor superstition. What those principles are, it is my province to unfold and to expound to you, to-day. But before I proceed further, it may not be improper to answer some of the objections which have been made against Masonry. But do not expect that I will stoop to notice the vile and malignant slanders, and accusations which are rife upon the lips of the envious, the vulgar, and the bigoted. No! these deserve, and should receive the silent contempt and indignation of every honorable man, or honorable Mason. Neither will I attempt to defend the character or moral worth of the fraternity for these need no vindication at my hands at this, or any other time. For the greatest and best men who have adorned any age or any country, have been patrons of the order, and no Institution in this or any other country, that has received the sanction and support of a Washington, a LaFayette, a Franklin, and a Jefferson, can be brought into infamy and degradation by the foul machinations with which this Institution has been assailed. The greatest and most universal objection to Masonry, and one which carries with it the appearance of reason to those unacquainted with the regulations of the Lodges, and the government of the order, is its secrecy. Its secret meetings, its secret labor, and some great and mighty secret which most of people suppose is kept among Masons. (Ladies and Gentlemen probably before I am through I will let you into this secret so far as it could be of any benefit to you and if you will properly appreciate it, it will be incalculable advantage to you.) But to return from this digression in answer to the objection which has been made I will simply say, that usefulness and the utility of the institution, and the great and manifold advantages resulting from it to mankind can be perpetuated and preserved only by this veil which covers it from the public eye. It is the cord that binds it.—It is the cement that holds it together; destroy this, remove this veil and you will at once destroy an institution that has been acknowledged by the great and the good by the philanthropist and the philosopher, to be based upon the wisest and best of principles, and one too that is conducive to the benefit and happiness of mankind. And for what purpose would you demolish this institution which has been erected for the protection of the weak and unfortunate, and as a shelter for the way-faring man in this vast howling wilderness of life. Why you would demolish it merely to satisfy a vain and idle curiosity, to let peeping, goggle-eyed suspicion fix her withering gaze upon the wreck of human happiness, that it had wrought.

But there is another objection which carries an equal if not greater weight of reason with it than the former and one too which comes from a source not to be disregarded but which does and which should at all times and under all circumstances command the respect and attention of every honorable Mason. This is an objection which is mostly made against us by the ladies and is this; why should the female part of the community be excluded from the rights, privileges and benefits of the order. And, indeed it does look unreasonable to exclude the fairest part of God's creation, the pride and ornament of Man. Those beings who gild the dreary shades of adversity and lend a brighter glow to the sunshine of prosperity, who administer to our joys and allay our sorrows, who win us by their fascinating loveliness, from the haunts of vice and dissipation, who cheer and comfort us thro' all the changing vicissitudes of life, who go hand in hand with us strewing flowers along our thorny path—this surely demands an explanation at our hands.—The first reason that offers itself to my mind, and probably the best that could be adduced is to be found in the ancient establishment of the order, and in the primitive state of the Institution. Masonry in the earlier ages of the world, particularly at the time of the erection of the temple by Solomon was operative as well as speculative. The female constitution, its delicacy, the nature of female employments and pursuits, and the proper station in life to which nature assigned them, forbid that they should be employed in the hard and toilsome labor, the menial drudgery and exposure which employed the workmen upon the temple. For these reasons which I think entirely satisfactory, females were excluded from the institution of Masonry in its formation, as such. It is true that with us Masonry is speculative only and not operative this seems to waive the reasons for the exclusion of Eve's fair daughters from Masonic privileges; but from the danger of suffering innovations upon the rules and regulations of our ancient order which might, and which in all probability would ultimately destroy it, forbids our receiving you into the lodges at this day, and will in all probability always exclude you. But the objection is not against you, it is not that we are unwilling to receive you, on your own account; but it is the structure of the institution itself which with us is unalterable. But be assured that you are the special objects of our peculiar care and protection that the benefits if not the rights and privileges of masonry are extended to you. And I hope never to see the time when a Mason shall be remiss in his attention, care and protection of the female sex or wanting in respect and reverence for the female character. Another objection which is entitled to our attention and respect, in an eminent degree, is made against Masonry by the religious part of the community, but is an objection on their part which bespeaks a total destitution of that Christian charity which should characterize the conduct and actions of those professing to be followers of the precepts and examples inculcated by the immaculate Savior of the world, while upon earth; principles which he so forcibly and so solemnly enjoined. They object to Masonry because of the immorality of some of the members of the Institution. This Institution like all others, is liable to be abused, but because some wicked or designing men may have imposed themselves upon us, and crept into the lodges, is that any objection to the Institution itself or to its principles, surely not. The mere fact of a man's joining the lodge no more constitutes him a Mason than the fact of his joining the Church would constitute him a Christian. It is only he that acts and carries out the principles of the order in his deportment amongst men, in his intercourse with society, and in the faithful and honorable discharge of every duty, which is incumbent upon him, in life, as a moral, a social and an accountable being, that is entitled to the honorable distinction of a Mason.

Masonry embraces the whole duty of man as a rational, a social, and an accountable being. The greatest and most important of those duties, and those too which embrace all others, are to his God, his neighbor and to himself. His duty to God in never mentioning his name, but with that reverence which is due from a creature to his Creator. In rendering that obedience to his will and commands which infinite wisdom claims of finite intelligences. In honoring him in all our lives and conduct, in all his attributes and divine perfections, in keeping his law, and in loving him supremely, above every thing else, and our neighbor as ourselves. How numerous are the duties which devolve upon us in a relative point of view? How many are the ties, social and fraternal, that bind us to those with whom we are thus, by the ties of our civil policy, by our feelings of humanity, by the injunctions of our order, and by the wise contrivance of the supreme ruler of the universe. So intimately united and connected. The most important relative duties which are inculcated by our principles, are a firm, an upright and an honorable deportment in our conduct among men. A strict adherence to the faithful discharge of the duties of life, never betraying any trust that may be reposed in us, but in all things, and under all circumstances, to act upon principles of virtue, honor and fidelity.—To do justice to all mankind. To render to every man his due. To cherish feelings of benevolence and kindness towards our fellow beings. To let the hand of charity be extended to the relief of the distressed and the unfortunate. To wipe the falling tear from the bedewed cheek of sorrow. To smoothe the thorny pillow of suffering and pain. Though the array of duty and obligation which stands thus thick in our way, may almost deter the timid and the feeble from the rugged path, yet, my brethren, let us reflect in our toilsome journey, upon the happiness, the joy, the delight, and the heartfelt satisfaction that will inevitably follow from a faithful discharge of those duties. Oh! how pleasing, how charming, how calm and heavenly, are the feelings which inspire the benevolent heart, when man is made the instrument of administering to his fellow man. To call the wanderer from the bewildering madness of vice, dissipation and degradation. To snatch the heedless and the thoughtless from the brink of the vortex of sin and pollution. To calm the troubled mind, and soothe the aching heart. To hush the orphan's grief. To turn the widow's wail and lamentation into rejoicing and gladness. To be the bearer of glad tidings and good news to those ready to faint. To irradiate the sullen dungeon's gloom, to set the oppressed captive at liberty. Oh these are sunny spots in life's dreary waste. They are flowery green in the rugged wilderness of earth's gloomy pilgrimage—they are cooling springs in the scorching, withering Sahara of time. Along the straight forward path of duty bloom the joys, the happiness and enjoyments of this world's blessings. Along this path the feelings, the soul of man can feast and luxuriate on rational delights.

His duty to himself consists in preserving his life and conduct free from intemperance and excess, and from the control of the vicious, the turbulent and unruly passions of the human heart. Will you believe me, when I assure you, upon the honor a man and a Mason, these are the abstract principles of Masonry.

But besides these, the mode and manner of initiating the regular succession of the degrees themselves, and the admonitory symbols are all replete with religious and moral instruction. On advancing to the first degree, the candidate is forcibly reminded of that moral gloom which overshadowed them on the disobedience of our first parents in the garden of Eden; of the darkness and obscurity of his mind and reason until the light of truth, that light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world bursts in irradiating splendor on his benighted and grovelling mind. In a moral sense he feels, and that sensibly to his impotence, his weakness and his dependence. He is willing though strong to throw his protection on the weak. Though wise to be instructed by those less intellectual than himself from whence he may draw this useful moral lesson that there are none so powerful, so learned, or so wise, but what they may under some circumstances, or situations be practiced by the weak, gain knowledge from the simple and reap instruction from the ignorant. He is also taught that all his undertaking in life should be of such a nature that he could without shame or confusion of soul or conscience ask the blessing of God to crown them. The Holy Bible is given him as a rule of life. The square, to square his actions, by the precepts of virtue and the compass to circumscribe his desires and passions, and to keep them in due bounds with all mankind, but more especially with a brother Mason. The lamb skin, or white apron reminds him of that purity of life, that unblemished character, that spotless heart, that will make him a fit inhabitant of that spiritual building that house not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens. And he never can forget the striking admonition, that through all life, it will be his duty to relieve the distresses of those he meets with in destitution and misery, so far as he is able. On advancing to the second degree, more light is shed into the dark cavities and recesses of his understanding. All the beauties, the grandeur and sublimity of the terrestrial and celestial worlds, are opened to his admiring mind, with all the moral and divine lessons which are from thence to be drawn. He is taught to admire and to adore the power and majesty of that being who spake, and the earth arose from chaos—who commanded, and the angry waters of the mighty deep retired within these bounds. Who unrolled the starry-decked, heaven, as a scroll, and appointed to the stars their course. Who commissions the comet on its blazing journey through the boundless regions of illimitable space, and sends the forked lightnings to rend the air. Who shakes the earth, with his thunders, rends the sturdy forest with his whirlwind, and rides dreadful upon the storm. Who rules and governs the whole system of universal nature by his will, and directs the destiny of man.—By these sublime contemplations, his mind is taught to look up through nature to nature's God, to fear, to reverence, and adore him, for his awful judgments, his manifold blessings, and his infinite wisdom and power.

On being raised to the sublime degree of a Master Mason, he feels that in life, he often wanders in devious and untrodden paths. That enemies lie in wait—that he is beset with sore trials and temptations while sojourning through this vale of tears. Yet he is taught, that though enemies assail, though temptations allure, and though death should stare him in the face, it is his duty to maintain his integrity, to discharge his trust and manfully to withstand every trial and temptation that may cross his path. He is also reminded of the certainty and of the solemnity of death; that it is appointed unto man once to die. How solemn the reflection. And, must we all die. Must the aged with their wisdom lie down in the bed of death. Must the mighty and the strong lie down relaxed, cold and inanimate in the yawning tomb. Must the blooming cheek of youth turn pale, his buoyant hopes, be cut down as a tender flower, and his throbbing heart sleep unconscious beneath its kindred clay. Must the tender forms and winning beauty of our daughters and sisters lie cold and inanimate in the embraces of the grim monster of terror. Must the infant bud be blasted and waste its fragrance beneath the silent clod of the valley; yes we must all die. Go to the silent grave-yard and there you will find the narrow dwelling, the long resting place of aged sires, and the tender infant, the youth cut down in his bloom and the man shorn of his strength, and after death what then? What of that far off realm—that undiscovered country from whence no traveller returns. Brethren, in view of this solemn subject, let me once admonish you of the high and important duties, which you are called upon to perform: can you forget your promises of compliance and resolutions formed of a faithful discharge of those duties? Do not the admonitory symbols meet your eyes on every side to keep you in lively remembrance? Look around on this interesting array. Are not here our mothers, and our daughters, our wives and our sisters? do they not admonish you, by that purity which is attendant upon virtue, to pursue such a course of life as will raise our order from its degradation and establish it in all its pristine purity? Does not the prattling, smiling infant, that climbs on your knee to caress, drive conviction to your heart, will not the awful thought of death arouse you? or will you be won by the blessings and happiness that await the faithful beyond the scenes of time and sense? For, brethren, the doctrines of our order do not leave us in the embraces of the tomb forever. For we are inspired with hope in the degree of which we have been speaking to believe, that though our bodies may die, and mingle with the dust, and that though the cypress may long flourish at our heads, and the green grass wave o'er our bed, yet that the spirit shall return to that God who gave it, that while in view of our mortality we might almost feel that an Angel's arm could not snatch us from the grave; yet the doctrine of eternal life, which is so lively represented by the evergreen, bids us say with triumph, legions of angels can't confine us there. But when the last sands in time's hour-glass are waning—when nature shall give premonitory signs of approaching dissolution when the fig-tree shall cast her untimely leaves as if shaken with a mighty wind—when the stars of heaven shall fall from their places, and all nature be tumbling into ruin, we shall arise above the fiery void, the wreck of matter and crush of worlds, and if we have done our duty here, and obeyed the will and kept the commands of our great high-priest we shall be admitted into the celestial lodge above, where the grand architect of universal nature resides.

And I know that you will join with me in the fond aspiration that when at last that solemn hour shall come, that the Masonic edifice may be the last to be demolished by nature's final ruin, and all good Masons with the salt of the earth and the light of the world, the first to pass the gates of a blessed immortality.

BUYING A RING—A SCENE.

Enter Ladies.

Lady.—I wish to see some of your most fashionable finger rings.

(The jeweller shows a number.)

Lady.—Are these the latest style? What is the price of this? (selecting one from the variety shown her.)

Jeweller.—Three dollars and a half.

Lady.—Three dollars and a half! what a price! I know I can buy them at other stores for two dollars. What do you ask for this plain gold one?

Jeweller.—I have always sold gold rings of that kind for one dollar and a quarter, but you may have it for fifty cents.

Lady.—Fifty cents for this plain ring! why, it is a monstrous price! I never heard of such a thing!

Jeweller.—I wish I could trade with you, Ma'am: you shall have it for thirty-seven and a half cents.

Lady.—No, sir, I cannot think of it; I want to buy a ring, but cannot afford to give such an exorbitant price.

Jeweller.—Say no more, ma'am—you shall have it for twenty-five.

Lady.—Oh, that's altogether too much; I know I can buy them cheaper elsewhere.

Jeweller.—I am desirous of securing your custom, Ma'am, and I will sell it for twelve and a half cents.

Lady.—Ah, you are getting a little more reasonable, but twelve and a half cents is too high.

Jeweller.—I am resolved to please you, Ma'am, and my lowest price is six and a quarter cents.

Lady.—(After examining it very closely.) Will you warrant it to be pure gold?

Jeweller.—Gold of an extra fineness. It suits your finger exactly, and you shall have the little box into the bargain.

Lady.—(Aside to her sister.) Oh, I almost wish we had brought some money with us. (Aloud.) Is that your lowest price, sir?

Jeweller.—That, Ma'am, is my lowest price.

Lady.—If that's the case, I'm afraid we shall not be able to trade; I know I can buy them for three cents at the other shops! good morning, sir.—(Exit ladies.)

Jeweller.—Good morning, ladies. Well, that beats all!—Three cents for a gold ring that cost me one dollar by the dozen! And this is what is called shopping.

The report that an old lady in her anxiety to hear a courting scene, run her head through the key hole, is now contradicted.

A person being asked what a ghost said to him, which he pretended to have seen, "how should I know what he he said? I am not skilled in the dead languages."

HOW TO CURE A HUSBAND.

A woman, whom her husband used to frequently scold, went to a cunning man to enquire how she might cure him of his barbarity. The sagacious soothsayer heard her complaint; and after pronouncing some hard words, and using various gesticulations, while he filled a vial with some colored liquid, desired her, whenever her husband was in a passion, to take a mouthful of the liquor, and keep it in her mouth for five minutes. The woman, rejoiced at so simple a remedy, strictly followed the counsel which was given her, and by her silence escaped the usual annoyance. The contents of the bottle being at last expended, she returned to the cunning man, and anxiously begged another possessed of the same virtue. "Daughter," said the man, "there was nothing in the bottle but brown sugar and water. When your husband is in a passion, hold your tongue, and, my life on it, he will not scold you."

APPALLING MURDER, AND ATTEMPTED SUICIDE AT LIVERPOOL.

One of the most appalling events we ever remember in the domestic circle, occurred on Tuesday morning at Portland-place, Roscommon-street, Everton. At six o'clock the neighborhood in which the tragical occurrence took place was thrown into dreadful excitement in consequence of a rumor that William Jenner, a cotton broker, had attempted to assassinate his wife and family by shooting at them with pistols loaded with bullets. The report was confirmed by one of the children escaping from the house, and giving the alarm to the policeman. It appears that the officers immediately proceeded to the house, and there saw the wretched father, whose reason appeared to have returned, and who immediately surrendered.

The statement given by one of his children proved, alas, to be too true; the mother was lying on the floor of the kitchen, apparently lifeless, with several wounds from the pistol bullets on her head. She was raised from the floor, and although life was not extinct, but little hope was and is still, entertained that she will survive. Another policeman proceeded up stairs, and there found one of the children lifeless upon the bedroom floor, and bathed in its own blood. The pistols had been but too unceremoniously discharged in the temple of the unfortunate child.

The boy who had escaped was requested by his father in an apparently very affectionate manner to 'come near to him and give him a kiss,' but the poor child horrified at the fate of his mother and brother, cried out "Oh! you are going to kill me," and fled from the house to give the alarm in the manner we have described. The prisoner assigned as a reason for the perpetration of the horrible deed, that he thought it better to see his wife and children dead, than to see them brought to poverty and distress. He has been a highly respectable merchant for many years at Charleston, New Orleans, and Liverpool, but some years ago he lost the whole, or nearly the whole, of his property in cotton speculations, and has since struggled hard against difficulties, which threatened distress and privation to his wife and children.

He was this afternoon brought before Mr. Rushton. He was attired in a morning gown, but as he covered his face with hand, and sat down, he was scarcely observed by the great number of persons who were present at the investigation. After a lengthened examination, the prisoner was fully committed to take his trial for wilful murder at the assizes.—English Paper.

FLATTERY IN RAGS.

We lately came across an anecdote in an English paper, which furnishes a fine lesson to the study of human nature. A miserable looking beggar in piteous accents implored the charity of a well-dressed lady who was passing by. But he was not graciously received. "I have no small change," said she, with a repulsive look. "Then, most charming madam," said the philosopher in rags, "allow me the privilege of kissing your beautiful lily-white hand!" "No, my friend," replied the fair one with a smile, "I will not do that, but there's half a crown for you!"

PUTTING A MAN ASHORE.

The offender was a "young man with a very bad countenance," and had been on board only about one day, during which time he had managed to insult several of the passengers, and to violate, in several instances, the rules of the boat; and on being threatened several times by the captain that he would be put ashore, if he didn't conduct himself properly, he only behaved the worse.

It was on a cold stormy day, and on either shore of the "mad Missouri," a dense forest was all that met the eye.

"Man the yawl, mate; a man wishes to go ashore," said the captain.

"Aye aye, sir."
 In a few minutes the yawl was rowed alongside the fore-castle. The captain then, touching the unruly passenger, observed, "The boat is ready, sir; show the steward your baggage, if you have any."

"Stranger."—"You be d—d—I don't leave this boat alive, in this place. Do you—"

"Captain."—"Mate, call two men and wait upon this man ashore," said the captain, very coolly.

"Stranger," (drawing a large bowie knife).—"The first man that dares lay hand on me, receives this blade to the hilt," vociferated the stranger.

"Mate."—"Move yourself forward there, my old boy," collaring the infuriated man.

The stranger resisted with all his strength, but the mate and two jack tars were too much for him, and they very soon disarmed him, and placed him in the yawl and rowed for shore, where the valiant blackleg was safely landed, the boat's crew merely laughing at the fellow's daring threats.—St. Louis Bul.

LOVER'S LEAP.

BY PROXY.

In Merrick's History of Haverhill, the following story is given as a historical fact:—

"One Joseph Whitaker, who was quartered in the garrison of that town in its early settlement, had become smitten with the charms of one Mary W— residing there. Long he had wished to declare his passion to her, but he had not the courage. At length he nerved his shrinking courage, and with a palpitating heart, and in broken accents, made a declaration of his love and concluded the harangue by offering his heart and hand. Mary heard his story attentively, and then flatly refused to have any thing to do with him. What a hard hearted creature! Joseph somewhat staggered at so prompt a denial, but determined not to suffer her to escape so easily. He plead his cause most manfully, but all was in vain—she remained stubborn and hard hearted as at first. As a last resource he told her that if she did not accept his offer "he would go and jump into the well." This was truly a desperate resolution, but it had no effect on the cruel heart of the maiden—she still persisted in her refusal. Joseph then arose, probably from a kneeling posture—and, casting a long and lingering look on the unfeeling girl, left the garrison. He went to the well, and looking into "the deep and dark abyss," anxiously weighed the matter before the final leap. It was a stern resolve—he thought of it earnestly—he wavered and at last determined not to throw away his life for such a hard hearted creature. While "casting himself about," to see how he could escape from this sad dilemma, and still preserve some appearance of having done the deed, a new idea happily flashed across his cranium. A large log was lying near, which he resolved should be the Joseph to jump into the well instead of himself. Soon as this commendable determination was formed, he seized the log, plunged it into the "watery deep," and immediately concealed himself behind the curb.

But where was Mary all this while? She had been listening attentively at the door, half sorry she had denied him so long and hardly believing he would commit so rash an act. But when she heard the heavy plunge of wooden Joseph, her heart completely relented, and oh! how fervently she then wished she had not refused his offer. She ran hastily to the well and bending over the earth with an agonizing heart—"Oh Joseph! Joseph! Joseph! If you are in the land of the living I will have you!" Joseph saw and heard the whole, and his heart leaped for joy at this intelligence, immediately leaving the place of his concealment, he rushed into her arms. "Oh Mary! Mary! I will take you at your word."

The long embrace—the mutual reconciliation—the many tears of joy—and long years of happiness that followed, we will not attempt to describe."

Extraordinary Scene.—G. E. A. Hamilton, who recently perpetrated a forgery, was sentenced on the 8th inst. in the criminal court of New Orleans, to four years' hard labor in the penitentiary. Previous to the sentence he addressed the court, and endeavored by a strong appeal to the feelings of the jury, to enlist its sympathies in his behalf. The address, however, was so contradictory, and so full of apparent falsehood, that it produced quite the contrary effect.

"Never, in my life," said Judge Canonge, in his charge, "have I witnessed so much duplicity, such a want of candor, and yet such an affectation of truth."

As soon as the sentence was passed (says the Picayune) the prisoner drew a penknife from his pocket, one of the blades of which he opened. Being seen, the cry was "hold him! catch him! But before any one laid hands on him, he entered the dock, and plunged the knife twice into his breast. The first stab was in the region of the pit of the stomach, the other was near the nipple of the left breast. The blood flowed from the wounds profusely, and the prisoner fainted away. He was removed to the jury room, and a doctor was immediately called, who dressed the wounds.

According to the Picayune, the prisoner is very young and has considerable talent and acquisitions.

Rather Foolish.—Running after a runaway wife, and when found, begging her return to the home which she has dishonored.

Rather Vain.—A snuff taking slovenly old bachelor imagining himself to be the cynosure of all female eyes.

Very Consistent.—A thorough democrat ashamed of poor relations.

Awful Kind.—A nice young man professing unbounded love for a simple young girl, in proof of which benevolent feeling, he insists that she shall ruin herself for his gratification.

April Showers.—A big, black rain, with occasional snow storms, from one end of the month to the other.—Atlas.

A CAREFUL SOLDIER.—A new recruit coming into action, followed the example of his comrades, and loaded his musket. Having done this, he placed the breech of his piece on the ground, and appeared to be anxiously endeavoring to draw his charge. One of his comrades observing him, sung out, "Jim, why don't you fire, and let 'em have it?" "Because," replied he, "I doesn't like to; I shall hurt somebody, for I've got a ball in my gun, and can't get it out!"

THE LEGENDARY.

From the Knickerbocker.

LEGEND

OF DON MUNIO SANCHE DE HINOJOSA.

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE STANLEY BOYS.

In the cloisters of the ancient Benedictine convent of San Domingo, at Silos, in Castile, are the mouldering yet magnificent monuments of the once powerful and chivalrous family of Hinojosa. Among these, reclines the marble figure of a knight, in complete armor, with the hands pressed together, as if in prayer. On one side of his tomb is sculptured in relief a band of Christian cavaliers, capturing a cavalcade of male and female Moors; on the other side, the same cavaliers are represented kneeling before an altar. The tomb, like most of the neighboring monuments, is almost in ruins, and the sculpture is nearly unintelligible, excepting to the keen eye of the antiquary. The story connected with the sepulchre, however, is still preserved in the old Spanish chronicles, and is to the following purport.

In old times, several hundred years ago, there was a noble Castilian cavalier, named Don Munio Sancho de Hinojosa, lord of a border castle, which had stood the brunt of many a Moorish foray. He had seventy horsemen as his household troops, all of the ancient Castilian proof; stark warriors, hard riders, and men of iron; with these he scoured the Moorish lands, and made his name terrible throughout the borders. His castle hall was covered with banners, and armors, and Moslem helms, the trophies of his prowess. Don Munio was, moreover, a keen huntsman; and rejoiced in bounds of all kinds, steeds for the chase, and hawks for the towering sport of falconry. When not engaged in warfare, his delight was to beat up the neighboring forests; and scarcely ever did he ride forth, without hound and horn, a boar-spear in his hand, or a hawk upon his fist, and an attendant train of huntsmen.

His wife, Donna Maria Palacin, was of a gentle and timid nature, little fitted to be the spouse of so hardy and adventurous a knight; and many a tear did the poor lady shed, when he sallied forth upon his daring enterprises, and many a prayer did she offer up for his safety.

As this doughty cavalier, was one day hunting, he stationed himself in a thicket, on the borders of a green glade of the forest, and dispersed his followers to rouse the game, and drive it toward his stand. He had not been here long, when a cavalcade of Moors, of both sexes, came pranking over the forest lawn. They were unarmed, and magnificently dressed in robes of tissue and embroidery, rich shawls of India, bracelets and anklets of gold, and jewels that sparkled in the sun.

At the head of this troop rode a youthful cavalier superior to the rest in dignity and loftiness of demeanor, and in splendor of attire: beside him was a damsel, whose veil, blown aside by the breeze, displayed a face of surpassing beauty, and eyes cast down in maiden modesty, yet beaming with tenderness and joy.

Don Munio thanked his stars for sending him such a prize, and exulted at the thought of bearing home to his wife the glittering spoils of these infidels. Putting his hunting-horn to his lips, he gave a blast that rung through the forest. His huntsmen came running from all quarters, and the astonished Moors were surrounded and made captives.

The beautiful Moor wrung her hands in despair, and her female attendants uttered the most piercing cries. The young Moorish cavalier alone retained self-possession. He inquired the name of the Christian knight, who commanded this troop of horsemen. When told that it was Don Munio Sancho de Hinojosa, his countenance lighted up. Approaching that cavalier, and kissing his hand, Don Munio said he, "I have heard of your fame as a true and valiant knight, terrible in arms, but schooled in the noble virtues of chivalry. Such do I trust to find you. Is me you behold Abadil son of a Moorish Alcayde. I am on the way to celebrate my nuptials with this lady; chance has thrown us in your power, but I confide in your magnanimity. Take all our treasure and jewels; demand what ransom you think proper for our person, but suffer us not to be insulted or dishonored."

When the good knight heard this appeal, and beheld the beauty of the youthful pair, his heart was touched with tenderness and courtesy. "God forbid," said he, "that I should disturb such happy nuptials. My prisoners in troth shall ye be, for fifteen days, and immured within my castle, where I claim, as conqueror, the right of celebrating your espousals."

So saying, he despatched one of his fleetest horsemen in advance, to notify Donna Maria Palacin of the coming of this bridal party; while he and his huntsmen escorted the cavalcade, not as captors, but as a guard of honor. As they drew near to the castle, the banners were hung out, and the trumpets sounded from the battlements; and on their nearer approach, the draw-bridge was lowered, and Donna Maria came forth to meet them, attended by her ladies and knights, her pages and her minstrels. The took the young bride, Allifra, in her arms, kissed her with the tenderness of a sister, and conducted her into the castle. In the mean time, Don Munio sent forth missives of every direction, and had viands and dainties of all kinds collected from the country round; and the wedding of the Moorish lovers was celebrated with all possible state and festivity. For fifteen days, the castle was given up to joy and revelry. There were tiltings and jousts at the ring, and bull-fights, and banquets, and dances to the sound of minstrelsy. When the fifteen days were at an end, he made the bride and bridegroom magnificent presents, and conducted them and their attendants safely beyond the borders. Such, in old times, were the courtesy and generosity of a Spanish cavalier.

Several years after this event, the King of Castile summoned his nobles to assist in a campaign against the Moors. Don Munio Sancho was among the first to answer to the call, with seventy horsemen, all staunch and well-tried warriors. His wife, Donna Maria, hung about his neck. "Alas, my lord!" exclaimed she, "how often wilt thou tempt thy fate, and when wilt thy thirst for glory be appeased."

"One battle more," replied Don Munio, "one battle more, for the honor of Castile, and I here make a vow, that when this is over, I will lay by my sword, and repair with my cavaliers in pilgrimage to the sepulchre of our Lord at Jerusalem." The cavaliers all joined with him in the vow, and Donna Maria felt in some degree soothed in spirit: still, she saw with a heavy heart the departure of her husband, and watched his banner with wistful eyes, until it disappeared among the trees of the forest.

The King of Castile led his army to the plains of Almanara, where they encountered the Moorish host, near to Ucles. The battle was long and bloody; the Christians repeatedly wavered, and were as often rallied by the energy of their commanders. Don Munio was covered with wounds, but refused to leave the field. The Christians at length gave way, and the king was hardly pressed, and in danger of being captured.

Don Munio called upon his cavaliers to follow him to the rescue. "Now is the time," cried he, "to prove your loyalty. Fall to, like brave men! We fight for the true faith, and if we lose our lives here, we gain a better life hereafter."

Rushing with his men between the king and his pursuers, they checked the latter in their career and gave time for their monarch to escape; but they fell victims to their loyalty. They all fought to the last gasp. Don Munio was singled out by a powerful Moorish knight, but having been wounded in the right arm, he fought to disadvantage, and was slain. The battle being over, the Moor paused to possess himself of the spoils of this redoubtable Christian warrior. When he unlaced the helmet, however, and beheld the countenance of Don Munio, he gave a great cry, and smote his breast. "Who is me!" cried he; "I have slain my benefactor! The flower of knightly virtue! the most magnanimous of cavaliers!"

While the battle had been raging on the plain of Salmanara, Donna Maria Palacin remained in her castle, a prey to the keenest anxiety. Her eyes were fixed on the road that led from the country of the Moors, and often she asked the watchman of the tower, "What seest thou?"

One evening, at the shadowy hour of twilight, he sounded his horn. "I see," cried he, "a numerous train winding up the valley. There are mingled Moors and Christians. The banner of my lord is in the advance. Joyful tidings!" exclaimed the old senechal:

"my lord returns in triumph, and brings captives!" Then the courts rang with shouts of joy; and the standard was displayed, and the trumpets were sounded, and the draw-bridge was lowered, and her pages, and her minstrels, to welcome her lord from the wars. But as the train drew nigh, she beheld a sumptuous bier, covered with black velvet, and on it lay a warrior, as if taking his repose; he lay in his armor, with his helmet on his head, and his sword in his hand, as one who had never been conquered, and around the bier were the escutcheons of the house of Hinojosa.

A number of Moorish cavaliers attended the bier, with emblems of mourning, and with dejected countenances; and their leader cast himself at the feet of Donna Maria, and hid his face in his hands. She beheld in him the gallant Abadil, whom she had once welcomed with his bride to her castle, but who now came with the body of her lord, whom he had unknowingly slain in battle!

The sepulchre erected in the cloisters of the Convent of San Domingo, was achieved at the expense of the Moor Abadil, as a feeble testimony of his grief for the death of the good knight Don Munio, and his reverence for his memory. The tender and faithful Donna Maria soon followed her lord to the tomb. On one of the stones of a small arch, besides his sepulchre, is the following simple inscription: Hic jacet Maria Palacin, uxor Munonis Sancti De Hinojosa. Here lies Maria Palacin, wife of Munio Sancho Hinojosa.

The legend of Don Munio Sancho does not conclude with his death. On the same day on which the battle took place on the plain of Salmanara, a chaplain of the Holy Temple at Jerusalem, while standing at the outer gate, beheld a train of Christian cavaliers advancing, as if in pilgrimage. The chaplain was a native of Spain, and as the pilgrims approached, he knew the foremost to be Don Munio Sancho de Hinojosa, with whom he had been well acquainted in former times. Hastening to the patriarch, he told him of the honorable rank of pilgrims at the gate. The patriarch, therefore, went forth with a grand procession of priests and monks, and received the pilgrims with all due honor. There were seventy cavaliers, beside their leader, all stark and lofty warriors. They carried their helmets in their hands, and their faces deadly pale. They greeted no one, nor looked either to the right or to the left, but entered the chapel, and kneeling before the Sepulchre of our Saviour, performed their orisons in silence. When they had concluded, they rose as if to depart, and the patriarch and his attendants advanced to speak to them, but they were no more to be seen. Every one marvelled what could be the meaning of this prodigy. The patriarch carefully noted down the day, and sent to Castile to learn tidings of Don Munio Sancho de Hinojosa. He received for reply, that on the very day specified, that worthy knight, with seventy of his followers, had been slain in battle. These, therefore, must have been the blessed spirits of those Christian warriors, come to fulfil their vow of a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. Such was Castilian faith, in the olden time, which kept its word, even beyond the grave.

If any one should doubt of the miraculous apparition of these phantom knights, let him consult the History of the Kings of Castile and Leon, by the learned and pious Fray Prudencio de Sandoval, Bishop of Pamplona, where he will find it recorded in the History of the King Don Alonso VI., on the hundred and second page. It is too precious a legend, to be lightly abandoned to the doubter.

It is said that a man in New Orleans was so cross-eyed that in trying to get asleep he wrung his neck off.

"I say Mister, how came your eyes so all-~~and~~ crooked?" "My eyes?" "Yes." "That came between two girls and trying to look love to both at a time."

A Fact.—"Miss Brown, I wish you'd sew up my trousers, so they won't keep coming down: the boys keep plaguing me."

"Why don't you get your mother to do it for you, Jemmy?" "O coz she can't; she's gone to the Sewing Circle."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ORIGIN OF INVENTION.

Electricity was discovered by a person observing that a piece of rubbed glass, or some similar substance attracted bits of paper, &c. Galvanism again owes its origin to Madam Galvani's noticing the contraction of the muscle of a skinned frog, which was accidentally touched by a person at the moment of the professor's husband, taking an electric spark from the machine. He followed up the hint by experiments.—Pendulum clocks were invented by Galileo's observing the lamp in a church swinging to and fro. The telescope we owe to some children of a spectacle maker placing two or more pair of spectacles before each other, and looking through them at a distant object. The barometer originated in the circumstances of a pump which had been fixed higher than usual above the surface of a well, being found not to draw water. A sagacious observer hence deducted the pressure of atmosphere and tried quicksilver. The Argand lamp was invented by one of that name having remarked that a tube held by chance over a candle caused it to burn up with a bright flame—an effect before unattainable—though earnestly sought after. Without the Argand lamp, lighthouses, (to pass over minor objects) could not be made efficient and on the importance of these it is needless to dwell.—Penny Mag.

An experiment was recently made at New Orleans by an English gentleman, on the notes of one of the city banks in the presence of the officers and of sundry citizens, by which he demonstrated his ability to efface totally, and without leaving a solitary trace every ink mark existing on the face of the notes.—The impressions made by the ink were removed by the feather point of a quill imbued with some chemical preparation compounded by the gentleman in question. He thus established with perfect ease that certificates of deposit and other bank documents in writing can be altered for purposes of counterfeiting. After this experiment, he wrote a few lines on a piece of ordinary writing paper, and sent it to an experienced chemist, declaring that it was impossible to remove it. He has offered to sell his secret to the various banking institutions at a reasonable rate. The same gentleman has made known his discovery to the Bank of England.—Clipper.

The Bavarian government has just granted a patent for a new lithographic process, to which its inventor has given the name of Lithosterotype. This process consists in tracing the subject on the stone, with a new black or colored ink, and then laying on the spaces a combination of acids, which eats away the stone, so as to leave the lines of the ink tracing in relief greater than that of printing types. From the stone thus prepared any number of impressions, it is said, may be taken by the common press, much clearer than those which are obtained by the ordinary lithographic process.

THE GATHERER.

AN AFFECTING SCENE.

The following affecting description is extracted from Bolwer's latest production, "Night and Morning."

In a miserable grabal, or garret, a mechanic, yet young and stricken by a lingering malady, contracted by the labor of his occupation, was slowly passing from that world which, for the mass of the inhabitants the curse of Cain is everlastingly at work. Now this man had married for love, and his wife had loved him; and it was the cares of that early marriage that had consumed him to the bone. But extreme want, if long continued, eats up love when it has nothing else to consume. And when people are very long dying, the people they fret and trouble begin to think of that too often hypocritical prettiness of phrase termed a "happy release." So the worn-out and half-famished wife did not care three straws for the dying husband, whom a year or two ago she has vowed to love and cherish in sickness and in health. But still she seemed to care, for she moaned, and pined, and wept as the man's breath grew fainter and fainter.

"Ah, Jean!" said she sobbing, "what will become of me, a poor lone widow, with nobody to work for my bread?" And with that thought she took on worse than before.

"I am stifling," said the dying man, rolling round his ghastly eyes. "How hot it is! Open the window—I should like to see the light—daylight once again."

"Mon Dieu! what whims he has, poor man!"—muttered the woman without stirring.

The poor wretch put his skeleton hand out and clutched his wife's arm.

"I shan't trouble you long, Mairé! Air—air!"

"Jean, you will make yourself worse; besides, I shall catch my death of cold. I have scarce a rag on, but I will just open the door."

"Pardon me," groaned the sufferer; "leave me then."

Poor fellow! perhaps at that moment the thought of unkindness was sharper than the sharp cough which brought blood at every paroxysm. He did not like her so near him, but he did not blame her. Again I say, poor fellow!

The woman opened the door, and went to the other side of the room and sat down on an old box and began darning an old handkerchief. The silence was soon broken by the moans of the fast dying man, and again he muttered, as he tossed to and fro, with bated white lips—"Je m'étouffe!"—Air!

There was no resisting that prayer, it seemed so like the last. The wife laid down the needle, put the handkerchief round her throat, and opened the window.

"Do you feel easier now?"

"Bless you Marie!—yes, that's good—good—it puts me in mind of old days, that breath of air, before we came to Paris. I wish I could work for you now, Marie."

"Jean! my poor Jean!" said the woman; and the words and the voice took back her hardened heart to the fresh fields and tender thoughts of the past time. And she walked up to the bed, and he leaned his temples, damp with livid dew upon her breast.

"I have been a sad burden to you, Marie; we should not have married so soon, but I thought I was stronger. Don't cry—we have no little ones, thank God!—It will be much better for you when I am gone."—And so word after word gasped out; he stopped suddenly, and seemed to fall asleep.

The wife then attempted to lay him once more on his pillow—the head fell back heavily—the jaw had dropped—the teeth were set—the eyes were open and like stone—the truth broke on her! "Jean! Jean! My God he is dead! and I was unkind to him at the last!" With these words she fell upon the corpse, happily herself insensible.

"There's no such word as fool."—The Sun relates the following anecdote:—A friend in Water street, had an apprentice who, at the time of Victoria's Coronation, clandestinely left his employer, and slipped over to England, and was a spectator of that royal pageant. His curiosity was gratified in that particular only, and had become greatly excited in reference to the old world in general by the great little he had seen of it;—but he possessed no more means than were barely sufficient to pay a steerage passage both ways, and keep him sparingly during his sojourn in the great metropolis.

To overcome this difficulty he returned to New York but not to his former employer. He succeeded in obtaining possession of a rout for a morning penny paper, and another on an evening penny paper, served his customers promptly and diligently eighteen months laid up ten dollars a week on an average during that time, and a couple of weeks since sailed again for the eastern hemisphere, with money to maintain him a year, and carry him over the whole of Europe in an economical way. If he won't "make his way through the world," we don't know who will.

DRUNKEN VAGARIES.—Some old writer tells the story of a drunken crew of sailors, who, hearing the wind roar in the house in which they happened to be carousing, became so fully persuaded that they were on board a ship and in danger of shipwreck, that they threw all the furniture out of the windows, under the idea that they were lightening the ship. A drunken man has been known to whip a post, because it would not get out of his way; and an old gentleman of eighty, when intoxicated, mistook a lamp-post for a lady, and addressed her in the impassioned language of love. We once heard of a very respectable gentleman, who occasionally got fuddled, who, in staggering along toward home in the night, was brought to a full stop by the shadow of a sign post, which he firmly believed it impossible for him to get over. The New Orleans Picayune mentions a case of equal extravagance. A chap the other night, who had caught the largest kind of a "turkey" while visiting the different bar-rooms, fancied himself one of Ericson's patent propellers, and went down and jumped into the Mississippi to ascertain how he would work.

ABSENCE OF MIND.—The following is a good 'un in more ways than one:—

A gentleman at one of the hotels in Boston, who is remarkable for this failing, on retiring at night, instead of going to his own room, proceeded to the reading room, and snugly ensconcing himself in the ample folds of a "Boston Notion," which had been carelessly left open upon the table, sank to sleep. When awakened the next morning by Boots, and informed that he had "got himself into the papers," he rather dryly remarked that it was news to him.

THE RULING PASSION.

We have somewhere read of a hard case whom his friends had tried every way to break his confirmed habit of drinking. As a last experiment, they took him dead drunk, and placed him nicely in a coffin. In order to convince him still stronger that he was dead and gone, a friend consented to be disguised and to stow himself away in another coffin close by, in order to watch the effects and carry out according to circumstances the serious joke. Having got over his drunken nap, the hero of the story raised himself slowly in his coffin the next morning and looked around with no little wonder.

Seeing the other man in the same bad fix, he shook his muddy head and rubbed his eyes:

Hullo, stranger, can't you give me an item?

You? why, you're dead and buried.

You don't say so.

Yes but you are.

Well you're in the same bad snap, ain't you.

Yes I'm gone too.

Poor fellow! Well, I must have died very suddenly, any how, I was out on a reg'lar spree last night.

Oh no you are mistaken. You have been dead and buried three years.

The devil I have! Well it don't seem long to me.

How long have you been here? I'd like to know.

Five years.

Rive eh? Well as you have been here longer than I have, and know the place better, just tell me where I can get a good gin cocktail.—N. O. Times

Dr. Dyott after two years' hard labor in the Penitentiary at Philadelphia, has been pardoned by the Governor. By his sentence he had one year longer to remain.

We dislike to see little boys smoking cigars and chewing tobacco; it looks as though they were in a hurry to make fools of themselves.

A Western editor says that nothing is sweeter than the warm and ardent kiss of one we love, unless it is melasses!

An Unheard-of Stage Effect.—As one of the actors of the Arch Street Theatre Company was about leaving the stage on Saturday night, a person from the pit jumped on the stage and arrested him on execution for debt. The audience generally knew the officer by sight, and the singularity of the proceeding seemed to strike all dumb.

Did you ever know a housemaid who, on your discovering a fracture in a valuable China jar, did not tell you it was "done a long time ago;" or that it was "cracked before?"

"O the sweetness of life," as the loafer remarked, when he took lodgings in a sugar boghead.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—We find ourselves unable to furnish any back numbers prior to No. 25.—the first six months, and we wish our Agents, on obtaining any new subscription to inform the subscriber of this fact. Any money sent to us, will be applied to this volume, and should there be any excess, it will be passed to the credit of the subscriptions of the next volume.

GRAND LODGE, OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

The Annual Communication of the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of the ancient and honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of New York, will commence on Wednesday, the second day of June, at 7 o'clock P. M., at the Grand Lodge room, Howard House, in the city of New York. Delegates from the country are requested to deposit their credentials with the Grand Secretary, at the G. L. room, immediately on their arrival in the city.

my27 JAMES HERRING, Grand Secretary.

AN EDITOR'S DIFFICULTIES.—It is a fact universally admitted and appreciated by the editorial fraternity of this country, that few, very few, of the readers of a newspaper, entertain any just conception of the almost innumerable trials and difficulties incidental to the publication thereof. Independent of the labor connected with the selection and proper arrangement of the materials of which a paper is composed, the great diversity of tastes which generally prevails among newspaper patrons, is likewise a source of constant annoyance to the Editor. He is often placed precisely in the position of one who, using his best endeavors to please all, is sure to offend every body. For instance—an individual enthusiastically attached to poetry complains of the lamentable deficiency in the poetical department; another insists upon the propriety of inserting a larger quantity of "horrid murders, dreadful accidents, and melancholy shipwrecks;" a third entertains a mortal aversion to tales of the imagination, and prefers subjects of a solemn and serious nature; while a fourth earnestly solicits the introduction of witty extracts and humorous anecdotes, bon mots, and repartees. The ladies manifest a decided preference for marriage notices, and useful receipts for cooking, et cetera; while some gentlemen are highly indignant at the exclusion of party politics, and sometimes resort to a practical mode of expressing their disapprobation, i.e.—"stop my paper!" And, if he attempts to comply with the requests of some, and accede to the wishes of others, thereby securing the approbation of a few he is sure to render himself liable to the censure of the others.

ALL this is sufficiently annoying, but it nevertheless might be endured, if unaccompanied by any other vexations. But, alas! we have not yet enumerated one-tenth part of the Editor's grievances. When subscriptions become due, how lamentably dilatory are many in paying for their paper; and this is an act of injustice which nothing can extenuate, and we cannot regard it as indicative of a very narrow, contracted disposition. Surely, such persons cannot be ignorant of the fact, that in thus neglecting to pay the amount of their subscriptions, they are withholding from the Editor the means indispensably requisite for the publication of his paper, without which (taken collectively) it is absolutely impossible for him to proceed. Indeed, this is the most serious difficulty with which the Editor is obliged to contend.

While commenting upon this subject, we cannot help advert to a serious annoyance that exists in the persons of certain aspirants to literary celebrity, who, conceiving themselves poets, and writers of great power and eloquence, frequently send in their productions to the editors of various periodicals, and because those gentlemen believing that such effusions would not add to the reputation of their respective journals, decline inserting them—declare that they are utterly unworthy of support, and lament their inability to appreciate the excellence of their several productions.

These are a few of the difficulties and perplexities attendant upon the editorial supervision of a newspaper.

[From our New-York Correspondent.]

New-York, May 24th, 1841.

In accordance with your request that I would act as your correspondent, I cheerfully send the following summary of all the news of interest now stirring in New York.

The case of McLeod is now under discussion in the Supreme Court of this city. There is no little excitement prevailing here, as to the termination of the trial. The question in point seems to be, whether the prisoner shall be set free at once, (inasmuch as England has taken upon herself the responsibility of the act) or whether he shall be held amenable to the laws of the State of New York, for the gross and wanton violation of the law, in aiding and abetting the destruction of the Caroline. These are the two grand points at issue, and the public are eager as to the final result.

Strangers are flocking to the city, and every thing indicates a speedy revival of business, in this great metropolis. The rainy weather of late has tended greatly to keep back the country merchants from purchasing their Spring supply. But since the pleasant weather set in, the city has been thronged with strangers; the cartmen are hurrying through the street with their ponderous vehicles loaded with merchandise and there is every indication of an active Spring trade.

Theatres here are rather on the decline; so much so, that fears are entertained by the managers that the inevitable result will be the closing of their doors, should this stagnation continue. You are aware that the Bowery Theatre was recently closed, in obedience to a mandate from the court of Chancery, sued out, and issued, in behalf of the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents. The Bowery was one of the most respectable theatres in the city; it was there that the revival of the legitimate drama was first commenced, and it was tightly patronized by the most respectable and discerning portion of the New-York public. It has since been re-opened.

No news as yet of the steamer President! Every thing relating to this vessel remains enveloped in mystery.

The splendid ship of the line North Carolina, also the Brandywine, (which has just returned from the Mediterranean) are now lying side by side, opposite Castle Garden. They are a splendid sight, and thousands are attracted daily to the Battery to see them.

S. C. C.

BETTER LATE THAN NEVER.—After a most protracted season of cold weather, rainy days and dark clouded skies, Spring has at length come in good earnest, arrayed in her most gorgeous apparel, and smiling in all her loveliness. Nothing can be more delightful, in this season of the year, than a stroll in the country to inhale the pure and healthful atmosphere, and contemplate the beauties of nature, as displayed in the variegated foliage of the trees, redolent with the songs of birds, and in the fragrant rose and budding blossom, expanding to the warm and genial sun. While thus gazing upon the brilliant hues of the early spring flowers we are forcibly struck with the peculiar appropriateness of the words of the poet,—

—who can paint
Like nature? Can imagination boast,
Amid its gay creations, charms like these?
Or can it paint there with that matchless skill,
And lose them in each other as appears
In every bud that blows?"

A FINE SIGHT.—The Quebec Gazette of Wednesday says that at noon on Tuesday last one hundred ships under sail were entering that harbor from the several ports in England.

☞ The steamboat Maryland was burned on the 15th inst., at the mouth of the Licking River. It was supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

TRIAL OF THE MURDERERS.—The trial of Madison the master spirit in the murder, burglary and arson of the 17th ult., was to commence on Monday the 24th: Mr. Primm for defendant.

James Seward, or Sewell's trial was to come on the next day, Tuesday the 25th, Mr. Gamble for defendant.

Alfred, or Alpheus Warrick's trial on Wednesday the 26th, Mr. Spaulding for defendant.

Charles Brown, on Thursday the 27th, Mr. Darby for defendant.

It is to be hoped that these villains will be brought to that punishment which they so richly deserve.

DEATH OF ASTEN THE CLOWN.—Mr. Charles L. Asten, of New York, lately attached to Mr. Nichols' Equestrian Company, died on Tuesday morning last, 25th ult., at the Republican Hotel in this city. The body was taken on the same evening to New York for interment. His death is universally regretted by a large circle of friends and acquaintances, by whom he was much respected. He has left a wife and parents to mourn his loss. It must, however, be a consolation to know, that every exertion which medical skill could afford, with the kind attention of the family where he died, were exerted for his recovery and comfort.

ALBANY THEATRE.—That popular comedian, familiarly known as "Bill Gates," has been engaged at this establishment, and has drawn good houses. In addition to his professional abilities, Gates is a native Albanian, and thus lays a double claim to the support of the play-going public.

DREADFUL CALAMITY.—By the Quebec Mercury, we learn that an avalanche of rock fell from Cape Diamond at Quebec, upon the houses in Champlain street, and in the Cul de Sac, on Monday the 17th instant.—So far as yet ascertained, there were 26 persons killed, (the bodies of whom have been recovered,) and six not yet found. A funeral procession of 17 bodies proceeded from the Lower Town Church to the Roman Catholic Cathedral on the morning of the 19th inst., preceded by a numerous body of the clergy, and followed by a great concourse of the people. A solemn funeral service was performed for the lamented victims of the accident.

☞ The extra session of Congress commences on Monday next; the members are already hastening to the seat of government.

SENTENCE.—Ezra White, convicted of the murder of Fitzpatrick, has been sentenced by Judge Edwards to four years imprisonment at hard labor, in the prison at Sing Sing.

The Grand Lodge will hold their annual Meeting on Wednesday evening next, at the G. L. room in the city of New York. A large representation is expected from the interior of the State. From the Notices we have seen addressed to the officers of the Lodges, we are pleased to observe that every member is requested to appear in full costume of the order.

Intelligence.

Fire.—The Central Railroad House, and the house of Charles Bristol, at Detroit, were consumed on the 17th inst.

The steamer Caledonia brought about ten thousand letters. The postage on those for New York city amounted to upwards of $1200.

Suicide.—Mr. Melancthon Woolsey Flinn, second mate of ship Cabinet of this port when on the passage from Liverpool to Havana, committed suicide by shooting himself with a pistol on the 20th ult. in latitude 25 23. longitude, 48. He was 24 years old and has friends or relatives in New York city.—Boston D. Adv.

Conviction.—A man named Thomas Shuster was tried last week in Philadelphia, for killing his wife, and found guilty of "Murder in the First Degree."

Samuel Oaks, of Hamburg, near Buffalo, aged 73 years, one of the oldest inhabitants of that county, and a steady, substantial farmer, committed suicide a few days since by hanging himself.

An unknown girl, about eighteen years of age, was found burned to death in the woods in Cuyahoga co. Ohio, on the 30th ult. She had built a fire in the woods, from which it is probable her clothes caught.

Fire.—The residence of Mr. Wm. Nichols, of Cooperstown, Otsego county, was destroyed by fire on the 18th inst. His loss is said to be from 3 to $5000. Most of the furniture was saved, but very much damaged.

Dr. Samuel S. Dickerson, one of the Lottery Commissioners was found dead near the Shot Tower, in Eutaw street; Baltimore—supposed from a fit.

Fatal Affray.—We learn from the Fall River Archetype that in a quarrel between two of the men employed in the American Print Works in that town, one of them named Braynon, was killed. The quarrel originated from a dispute that arose while playing cards.

An Aged Woman.—A Mrs. Stevenson died recently in Clearfield county, Pa., at the advanced age of 108 years. She left her third husband a widower—and her posterity extends down to the sixth generation.

Infanticide.—The Coroner of Boston on Thursday held an inquest on the body of a female child, found floating on the tide water above South Boston Bridge enclosed in an ink box. The appearance of the body left no doubt on his mind that the child had been barbarously murdered, by some person or persons unknown. There were two stabs in the throat, a large cut across the back, the right arm was severed from the body at the shoulder joint, and the intestines were drawn out.

A tremendous storm occurred at Natchez, Miss., on the 7th instant, which being the anniversary of the great tornado in that city, occasioned a great deal of consternation among the citizens.

Destructive Fire.—A serious fire occurred at Raleigh, N. C., on the 14th inst. It broke out in the stable of Messrs. Ellen & Bevers, and communicated to the extensive boarding house of the Misses Pulliam. Both were destroyed. Loss heavy.

Caution to Mothers.—A little girl, living at No. 20 Chambers street, was thrown into severe convulsions, produced by fright, on being shut up in a dark room, as punishment. We learn from Dr. C. A. Porter, the attending physician, that at one time he entertained doubts of the recovery of the child. The child is happily restored.—Sun.

EXPERIMENT.—Tie a piece of sewing silk to a large silver spoon, and suspend it from the ear. Then strike the spoon, and the reverberation will sound as grand and tremendous as that of the great bell of a cathedral.

"Say Pat—are the days any longer in Ireland than in this country?"

"Longer! Aye; you may well say it: and not only longer, but there are a great many more of them."

Married.

In this city on Wednesday evening, 19th inst., by the Rev. Ezra Hunton, Mr. David L. Steinburg, of Livingston, Schoharie co., to Miss Margaret Bowie, of this city.

In Detroit, by the Rev. Geo. Duffield, Lieut. Thomas L. Brent of the 4th regiment of U. S. Artillery, and Miss Jane Duncan, only daughter of the Hon. Ross Wilkins.

In New York, on the 18th inst., by the Rev. Nathaniel S. Prime, the Rev. Paul Eugene Stevenson, pastor of the presbyterian church in Stanton, Va., to Miss Cornelia Prime, youngest daughter of the Rev. N. S. Prime of Newburg.

In Buffalo, on the 11th instant, by the Rev. A. T. Hopkins, Alfred P. Stone, Esq., of Columbus, O., to Anna M., eldest daughter of the Hon. Charles Townsend of that city.

On the 21st inst. by the Rev. Dr. J. N. Wyckoff, Peter D. Roff, to Miss Larina Martin, all of this city.

DIED.

In this city, Monday morning, Julia, infant daughter of S. T. and Eve Thorn.

In this city, on Friday afternoon, of consumption, Thomas Barrett Hewson, in the 37th year of his age.

In New York, on the 13th inst., Sarah, wife of Alanson Jermain, merchant of that city, formerly of Albany, aged 40 years.

At Auburn, on the 5th ult., after a long and distressing disease, Capt. Thomas Folger, aged 65.

In Marblington, on the 11th instant, of palsy, Wessel Brodhead, Esq., in the 74th year of his age. He formerly represented the county of Ulster in the State Legislature, and has been Judge of its Courts.

At Hartford, Conn. Lieut. Thomas C. Brownell, of the U. S. Army, son of the Bishop of Connecticut, aged 26 years.

At Clarksville Tenn., on the 13th inst. at the residence of her son, Mrs. Polly Weed, mother of the Editor of the Evening Journal, aged 70 years.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

Hudson Lodge No. 7, Hudson R. A. Chapter, No. 6, and Lafayette Encampment, No. 7, will celebrate the coming Anniversary of "ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST," on the 24th of June next. Masonic Brethren, generally, are respectfully invited to unite in the festivities of the day.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE.—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptedness to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

For further particulars, apply to the captain on board or at the office on the dock. mr. 12

REMOVAL.—JOSEPH CHATTERSON, Draper and Tailor, respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has removed to the new store No. 113 Market-st. four doors south of the Eagle Tavern, where he intends to conduct the tailoring business in the latest and most approved fashions.

J. C. trusts his assiduity and attention to business to merit a share of public patronage, and solicits a continuance of the favors of his present customers; he flatters himself by the long experience he has had in the above business to be able to give general satisfaction to those who may favor him with a call.

Just received a choice assortment of goods, suitable for the season. m. 31f.

CORNING & COOK Book-Binders, 67 State, corner of James street, (formerly Middle Lane,) Albany. BLANK BOOKS of every description made to order. Paper of any size ruled to any pattern.

Particular attention paid to the binding of music books, law periodicals, old books, newspapers, &c. &c. They would respectfully solicit a share of public patronage.

By the recent improvements in the above establishment, the proprietors are ready to do all kinds of BOOK BINDING in the most neat and substantial manner. Persons having to bind for their libraries, will do well to call at the above establishment.

General satisfaction warranted. Prices to conform to the times. Albany, 1840.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN—REMOVAL.—The Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the Travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand in door below on the same side of the street to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 169 Market-st. and for a number of years past, occupied by M. S. Crosby, as a boarding house. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his friends and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is 4 stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, adapted for families, men of business, &c. Persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by Rail Road, Steamboat or Stage, and find the New England well adapted to their accommodation, within five or ten minutes walk of the Railroad station, within five or seven rods of the Steamboat landings. Breakfast will be served every morning, during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, or those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York, so as to eat 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is attached to the house with every convenience for those travelling with their teams, &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their patronage at his new one. His old Customers and the travelling public generally, are respectfully invited to give him a call; and he pledges himself to exert every exertion shall be made to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His prices will be moderate so as to suit the times. 75 cts. per day, for Board and Lodging.

Albany, May 15th, 1841.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to be buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved Diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT: addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany."

Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

TO THE SEASONS.

SPRING.

Hail, beauteous Spring! in all thy splendor drest,
Once more we greet thee 'midst thy native bowers;
And blooming roses deck thy virgin breast—
Thy brow is crown'd with chaplets of fair flowers,
And sighing zephyrs woo thee as they pass,
And gently fan each blade of dewy grass.

How like unto sweet childhood's early dawn,
When joy and happiness the heart illumine—
When all is smiling as the rosy morn,
With naught to cloud the youthful brow with gloom.
But hope and happiness are on the wing,
And prove as transient as the short-lived Spring!

SUMMER.

Season of sunny skies and burning heat,
Whose sultry breath wafts o'er the arid plain,
How the soul panteth for some cool retreat,
How the ground thirsteth for refreshing rain!
The noon-day sun, in blaze of splendor bright,
With scorching rays, doth pain the aching sight!

Thus youth, with ardent and impetuous fire,
Doth scorn the precepts of maturer years,
And in the pursuit of each mad desire,
Spurs on to where proud Fame her summit rears—
With vigorous arm, ambition's heights doth climb,
In the full power of his manhood's prime.

AUTUMN.

The winds of Autumn, solemn, sad and drear,
Come murmuring through the wood with soothing sound,

The once green leaves are now decay'd and aere,
And by the winds lie scatter'd on the ground;
While silence steals o'er all, save where the breeze
Sighs through the branches of the leafless trees.

'Tis thus that age creeps on with stealthy pace;
Where'er we turn, our footsteps 'twill pursue,
Chasing the smiles from off the youthful face,
And robbing beauty of its roseate hue;
No more rejoicing in our youthful prime,
We bend beneath the weight of withering time!

WINTER.

How keenly blows the winter's piercing blast!
What desolation rests on all I view!
The snow-flakes, from the sky descending fast,
Soon clothe all nature in their spotless hue;
And o'er the surface of the ice-bound lake,
The sportive snow-wreath its swift course doth take.

So youth and beauty soon must take their flight;
Our voices lose their happy, cheerful tone,
And friends who once with smiles did greet our sight,
Have gone, and left us desolate and lone.
And to our journey's end we all draw nigh—
We bloom a season, and then fade and die!

T. G. C.

WHAT IS LIFE?

A ray of light—a sunbeam bright—
That glids the ocean foam—
Now seen in strife when storms are rife—
Now in its either home.

A flick'ring spark, that shines where dark
Oblivion's gloom does reign,
'Tis seen to dash—to flare—to flash,
And never is it seen again!

A vessel frail with crowded sail,
When storms her topmast lave,
She reels—she's toss'd—she swamps—she's lost;
She sinks to ocean's grave!

A dew drop shed on some rose-bud,
At gentle fall of even;
At morn to rise beyond the skies
To dwell for ever in heav'n.

THE WATCHER.

BY MRS. HALE.

The night was dark and fearful,
The blast swept wailing by,
When a watcher, pale and tearful,
Looked forth with anxious eye;
How wistfully she gazeth—
No gleam of morn is there;
And the look to Heaven she raiseth,
'Tis the agony of prayer.

Within that dwelling lonely,
Where want and darkness reign,
Her precious child, her only,
Lay moaning in his pain;
And death alone can free him—
She feels that this must be:
"But oh! for morn to see him
Smile once again on me!"

A hundred lights are glancing
In yonder mansion fair,
And merry feet are dancing—
They need not morn there;
Oh, young and joyous creatures,
One lamp from out your store,
Would give that poor boy's features
To his mother's gaze once more.

The morning sun is shining—
She heedeth not its ray;
Beside her dead, reclining,
That pale, dead mother lay;
A smile her lips were wreathing,
A smile of hope and love,
As though she still were breathing—
"There is light for us above!"

TO THE PUBLISHER.

Permit a laughter-loving girl,
To fill a corner in your paper—
You would, if you could see the curl
Of her dark hair, and wait so taper!

I have some half a dozen beaux,
Forever in my pathway sighing,
Each one looks like a faded rose—
Poor things! you'd think they all were dying.

But there is one, so full of mirth,
That all that I can do won't move him;
The happiest fellow on the earth—
He says we girls cannot but love him!

It vexes me to see him laugh,
I tell him that he has no feeling;
I've tried one season and a half
To bring him to my presence kneeling!

I know he loves me—so he swears—
But says he will not be down hearted—
I've tried my best with frowns and tears,
And once or twice have well nigh parted.

But all in vain—he will not kneel—
He will not sigh—I must surrender!
He tells me that he's made of steel,
But well I know his heart is tender.

Another thought just strikes me now—
(It shall take place by next October)
I'll marry him—I will, I vow!
And, tha., I guess will make him sober!

THE IMPRISONED BIRD.

BY W. G. BROWN.

Uncage that bird, and let it soar
To its cloud-home amid the sky;
Why should it heat its bosom more
Against the wiry cage, and die,
When God hath given it wings and air,
To waft the warbler every where!

Oh, late it soared with joyous wing
Up to the heavenly gates, and then
Catching the notes that angels sing,
Winged its swift flight to earth again,
And poured through greenwood, far and near,
Such strains as win th' enchanted ear.

Why did ye catch and cage that bird,
While sailing on its azure sea?
The winds, whose songs at eve are heard,
And the bright waters all are free,
To play and sparkle as they will
In mighty stream or murmuring rill.

Its mate, perchance, hath mourned it long
Upon their green and favorite tree,
And poured its loud unanswered song
Through leafy grove and flowery lea;
And pined to find no answer float
In echo to its wildest note.

I've wandered forth at dusky eve,
When every human sound was still,
And heard some little warbler grieve
With such a plaintive song and shrill,
That earthly wrongs were all forgot,
In pity for its hapless lot.

Uncage that bird! the Spring hath come,
And every wing is out at play
With gentle winds—the wild bee's hum
Is mingled with the matin lay
Of laughing voices, 'mid the flowers,
That deck the trolleed garden bowers.

13. Although Freemasonry may be perverted and abused by designing men, this fact constitutes no valid objection to the order itself. Its principles offer to the consideration of its votaries a moral code in strict accordance with the code of ethics contained in the Bible. Its lectures and charges, whether oral or written contain rules of moral conduct perfectly in unison with the doctrines of Christianity, and their avowed object is to promote and extend the virtues of Brotherly Love, Charity, Temperance, and universal Benevolence. Being essentially a moral institution, and not religious, in the strict sense of the term, it prescribes no particular creed, but it is, at the same time, so closely connected with religion, that it forms as it were, a stepping stone to that sublime and beautiful system, of which the Savior of mankind afforded a bright and glorious example.

14. If the true principles of Freemasonry were cherished and practised by its members, how beautiful would the temple appear! The best desires of the human heart would be fulfilled: the cause of universal benevolence would be honored and promoted, and the true end and aim of the institution would be manifest to the world.

15. St. Paul, well knowing how important peace and harmony were to the integrity of the church, to its prosperity, and the extension of its doctrines, admonished his brethren to drive from the threshold every evil passion, every impure desire, that all things might give place to peace and good fellowship. How forcibly do such doctrines address themselves to masons? How perfectly applicable are they to masons of every degree and order? The Christian church was then in its infancy, struggling for ascendancy over the gods of paganism. It was necessary for their preservation that the Christians should be united; that they should practice the virtue of Brotherly Love, and that they should support and encourage each other in every good work. It is thus with Masons. By the practice of Brotherly Love, and its associate virtues, the character of the institution will be elevated, and its opponents will retire abashed from the conflict.

16. It has been remarked by a distinguished member of the fraternity that "it cannot be expected that in every society there will be a perfect accord, and congeniality of minds, of tastes, and of morals. Hence difference will sometimes arise." This is true. In the best regulated societies there will be occasional disturbances, but a proper exercise of Brotherly Love on the part of those who are not immediately interested, will in nine cases out of ten, prevent them from breaking out into violent convulsions. In the course of my masonic life, I have often seen violent quarrels reconciled by such interposition which, under other circumstances, would have ended in bloodshed. It is a beautiful feature in the masonic character, that it possesses such an influence over the passions of men.

17. Freemasonry is essentially a charitable institution. No institution more strongly enforces this virtue by its laws and its precepts. How strikingly this virtue is impressed upon the novice every mason well knows. In the language of one of our charges, "the mason's heart should be ever ready to commiserate distress; his hand ever open to relieve it; he should drop the cordial balm on the wounds affliction has made, and bind up the heart which sorrow has broken." No mason who is imbued with the true spirit of the order, will turn a deaf ear to the supplications of a worthy brother, or reject his application when in his power to afford relief. If there be one he is unworthy the badge he wears,

18. Charity may be contemplated in another aspect not less beautiful than that of affording pecuniary relief. On this point I shall use the language, "It does not require us to excuse the vices, or overlook the errors of a friend. One of the best proofs of charity towards a brother is that affectionate censorship which watches over his actions, marks his errors, and sedulously labors for their correction. It instructs us to bear with affectionate sympathy those eccentricities of character, those fluctuations of temper, and those little excesses either of gaiety or depression to which all are subject. We should advise a friend with caution, and reprove with meekness." When thus contemplated Charity is a high and noble virtue, and one not difficult to exercise. A mason who acts according to this principle in his intercourse with his brethren, will bring back to the fold many a wandering sheep, and reclaim many an erring brother.

19. The vice of intemperance is one which cannot be too carefully avoided, independently of being a direct breach of masonic duty. How often do we find a splendid genius prostrated, and a noble mind destroyed by the debasing effects of this worst of vices—the worst because it leads to so many others. God endowed man with reason and intelligence for higher, nobler purposes. He did not endow him with the highest powers of intellect to be destroyed by intemperance. He did not give him noble sentiments and generous feelings to be debased by this wretched vice. He created him in his own likeness, that, towering above all other created beings, he might assume the exalted station he was destined to fill. He gave him an immortal soul, that by properly cultivating his powers here he might be better fitted to enjoy immortality in the world to come.

20. Masons, like other citizens of this free government may differ on the great political questions which from time to time, agitate the community, but under all circumstances it is their duty to acknowledge the supremacy of the laws, and bow to their decisions. A mason is free in every sense of the word; he is a freeman as well as freemason, but he who rightly understands his masonic duties, and justly appreciates the privileges of his order, will ever feel the weight of his civil obligations. He who would enter into plots and conspiracies against his government, or obstruct the execution of its laws, is a traitor to his order.

[The following from the pen of Giles F. Yates, Esq. of Schenectady, was published a number of years ago. It appears to have been chiefly designed for those Brethren of the "ineffable degrees," and we presume it will not only be acceptable to them, but to the Masonic reader generally.—Ed.]

MASONIC CHRONOLOGY.

It has been an immemorial custom among "blue" and "red," as well as "sublime freemasons," to date from the creation. The reason of this custom, is doubtless because the principles upon which their order is founded, can be traced from the beginning of time. With sublime freemasons, there is an additional reason. Certain circumstances detailed in some of their degrees, have an allusion to the time, when by the fiat of Jehovah, the chaotic materials of this earth were ranged in form and order, and gleams of light dispelled the darkness, that enveloped "the face of the deep." Every accomplished brother will here readily advert to our mottoes, "Lux ex tenebris," and "ordo ab chaos." And when it is considered, that the Jews were the original depositories of some of the sublime mysteries, it is not to be wondered at, that sublime freemasons should adopt, or retain, the Jewish mode of dating.

It has been a subject of much speculation, at what time before Christ to fix the epoch of the creation.—Several hundred calculations and opinions have been given, making the extreme dates differ upwards of 3000 years." Since the most learned chronologers do not agree on this point, it is not strange surely, that freemasons should differ in their computations. Masons of the lower degrees, usually compute by the "vulgar year of our Lord," adding to it 4000 years; thus calling the present year 5820. But Dionysius Exiguus, who, A. D. 532, first taught Christians to date from the birth of Christ, commenced the Christian era four years too late. The true epoch of the creation, is B. C. 4004. This is the chronology established by these profound scholars, Usher, Prideaux, Calmet, and others, and is according to the Hebrew text. It has received the sanction of the greatest Protestant divines throughout the world, and is held in such high repute, that it is adopted in the authorised versions of the Holy Scriptures. Sublime freemasons use this chronology either alone, or in conjunction with the vulgar Jewish computation, which fixes the creation B. C. 3760.

In one of the sublime degrees, allusion is made to an ancient Syriac manuscript, discovered A. D. 1553, which represents the world as being many thousand years older than by the chronology of the Bible.—That freemasons should make pretensions to a discovery so much at variance with the commonly received opinion of men on this subject, might by some be deemed presumptuous. In answer, we will state simply one fact. Not many years ago, the learned Dr. Hales, in his "analysis of chronology," has established a new era, which makes the present year of the world 7231. He has, in the most able manner, controverted the system of Usher, and if not fully established his own system, has advanced such powerful arguments in support of it, as will stagger the most sceptical.

The "year of the restoration," which will be found in some masonic documents, cannot with propriety be used by masons below the 16th degree, and is seldom used by any except masons above that grade. It is calculated from the time Cyrus issued his decree for the restoration of the ancient Israelites. The Knights Templars have a date peculiar to themselves, which is computed from the time their order was established. According to these several computations, the date of this communication would be, the 19th day of the second month IYAR, Judæorum anno 5587, Anno Liberationes 2362, Anno Lucis 5831, Anno Ordinis (of the Templars) 709, which answers to the 16th day of May, Anno Domini 1897, and (it may not be impertinent to add) to the 10th day of the 11th Arabic month, called Dalhaadah [signifying month of repose] Hegira 1205.

The Rabbies maintain that the Almighty rested from the work of creation, on a day answering to the first day of their month Tisri, which corresponds with Sunday, October 23d. It is admitted that the Hebrews originally began the year with that month. But on their departure out of the land of Egypt and in commemoration thereof, they were divinely commanded to make their year commence at the beginning of the month in which that departure took place; to wit, the month Nisan, then called Abib. Josephus says, that "Moses appointed that Nisan should be the first month for their festivals, because he brought them out of Egypt in that month: so that this month began the year as to all solemnities they observed to the honor of God; although they observed the original order of the months, as to selling and buying and other ordinary concerns."† Josephus then being judge, the Hebrews had two ways of beginning their year. For all matters of a civil or secular nature, they made use of, what they now term their "political" or "civil year;" which commenced about the time of the autumnal equinox with the month Tisri. And in the calculations of their festivals and other ecclesiastical concerns, they used their "sacred," or "Ecclesiastical year;" which commenced about the time of the vernal equinox, with the month Nisan.

This notion of two sorts of years, is maintained by the Rabbies of the present day. That it should have been adopted by Pridéaux,† and other christian writers, may appear somewhat singular, when it is considered that no plausible passage from Holy writ can be adduced in support of it. It does not appear from any part of the old Testament that the ancient mode of beginning the year from the month Tisri, was used after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt.—Wherever the months are named and numbered, no matter whether for civil or ecclesiastical purposes, they are numbered according to the ecclesiastical year. Examine among other passages, Exod. xiii. 4.—1. Kings vii. 1. viii. 2. Esther viii. 12—ii. 16—iii. 7—xiii. 9—Zech. i. 9—vii. 2.

But whether there was a single or doubtful commencement of the ancient Jewish year, it is not of any consequence to us, as sublime freemasons, to enquire into, since we have adopted the ecclesiastical year of the modern Jewish Calendar. The fasts and festivals of the Jewish church are connected with this subject, and might here claim our attention. But inasmuch as this essay is designed for freemasons, who as such have nothing to do with these observances, we shall waive any remarks respecting them, and proceed to a description of the Calendar now used by the Jews.

This Calendar was settled by Rabbi Hillel, cir. A. D. 358. He made the ancient Jewish Calendar which consisted altogether of lunar months, vie in astronomical accuracy with the Julian Calendar. This last, however, was in the sixteenth century surpassed by the Gregorian Calendar, which (as is well known) is the one now in use among Christians.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY OF A YOUNG LADY IN DISGUISE.

On Wednesday evening last, as the turnkeys of the Westminster Bridewell, were searching the male prisoners, as usual, before locking up at night, it was remarked by one turnkey to another that one of the prisoners had a very white neck. This observation led to a somewhat closer examination, the result of which was, that a suspicion was awakened in their minds that the sex of the prisoner was not what had been represented. Mr. Tracey, the governor, was instantly informed of the circumstance, who ordered the party to be conveyed to a separate cell, and went himself, accompanied by the chief, to question the prisoner.—The governor asked the prisoner's name. The reply was 'George White,' the name under which prisoner had been committed and had been known while in the jail. The governor intimated his suspicions that such was not to the case, when finding that detection was inevitable, the prisoner began to cry, and to acknowledge being a female. Her attire at the time of discovery was the dress usually worn by the male convicts in the prison; and which she had worn ever since her admission to the jail on the 7th inst., seven days previously, during which she had been alternately at wheel labor and picking oakum, being treated in all respects as a male prisoner.

The following morning the governor again paid her a visit, with a view to ascertain, if possible, the cause which led to her assumption of male attire. It was with difficulty that he could elicit replies to his questions. Her conduct was characterised by a propriety of behavior evidently above her apparent station, and she declined at first to answer any queries, but by dint of persuasion and kindness the governor elicited a variety of facts, of which the following may be depended upon as correct:—She admitted that her name of "White" was assumed, and said she was an orphan, and had always lived with her uncle and aunt in Sussex, who are a highly respectable family in that country, but she resolutely declined to mention their names or their residence. They were on terms of intimacy with a family at some distance off, and her uncle's footman was in the habit of conveying her occasionally thither and back, unaccompanied by any of the members of the family. This led to an intimacy between them, which was the cause of her ruin. A short time after the servant suddenly disappeared, and she dread- ing detection and exposure, formed a resolution to quit her home, in doing which she put on a suit of clothes belonging to her brother, who is at Cambridge studying for the Church, and with a sum of about £11 she secretly quitted her uncle's residence and went to Chichester, about six months since. She remained at a lodging-house some time, and on finding her little stock of money expended, parted with her clothes by the advice of the lodging-house-keeper, and buying a smock-frock, the dress of a common farm laborer in Sussex, she paid the lodging-house-keeper, and leaving Chichester begged her way to London. Her adventures in the metropolis were most extraordinary. Amongst other places she had been employed in the workrooms of the Mendicity Society, and from the 7th to the 15th of March in the workhouse of the Kensington union, where she was eighteen days under medical treatment, all the time being supposed to be a man. She had at times endured the greatest privations, and was ultimately committed from Marlboro'-street police court as a rogue and vagabond, under a sentence of six weeks' confinement and hard labor in the Westminster Bridewell.

Inquiry was made by Mr. Tracey at the work-house of the Kensington union yesterday, and that part of her story is found to be correct. She has been cross-examined repeatedly, but her statement continues to be the same.

On her admission to the Bridewell she passed under the surgeon's inspection, and he actually examined her arms very minutely, suspecting that she had a cutaneous eruption. She is about eighteen years of age, with extremely delicate features, a small hand, and small feet. The turnkeys mentioned the difficulty they had in finding a pair of shoes to fit her, and other minute circumstances, which led them to feel surprised at their own stupidity in not making the discovery sooner. She has been, also, in the large baths at the ordinary times of bathing of the male prisoners, and yet none of them had the least suspicion of her sex.

It has been the general subject of conversation amongst the magistrates during the day, and every means has been adopted which is most likely lead to a discovery of her relations in Sussex. Mr. Tracey has written to several gentlemen in that county, and expects further information every hour.

PISTOL SHOOTING EXTRA.

No little noise and alarm was created in one of our principal hotels early yesterday morning by the loud report of a pistol in one of the passage ways of the third story. Some thought that a suicide had been committed, while others did not know what to think of an occurrence so unusual; but their doubts were soon removed as we shall show.

It seems that one of the Irish waiters attached to the hotel had taken a gentleman's overcoat from his room in order to brush it. Finding a pistol in one of the pockets, he drew it forth to examine it. At this juncture a darkey came into the room, when the Irishman, having no idea that the pistol was loaded, took sight at the sable fellow and exclaimed—

"I say, my rowl of blacking, jist straighten yourself like a man—stand still and I'll plug ye as aisy as I'd kiss me hand."

"Wy, wy, look heah, master, said the darkey, rolling his eyes, and turning pale blue from fright—look heah, master, don't you do dat—don't aim dat pistol dis way. Wha-wha-what for you shoot me?"

"Jist for a bit of divarshun, that's all. Be aisy, I say, and I'll let a streak of daylight through that dark body of yours."

No sooner said than done. Pat took a deliberate aim, pulled the trigger, and off went the pistol with a tremendous report. The ball—for it had a blue pill, in of a large size,—just grazed the darkey's side and went smack through the door, but fortunately it did not happen to come in contact with any "sure enough" flesh and blood. It is needless to say that the Irishman was more frightened than any man in the party, and has since declared that he "will not touch one of the desatful things again."—N. O. Picayune.

PUNS AND JOKES.

Why is a man with wooden legs like one who has made an even bargain? Because he has nothing to boot.

When people assemble, why must they do wrong. Because they must err (muster.)

What word contains all the vowels, and in their proper order? Ans. Facetiously and also abstermi-ously.

What court is a belfry? Ans. Court of appeal, (a peal.)

Why is idleness like the letter C? Ans. It is the beginning of Crime.

Why are the galleries and corridors of a prison like music for the violincello? Because they are passages for the base.

Why are Protestants like fleas? Because they are in-sects.

What is that which every one knows? The way in which a newspaper ought to be conducted.

IMPRESSIVE TRUTH.—Human happiness has no perfect security but freedom; freedom none but virtue; virtue none but knowledge; and neither freedom, nor virtue, nor knowledge has any vigor, or immortal hope, except in the principles of the Christian faith, and in the Christian religion.—Quincy.

Editors looking up.—The New York Atlas mentions the case of a couple of editors in that city, looking up, but it was only to see who threw a basin of dirty water upon their heads from a third story window.

A NOVELTY.—To see two women pass each other in the street, without each turning round to see what the other had on.

CHALLENGE.—Calling upon a man who has hurt your feelings to give you satisfaction—by shooting you through the body.

The Sunday Mercury says there is something touching—deeply touching and thrilling—and we might even say disagreeable, in the question—"Will you pay this bill, sir?"

Politeness on all occasions.—At a wedding recently, which took place at the altar, when the officiating priest put to the lady the home question, "Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?" she dropped the prettiest courtesy, and with a modesty which lent her beauty an additional grace, replied, "If you please, sir."

A Professional Touch.—A worthy carpenter the other day, in giving evidence in a case of fraud, said that he plane-ly saw the defendant's object was to chisel the plaintiff out of his property, &c., and for his part he liked 'fair play and no gouging.'

An Apology.—A well dressed young gentleman at a ball, in whisking about the room, run his head against a young lady. He began to apologise. "Not a word sir," cried she, "it is not hard enough to hurt any body."—Atlas.

Good Sentiments.—Agriculture is the nursery of patriotism and virtue.

Agriculture, aided by science, will make a nation a great one.

Science must combine with practice to make a good farmer.

All the énérgy of the hero, and all the science of the philosopher, may find scope in the cultivation of one farm.

When you indulge in hard thoughts, or harsh expressions against your neighbor, think of your own failings and be moderate.

There are two reasons why we don't trust a man: one is, because we don't know him—the other because we do.

THE LEGENDARY.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE BLACK BARON.

In a certain province of Germany, north of the Mayn, there formerly dwelt a son of the house of Osnabruck, known by his serfs and vassals at the Black Baron; a name probably derived from the dark character of their feudal lord, and certainly one which had more meaning than his true title, Baron Von Gliffen.

Some of the old traditions concerning the pedigree of the Baron are still extant; and though all of them concur in making him the offspring of the most beautiful woman conceivable, few seemed inclined to allow him a father. Such miraculous occurrences as spontaneous production were too common in those times to excite particular attention: tradition is fraught with instances of the kind; and all will admit, from the following account of his life and character, that Baron Von Gliffen was as substantial flesh and blood as if he had a dozen fathers.

Throughout Germany there was neither lord nor plebeian could cope with the Baron in drinking hock or Heidenmaur, and long eating, or any thing requiring extraordinary alimentary powers. Among the most distinguished of his table-chronies, were Baron Schwartenberg, a miracle at despatching roast beef and tossing hock; Herr Von Twitter, a prodigy; Corporal Thwack, a sort of hyeda; Hymn Der Vheiber, a bottomless pit; Snyder Hans-Globbin, an elastic rum pipe; Herr Cartouchea, a mammoth sponge; but it was sagely hinted that Baron Von Gliffen was someway akin to the Great Receptacle, or Ditch of Mundus, into which the Romans used to throw a little of every thing, not forgetting the necessities of life.

In his less serious occupations, the Baron was equally famous. None could hunt with greater success; none could bring to battle a nobler array of followers; and none needed partisans more than the Black Baron for his feuds were universal; his person the terror of the weak, and the scorn of the strong; nor was it in those times so considered disgraceful to make a predation on neighboring barons, to kill their cattle, maltreat their vassals, and occasionally carry off their daughters and take them to wife, in default of a suitable ransom.

In a predatory excursion of this kind, Baron Von Gliffen vanquished the forces of one Weldimar, a nobleman of high degree; and with his followers, entered the castle of the conquered, to take possession of the booty. Whether Weldimar had hidden abroad something concerning a certain jewel belonging to the Baron Weldimar, or whether led by instinct, it matters little; but while his followers were ransacking every other valuable about the castle, Baron Von Gliffen had found his way to the chamber in which the treasure was concealed, and was paying his devoirs to Cristella, the jewel itself, the diamond of beauty. Cristella refused to fly; the Baron persisted, prayer threatened—carried her off! As a matter of courtesy, he demanded an immense ransom for her release. Weldimar was unable to pay; the Baron protested he would not bate a jot; Weldimar swore his whole estates, cattle and all, would not make up the amount; and Cristella became the wife of Baron Von Gliffen.

By this union there sprang an heir to the Osnabruck barony, whom they christened Von Redder, a name contracted from Red-Heir; the most prominent peculiarity about the child. This flaming omen presented fine work for the astrologers, necromancers, and others versed in occult sciences. Herr Twaddle, the greatest metaphysician and most famous necromancer in Germany, being present at the birth of Von Redder, took the child in his arms, described divers hieroglyphics in the air, muttered incantation to the dark spirits, and pronounced with becoming gravity the doom of his subject. "Much good was skillfully mixed with the evil; but on the whole the young prodigy was certainly born for deeds of blood, as was evident from the sanguinary color of his hair. Der Fuddle, another sage in necromancy, was called upon to predict the fortunes and misfortunes of the heir. This miracle of profundity began exactly opposite to his compeer. He took the child by the heels, and swore, from the lines on the soles of the feet, that nothing more certain than eternal happiness to the successor of Baron Von Gliffen; a prediction ill-naturedly accounted for by Herr Twaddle, whose prognostications of evil were scantily paid for, and abundantly doubted. A host of others, deeply skilled in these matters, predicted divers destinies, according to the quality of gold upon which their efforts were based; those who obtained nothing, of course read ominous things in the stars; and those who received kicks and cuffs, produced incontestible evidence that the heir was designed for eternal perdition.

Dark and incontinent as was the character of Baron Von Gliffen, his own bade fair, from the cradle upward, to excel him in blackness of heart, thirst for distinction in crime, and in all the wild and reckless exploits of a monster in the age of barbarism; so that when Von Redder had attained his twentieth year, he was as finished a vagabond as his father could wish. Highway depredations were his favorite amusements; feuds and bloodshed his delight; heresy, rape, and schism, things to boast of, and laugh at; midnight carousals his gentler occupations; and open depravity his characteristic trait. This prodigal course of life caused repeated demands on the purse of the old Baron, whose own extravagance had nearly drained it. The hopeful son would take no refusal. The Baron stormed, the heir repeated his demands. Baron Von Gliffen sternly refused to support his extravagance; and for several years this sort of wrangling and contention between them was the topic of the country. Cristella, under the brutal treatment of Von Gliffen, and the unnatural and depraved conduct of her son, pined away, till death released her from their influence. Indifferent as the Baron was, during her life, he deeply felt this stroke; and to drown remorse, doubled his depredations, and hunted more than ever. The chase, to be sure, was merely a softened name for predatory excursions and highway robberies; but where custom and the laws of the land countenanced the term, it mattered little about the meaning.

In one of these peregrinations, Baron Von Gliffen, accompanied by his band of stout henchmen, made a descent upon the Castle of Stockenberg, then the strong hold of a nobleman renowned for his wealth and prowess. The defender of gold made a gallant resistance: the Baron, at the head of a chosen corps, rushed onward; a terrible battle ensued: fortune seemed to declare at one moment in favor of the besieged, at another of the besiegers; when at length the Baron was driven back, and the lord of Stockenberg shouted victory. While this cry still rang in the air, a gigantic follower of the Baron, named Melifleur, made a sudden and desperate rally; one and all the besiegers rushed to battle; and overpowered by skill and force, the noble foe yielded to the conquerors, whose armor, shattered in strife, dripped with the blood of the slain. This victory was gained by the ferocious valor of Melifleur, who, less blood-thirsty than avaricious, claimed the greater part of the booty. Enraged at his insolence, the Baron struck him in the face: Melifleur, writhing with pain and rage, swore he would have a sure and terrible revenge.

Two months passed away, and Baron Von Gliffen suddenly disappeared. As it was doubted by none that he had been murdered, or slain in single combat by the giant henchman, the strictest search was made for his body, but without success. No clue could be discovered to its mysterious disappearance. None was more active in the search, and no one more grievously shocked at the death of the Baron, than Von Redder, to whom the estates and title of the deceased passed without a murmur. Melifleur underwent a rigorous examination. His threats in the presence of the Baron's henchmen, his confusion and perturbation at the charge, and the evidence of certain witnesses adduced by the young Baron, convicted him to the satisfaction of all; and without farther ceremony, he was swung up on one of the castle turrets, where his bones bleached and rattled for many a day, as a warning to the evil minded in the service of the living Baron.

Twenty years had been measured from the lawless and criminal career of the heir of Osnabruck, and the death of the Black Baron ceased to be thought of, and even remembered, by many who had acted conspicuous parts in the search and trial. Preparations for an evening of joy and festivity going on in the castle, evinced that the occasion was one of unusual importance, since the gloomy Von Redder seldom indulged in any thing so congenial to the taste of his dependents. In fact, the Baron had wooed and won the most beautiful heiress in the province, and this festival was in honor of his marriage. However limited was the number of his sincere friends, he had many who were no wise backward in proffering their company and services on occasions of this sort; and the castle was soon crowned with noble rakes, prodigal sons, ruined barons, ladies of high fame, though not inaccessible virtue, and dependants of every description, from self-styled relatives to henchmen and vassals. In due time the guests were ushered into the largest hall in the castle in which a banquet table extended from end to end. At the head presided Baron Von Redder, beside the most exquisite bride imaginable, and ranged in due order, according to their various rank and degree, sat the merry company.

Immense dishes of lamb, beef, fatted sheep, and other savory solids, the appetites of those who did such wonderful execution. At length came the wine to the great satisfaction of others inclined to prowess in toasting. The rejoicings were great; the noise and revelry loud. Even the gloomy Von Redder became facetious; he laughed for effect, and uttered some execrable jokes, which of course received universal applause. The fair bride was pensive and happy; for she knew little of the character of her lord, and that little was of his better traits. He was now in the prime of life: his person, though somewhat ruffianly, was fine and commanding; his eye was keen for conquest; his smile affable; his countenance manly; his bravery undoubted; and such qualifications were sufficient, in the days of chivalry and romance, to make up for many deficiencies in the moral department. In the fullness of his heart, the Baron pledged his bride, responded to the toast with admirable grace. The conversation then turned on the excellence of the wine.

"To me," said the Baron, "it has a peculiar richness in the flavor: how dost thou like it, fair Ismena?"

"O, 'tis admirable!—so sparkling and purgent!"

"No doubt, my lady, it has many virtues," chimed in the old seneschal; "for, according to the best of my recollection, it is this night twenty years old."

"How!—whence came it?" demanded Von Gliffen.

"From the Black Hogshead," replied the seneschal; "Damnation!" cried the Baron, starting from his seat.

"Yes my lord; but you turn pale—you tremble—you are ill!"

"Merciful God! what have I done! Nay I meant nothing. . . . I had a slight pain. . . . It is all over."

The guests turned pale, and stared. The bride sickened at the thoughts that whirled through her brain; all became convinced that there was a mystery in the words of the Baron. His brow grew dark as the storm-cloud; his lips quivered; his cheeks blanched to an ashy hue; and he darted a suspicious eye on the guests. In a loud and angry voice he demanded, "What means this confusion! None dared to answer; the haughty Von Redder sat down, and mysterious whispers, and shakes of the head, were all they thought proper to display. Annoyed and alarmed at the general commotion, the Baron darted a scowl at the seneschal, and left the room. The ancient retainer quickly acquired the use of his tongue, and entranced the company, in spite of the silent threat of the Baron, with an ominous account of the dark and bloody end of Baron Von Gliffen.

"Twenty years ago," continued the venerable seneschal, "a henchman of the Black Baron was hanged for this mysterious murder. I had my own suspicions concerning the matter; but as they were without any certain foundation, I kept them to myself. Immediately after the disappearance of the unfortunate man, the heir, our present Baron, brought me to the wine-vault, where snugly stored was a stock of wine, in which Bacchus himself might rejoice, for you must know the deceased baron was a reputed toper; and assuming a countenance so dark and lowering that I shall never forget it, he pointed to a black hogshead, in a remote corner of the vault, and said: 'As you value your life, never draw from that hogshead!' This caution had great impression on my mind, but I knew too well the determined character of the Baron, to incur a penalty by my curiosity; and I never touch the forbidden wine until this day. I found myself growing old; I knew my thread of life would soon be severed; and this, together with the harassing thought that I was accessory to some mysterious crime induced me to try an experiment, which would either be my ruin or my salvation. I drew the wine, and managed to place it before the Baron, my master.—The effect you have all seen. I solemnly believe there is a double-dark deed in the affair; and as men and Christians, I beseech you to follow me!"

Many of the guests shrank back at the proposal; but others, more courageous, followed the seneschal, who led the way through passages and dark chambers, to a flight of stairs, leading to the wine-vault. Having procured a torch, they descended the dim and gloomy recess. The wall was black, and covered with slime and moss; the air dank and chilly; and the hollow sounds of the vaults caused the stoutest hearts to quail. Passing on through several subterranean chambers, the seneschal led the way to a capacious cell, stored to the ceiling with casks and tuns of wine. In the gloomiest corner stood a black hog's head, exactly as he had described. Beside it lay an axe, with which after infinite labor, the hog's head was broken open.

A cry of horror burst from the group. In the bloody wine lay the remains of the Black Baron! His skull was shattered, his limbs frightfully mutilated, his body striped and gashed in several places, and the whole bearing evidence of a horrible death. A groan was heard among the by-standers: it was the voice of Baron Von Redder, the bridegroom and the partridge.

"Monster!" cried the guests, "you have foully wronged the henchman! You are the murderer.—You have shed, you have drunk your father's blood!" The man of guilt staggered back, stupefied with horror.

"Seize him!" shouted the seneschal; "seize him!" Baron Von Redder was secured. The avengers bore him to the top of the castle, where still swung the mouldering skeleton of the henchman. In the summary manner of the time, he was bound to the skeleton, and cast over the turret; and to and fro swung the dying and the dead. The wind whistled mournfully against the chains; the clouds seemed to gather at the moment; and ere the executioner had left the walls, a raven was tearing the flesh from the dead Baron of Osnabruck.

Many a dark legend is still extant, relative to the fate of the bride. The favorite one is to this effect: when the Baron retired from the banquet, she also left the room, and sought the solitude of her chamber. Night closed in. Weeping and sad, she flung herself on a couch, where sleep soon relieved her of her terrors. At midnight a rustling noise and a clanking of chains awoke her. With a cry of horror, she started from the couch. Before her stood the Baron, his face blanched and gory, his eyes sunk, his step uneven, and his person was wasted to a shadow. In a voice too sepulchral and unearthly for life, he demanded a fulfilment of the marriage rites. The bride, horror-stricken, endeavored to elude his clammy grasp: a curse and a shriek rang throughout the castle; and when morning dawned, the retainers beheld, still swinging by the skeleton henchman, the corpse of the Baron; and repairing to the bridal chamber, a sight equally horrible met their eyes. On the floor lay the widowed bride, weltering in blood; full soon to be a thing

Where could Oh! woe, until the ruin laid,
Folds his dark wing beneath the vengeful dead!

DIED OF A BROKEN HEART.—A young girl, a German, lately died at Baltimore under circumstances deeply affecting. She was engaged to be married to a young man of Philadelphia, who for reasons best known to himself, communicated to her some time since his intention of abandoning her. On receiving this information, she became the child of sorrow and despair for ten days, when reason left its seat, and she became an awful maniac, unceasingly calling on her lover to "come to her." On the evening of her death she ordered her "wedding garment to be prepared," saying that she "wished to be dressed in white," and that she "was to be married at ten o'clock," the precise time of her departure to a world of spirits!

THE GATHERER.

TYPE STICKERS.

We casually mentioned a day or two ago, that the newly elected mayor of Baltimore was a short time since a journeyman printer. The instances are not rare in which those bred to the profession of printing, have become distinguished and honored.

To say nothing of Franklin, the beacon light of the craft, we have in our day more than one instance of this honorable distinction. Isaac Hill, the governor of New Hampshire, was a journeyman printer; Samuel T. Armstrong, late mayor of this city, was once a journeyman printer; Mr. Knapp, the Secretary of the State of Vermont, was a printer. And what is of more consequence in the editorial profession, some of the most distinguished were regularly bred to the craft.—Our neighbor Green, the popular editor of the Morning Post, was once a ragged little roller boy. Mr. Homer, of the Gazette, was brought up on Pica and Brevier. We recollect many years since of seeing a little tow-headed overgrown boy, in an obscure printing office in Vermont. That boy is now Mr. Greeley the talented editor of the New Yorker. Of equally obscure origin was the editor of the New York Spirit of the Times, Mr. Wm. T. Porter.

The first we ever saw of Deacon Weld, the editor of the N. Y. Sun, and a clever writer for various magazines, &c., was in a printing office in Lowell, when he was no higher in grade than a "printer's devil." The truth is, if a man has genius, the art of printing will draw it out and set it to work. Printers, with the same amount of natural talent, always make the most popular editors, because they imbibe the tact of the profession. Schooled among "types and shadows," they have every opportunity of studying public taste, and of diverting their minds so as to meet the various readers. The discipline of their minds may not be so severe and rigid as that required for eminence in the legal profession; but this is a peculiarity which the great mass of the people care nothing about, and it is unfavorable to the free interchange of mind with mind. Fact, give us editorial tact. In our profession it is every thing.—Boston Post.

WOMAN.—Perhaps one of the most indispensable and endearing qualifications of the feminine character, is an amiable temper. Cold and callous must be the man who does not prize the meek and gentle spirit of a confiding woman. Her lips may not be sculptured in the line of perfect beauty, her eye may not roll in dazzling splendor, but if the native smile be ever ready to welcome, and the glance fraught with clinging devotion or shrinking sensibility, she must be prized far above gold or rubies. A few moments of enduring silence would often prevent years of discord and unhappiness, but the keen retort and waspish argument too often break the chain of affection, link by link, and leave the heart with no tie to hold it but a cold and frigid duty.

A BUSY FELLOW.—The editor of the Yazoo City Whig says that one week he had to attend to divers and sundry matters, to wit:

Attending to the practical business of the office and editorial department—furnishing divers persons with exchange newspapers—nursing wife and family, owing to sickness—carrying mortar to the mason building our cistern—working in the garden—going after cow and calf—chopping and hauling fire-wood—feeding horses and hogs—hunting hen's eggs—sweeping out the church—endeavoring to collect any pay debts, &c. &c.; in fact, being editor, proprietor, housekeeper and devil.

WHAT NEXT?—A man in Pittsfield, Mass. advertises "a slate pencil lost." Another one for "fifteen girls with active jaws to chew rags at the paper mill." We know a girl in this city who would make an excellent hand at chewing rags; she is all jaw.

INDUSTRY.—The time was when industry was fashionable, and none were ashamed to practice it; but they have changed—fashion rules the world, and labor has nearly gone out of fashion with those who can live without it; and until a reform is had, we may bid farewell to many a comfort we might otherwise enjoy.

A CONVENIENT MEMORY.

A popular jockey was called on one morning by a negro man, who was mounted on a fine looking horse, and with whom a conversation something like the following ensued.

"Good morning, Massa Sharp: My massa sent me to sell dis horse, cause he so bad massa don't want to keep him."

"What are the faults of the horse?"

"O he got good many very bad faults;—dre'ful bad faults."

"What is one of them; the principle one?"

"Well then, Massa Sharp, you see dis horse all ober white; and when massa ride him, the white hairs all stick to massa's new black coat, spoils massa's new coat!"

"Well, that is rather a bad fault to be sure; but has the horse no other faults?"

"O yes massa; horse three very bad faults two others besides dat one."

"What is another of the faults you speak of?"

"Why den massa I'll tell you all about it. When I rides dis horse to water, he souse he nose down in de water, and wet massa's new bridle."

"Well what else?"

"Toder fault massa, dat toder one fault—ah,—me can't tink on em; very bad fault but,—me can't tink on em."

"And what price do you ask for the horse?"

"O not much; he so very bad,—only ask one hundred dollars; and massa say, if can't get dat,—may take seventy-five."

"I'll give you sixty dollars for him."

"O no; couldn't take less den seventy-five dollars, and don't mean to take dat."

With that the fellow turned his horse as if to ride off, but the jockey called out to him "here, stop; stop!" take him at seventy-five?"

"Well hand out de money quick den, cause mus be off."

Seventy-five dollars in new bank notes, were soon tendered, and which the negro with much apparent reluctance received, before he would give up his seat on the horse. The bridle was changed, and the jockey much elated, mounted his new acquisition to ride into the stable door; but before he had fairly considered the propriety of fetching up by means of the reins, the horse struck his head with some violence against the stable walls. The jockey, looking over his shoulder, and seeing Sambo industriously walking away, he called out. "Here you black son of a possum! this horse is stark blind!"

"O law, massa," drawled Sambo, "dat er toder one fault me couldn't tink of?"—N. Y. Mechanic.

Various are the anecdotes on record of the humor of Irish post boys, but we question if any of them are more characteristic than the following incident.—While in Ireland last summer, two gentlemen hired a car from Belfast to go by the hill road. A little after they had reached the rising ground, and while absorbed in admiration of the extensive and picturesque scenery, they scarcely perceived that the driver had pulled up the horse, till he came round and opened the car-door, and immediately shut it with a loud bang. On being asked, in rather a surly tone, the meaning of his conduct, he held up his hands as if to command silence, and repeating in a half whisper, "Hold your tongues, yer honors; I'm making Paddy believe you're out; a walking up the hill, for the devil a foot he'd go farther this blessed day, did he know that yer honors were sitting at yer aise, an' himself pullin' the legs off of him up this tarnation hill."

Dropping.—A gentleman having been hanged, a stranger asked his wife of what distemper her poor husband died. "He took a drop too much," said she.

"Too Slow."—A worthy mid'died, leaving a rich and beautiful widow; the clergyman of the parish, a widower, accompanied her home from the grave and spoke in condoling tones of the loss she was bewailing. The clergyman being a kind and tender-hearted man, told her, by way of consolation, that her loss was not irreparable, and intimated to her, in terms not to be misunderstood, that he should be happy at a proper time to marry her. To which the widow replied, "Oh, my dear sir, you are too late; the deacon spoke to me at the grave."

SISTER NANCE AND THE AGER.—We were travelling not long since in Illinois, and called at a house near the road-side to solicit a drink of water, when the following conversation occurred:

Well, my boy how long have you lived here?
 I don't know, sir, but mother says ever since I was born.
 Have you any brothers or sisters?
 Yes, a few.
 How many?
 Ten or 'leven, I reckon.
 Pretty healthy here, isn't it?
 Yes, but sometimes we have a little ager.
 Any of you got it now?
 Yes, a few on us goin' to have the shakes this afternoon.
 How many?
 Why, all on us, exce, t sister Nance; and she's sich a darnation cross critter, the ager won't take on her; and if it did, she is so cussed contrary she won't shake, no how you can fix her!

Premature Interment.—A lamentable instance of premature interment is mentioned by the Agram Gazette. Several years ago an inhabitant of Beregh, in Croatia, died, as was believed, and 24 hours afterwards deposited in the family tomb. Lately his brother departed this life, and his body was taken to the same receptacle. On re-opening the vault, the coffin of the prior was found empty, and the remains it ought to have contained were lying near its mouth in a position which left no doubt that life had returned after the unhappy man had used powerful, but vain exertions to effect his emancipation.

An Irishman's Plea.—"Are you guilty or not guilty?" said the clerk of the arraigns to a prisoner.—"Aa' sore now," said Pat, "what are you put there but to find that out!"

LADIES TOO MUCH FOR LAWYERS.—An intelligent female witness having been much perplexed by a barrister in a long cross-examination, happened in replying to use the term humbug. "Madam," said the man of law, "you must not talk unintelligibly; what is the court and jury to understand by the word humbug?" The lady hesitated. "I must insist madam," said the barrister anticipating victory, that you proceed no further until you state plainly and openly, what you mean by a humbug." "Why then, sir," returned the lady, "I don't know how better to explain any meaning than by saying, if I met a company of persons who were strangers to you, and should tell them that when they saw you they might prepare to meet a remarkably handsome, genteel, agreeable looking man—that would be a humbug."

DYING RICH.

The following lines from the United States Gazette, have the eloquence of truth to recommend them:
 "An active business man is a rational man, and a great blessing to the community. He keeps in gratifying exercise the talents which God has given him, which, of itself, is a blessing to him. He gives employment to the hands of industry, which is far better than giving alms to the unemployed. These are the legitimate and rational end of active business pursuits and wealthy-getting—the gratification of the active powers and the promotion of industry. But their desire of growing rich, is one of the most foolish intentions which ever entered the heart of foolish man. Experience has fully and emphatically taught the lesson that much wealth left to heirs, is eight times out of ten, not a blessing but a curse. Its expectation beguiles and spoils all the manly powers—its possession leads his mis-judgment, excess, and finally, exhaustion and ruin. The time will yet come, when men of wealth will be wise enough to make a gradual disposition of their property while living—not prospective, but operative—thereby have an eye to the use which is made of it, and participate in the greatest enjoyment that wealth is capable of giving, that of seeing it do good to others. They will despise the foolish aspiration of dying rich, with the certain reflection that their heirs, sooner or later, will die rich."

PRETTY GOOD.

Last night when the congregation of one of the churches were leaving the house of worship it commenced raining. A lady said to the gentleman who accompanied her and her sister, "Why, it rains—send and get an umbrella." "Why, my dear," said the gentleman, "you are neither sugar nor salt, and rain will not hurt you." "No," said the lady, "but we are lasses."

On Monday morning, a bill was posted on a shop door of Duke street, Lincoln's Inn-fields with the following written thereon: "We have shut up the shop. We have all gone to take a holiday. Go thou and do likewise."

An eccentric banker was eyeing with suspicious vision a bill presented to him for discount. "You need not fear," said the palpitating customer; "one of the parties keeps his carriage." "Ay," rejoined the banker; I shall be glad if he keeps his feet."

HEROISM.—The following trait of heroism in a Greek female is from the pen of a correspondent in the Levant:—"A young woman of Missolonghi and her brother quitted that place, and, fighting their way through the ranks of the Turks succeeded in reaching the mountains. Upon arriving there, the young man, overwhelmed by the effort and the weight of his arms, sunk down, and could go no further. At that moment a Turkish horseman came up, with his sabre in his hand. The young woman seized her brother's pistol, shot the Turk, took his horse, and, after assisting her brother to mount it, convey him to Solona. From thence she went to Napoli Romania to sell the horse, in order to buy food and medicine for her brother."

SOMETHING ORIGINAL.

Campbell, the poet, lately received a request from a young lady to write something "original" in her album—he answered as follows:

An original something, dear friend, you would win me
 To write, but how shall I begin?
 For I'm sure I have nothing original in me,
 Excepting Original Sin.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, June 6, 1841.

The Hon. BATES COOKE, ex-Comptroller of the State, died at his residence in Lewiston, on Sunday the 30th ult. The Buffalo Daily Journal says:—"Mr. Cooke had suffered from ill health for many months; and last winter in consequence of continued indisposition, which rendered relaxation from his arduous duties absolutely necessary, he resigned the office of Comptroller of the State. It was too late.—The hopes and expectations of his friends, who trusted that a return to his home and the absence of official cares would restore him to health and usefulness, have been painfully disappointed. He literally fell a martyr in the service of the State. Mr. Cooke was a good upright man in all the relations of life, whether public or private, and his death will be sincerely lamented throughout the State."

ABOLITIONISM.—The "abolition excitement" which has for several years prevailed throughout our country, and more particularly in the non slaveholding states, seems to have considerably abated; and those who were formerly so zealous in the advocacy of the principles of unconditional and immediate emancipation, seem in some measure to have relaxed their efforts and withdrawn their arguments as if they were becoming convinced of the impracticability of the scheme of "immediate abolition." However this may be, we opine that the sudden liberation of the negroes from bondage, in their present extremely illiterate and degraded condition, and their immediate elevation to the unrestricted enjoyment of the privileges and immunities exercised by the white population (without and preliminary measures being taken to prepare them for the sudden change)—would be productive of any thing but beneficial results, either to the whites or the blacks. The conduct of the negroes recently emancipated in the British W. Indies, furnishes abundant evidence of the truth of this assertion.

It is singular and unaccountable, that those very "philanthropic" individuals who profess so great a friendship for "Africa's sable sons," and so great a desire for their improvement and elevation, should be so strenuous in their opposition to the colonization of the already free blacks, in Liberia—a place provided for their reception on the coast of Africa. Those few who have already emigrated, have returned most satisfactory accounts of their improvement, and the local advantages of the place; and this is a conclusive demonstration of the practicability of the general emigration of the free black population to that colony, where, if they in reality possess the qualifications necessary for their advancement, they may enjoy the full benefits to be derived therefrom, without being impeded in their progress by that prejudice, which (as their friends, the abolitionists, have alleged) is all that now prevents their rising, in morals and intellect, to an equality with the whites.

BURNING OF THE NATIONAL THEATRE.—This splendid edifice was entirely destroyed by fire on Sunday morning last, the 30th ult. Previous to the breaking out of the fire, a person employed in the establishment, in the capacity of lamp-lighter, made some expressions and remarks, which afterwards tended to fix suspicion upon him, of being the incendiary; and he is now in custody, undergoing an examination. Should he be pronounced guilty, his punishment will undoubtedly be heavy, as, by the conflagration, the life of a female residing in an adjoining tenement was lost, by the falling in of the roof.

Good.—We recommend the following to the attention of our readers:—Non-conductors of newspapers, who talk so wisely about the manner in which they ought to be conducted, might possibly find it to their advantage to treasure up in their memory the words following:—"No one understands how a newspaper should be conducted so well as some modest individuals who never managed a paper in all their lives.—They understand all about it."

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.—This important document arrived in this city on Wednesday afternoon, about 5 o'clock, and was soon issued in extra sheets by the respective daily papers. We have given it but a hasty perusal, and our time will not at present admit of a more extended notice of the views entertained, or the subjects embraced.

THEATRE.—We perceive that RICE, the popular and inimitable delineator of Ethiopian character, has been engaged here during the past week. Other eminent performers are shortly to appear, among whom is the great national tragedian, EDWIN FOREST.

Mr. Rice takes a benefit this (Saturday) evening.

From Fayal advices have been received to the 17th April—up to which time nothing had been heard there of the President.

The Halifax Gazette states that Sir John and Lady Harvey, with their suites, have taken passage in the Britannia.

THE WRONG MAN.—The man arrested at St. Louis, charged with the recent forgeries in New York, and other cities, has obtained a hearing and after examination set at liberty—there being no satisfactory evidence against him. It is believed he is not the man.

The jury in the Elridge case are still out. They stand eight for acquittal, and four for conviction.

The Caledonia left Boston, on Tuesday at 2 o'clock P. M. with 101 passengers, 18 of whom will stop at Halifax. She carries out 10,200 letters, and five bags full of newspapers.

THE PRESIDENT STEAMSHIP.—The news by the brig Harbinger which arrived at Boston, on Saturday morning last, from Fayal, brings no tidings of this ill-fated vessel from that place, up to the time she sailed, which was on the 11th of May.

☞ The beautiful poetical selection of T. T. shall appear in our next.

Intelligence:

Death by Lightning.—Mrs. Polly Chapin, wife of Mr. Zebulon Chapin, of Simsbury (Ct.) was instantly killed by lightning on Tuesday last. She was alone in the house at the time. Her age was about thirty-seven.

During the same storm a tree was struck in the yard of Deacon William Mather, and his fence broken down.

Providential Escape.—During the thunder shower on Saturday evening last, the house of Mr. Jacob Morey, in Upper Mt. Bet el, Pa. was struck by lightning. There were five children in at the time, who prostrated by the stroke but did not receive any serious injury, having all recovered from the shock and are as well as usual. One of them has some slight marks remaining on one arm.—Balt. American.

Driver killed.—Edward Crane, a driver for the Albany and Buffalo Towing company, was killed at Palmyra, on the 21st inst. by the horses running away, while towing the boat George A. Avery, and throwing him against the bank of the canal, with such violence as to fracture his skull.

A dreadful Suicide.—A man committed suicide at the Alms House, in Roxbury, on Monday last, by running a broom stick down his throat ten inches, and died shortly afterwards from its effects. He was a foreigner, and partially deranged.

The Death of a Judge.—The New Orleans papers announce the death on the 19th inst. of the Hon. Philip K. Lawrence, Judge of the U. S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

According to the late census there is but one person in the State of Mass. who is a native, who cannot read and write.

Young Semmes, charged with the murder of Prof. Davis, it is said, is sinking into a consumption, and doubts are entertained whether he will ever be brought to trial. His trial was postponed a few days owing to his indisposition.

Fatal Accident.—On Thursday last, Mr. John B. Landis, son of Christian Landis, (distiller) of Derry, Pa. was killed in an awful and sudden manner. Riding along in company with a friend, they were induced to try the relative speed of their horses, when the stirrup strap of Mr. Landis gave way, and he was precipitated to the earth, striking his head against a tree with such force as to crush his skull.

Robbery.—A lady of wealth, who has apartments at Jones Hotel, in Chestnut street, Philadelphia, was robbed on Thursday afternoon of jewelry and bijouerie, amounting to upwards of $3000. Two of the servants employed in the hotel, were arrested on suspicion, and underwent an examination by the Recorder. They were, however, discharged for want of evidence.

Accident.—On Saturday last, a young man by the name of Lindsey, belonging in Chester while riding with two others on the rail road, in one of the small cars propelled by hand, suddenly lost his balance, and falling over the front side of the car across the track, the wheels passed directly across his breast, inflicting an injury on which he has since died.—Springfield Gazette.

Escape and Re-capture of Murdock.—Bartley M. Murdock, whose arrest we mentioned some weeks since, escaped from Talbotton Jail, on Wednesday 12th, about one hour before day. He was confined in the lower story, in company with a negro, and both escaped. Dogs were put on their track, and the negro was soon recaptured. They then commenced a search for Murdock, and found him about 9 o'clock, in a swamp near the court house. He was carried to Harris co. jail, where he was strictly guarded. It is now ascertained that it was Mr. Thurnod of this place who was murdered, and clearly evident Murdock killed him.—Athens, (Geo.) Whig.

On Thursday last, 13th inst., Mr. Thomas Livingston, (a partner or clerk of Mr. Newsome of Jeff. co., as appeared from papers found near his body,) was murdered about two miles and a half east of the Ocilla ferry, on the St. Augustine road, at or near the river Styx. His body was discovered by Maj. Wilson, 3d Infantry, who was returning with an escort from Fort Gamble to Fort Pleasant. He appeared to have been shot through the left breast. His body was lying in the road—his clothing had been taken off, and his eyes plucked out. His horse was found a few hundred yards off, lying dead. Maj. Wilson immediately despatched a party to enter the body, and others from Forts Pleasant and Gamble, in pursuit of the Indians, who in all human probability, have committed this act.—Tallahassee Sem.

Miniature Carriage for the Princess Royal.—A most elegant little carriage is now building and nearly completed, for the use of the Princess, to enable the Princess to take occasional airings with her Majesty through the walks in the gardens of Buckingham Palace and Wind or Castle. It is a most tasteful little affair, the body resting within a few inches of the ground, and admirably adapted to the purposes for which it will be required. A pair of beautiful Shetland ponies, in perfect keeping as to size with the carriage, have been presented to her Queen, and the whole "turn out" will be attractive novelty. The ponies are so exceedingly tractable and docile, that it may be said even a child might drive them. It is expected that this Lilliputian affair will be used for the first time upon the arrival of the Court at Windsor, at Easter.—London paper.

Married.

On Saturday last, by the Rev. Mr. Kissam, Mr. John P. Long, of Bethlehem, to Miss Eve Keelen, of New-Scotland.

On the 9th April, by the Rev. Dr. Welch, Mr. John A. Sickle, to Miss Deborah A. Salvadge, all of this city.

In New York, 29th ult., by the Rev. Dr. Eastburn, Alex. H. Stevens, M. D. to Phoebe Coles, daughter of John Nelson Lloyd, of Lloyd's Neck, Long Island.

In New York, on the 27th ult., by the Rev. Dr. Eastburn, Wm. H. Neilson, to Caroline Kane, daughter of P. L. Mills.

DIED.

In this city, on the 1st inst., Richard Rosecrans, son of Abraham Rosecrans, in the 50th year of his age.

In New Scotland, on the 17th ult. Mrs. Rachel Van Heusen, relict of the late Rev. Harmanus Van Heusen, in the 82d year of her age.

At Utica, on the 22d ult. Hon. James Dean, aged 52 years.

In Rome, on the 6th ult., Cornelia Ann, wife of M. Farmer, editor of the Onondaga Standard, and daughter of Charles and Ann Mosely.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

Hudson Lodge No. 7, Hudson R. A. Chapter, No. 6, and Lafayette Encampment, No. 7, will celebrate the coming Anniversary of "ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST," on the 24th of June next. Masonic Brethren, generally, are respectfully invited to unite in the festivities of the day.

By order of the Committee of Arrangements.

Committee of Correspondence and Invitation.

Hudson, May 4, 1841.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved Diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the same subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful, and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN—REMOVAL.—The Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the Travelling Club generally, that he has removed from his old stand, in the corner of the middle of the street to the large and commodious new place here before known as the National Hotel, No. 169 Market street, and for a number of years past, occupied by M. A. Grishy, as a Boarding house. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his friends and more of them, with an additional expense on their part. The house is 4000 ft. high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of comfortable and elegant families, men of business, &c. Persons desiring for pleasure, travellers by Rail Road, Steamboat or Stage, will find the New England, well adapted to their accommodation, being within five or ten minutes walk of the Rail Road, and within six or seven miles of the Steamboat landings. Breakfast will be prepared every morning during the season of Navigation, and for those wishing to and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning Boat for New York—leave at 7 o'clock. An excellent table, attached to the house with every convenience for those travelling with their families, &c. The subscriber embosoms the privilege of returning his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests continuing patronage generally, are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself, at every exertion shall be made to make their stay while at his House both pleasant and agreeable. His prices will be a guide to no one to suit the times. 75 cts per day, for Board and Lodging. Albany, May 15th, 1841. A. W. STARKES.

REMOVAL.—JOSEPH CHATTURSON, Draper and Tailor, respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has removed to the new store No. 113 Market street, four doors south of the Eagle Tavern, where he intends to continue the tailoring business in the latest and most approved fashions. J. C. trusts his long and attention to business to merit a share of public patronage, and solicits a continuation of the favors of his present customers, and solicits himself, by the long experience he has had in the above business, to be able to give general satisfaction to those who may favor him with a call. Just received a choice assortment of goods, suitable for the season. May 3d.

POETRY.

THE SONG TO THE BROOK.

BY ABRAHAM MESSLER.

Bright daughter of the mountain shade,
Light bounding o'er the rocklet's shade,
As onward to the bright green glade
Thou wanderest on thy murmuring way—
Blithely chanting for the earth,
Through all thy winding way along.
Say, what prompts thy ceaseless mirth,
And wakes thy glad and joyous song?

Sweet streamlet of the flow'ry vale,
Lingering round each little hill,
The breath of flowrets to inhale,
And wandering at thy own sweet will;
I hear thee singing all the while,
In murmurs gentle, soft and mild,
Thy lingering moments to beguile,
Like Nature's feeling wayward child.

When Spring with blossoms scent the earth,
Thy song is rapid, loud and wild;
And mingling with the warbler's mirth,
Hath oft the heart of care beguiled.
But Summer's fainting heat subdues
That merry song to murmurs soft,
Till some fresh shower thy mirth renews,
To pour its melody aloft.

In Autumn's sere and fading time,
When flowers are gone and birds have fled,
I hear its melancholy chime,
A requiem o'er the beauteous dead;
But when the loud harsh Winter roars,
And storms are thundering o'er the earth,
Thy voice of madness shouts and soars
In deep and wide-responding mirth.

Or else in icy fetters bound,
Like some dull captive in his cell,
Where midnight reigns, and no sweet sound
Is heard to break thy gloomy spell—
Silent and sad thy voice is mute,
While creeping slowly on thy way,
As if in agony acute,
Thou waitest for the summer's day.

Sing on, bright streamlet, in thy joy—
A thousand voices glad as thine
The hand of Time will soon destroy,
As hearts are rent and souls repine!
But 'mid the dirge of death and woe,
The merry song will ne'er decline,
Our hearts may all their joys forego,
While joy and gladness still are thine!

FAREWELL TO MY NATIVE VALE.

Farewell, ye dear vale, and ye woodlands adieu,
Farewell to the joys I've relinquished with you;
No longer I hail those enchantments ye shed,
Your pleasures and pastimes no longer I wed.

Farewell too, ye friends, ye friends ever true,
No longer I sit in sweet converse with you;
Your precepts and counsel no longer I hail,
That oft I hear in my own native vale.

The rays of affection and shades of delight
That banish dull care, and bespangle with light,
That visit the mountain and light on the dale—
These pleasures are felt in my own native vale.

When Spring opens her bosom and puts forth her bloom
And Summer succeeds with a richer perfume,
When Sol mounts on high, and doth odors inhale—
These pleasures are felt in my own native vale.

When earth was enwrapped in her mantle of white,
And the green turf of Summer is hid from the sight,
Round the fire-side with joy how oft did I hail
The friends of my youth in my dear native vale.

When life shall be o'er, and its lamp cease to burn,
When back to the dust my frail body shall turn,
When the last trump shall sound, with joy may I hail
The friends of my youth, of my own native vale.

MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

It is a gentle flowery spot,
Beside a rich one's crumbling mound,
Where my poor mother's form is laid—
Where from earth's ills a rest she's found.

Earth's children fair are often seen
Attracted to that sacred spot,
By the gray marble mass near by,
Which hides a base and wealthy sot.

When some, perchance, have cast their eyes
Upon my mother's lowly bed,
I've heard them whisper as they pass'd,
"There lies the meek and humble dead."

Here high and low, here rich and poor,
Together mingle dust with dust,
While o'er the one the lilies weep,
The other boasts a marble bust.

At night I seek my mother's grave,
When sleep benumbs the world's cold scorn.
And then I utter forth the prayer
Which she taught me in childhood's morn.

Though 'bove her aged and hallow'd head,
No slab is rear'd her name to tell,
Her memory dear, and virtues bright
Within my heart will ever dwell.

But ere I quit life's rugged path,
I have one boon of some to crave—
That when I'm gone, they'll lay my bones
Beside her green and simple grave.

VALUE OF A MOMENT.

BY MONTGOMERY.

At every motion of our breath,
Life trembles on the brink of death!
A taper's flame that upward turns,
While downward to the dust it burns.

A moment ushered us to birth,
Heirs of the common wealth of earth;
Moment by moment, years are past,
And one, ere long, will be our last.

'Twixt that, long fled, which gave us light,
And that which soon shall end in night,
There is a point no eye can see,
Yet on it hangs eternity.

This is that moment—who shall tell
Whether it leads to Heaven or Hell?
This is that moment—as we choose,
The immortal soul we have to lose.

Time past, the time to come, are not—
Time present is our only lot:
O God, henceforth our hearts incline
To seek no other love than thine!

WHAT WERE HER EYES LIKE?

BY JAMES BURTON.

What were her eyes like? Poet, say!
They seem'd, through their silken lashes,
Like the blue of a bright Italian day,
Or a star that through darkness flashes.

What were her lips like? Poet, say!
Like beautiful buds a growing
On one fair stem in the month of May,
But far more perfume throwing.

What were her teeth like? Poet, say!
They seem'd, with lips asunder,
Small caverns of pearl that hidden lay,
Or just shown to excite our wonder.

What were her cheeks like? Poet, say!
Like the bloom the peach receiveth,
Which the amorous sun, on a summer's day,
Doth kiss till a blush it leaveth.

MASONIC APRONS, of the Degree of Master and Royal Arch, splendidly engraved on satin, can be obtained on application to this office. Likewise, handsomely engraved Diplomas of Master and Royal Arch, suitable for framing.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptability to business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captain on board or at the office on the dock.

MASONIC.

EXTRACTS FROM A MASONIC SERMON.

Text.—"I light was ag in t lht, in the ranks."

Our first and most excellent Grand Master, Solomon, king of Israel, strengthened by the strength of Hiram, king of Tyre, who strengthened him in his glorious undertaking, had now completed that mighty fabric on the summit of mount Moriah which has immortalized his name; and being called thereby from the labor of seven revolving years to the refreshment of a moment's rest, his active and intelligent mind employed that moment to draw the outlines of a spacious and magnificent edifice, sacred to the genius of the mystic order, and devoted to the regular assemblings of the faithful and the true; the worthy and the good.

The foundation and the cape stone of this elegant monument of fraternal affection and royal munificence, king Solomon gave in charge to the widow's son, by whose cunning contrivance and curious workmanship, the pillars and their chapters were beautified and adorned with lily work, net work and pomegranates, inlaid in the seven times refined silver of Parvaim, combined with perfections of Gold from Ophir and Uphaz; united to the mild radiance of the oriental pearl, and gemmed by ten thousand stars, composed of sparkling diamonds, set in polished rubies.

Obedient to the mandate of his illustrious companion and brother, Hiram el Abif selected a deep vale in the forest of Lebanon, where the voice of the lion had never been heard, nor the volume of the serpent pressed the flowery turf, and projecting an oblong square, due east and west, of one hundred and fifty feet in length; and seventy-five in breadth, between north and south; the lower court, middle chamber, and third story rose from the earth to the heavens, forty-five feet in height; and the whole building was supported on its base, in the centre, and at the capital, by thrice fifteen cedar columns of the ancient and original orders, emblematic of the illustrious elect, elected of three times five; and alluding to those ineffable mysteries which can only be learned in the audience chamber of the grand, most potent and sublime.

Forbidden to rend the purple veil which hides the ever burning lamp; nor permitted to explain the secret engraving in crimson capitals; we therefore shall confine our present researches to that light against light in three ranks, whereby this magnificent dome was perpetually illumined, as with the noontide splendors of the glory and beauty of the day; and this light against light in three ranks it will be our happiness to exhibit, as the three greater lights in the golden candlesticks of the temple, comprehending the first great light of the Holy Bible, the second great light of the perfect square, and the third great light of the extended compasses; and may each one of these grand, sublime, masonic solar orbs commingle social rays, in harmonies of moral and of heavenly light; and so enlighten the worshipful master, wardens and brethren of this right worshipful lodge, that having faith in God hope in immortality, and charity to all mankind, they may realise the pleasing satisfaction which results from a life well spent, die at last in peace with God and man, and wake to raptures of ecstatic bliss in yon bright world of everlasting day, which neither needs the sun the moon, nor morning star, for the Lord God Almighty is the temple thereof, and the Lamb in the midst of the rainbow diademed throne, its cloudless and eternal light.

Masonry, my brethren, my friends, is moral and spiritual science, progressing from faint degrees of natural light, to brighter and more perfect degrees of intellectual day; and while her sons profess to revere that older scripture, penned on vast creation's wide expanded scroll, they are taught to acknowledge still superior obligations, to a far superior light than nature or than reason can presume to boast. For although it be a serious and solemn truth, as the apostle Paul hath justly observed, that the eternal power and deity of the Supreme Architect of the universe may be clearly inferred and positively proved, from the visibles of creative wisdom, strength and beauty, as impressed on the heavens above, and engraven on the earth beneath; yet, incredible, as it may appear; astonishing, as indeed it is; and humiliating, as it must be, to philosophic pride, the inhabitants of the world, from the rising of the sun, to the going down of the same, stand solemnly charged at the dread tribunal of the high and the lofty One, who inhabiteth eternity, with having changed the glory of the incorruptible Jehovah, into an image made like to corruptible man, and the bird of the air, the beast of the earth, and meaner reptiles of the dust, have received that worship, homage, and fear, from rational, intelligent, and immortal beings, which ought forever to ascend, as a morning oblation, a noontide offering, or an evening sacrifice, to the only blessed Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, who is clothed upon with light, as with a garment; who is decked with honor and majesty, for a covering; who maketh the clouds his chariot, and walketh abroad upon the wings of the wind; in whose presence, angel and archangel, veil the radiant face, while cherubim and seraphim continually cry, Holy, holy, thrice holy, is the Lord, the Lord of hosts; and to whom, the first born sons of elder paradise, from golden harps, perpetually respond. 'The heavens are full of thy glory, thy goodness, O God! and let the earth be filled with thy praise, thou grand Master Builder of the mighty, the stupendous whole; Artificer supreme, of worlds on worlds, that roll and the vast expanse!'

Thus taught to know the weakness of imperfect man; and learned to feel the frailties of feeble dust, as men, as masons, we confess the necessity and need of a divine revelation, in which, the name, the nature, and perfections, of the great first cause; the sovereign cause of causes and effects, shall be engraven, as with the point of a diamond, on the rock of celestial truth; and by the clear shinings of whose unspotted light, the craft may be enabled to walk through the darkness of the valley, evermore offering the incense of piety, perfumed by odors of praise, to the munificent giver of every good and perfect gift, for the manifold blessings and comforts of life, profusely sprinkled in a vale of tears; and specially adoring the ineffable riches of that unspeakable grace, which hath set before the sons of amity and peace, a hope full of immortality, beyond the clouded canopy of time; where sorrow and sighing shall flee away; sickness and pain be known no more; and death himself give up the ether, resign the quiver and the bow, and yield his iron sceptre, to the Son of God.

But it is not, my brethren and my friends, the lighter shade of superstition, the deeper gloom of bigotry, nor yet, the more awful horrors of idolatry, which alone have impelled the fraternity of free and accepted masons, to rejoice with exceeding great joy, in that light of the knowledge of the glory of God, which the gospel of the blessed Redeemer, hath benignantly revealed, as the path of the just, shining brighter and brighter unto more perfect day; but they are also convinced from indubitable records, supported by historic fact, that Grecian philosophy and Roman ethics are but the darkness of the midnight hour, when compared with that purer light of the moral which glows on revelation's lucid page; and we feel ourselves bound to acknowledge, what Socrates and Plato confessed as truth, that weak, imperfect, and benighted man needs a lamp to his feet, and a light to his path, enkindled at the altar of the skies, and fed upon the oil of heavenly grace.

This pure and spotless light, a light above the brightness of the mid day sun, above the radiance of the queen of heaven, our ancient patrons found within the compass of the book divine; and as whose birth we celebrate this day, and one, whose memory masons hold most dear, have added many a wheel of light, involving light, in triple rank, to revelation's glowing car; and here permit me to observe, that this great light of life; this greater light in death; not only reflects the light of heavenly truth, on the whole sphere of obligation, which is due to the Grand Architect of the heavens, the earth, and the sea; the Creator of all things above, below, beneath, around; but it also sweeps the compass of knowledge, circle within circle of moral duty, as duty respects the great brotherhood of the one family of man universal; and likewise it teaches that reverence, which we owe to ourselves, as bearing the image and superscriptions of the imperial Augustus of the worlds, on high; as deathless emanations from the brightness of the King eternal, immortal, invisible; who alone by his wisdom stretched forth the heavens; by his strength, based the corner stone of earth on the fiat of his word; and swept the royal arch of beauty round yon azure skies!

Persuaded as men, convinced as masons, and believing as christians, that no other light, except the sun of righteousness himself, can possibly equal this great light of present, and of future life; this light of God from heaven above, reflecting light on earth beneath, it is therefore established by a solemn masonic decree, immutable as the law of Media and Persia which changeth not, that the first great light of the Holy Bible shall forever adorn the altar and the column; perpetually shine within the temple and the veil, and evermore move onwards before the journeyings of the craft; as a pillar of fire, moving mid the wilderness of old; and beaming meridian splendors of light, on the deepest gloom of low twelve; while our ancient books of original constitutions, and primitive rolls of sacred charges, received from the Master in Israel on the top of Mount Horeb, and confirmed by himself, in the depths of the valley of Jehoshaphat, have unitedly ordained, that the faith and practice of masons must be conformed to the divine principles, and heavenly pattern of the supreme, sublime, Grand Master of the universe; from whose written word we are taught; and by whose whose exemplar we are taught, to walk as children of the light and of the day, having on the breastplate of faith; and being clothed with the ephod of love, unsullied by hypocrisy, and unstained by dissimulation; evermore loving God, who first loved us, with all the heart, and soul and mind, and might, and strength; which is far more acceptable than thousands of rams, ten thousands of rivers of oil, or the sweetest perfumes of Sabe's spicy groves; and loving our neighbors as ourselves; speaking truth and peace; showing mercy and compassion; executing judgment and justice; thinking no evil against a brother; and working no ill to an enemy; we thus fulfil the royal law of heaven, the law of liberty and love; for these are the two great commandments of the Mosaic and Christian economies united as one, in love to God, and love to man; and they contain within the golden points extended from the bosom of Moses, to the breast of Jesus, the sum of all the law at Sinai given; the substance of prophetic truth from Samuel, to the days of John; and comprehend the glorious gospel of the blessed God, reflecting of the mingled rays of legal and prophetic light; and which like charity, abides the greatest of the three, forever blessing and forever blest.

*St. John the Baptist, and St. John the Evangelist

A person bemoaning the uncomfortable prospect of celibacy, and comparing the respective happiness of married and single states, exclaimed, 'What can make the bitter cup of a bachelor go down?' A wit in company, assuming the tone and manner of the complainant, exclaimed, 'a-las! a-las!'

KEEPING A SECRET.

The following, from "Lectures on the Sphere and Duties of Woman," lately published in Baltimore, is evidently the production of one who (we wish not to perpetrate a libel on the sex) has obviously been a close observer of the female character.

Some women appear to be incapable of keeping a secret. It seems to burn upon their lips till they have uttered it. Let a woman of this description come in possession of a secret, affecting the peace of whole families, and which every tie of humanity would persuade her to bury in utter oblivion, and what does she do? Stay at home and forget it by pursuing her accustomed avocations? Ah no, wet or dry, hot or cold, out she must go at the earliest hour that it is decent to visit. She calls on her most intimate friend, without, perhaps, any definite intention of unburdening her mind. But when she arrives she can think of nothing else. One topic after another is started, but all immediately flag. A strange air of mystery and constraint comes over her, which brings the conversation entirely to a stand. "What is the matter? Has anything happened? Do tell me what has happened!" It is all over. Out it must come, if it costs her her life. But then she quiets her conscience by exacting a promise of inviolable secrecy. That promise of secrecy, however, means that she will tell it only to those of her immediate acquaintance whom she can trust—so in about two days it is all over town. It is a profound secret until it is found that every body knows it. Thus it is in the power of two or three women, who are so disposed, to keep any community in a perpetual strife. I have myself known a whole town thrown into the most violent excitement, and a division created, which separated families, alienated friends, and entirely broke up all social harmony for years, by one base insinuation of not more than ten words.

DRESS OF THE ICELANDERS.

The dress of the Icelandic peasant resembles that of a common sailor, being a short jacket of blue, gray or black home-made cloth, wide trousers of the same material, woollen stockings, and shoes or short boots of untanned leather, without heels, and laced in front. The higher classes are clothed as in other lands, and even the common people, when going on a long journey or to church, approach nearer the fashion. The raiment of the females is more peculiar, and highly ornamented, though almost all formed of the wadmal, or common cloth of the country. It consists of a red or a black bodice, with stripes of velvet covering the seams, and fastened in front with five or six silver clasps; round the neck is a ruff of velvet, adorned in a similar manner; above is the freva or jacket of black cloth, with silver buttons; and above all, is the hempa, a black cloak lined with velvet, and fastened with clasps. The stockings are dark blue or red, and the shoes somewhat similar to those of the men. The head dress is a fantastic turban of white linen stiffened with pins, and generally from fifteen to twenty inches high. It is round near the head, but soon becomes flat, and curves first backwards and then forwards. It is fastened by a black or colored handkerchief bound round it several times, and on bridal or other high occasions, it is also adorned with gold and silver. By the quantity of these precious metals on the dress, a judgment may be formed of the wealth and station of the proprietor, the silver on that of a lady of rank being frequently worth 400 dollars. But with all this external magnificence, linen is almost unknown, the under clothing of both sexes being chiefly flannel or wadmal, to which many of the diseases prevalent in the country are ascribed.—Edinburgh Cab. library.

A Roman, being about to repudiate his wife, amongst a variety of other questions from her enraged kinsmen, was asked, "Is not your wife a sensible woman? Is she not a handsome woman? Has she not borne you five children?" In answer to all which questions, slipping off his shoe, he held it up, and interrogating them in his turn, "Is not this shoe?" said he, "a very handsome one? Is it not quite new? Is it not quite new? Is it not extremely well made?—How, then, is it that none of you can tell where it pinches?"

PETRARCH AND LAURA.

Petrarch first beheld Laura as she was going to the church of the monastery of St. Claire. She was dressed in green, and her gown was embroidered with violets. Her person was delicate, her eyes tender and sparkling, and her eyebrows black as ebony. Golden locks waved over her shoulders whiter than snow, and the ringlets were woven with the fingers of love. Nothing was so soft as her looks, so modest as her carriage, so touching as the sound of her voice. An air of gaiety and tenderness breathed around her; but so pure and happily tempered, as to inspire every beholder with the sentiments of virtue; for she was chaste as the spangled dew-drop on the thorn. Such was the description given of this divine woman, by Petrarch, her enslaved lover.—Zimmerman.

A DESIRABLE RESIDENCE.—The N. Y. Sun contains an extract of a letter from a family in Texas, which it publishes for the benefit of those who do not consider the United States either large or good enough for them. They write:—"If you come across any fools who have the Texas fever on them strong, just ask them what they want to lose! for if they have any thing to lose, Texas is just the place for them. All we carried to Texas, or made there, has been sacrificed to get away again. You know nothing of sickness at the North; here one day's fever will do more towards killing a man, than a month's sickness would with you."

ANECDOTE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION OF 1789.

Politics and cupidity were not the only evil passions which sent their victims to the revolutionary scaffold. All the baser feelings of human nature furnished their contingent, "envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness," jealousy, sensuality, and even the wounded pride of bad poets, and wretched actors. The following anecdote is related by Heron, private secretary of Fonquier Tiville, the public accuser. On the sixth or seventh Thermidor, (two or three days before the fall of Robespierre, one of Heron's friends called upon him at the bar of the tribunal, for Fonquier had scarcely any other domicile, taking his meals and his rest at the bar, so urgent was the work of destruction; and his secretary was compelled to show as much activity as himself. His college friend then came up to Heron, rubbing his hands and a chuckling smile upon his lips. "Bravo! citizen Heron!" said he, "bravo! the work goes bravely on; fifty four to day! Eh! Tell me, have you as many for to-morrow!" "Not quite," replied Heron, "but nearly." "Is your list complete? tell me, is it signed by citizen Fonquier?" "Not yet; but why do you ask? have you any aristocrat, federalist, fanatic, or any other to denounce?" "Unfortunately, no; but I have a small favor to ask of you my friend; for you are my friend, are you not? Oblige me by putting my wife's name on the list." "Your wife! ridiculous! you are joking!" "Upon my honor, I am in earnest; and I assure you, it will be doing me a signal service." "Impossible," rejoined Heron; "why it was but last Duodine dined together, and you then seemed delighted with the citoyenne?" "Never mind; my opinion of her is altered." "But she is an excellent sansculotte?" "Not at all," replied the husband, "She is an aristocrat, and I can prove it." "You are mad," said Heron; "she is a good wife, and you would quickly repent it." "Not at all; listen to me: once, twice, will you guillotine my wife for me?" "Certainly not," said Heron; "I'll have nothing to do with it." "Thus it is to place my reliance upon college friends," exclaimed the visitor as he withdrew, as angry with Heron as if the latter had refused to lend him an assignat for a hundred francs, or to sign a certificate of his civism. The cream of the story is, that they continued to live lovingly together for thirty years; and that the wife never entertained the slightest suspicion of her husband's summary attempt to get rid of her.—Monthly Chronicle.

A person of rather doubtful integrity was bragging to Foote, "that however other people might act, he had the satisfaction to feel that his heart always lay at his tongue's end." "I always thought so," said the other; "as I never knew it lie in the right place."

AN ARTFUL DODGER.

A young student, living in a humble apartment in the Quarter Latin, expecting his father to pay him a visit from the country, usually addressed the porter on his return from his lectures, "Well, is my father arrived?" The answer was till yesterday in the negative, when the reply was, "Yes, he arrived about an hour since, and requested to be shown to your room, saying he should lay down on on your bed and rest himself, as he was much fatigued from his journey. After remaining, however, about a quarter of an hour, he again went out, saying he had a little commission to execute in the neighborhood, and would attend to it immediately, that he might have the uninterrupted enjoyment of your company for the rest of the evening. He has not yet returned." He said he should call at the College de France, where he should perhaps meet you." The son immediately went up to his room, where, to his great consternation, he found that his trunks and drawers had been broken open, and every portable article of wearing apparel carried off, together with about three hundred francs in money. It is probable that he had been dodged by some one of the Parisian swell mob, who, by throwing himself into his company, had ascertained that he expected his father from the country, and had artfully laid his plans accordingly. No clue to the robbers has yet been obtained.—Paris Paper.

A GARDENER'S PRIVILEGES.

The question was once asked by a very beautiful woman,—"Why is a gardener the most extraordinary man in the world?" The reply given was as follows:—"Because no man has more business on Earth, and he always chooses good Grounds for what he does. He commands his Thyme; he is master of the Mint; and he fingers Pennyroyal. He raises his Celery every year, and it is a bad year indeed that does not bring him in a Plum. He meets with more Boughs than a minister of state; he makes more Beds than the King of France, and has in them more genuine Roses and Lilies than are to be found at a country wake. He makes Raking his business more than his diversion, but it is an advantage to his health and fortune which few others find it; his wife, moreover, has enough of Heart's ease, and never wishes for Weeds, Disorders, fatal to others never hurt him; he walks, and bustles and thrives most in a Consumption: he can boast of more Bleeding-hearts than you can, and has more Laurels than the Duke of Wellington. But his greatest envy of his companion is, that he has Yew when he pleases."—Gardeners' Chron.

LAUGHABLE ANECDOTE.

A poet was noticing how sometimes the most trivial and unforeseen accident overturns an author's hopes. "A thing," said he, "once happened to me which was enough to make a man forswear ever taking a pen in hand. I had a tragedy—Garrick performed in it—I must confess the principal incident was little similar. Lear's abdication of the throne in favor of his daughters. Mine were two daughters; and the king—after giving them a lesson fraught with legislative advantages that might have done honor to Solon or Lycurgus—finished his harangue by saying, 'and now I divide this crown between you'—Sir, a malicious scoundrel peeping over the spikes of the orchestra, and staring Garrick full in the face, cried out—'Ah, that's just half a crown a-piece.' Sir, an incessant laugh immediately prevailed, and if it had been to save your soul, another syllable could not be heard."

A SEA HORSE.

A captain of a West Indianman wished to purchase a horse: in consequence he applied to a well known character, who sold him one. After the purchase had been made the captain observed, "Well, now the horse is mine pray tell me candidly whether he has any faults, and what they are." "What do you mean to do with him?" replied the other. "Why, to take him to sea," said the captain, "to the West Indies." "Then I will be candid," replied the dealer; "he may go very well at sea, but on land he cannot go at all, or I would not have sold him."

These hot days are piping times for editors!

TO CUT GLASS WITH A PIECE OF IRON.—Draw with a pencil on paper, any pattern to which you would have the glass conform; place the pattern under the glass, holding both together in the left hand, for the glass must not rest on any plane surface; then take a common spike or similar piece of iron, heat the point of it to redness, and apply it to the edge of the glass, draw the iron slowly forward, and the edge of the glass will immediately crack; continue moving the iron slowly over the glass, tracing the pattern, and the chink in the glass will follow at the distance of about half an inch, in every direction, according to the motion of the iron. It may sometimes be found requisite, however, especially in forming corners, to apply a wet finger to the opposite side of the glass. Tumblers and other glasses may be cut or divided very fancifully by similar means. The iron must be re-heated as often as the crevice in the glass ceases to follow.

A Chinese widow, being found fanning the tomb of her husband was asked why she performed so singular an operation? She said, she had promised not to marry again while the tomb remained damp, and that as it dried very slowly, she saw no harm in assisting.

A CONVENIENT NAP.

Two Oxford scholars slept in the same room at college. 'Jack,' (says one early in the morning) are you asleep? 'Why,' replied the other, 'Because, if you are not, I will borrow half a crown of you.' 'Is that all?—then I am!'

STATISTICS OF DUELLING UNDER GEORGE THE THIRD.—Such was the frequent occurrence of duels in this long reign, that one hundred and seventy-two were fought, (in which three hundred and forty-four were concerned;) sixty-nine individuals were killed; in three of these fatal cases neither of the combatants survived; ninety-six were wounded, forty-eight of them desperately and forty-eight slightly; while one hundred and seventy-nine escaped unhurt. From this statement it will be seen that rather more than one-fifth of the combatants lost their lives, and that nearly one-half received the bullets of their antagonists. It also appears that only eighteen trials took place; that six of the arraigned individuals were acquitted; seven found guilty of manslaughter, and three of murder, two of whom were executed, and eight imprisoned during different periods. When the British army occupied the south of France, similar scenes were witnessed, but more especially at Bordeaux, where the French officers came over to the Garonne for the sole purpose of insulting and fighting the English, who were, in many instances, absurd enough to meet their wishes. It is, however, gratifying to state, that the fortune of arms generally in our favor, and in many instances, when our young officers had been so imprudent, as to accept a challenge with the sword, their superior bodily strength and utter ignorance of the polite rules of duelling, turned to their advantage; in several instances they rushed on their adversaries, broke through their guard, and cut them down. In vain the French expostulated against this breach of the regles de l'eserime, and called out "foul play;" our seconds usually carried pistols in their pockets, and threatened to shoot any who interfered; and the French at last were tired of the experiment. In one instance the French officers went to the little Theatre de la Giete, then on the Alleys Tournay, when a furious fray took place between them and several British officers; although the latter had no swords, the French drew theirs; but the British, breaking up chairs and tables, in a few minutes shivered their weapons, and knocked them down in every direction. It is somewhat strange, but I was, in a great measure, the means of terminating these differences. Coming out of the theatre, I was assailed by a group of French officers; I calmly replied, that if I had giving offence to any of them, I was ready to afford them any satisfaction; and dilated on the absurdity of making a national war the subject of personal hostility, while I enlarged on the friendly feeling that had prevailed between our armies during the peninsular war, and recalled to their recollection the many kind acts that we had shewn each other when prisoners and wounded. The officers not only listened to me with the greatest attention, but one of them actually hugged me in his rude embrace, and I was obliged to accompany them to an hotel and sup with the party. The next morning there was not a French officer remaining in the town.—Dr. Millingen's History of Duelling.

A CRUEL FATHER.

The following atrocious narrative, is copied from the last Monroe (Onachita) Olive Branch. John Hays was brought before Judge Lamy on a charge of inhuman treatment of his own son Samuel Hays.

It appeared that the treatment of the father was of such a nature as to compel the boy to run away from home and upon the instigation of some person, he was induced to go to the Parish Judge. A subscription of twenty dollars was raised from the persons present in the office at the time, with which they purchased him clothes. Persons who were present when he first came in the office, state that they never saw a more deplorable sight in their lives. His back and arms were mangled in a shocking manner from severe scourging, and his feet and legs were very much swollen.

It appears that the father, together with his inhuman chastisement, forced him to work when he was not able to set down, on account of the manner in which his legs were swollen from being forced out in the cold wet cane and grass, and that he turned him out of doors at night, in his then debilitated condition.—One of the witnesses stated that he saw the father with a rope round the neck of his son, which was attached to the end of a pole, and that he would extend the pole and raise the boy to the end of his toes. This fatherly treatment was intended to intimidate the child for having run away.

Hays was committed to jail, where he will probably remain until November.

Super-superlative.—A wagoner, the other day, drove his team to the door of a warehouse in this village, and thus hailed the merchant: "Don't you want some fine kegs?" "No," answered the merchant. "But don't you want some first rate kegs?" "No." "They are confounded first rate." "Don't want any." "But they're darn'd eternal first rate." "I tell you I don't want any." "But mister, they're superlative first rate." "No." "Each keg is equal to a hoghead." "Don't want any." "Well, dang my buttons if I'd sell to such a scrimpion as you, any how."—Wayne Standard.

A KEEN REBUKE.

Two strangers recently visited Bunker Hill, and ascended to the top of the Monument. After they had asked a number of questions, which the superintendent answered very politely, he told them it was customary to pay a small sum for ascending the Monument. At this they were highly indignant, and said they thought it was a free country, and this place should be free to all—they would not be gulled out of their money by a Yankee! an Englishman ought to be allowed to go free to such public places, &c. The superintendent bowed very politely, and said, "I wish that you had mentioned that you were Englishmen before, for they are the only persons we admit free; we consider that they paid dear enough for ascending this hill on the 17th of June, 1766."

CONJUNCTIONS.—A conjunction means, literally, an union or meeting together. An ill-assorted marriage is a comical conjunction. But our conjunctions are used to connect words and sentences, and have nothing to do with the joining of hands. The Siamese twins formed a singular conjunction. A tin pot fastened to a dog's tail is a disagreeable conjunction to the animal. A happy pair may be regarded as an uncommon conjunction. Conjunctions connect similar moods and tenses of verbs, and cases of nouns and pronouns; as "a coat of arms suspended on a wall is like an executed traitor, it is hanged drawn and quartered." "If you continue thus to drink brandy and water, and to smoke cigars, you will be like Boreas, the north wind, who takes 'cold without' wherever he goes, and always 'blows a cloud' when it comes in his way. Do you think there is any thing between him and her?" "Yes; he and she are engaged ones."—Comic English Grammar.

THE STEAM SHIP PRESIDENT.—We copy the following from the New Bedford Mercury of yesterday morning:

A wine bottle which had drifted ashore on the Horse-Neck Beach, at the mouth of Buzzard's Bay, was picked up on Saturday last by Mr. John Devoll, of Westport, and was found to contain a slip torn from the side margin of a newspaper, upon which the following memorandum had been penciled:

"Steam ship President, sole survivor
the Steward—in a small boat.
Save me—20th May."

The fragment of paper upon which this is written is a strip about six inches long and one inch wide, and judging from the typography which is scantily indented upon both sides of one of the edges, as also from its corresponding texture, it appears to have been torn from the Philadelphia Gazette and Commercial Intelligence, although we cannot identify it in this respect with certainty. We state what has thus come to our knowledge, leaving it to others who are interested, to form their own conclusions. For ourselves we are strongly inclined to believe it to be an imposture; however difficult it must be to conceive of the motive which could thus induce any individual wantonly to trifle with the sympathies of hundreds who are anxiously interested in the fate of the unfortunate passengers and crew who were embarked in the President.—The President, it will be recollected, sailed from New York on the 12th of March.

AN INTERESTING ALLEGORY.

A vine was growing beneath a thrifty oak, and had just reached that height at which it requires support. 'Oak,' said the ivy vine, 'bend your trunk so that you may support me.' 'My support,' replied the oak, 'is naturally yours, and you may rely upon my strength to bear you up; but you are too large and too solid to bend. Put your arms around me, my pretty vine, and I will manfully support and cherish you, if you have an ambition to climb even as high as the clouds.—While I thus hold you up you will ornament my rough trunk with your pretty green leaves and shining scarlet berries; they will be as frontlets to my head, and I shall stand in the forest like a glorious warrior, with all his plumes. We are made by the Master of Life to grow together, that by our union the weak should be made strong; and the stronger render aid to the weaker.

"But I wish to grow independently," said the vine 'why cannot you twine around me, and let me grow up straight, and not be a mere dependent on you?'—Nature, answered the Oak, did not so design it. It is impossible that you should grow to any great height alone; and if you try it, the wind and the rain, if not your own weight, will bring you soon to the ground. Neither is it proper for you to run your arms hither and thither among other trees; the trees will begin to say, 'It is not my vine—it is a stranger—get thee gone—I will not cherish thee.' By this time thou wilt be so entangled amongst the branches that thou canst not get back to the oak; and nobody will then admire thee or pity thee.' 'Ah, me,' said the vine, 'let me escape from such a destiny!'—and with this she twined herself round the oak, and they both grew and happily flourished together.

CURIOUS IDEA.—The opinion prevails to some extent that water runs faster in the night than it does in the day time. This is a new idea to us. N. P. Willis, in a little book which he has published—"the Tent Pitched"—says: "Talking with my neighbor the miller, about sawing lumber for a stable I am building I discovered incidentally, that the mill will do more work between sunset and dawn, than in the same number of hours by daylight. Without reasoning upon it, the miller knows practically that streams run faster at night." Dr. Webster, in his "History of Pestilential Disease," states that the same thing; that the wheel of a mill moves faster in the night than in the day time, with the same "head and fall." What is the experience of our friends the miller in this matter? They can judge pretty well, for there is scarcely one in the land who has not ran his mill day and night during the high water in the spring.—Nashua Tel.

POPULAR TALES.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE MYSTERIOUS HOMICIDE.

FROM THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF LAUNCELOT LINNER, CLERKE.

It was late in the afternoon of a genial spring day, that a noble looking Spanish cavalier was seen riding into a quiet little village, snugly nestled in a valley at the foot of the mountains that stretch along the western borders of the province of Valencia. The sun, which was just retiring behind the tops of the mountains, left the valley immediately at their base in a melancholy shadow; while he cast upon the vast plain beyond, a rich and vigorous glow, which showed that he was not yet setting, nor shorn of his splendor, amid the golden and rose-colored haze upon the horizon. The cavalier rode slowly on through the village casting a benignant smile upon the urchins, who, attracted by his splendid dress, ran along by his side to gaze upon him; and passing through the principal street, took a narrow road that wound up the side of the mountain, to an antiquated castle, which stood beetling upon an eminence, overlooking the vast plain, and the village sleeping below.

As he approached the castle, it was evident that at first he was regarded as a stranger; but no sooner had he doffed his Spanish hat and sweeping black feathers, displaying his high and expansive forehead, and his noble and benevolent features, than he was recognized by the old seneschal as his long-expected master.

'Ah, Seignior,' said the faithful old servant, 'long have my wearied eyes strained themselves down this winding road, looking for your return to this retreat of your ancestors, and right jealous have I been of the attractions of the lowland estates, that have kept you so many years from us. Your honored father never left the castle three months together.'

'True, good Gomez,' said the master, 'but he was of a moody temperament, and preferred these wild rocks and forests, to the sunny plains; but whether I prefer them or not, I must now perforce make the best of this rude retreat, for all the rest of my rich inheritance is gone from me; but I trust not without making many a heavy heart lighter, smoothing the rugged path of life to many a suffering pilgrim.'

The good old seneschal seemed hardly to comprehend his master's meaning, and a few words of explanation may be necessary for the reader.

Don Vincente de Raymar, at the early age of twenty years, came into the possession of one of the richest inheritances in all Spain. He was an only son; and his father, a morose, retiring, and penurious man, had lavished all the affections of a soured and disappointed heart upon this darling object, and had bestowed upon him all the advantages of a perfect education and princely accomplishments. Don Vincente after the death of his father, as if proud of exhibiting the most striking contrast of character, moved to the gayest circles of Madrid, and was the only most prodigal in his personal expenditure, but most beneficent in his largesses and charities. By degrees either through satiety or some other cause, he became less self-indulgent, but at the same time more and generous to others; till at last all Madrid was ringing with the praises of the young cavalier's self-denial, and still more wonderful munificence. His whole delight appeared to consist in giving, and his whole time was absorbed in seeking out objects of charity. Even the beautiful and accomplished Donna Xilia de Toranti, who at first had captivated his heart, now seemed to have lost her power over him; and numerous other lovely damsels, who could not fail to be struck with his fine person, and romantic generosity of character, tried all their arts of captivation in vain. In short, his generosity became a kind of monomania; and although at first indulged in some measure no doubt from love of admiration, is now assumed the character of a ruling passion. His fortune melted rapidly away before it, and in a very few years, while he was yet quite a young man, he found himself deprived of all his estates, except one on the mountains, and was brought to a stand by his ability to find a purchaser for that remote relic of his vast patrimony. The crisis, however, did not seem to cause him to reflect on his actual condition; but he at once resolved to retire to that estate, and find there a new field for his active and extraordinary benevolence. As he had no longer the means of founding convents, and supplying the luxurious but necessitous extravagance of his peers, he thought he might discover in these remote regions and among these humble villages, a theatre for the exercise of his ruling passion, adapted to his altered circumstances.

No sooner, therefore, had he established himself in his new situation, than he proceeded to make himself acquainted with the condition and wants of all the good people of the village and neighboring hamlets. In such small communities, the minutest actions of each member are known and canvassed by all the rest and it required but a few acts of generosity on the part of so prominent a personage, to spread his notoriety and fame as extensively among these villagers and peasants, as the squandering of his immense estates had done at Madrid. Rumors of his boundless wealth were circulated abroad, and the people whose wonder was aroused, and whose imaginations became highly excited, began to fancy that they had but to wish for any blessing, and it would at once be supplied by the good Don Vincente.

Things were in this condition, and the whole country was resounding with the praises of the benevolent Don Vincente, when the public ear began to be occupied by other equally extraordinary circumstances. The passage across the mountains, near Don Vincente's castle, was a great thoroughfare, but led for several miles through gloomy forests, and wild, rocky and uninhabitable wastes. This region in former times, had been a famous resort of bands of robbers; but of late years, by the vigilance of the alcaides of the neighboring villages, and the aid of a small body of troops furnished by the government, had ceased to be infested by these outlaws, and was considered safe for travellers by day or by night. Within a short time, however, several remarkable robberies, and some murders, had been perpetrated in this rude and benighted region. The good Don Vincente appeared very much distressed at these extraordinary occurrences, and took an active part, such as became his benevolent character, in the efforts to discover the cause, and to put an end to the enormities. His high rank, and the exalted reputation which he enjoyed, gave him great influence; and the measures taken to attain these objects were entirely of his dictation. One day, while he was on a visit to the alcaide of the village, the worthy Pietro d'Almanzor, to consult upon some steps which he advised should be taken in reference to this subject, he fell into conversation with the magistrate's son, Ferdinando d'Almanzor, whom he had observed to be of a melancholy turn of mind, and whose interesting appearance altogether had attracted his regard, and excited his sympathies.

'I pray you, tell me, my young friend,' said the kind Don Vincente to the disconsolate youth, 'why it is that you always wear so sorrowful an aspect, and that you resist my solicitations to know the cause of your grief, so that I might perchance have it in my power to relieve it.'

'Alas, no, Seignior,' replied Ferdinando, 'bountiful as you are, you have not the ability to aid me, and I would not afflict your generous heart with a fruitless recital of the sources of my unhappiness.'

'Nay, but I insist,' said Don Vincente, 'that you tell me, for you can form but a very inadequate estimate of my means of assistance, or the fertility of my resources.'

'True, Seignior,' replied the youth, 'but it is not money that can help me, but power over the will of others; and I fear me, with all your kindness of heart, and powers of persuasion, you can do little for me.'

'Say not so, Ferdinando,' responded Don Vincente with a benignant smile; 'know you not that my influence through the whole country around is unbounded, and that I have already laid almost all the people under obligations to me?'

'Well, then,' exclaimed Ferdinando, with a sigh, 'I will tell you my story, though with little hope that you can in any way extricate me from my difficulty.'

'You know the excellent widow Isabella D'Estremar, and her daughter Julia, who reside in the little white cottage, embowered in the orange grove by the narrow path near the foot of the mountain, and not far from your castle. I have seen you there once or twice, and have often heard them both speak in the most enthusiastic terms, not only of your general benevolence, but of your especial kindness to them in their humble though not entirely destitute condition. They were formerly in better, although not in affluent circumstances, during the life of the father and husband; and Julia had received the education and accomplishments appropriate to her sex and station. Soon after the retirement to the little cottage, I was pursuing my sports upon the mountains, when I came to a rivulet that ran brawling and sparkling down a wooded ravine, rejoicing in its own liquid music, and its covert of trees, like a wild bird warbling in its green protecting bower. I paused to enjoy the sweet sounds that seemed attuned to a harmony in my own bosom, amid the solemn stillness of the mountain height, rendered more impressive by the gentle shadow that brooded over its steep declivities, and the intense sunshine that slept upon the plain below.

'I loved such scenes with an absorbing but undefined passion, and my whole soul was gushing with sweet but inexplicable emotion. While under the magical influence, and just as I was penetrating the covert of trees to the rivulet, I beheld seated upon the opposite bank a beautiful maiden, with a book in one hand, which she was reading, and the other slightly raising her garments from the water, while she bathed her naked foot, of snowy whiteness and exquisite proportions, in the cool and gurgling stream. A sudden thrill penetrated my bosom, that made my heart beat audibly, and I stood for a few moments perfectly entranced. As soon as I could in the least command my overpowered senses and scattered reflections, I determined not to surprise her, or make her aware of my presence, until she should change her position. After waiting in perfect silence some minutes, persuading myself in the mean time, with much difficulty, that she could not hear the throbbing of my heart, she removed her foot, that seemed like white marble dropping crystals, from the sparkling water, and covering it, arose apparently to depart. Though determined not to let her retire without seeing me, when I made the attempt to discover myself I seemed rooted immovable to the spot, and could scarcely command strength enough to break a twig, whose rustling betrayed my approach to the startled damsel. The spell being now partly broken, my limbs recovered their functions, and I rushed towards her, reaching forth my arms, and imploring her not to be alarmed. As she turned her face toward me, hesitating whether to stop or to go on, the rich auburn hair fell over her glowing cheeks, and snowy shoulders, and from beneath their covert her dark flashing eyes poured their light with double fascination into my enraptured heart. You may say, perhaps, that it was this exquisite combination of sweet natural influences which I had been enjoying, that rendered my heart at that moment so susceptible to her charms; perhaps it was so; yet you need but to know Julia D'Estremar, for it was she whom I had thus met, to feel that she is in all respects worthy of the intense love which I suddenly conceived for her.

'I was not long in making known to her the emotions of my heart, nor in securing the entire affections of her own; and as my father had always been exceedingly indulgent to all my wishes, I saw no bar to my complete happiness. Judge of my surprise and grief, then, when I tell you, that when, with an exulting and confident heart, I went to that parent, hitherto so kind, to inform him of my bliss, and reveal to him my wishes, I received his severe reproaches and flat refusal! He ridiculed what he called my silly romantic adventure; said Julia was poor, and unfit to match with a young man of my pretensions; and finally concluded by saying, that I must instantly abandon all future intercourse with her, for he had provided a match for me in the daughter of an old friend of his, a rich merchant of Tarragona, on the other side of the mountains. Indeed, so determined and precipitate is my father in this business, that, although it is now but three days since the first was informed of my ill-fated passion, he has already despatched a messenger to Tarragona, to request Don Antonio Zamara, the rich merchant, to bring his daughter Inez to the church at Bexar, to be married to me to-morrow. In fact, Don Antonio is doubtless now on his way hither, with his daughter and her rich dowry, and will reach here across the mountains early in the morning. You see, then, good Seignior, that I have great cause for unhappiness, inasmuch as I have to choose instantly between disobeying the kindest of parents, with the loss of my inheritance, and marrying one whom I cannot love, with the loss of one who is the idol of my heart.'

'Indeed, my good young friend,' said the sympathizing Don Vincente, 'you are in a strait, to be sure; but think you it is the poverty of Julia alone that prevents your marriage?'

'This at first was no doubt the only cause,' replied Ferdinando; 'but perhaps he has committed himself so far with Don Antonio, that he will not persist on that account.'

Well, Ferdinando,' said Don Vincente, 'perhaps, after all, Don Antonio may be detained, and not arrive to-morrow; and if so, I will contrive some way to break off this unlucky engagement. How large was the dowry that Don Antonio was to give with his daughter?'

'Ten thousand dollars,' replied Ferdinando.

'This is a large sum, in the present state of my finances said Don Vincente, musing; 'but take comfort, Ferdinando; if all the other difficulties, be mastered, I will raise the same sum for a dowry to your beloved Julia.'

'Noble benefactor!' exclaimed Ferdinando, 'I cannot accept so heavy an obligation from you, even to gain so rich a prize.'

'Nay, I shall not ask your leave,' said Don Vincente, smiling; 'it is Julia that is to accept the gift, not you.'

So saying, the good Don Vincente left the young lover, half hoping, half despairing, and made his way to the castle.

Night soon closed in, and heavy black clouds were drifting rapidly through the sky, at intervals covering and revealing the crescent moon, while the sultry wind howled around the battlements and towers of the castle, and the tops of the forest trees. It was a dismal night, and occasionally, as if by convulsive fits, the pattering rain, which fell in heavy drops pressed from the clouds like big tears from some suppressed agony, rustled mournfully among the forest leaves, or beat fitfully against the bald projecting rocks.

Don Antonio Zamara pressed his daughter closer to his bosom, and cast frequent glances back upon his servant, who rode close behind, well armed, as the howling of the wind seemed to increase, and they approached the more desolate and gloomy passes of the mountain.

'Keep a good look out, Pedro,' said Don Antonio to his servant, 'and be ready with your pistols at a moment's warning; for I hear there have been of late frequent attacks of robbers upon way-farers on these wild mountains, notwithstanding all the efforts of the worthy Alcaide d' Almanzor, and the good Don Vincente, to suppress them. Do not tremble so, Inez; I really do not suppose there is any danger, and no doubt the rumors are much exaggerated.'

Thus saying, Don Antonio and his little party descended a declivity in the rough road, into a kind of ravine, overhung on each side by large masses of rock, covered with a thick growth of dark evergreens, and presenting in every aspect a very forbidding appearance.

Don Antonio kept a sharp look-out, for he felt more apprehension than he was willing to acknowledge; and at a slight turn in the road, he thought he discovered some object moving among the clefts of the rocks above and just before him. He stopped suddenly, to assure himself of the fact, but all he could see was an indistinct, dark mass, which appeared immovable, and which he concluded must be the shadow of a rock, or tree, or cloud, to which the turn in the road, or the fitfulness of the moonlight, had given the appearance of motion. Thus assured, he proceeded a little farther still keeping his eye fixed on the suspicious-looking object, when suddenly he saw the gleam of the moonlight upon some weapon, and in an instant, the flash of a pistol threw a lurid glare through the ravine, and its sharp, spiteful sound reverberated among the hills. The warm blood gushed from the bosom of Don Antonio upon his daughter, who sat on the horse before him, and the animal was plunging with fright, when the dark figure jumped from the cliff into the road, seized the rein, and supporting the relaxing frame of the daughter, he gently laid them both upon the ground. All this was done with such rapidity, the astonished Pedro, who rode up behind, had a pistol at his breast before he had time to discover what had happened.

'Peace, slave!' said the robber; 'I would not take human life unnecessarily; and I will spare yours, if you will promise me straightway to take this young damsel back to her home. All I wish is the money your master brought with him.'

THE GATHERER.

From the Lafayette Chronicle.

BLACKBERRY PICKING.

LOVE AND HORNETS.

Mister Editor: Did you ever in the hull course o' your natural life go a blackberryin'? If you haint, golly grashus, why you don't know nothin' no more about rael labor-savin', presshut, galvanic-lectifyin' sport than the but eend o' nothin' arter it's been whittled. Lor, ha' massy upon offiss holders! why nothin' in all creation can come up to blackberryin' but gittin' dumped out'n a slay into a sno bank, and even that aint as good when it aint a moonshiny night.—Menny and menny is the time when a lot o' the Jordan Spankers—that's what our village boys was nicknamed—would raise a party o' gals, after the grain harvestin' was over, and afore the corn and taters was ripe, and start off early in the mornin', for Hop-Toad Hill, where the blackberries was enamoost as plentiful as musketurs in these diggings and sich all-fired prime times as we'd have was a caution to forriners.

Fust off when all hands got collected, and a lot o' suthin' to eat, pork an' beans, new cider, gooseberry pies, green corn, lasses gingerbread an' a smart sprinklin' o' other good things were pervided, we'd loker-mote; the gals all a walkin' by theirselves; the gals with their tongues a runnin' about scandle, new ribbons, kaliko gowns, an' sich consarns, jest as fast as a saw-mill in a freshet; and the fellows a gabbin' about horses, cattle, general musters, an' con shukins—a tellin' how 'twas all like Shaw's kerelessness that made his grain mouldy—that Jim Bingy was the orfullest liar that ever was, and that Hen Sprague told uncle Seth that Zebe Armstrong's wife had heerd how that Harrison Stebbins hadn't the funs to go on with his new frame house, and that a comin' so strait from one who'd orter know all about it, all hands sot it rite down for a fact, an' said that it served them jest rite—and then to think o' his havin' the sass to build a house without tellin' the hull village how menny roomsthere was to be on the fust floor, an' he a member o' the church tu—"it sarked him jest rite, by crackey!" So we'd keep a torkin' till we cum to the hill, then all hands div rite into the bushes and brambles, and sich a scramble and scratchin' for blackberries as there was, wasn't to be sneezed at.

It happened that on one o' these blackberryin frolics that a sarting long haired feller, with a leetle hunch rite over his mouth—lookin' at a distance jest as tho' he'd been among the pots an' kettles, and got a great gob of crock on his upper lip—was a visitin down our way, an' appeared to have taken an amazin fancy to Sally Ann, the Sally Ann that I'd ben payin 'tentions tu; kep a chattin to her the hull livelong time, and I snum if I could scarcely bleve my own nattered senses, when he begun tu pick berries an' put 'em intu her b sket, an' she not sayin a word agin it. Wal, I guess, as how I was a leetle riled tu see myself cut an set adrift in that fashion, an I had a gret mind tu go off an shine round some other gal, jest for spite, but somehow or nother I wanted to keep an eye on that dandy. So tu Sally says I, 'ther's a smart sprinklin ov berries over here—I guess a leetle more than grow around your way'. 'Oh, they're thick as puddin here!' says she, 'I calculate that you are pooty consumedly thick,' says I. 'You-aw remarks are demd supawfluous,' says the long-haired creetur. Suz alive! but want my dander up to hear myself call'd a demd supfluous—down I slat the basket and up sot all the berries—marches right up to him jest as brassy as a hull militia trainin, an says I, 'ony you call me a porpus or a superflus again, an see how I'll go to work an spile your hansom countenance for ye.' With that, Sally she bust out a crying, an I vow if I could help boo-hooing a leetle myself, I felt so confusticated.

'You-aw laborin' under an erraw,' says he, 'but awnaw demands an explawnation—awn demd.' 'Wal' says I, 'your langwidje wants explainin, that's a fact.' So he turned round to set down, hauled out his handkercher, an as I hope to be saved, went to dustin off the top of a hornet's nest, and afore one could say 'git out,' sot down on 'tu tu explain. Gorashus! didn't the hornets come at him for squashin their nest, an didn't he run and holler, an scoot through the briar brushes, an' tear his trowserloons—an the gals snickered out, an' the fellers haw-hawed till they was enamoost ded, tu see that dandy marvil down in the main road, without enny hat, his trowersers all split up, his hair a flyin in the wind like a hosses tail, an the hornets agoin it tu kill. Sally was shocking shamed of occin so, but we soon made up, and sitch prime sport as all hands had for the rest of the day wasn't to be beat. Long Locks mended up his trowserloons—they were the only ones he had—and sneaked out'n our village that day an' haint showed his nose there since—the poor creetur said he found no less than tew duzzen ded hornets in his boots arter he took 'em off! We come from blackberryin in pairs and not as we went—had a loud cargo o' berries, and I do not bleve that one on us 'll ever forgit the haw-hawin we had about the fellow who sot down on the hornet's nest.

Yours truly,

JEHOSHAPHAT JENKINS.

A NOBLE THIEF.

The following appeared in a native Bengalese paper:—"Latelly, in the district of Bankora, a thief had made an entrance into the house of a Bramin. While searching for booty, he heard voices, and was about to retreat, when he found the parties close to the spot where he had entered, consisting of the Bramin's wife and her gallant in conversation. The woman complained of the jealousy of her husband, and her lover recommended her to take advantage of his being asleep to murder him, giving her a weapon for the purpose. She objected, however, that if he should wake he might be too strong for her; and urged the gallant to undertake the deed himself, to which he consented: as he advanced to enter the house, the thief, although disposed to make free with the Bramin's property, tho't it incumbent on him to protect the Bramin's life, and as the intended murderer passed the spot where he was secreted, he thrust the instrument with which he had made his way through the wall into the man's belly and killed him; after which he made his escape. The woman seeing her gallant slain, made an outcry, which brought her husband and the neighbors to the spot, when she accused the former of having committed the murder. He was accordingly secured and tried, and as appearances were strong against him, sentenced to be hanged. From this fate he was again rescued by the heroism of the freebooter, who, on hearing the turn events had taken, gave himself up, and acknowledged his crime. It is not recorded, what decision was pronounced in the case."

OLD VIRGINIA—THE MOTHER OF PRESIDENTS.

It would seem as if fate had determined that Virginia alone should give Presidents to the Union. With the exception of Gen. Jackson, no one who was not from that state has ever been elected for a second term, and very few even for the first. Washington was a Virginian, and served eight years. Adams was from Massachusetts, and served but four. He was succeeded by Jefferson, a Virginian, who served eight. Then came Madison, a Virginian, who also served eight, and then Monroe, a Virginian, who also served eight. Then the younger Adams was elected by Congress for four years. Then Gen. Jackson served eight, and Mr. Van Buren four years. Gen. Harrison, although from the state of Ohio, was a native of Virginia, and after serving thirty days was removed by death, to make room for Mr. Tyler, who is and always has been a Virginian. Therefore, when the latter shall have served out his term, it may be said that out of the fifty-six years that the Constitution has been in operation, Virginia has had the President for thirty-six years, and that only one man who was not a Virginian has ever been elected for a second term. Truly the "Old Dominion" may justly claim the proud distinction of being the "Mother of Presidents."—N. Y. Sun.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, June 12, 1841.

☞ We would again remind our Brethren abroad, that wherever the 24th is observed, we would feel obliged by receiving the proceedings for publication.

Masonic Notice.

The members of Temple Encampment, Temple Chapter, together with Mount Vernon, Temple, and Washington Lodges, are particularly requested to meet at Staawix Hall on Monday evening next, at 7 o'clock, in order to make such arrangements as may be necessary to unite with their brethren in Hudson in suitably celebrating the coming 24th of June. The Brethren are requested to be punctual.

THE GRAND LODGE of the State of New York, held its annual session, on Wednesday the second of June, at the Howard House, New York, and continued its deliberations four days. The representation was unusually large, and the proceedings were of a highly interesting character. As soon as we receive the proceedings from the Grand Secretary, which will be at an early day, we shall spread them before our readers, in detail. During the session, several foreign representatives were received in form; clothed in elegant costume; and the ceremonies connected particularly with the reception of Br. Pirssons, as the representative of the Grand Lodge of Georgia, was not only imposing, but interesting. We shall in a future No. give the communication of the Grand Master of Georgia,—the Address of the Deputy Grand Master, of this State, together with the reply of the R. W. B. Pirssons, on the occasion, as well as the very fraternal and interesting letter from the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, to the Grand Lodge of this State.

The following are the Grand Officers elect, for the ensuing year.

M. W. Morgan Lewis, G. M.
R. W. W. Willis, D. G. M.
Joseph Guyler, G. S. W.
John D. Willard, J. G. W.
James Herring G. Sec'y.
Richard Ellis, G. Treasurer.
& Rev. Salem Town,
Wm. S. Walker,	Grand Chaplains.
Evan M. Johnson,
Coogland,
W. Lewis De Forest,	Grand Stewards.
George Davis,
John Waydell,
William Boardman, G. Pursuivant.
Rev. James Thorburn, G. Tyler.

THE 24TH OF JUNE.—We understand, that Br. Joseph P. Pirssons, of New York, has accepted the invitation from the Brethren of Hudson, to deliver the Address at that place, on the 24th of June.

THEATRICAL AMUSEMENTS.—A great deal has been said and written, with much justice and propriety, against this species of entertainment. We readily admit, that there exist, in connection with some of the theatres throughout the Union, evils of a sufficient magnitude to condemn every variety of stage performance—evils productive of the most injurious effects to the community, and which should, therefore, be immediately obviated.

But, divested of every immoral feature, and restored to a condition of unpotted purity, we believe that the stage, instead of tending to the perversion and utter prostration of every sentiment of virtue or morality, might be made the instrument of imparting much valuable instruction, combined with a harmless and amusing recreation. Historical events, correctly represented on the stage, are unquestionably calculated to leave a deep and lasting impression on the youthful mind, which time may never efface.

It is greatly to be lamented, that an institution susceptible of being elevated to such an eminent degree of refinement and usefulness, as the theatre, should be perverted and abused by the toleration of evils so obviously calculated to degrade it in the estimation of the respectable and discerning portion of the community. The most prominent of these evils are, the introduction of indecencies in language and costume upon the stage, and the admission of lewd and improper persons. These should be carefully excluded; and no pains should be spared on the part of the management to abolish every objectionable species of dramatic entertainment, so that, in time, the theatre may in reality become what it professes to be—the "school of morality."

THE FOURTH OF JULY.—With no small degree of pleasure, we perceive that preparations are making in various quarters, to celebrate, in an imposing manner, the 65th anniversary of American independence. The return of this great National Jubilee must ever be welcomed by the American with a heart overflowing with gratitude, and a soul inspired with a love of justice and freedom. We see no reason why we should restrain our emotions of joy, and set bounds to harmless pleasures, on a day whose history is lighted by so great a portion of our early glory; nor do we find reason to the hypothesis of those who would fain have us believe that public celebrations of this nature, operate with an evil tendency upon the minds of the rising generation. To celebrate the noble deeds of his ancestors should be the pride of every youth; and we are sure it would chill the blood of the few revolutionary heroes who are yet among us, to have the anniversary of the day on which they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors, to maintain the cause of liberty and equality, so soon looked upon by posterity with cold indifference, or passed idly off. All classes of men should be as one family on this great jubilee; the merchant, the farmer, the mechanic, and men of every profession, should unite in joyous acclamation, and sing Te Deum to the spirit of '76.

☞ Operations have been commenced for lighting the city of Toronto with gas.

☞ The London papers say that POWER, who was lost in the President, had thirty thousand dollars with him. Power was unrivalled as an Irish comedian, and his loss is sincerely regretted, more especially by those who have witnessed his personations.

REFORMED DRUNKARDS.—On Tuesday evening, Messrs. Pollard and Wright, the "reformed drunkards" from Baltimore, lectured on the subject of temperance before the Hibernian Temperance Association, in this city.

KNICKERBOCKER FOR JUNE.—This excellent and popular periodical comes to us containing the usual variety of valuable and interesting matter. The Knickerbocker is decidedly one of the best monthlies of the day; and speaks well for the elevated character of American literature.

DUELLING.—This absurd practice originated in antiquity; in history we have records of the ancients who resorted to "single combat" for a settlement of their personal difficulties. It has since become a fashionable amusement, in which gentlemen are wont to indulge, when particularly desirous of attaining an enviable newspaper notoriety, and of establishing an honorable reputation.

Could not a safer and more satisfactory mode of vindicating an individual's character, be devised, than that of converting himself into a target for his opponent to shoot at?

This duelling is a dangerous business, and is getting to be "very prevalent in this community." Read the following:—

CHIVALRY!—HONOR!—GLORY!—On Monday last, a duel came off in the neighborhood of our city. A challenge was sent by a fire-eater to another citizen, which was received and accepted—the time for meeting, the ground, arms and distance agreed upon. The parties met, with their seconds and surgeons, armed with the implements of death. For some cause the challenger refused to fight, and the seconds took up the quarrel—received the deadly weapons—fired in proper time—the second of the challenged fell, the vital fluid appearing to ooze out of the forehead of the fallen? Dead! said the bye-standers. Fly! said the surviving second to his principal—'tis now 'neck or nothing.' They seized their horses, mounted them, and off they scampered as if mad! Before they were out of sight, the saddle girth of the principal's horse gave way; he implored his second to stop and assist him; that could not be—time was too precious—'dear life was at stake'—and away went the second, as if the sheriff and a whole posse were after him—until he was out of the sight of his principal, when he returned by a circuitous route to his friends on the field of death. The principal repaired his girth—again mounted—and the last heard from him, he was on his way to Beardstown, giving his horse as 'tis said, "three licks every jump."

We are told that the parties conducted with the utmost coolness, shaking hands most cordially before they fired, and that neither winked at the flash of the pistols.

N. B. It is now understood that the fatal wound was made with paint, and that, contrary to current reports, no steps have been taken to administer upon the estate of the supposed unlucky second—and that in fact, 'the man's alive, and alive like to be!'—Springfield (Ill.) Journal.

A DELICATE APPETITE.—The Lady Beatrix, says the legend, was a great gourmette in her way. She was, as people often profess themselves to be, "fond of children." She liked them newly born, and dressed simple—on the gridiron; and she had a cook whose broiled babies were chef d'ouvres of the then infant art of cookery. But new-born infants are, fortunately, not so plentiful as new laid eggs; and the Lady of Talmont's daily dinner acted as a strong 'check on population.' Upon one occasion when there was not a child to be had for love or money, it so happened that the cook's wife became the mother of a fine boy. It only wanted half an hour to dinner. His credit, his place, nay perhaps his character was at stake! And the struggle in his bosom, between the father and the cook was tremendous. He looked dangerously at the child, as eyeing its limbs professionally, he stood feeling the edge of his long knife with his thumb, and casting a side glance, from time to time, at the gridiron. But at length Nature triumphed over art, and the cook yielded to the father. Dashing his white cap from his brow, he rushed into the presence of his hungry mistress, and he spoke to her so eloquently of the impropriety of indulging, as she did, in the pleasures of the table, that she not only, with self-denial; renounced for the future the favorite luxury to which she was so partial, but determined to expiate her past dinners by walking bare-foot on thorns from Talmont to Fontenelle.

THE BOSTON STEAM SHIPS.—PRECAUTIONS FOR SAFETY.—It is not generally known, says the Bunker Hill Aurora, we believe, that the mail steamships between Liverpool are amply provided with extra floats and bolts for the paddles, extra parts of the engines. (all those parts most likely to give way,) and are otherwise provided against accidents to any part of the machinery. In addition to the above, they are also furnished with spars, sails rigging, &c., which may be needed in case of irreparable injury to the engines.—These are carried only by the winter months, from October to April, and with these the captains are able to rig their steamers into complete barques in the short space of six hours.

Rather Awkward.—This was the remark of the last captain but one of the President, when he found she had not arrived in England. This was long ago.—Alas! what can he think now? That unwieldy hulk is now plunging and weltering among the caverns of the deep, where sailor's bones lie whitening, and some restless sea-fan waves over them; and we cannot but deplore the "awkwardness" of such unwieldy marine structures—which absolutely "invite" destruction.—A friend of ours observed to us the other day, "Ah! but the President is so well made!" "So is the Atlantic," said we, and made to last; and in the mad play of one horrible midnight, she could survive half her navies.—Phil. Gaz.

POWER OF ELOCUTION.

Hosko read some passages in his Roman History to Onslow, (the speaker of the house of commons) who piqued himself upon his reading, and begged him to give his opinion of the work. The speaker answered, as if in a passion. "I cannot tell what to think of; it may be nonsense for any thing I know, since your manner of reading has bewitched me."

Intelligence.

Fire in Albany.—The first fire that has occurred in Albany, since last November, took place on Sunday, and consumed only an out building.

A Caution.—Two young roisterers have been fined one hundred dollars per head for breaking the street lamps in Philadelphia while on a spree.

Homicide in Arkansas.—In Benton, Saline co., on the 10th inst., Hardin D. Cross, who had been previously convicted of manslaughter for killing G. A. McDaniel, was shot by Wm. Calvert, with a shot gun, just as he stepped out of his grocery store.

Jacob Gall.—aged 24 years, a German, who came to Baltimore a few years since, was drowned at that city on Sunday morning while bathing.

Mary McCastline came to her death at Toronto a few days since, in consequence of taking a quantity of saltpetre, sold to her by mistake, for Epsom salts, by a grocer.

Execution.—At Wilmington, N. C. last week, a young man named Madison Johnson, was hung for the murder of Henry Beasley. When brought under the gallows, he addressed the people nearly an hour, in an unflinching and audible voice—warning them, and especially the young, against the evil practices of gambling, intemperance and night carousals, to which he attributed his ignominious, untimely death! He said he had been deaf to the good advice given him by his parents; and that the crime for which he was to pay the forfeit of his life was committed under the influence of liquor and passion; and added, that if he had never indulged in the practice of drinking, he should then be free!

Another Murder.—We learn that the body of Mr. Ellsley, who had been keeping a wood yard near the mouth of the Missouri river, was found partly buried in earth and brush, and bearing marks which leave no doubt that a murder has been committed upon him.

We are informed that his partner, a few days ago, called on Ellsley's mother, in Alton, giving her eight dollars, told her that her son was going to New Orleans and would be absent some time. He has been arrested.—St. Louis Gaz.

Pirates.—It appears by the following, received at Lloyd's from Salonica dated April 22, that the pirates have reappeared in that quarter:

"Pirates are reported to have reappeared at the entrance of this gulf, but of their having attacked any vessels no intelligence has been received. The Greek gun-boats are cruising between the Island and the mouth of the gulf and Mount Athos, to the N. E."

Suicide.—We learn that Mr. Job Abbott, of Barnet, aged about 24, who has been subject to occasional fits of insanity for some years past, committed suicide on Saturday morning last, by cutting his throat with a razor. He locked himself in his room, and when found, his throat was cut from ear to ear, and all signs of life were extinct. We understand that it was the intention of his friends the very morning on which he committed the fatal act, to start with him for the Charleston Lunatic Asylum.—Danville Vt. Star.

All done for.—On the 26th ult., Chales Seward, alias Sewall, another of the negroes engaged in the late horrible tragedy of St. Louis, was tried and convicted of murder in the first degree; and on the following day, the fourth and last of the hellish crew, Warrick was tried and convicted. They will be executed in less than month—probably all together, on the same gallows. Four more terrible beings were probably never brought to justice at the same time.

Fatal Accident.—An accident fatal in its results—as we are informed by a letter from Marshfield—occurred in that town on the 2d inst., owing to the accidental discharge of a gun in the hands of a boy. The person killed was a widow woman, named Patience Linton, aged about 35 years. The boy, who it appears was rather careless with the gun, knowing it was loaded, was requested to put it up or go out of the house, and while in the act of leaving, and passing by Mrs. Linton, to reach the door, the gun went off, and she received the contents in her face, causing her death in five or six hours. She has left three little children and a large circle of relatives and friends.—Danville (Vt.) North Star.

Suicide.—The Kingston, U. C. Chronicle, states that Mr. Joseph Lee, a resident of Ernesttown, U. C., aged 71 years, committed suicide recently by hanging himself to a tree. He was afraid his family would starve.

A Silly Girl.—A girl named Elizabeth Scott, a domestic in a public house near Pottsville, last Thursday put an end to her life, by the use of arsenic, by reason of being deserted by her lover a stage driver, named Smith.

Accident at Hudson.—The freight cars of the railroad are said to have been precipitated into the river by some unskillfulness on the part of the man at the break. No lives were lost, and no one seriously injured, as we can learn, although the particulars of the accident have not transpired.

Married.

On the 7th inst. of consumption, Mrs. Sarah Goodwin, aged 69 years.

On the 22d inst. Hezekiah Sharp, Esq. of the town of Guilderland, Albany co.

On the 31st inst. at Gaines, Orleans co. Mr. John J. Walbridge, aged 50 years.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to be buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register.

Mr. Hoffman—The following effusion appears to me so beautiful, that I cannot avoid copying it, for your excellent paper, in which I have with great pleasure, found so many pieces worthy of circulation, thro' the Union.

T. T.

"Thou art, O God! the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see;
It's glow by day—its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from Thee:
Where'er we turn thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are THINE!"

When day, with farewell beam, delays
Among the opening clouds of Even,
And we can almost think we gaze
Through golden vistas into Heaven
Those hues that mark the sun's decline,
So soft, so radiant, Lord are THINE!

When Night, with wings of starry gloom,
O'ershadows all the earth and skies,
Like some dark beauteous bird, whose plume
Is sparkling with unnumber'd eyes—
That sacred gloom—those fires divine,
So grand, so countless, Lord, are THINE!

When youthful Spring around us breathes,
Thy Spirit warms her fragrant sigh;
And every flower the Summer wreathes,
Is born beneath that kindling eye,
Where'er we turn, thy Glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are THINE!"

MOORE.

A BRIGHTER WORLD THAN THIS.

BY MRS. AEDY.

Oh! when I trod life's early ways,
Hope winged my fleeting hours;
I saw no shadow in her rays,
No serpent in her flowers;
I thought on days of present joy,
And years of future bliss,
Nor dreamed that sorrow could alloy
So bright a world as this.

Alas! the fairy dreams I wove,
Soon from my fancy fled;
The friends who owned my tender love,
Were numbered with the dead;
Upon their pallid lips I pressed
Affection's parting kiss;
They left us for a world of rest,
A brighter world than this.

Nor did the spacious world supply
Those ties of opening life;
False was its mocking flattery,
Keen was its bitter strife!
And then I first began to look
For purer, truer bliss,
And love to trace in God's own book,
A brighter world than this.

My wounded heart desired relief,
I found the good I sought,
And now, in trial and in grief,
I feel the soothing thought,
That though the worldling may despair,
When robbed of earthly bliss,
The Christian humbly hopes to share
A brighter world than this!

FRIENDSHIP.

When fortune smiles and life is fair,
Seek not the gem of Friendship there;
When true and false are mingling near,
They both may seem alike sincere;
But when the storms of sorrow lower,
The clouds that first o'ercast the sky,
Will bid the friends of fortune fly;
But one who truly loved before,
Will only change to love the more.

From the London Literary Gazette, for May.

SONG.

BY C. SWAIN.

Oh, sweet comes the grace of the young dewy morning,
As queen-like she steps from her cloud-pillar hall;
And lovely the rose-bud its wild home adorning,
But Love's modest bloom is the sweetest of all.

And sweet is the glimpse of the moon o'er the ocean,
Whose waves, like a blessing, upon our path fall;
But the light that awakens the heart's first emotion,
Oh, Love's stolen glance is the sweetest of all.

There's music in Nature like deeper revealings
Of memories passed which her voice would recall;
There are tones that like angels may visit our feelings,
But Love's whisper'd word is the sweetest of all.

HOME.

How many a fond affection lingers round
The fireside circle, which encloses all
Our dearest ones on earth—those whom we call
Our own, amid the busy worlds wide bound;
Those who were never cold nor faithless found;
Who in our hearts we know will never change;
But love us, think of us, where'er we range,
Whose voices have a dear familiar sound,
Whose very looks are home to us—Oh, there,
When the tired spirit from the vanities
Of life returns, to them it fondly flies.

MY MOTHER.

The tribute to a good mother, which follows, will serve to express the feelings of many who behold time's ravages upon their most dear and highly prized parent.

My mother! thou art growing old—
Thy locks, as white as snow,
Proclaim thy years are well nigh told—
And thy cheeks have lost their glow.

O must thou fade so soon away,
My best and only friend?
Thou who first taught my lips to pray,
My infant knees to bend?

Thou who forsook thy couch at night,
To watch around my bed,
And deemed it still a fond delight,
To kiss my feverish head?

Thy kindness in my tender youth,
I never can repay—
In sickness ever near to soothe,
And comfort every day.

My mother! I can never tell
Of all thy tenderness,
For thou hast loved—loved much too well,
And watch too oft my bliss.

When weary and my toil is o'er,
I'm sinking to my rest,
I seem to feel as years before,
When nestling at thy breast.

But as thy evening hours decline,
With all life's labor past,
No joys shall be so great as mine,
To cheer them while they last.

My Mother! every nerve shall strain,
To take away thy care—
Could'st thou but live thy years again,
I would thy trials share.

REMOVAL.—JOSEPH CHATTERSON, Draper and Tailor, respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has removed to the new store No. 113 Market-st. four doors south of the Eagle Tavern, where he intends to conduct the tailoring business in the latest and most approved fashions.
J. C. trusts by his assiduity and attention to business to merit a share of public patronage, and solicits a continuation of the favors of his present customers; he flatters himself by the long experience he has had in the above business to be able to give general satisfaction to those who may favor him with a call.
Just received a choice assortment of goods, suitable for the season.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY
NIGHT LINE.—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptiveness to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock.

MASONIC.

AN ADDRESS,

Pronounced, before the Grand Lodge of South Carolina, in the year of Masonry, 5795.

RESPECTABLE BRETHREN—

You have so often received, from this chair, discourses illustrating the high antiquity and peculiar excellencies of freemasonry, that you cannot expect from me any thing on those topics, instructive or entertaining. Indeed, so little competent do I feel myself to the task of addressing you at all on this interesting occasion, that I should have requested to decline it altogether, had I not too much respected the custom which sanctions these addresses, a custom not only venerable in itself, but attended in its effects with essential advantages. By a periodical assembly of the brotherhood, by drawing our minds to an attentive view of the origin, duration and excellence of the order, and by impressing on them its great and noble objects, we are taught to reverence the former with unabating respect, and to pursue the latter with increasing zeal. Freemasonry is an institution of very remote antiquity; it is the growth of every clime; it has flourished in all parts of the globe; it is understood in every language; indeed it may emphatically be called the language of human nature. While governments founded in fraud, deception or injustice, have been swept away by the revolutionary hand of time; while whole nations have either disappeared, or have so changed by great natural or political convulsions, as not now to be traced; Freemasonry, like a venerable fabric, founded on the strong and unshaken pillars of piety, charity, benevolence, has stood the test of time, and resisted the shock of ages. Such have been the benefits to mankind from this admirable institution, that while all others have in their turns experienced the wrath of arbitrary governments, freemasonry, upheld by conscious innocence and the universal reputation of its merit, has ever escaped the ruffian fangs of tyranny, and the lawless gripe of anarchy. When ruthless despots, aware that masonic principles opposed a barrier to their force ambition, and eager to establish their tyranny on the ruins of virtue and philanthropy, have attempted to abolish freemasonry within their dominions, they have soon found it so deep rooted in the affections of the people, as to be compelled to forego their detestable designs.

This preservation of our Order for so many ages, through so many dangers and revolutions, and in so great a portion of the world; while it must inspire us with the liveliest gratitude to the great Architect of the universe, cannot fail to warm our breasts with the purest sentiments of attachment to it, and to prompt us to the exercise of all those virtues which have constituted its basis and conduced to its permanency. Those virtues have been frequently the theme of similar discourses; but it is so interesting and so animating a theme, that fearful as I am of trespassing on your patience, and superfluous as the duty may appear after the able discourses you have heard, I shall slightly touch on some of them, trusting that you will receive with indulgence what I shall offer with deference.

Charity is the brightest jewel in the masonic temple: it is a virtue which more than any other, assimilates man to his beneficent Creator: it opens the heart to the divine effusions of unlimited sympathy and benevolence, and rubs off that rust which would gather round it and corrode every exquisite sensation. But it is a virtue of reflection as well as of feeling; in the due exercise of it, reason, no less than impulse, has its duty to perform: these should be properly tempered and balanced; for while, on the one hand, cold reason ought not at all times to benumb the generous emotions of an amiable impulse, so, on the other, though not an ardent sensibility to stimulate to an improper lavishness of that which might be wanted for more fit occasions. Happy is it for us, my brethren, that the bountiful hand of nature has been so prodigal of its blessings to this country; that the calls on human commiseration are, perhaps, less frequent here than in any part of the world. In this young and flourishing nation, industry can scarcely fail to be rewarded with a decent competency; and idleness ought ever to meet a freemason's frowns. Still, even in this fruitful land, poverty and distress will sometimes await the aged and the infirm; there will also be some, who, in spite of the utmost exertions of a laudable industry, will be overtaken by unavoidable misfortune; these, with the unfortunate brethren, of other climes, who seek among us a shelter from transatlantic miseries, will claim and will always receive the benevolent aid of our society.

Before I quit this subject, I will mention one species of charity, which though not of the active but of the passive kind, though not a positive but a negative virtue, is, notwithstanding, attended with great social benefits: I mean that kind of charity, which restrains us from thinking too unfavorably of each other: the neglect of this virtue has often been the source of great disorders; mankind are but too prone to indulge an uncharitable disposition, to ascribe the worst views and motives to those who differ from them in the occurrences of life; this imputation of sinister designs produces an acrimonious state of society, and begets divisions, productive of social misery and public unhappiness. In the organization of the human mind, and in the structure of civil society, was it not intended that there should exist a variety of opinions? And when these neither disturb the public order nor endanger the public welfare, should not candor give credit to others for the same purity of views which we are conscious of possessing ourselves?

May I be permitted on this occasion to touch on another kind of inactive virtue, an inattention to which frequently leads to the prostration of all others: I mean sobriety. This virtue being as it were, the guardian of the others, a few observations on it may not be misplaced. An oriental apologue contains an excellent moral on this subject. A man was directed to choose which of these crimes he would commit—parricide, incest, or drunkenness; he recoiled with horror, and without hesitation chose the latter: but mark the sequel—when drunk he committed both parricide and incest. This vice, when it becomes a settled habit, is indeed attended with innumerable evils: it palsies all those fine qualities of the mind which elevate man to the similitude of the Supreme Being: it obliterates all those sublime virtues and excellencies which have distinguished man as the noblest work of God: it sinks him far below the inanimate brute; for the latter pursues the design of its creation, whereas man, by wantonly depriving himself of that reason wherewith he is endowed, entirely disappoints the views of his Creator. Can there be a more melancholy object than a human being in this degraded state, where a dark and gloomy veil is drawn over the obscured faculties of the mind; where the man, who a few hours ago, was admired for the brilliant display of his talents and genius, is now contemned for his folly and extravagancies; where he, who, but yesterday, was an object of envy or admiration, is, to-day, a subject of derision or compassion. Were we not too much familiarized with such scenes, should we not shudder at the sight of an enlightened being, suddenly reduced to the darkness of insanity, not by the inevitable act of providence, but by the wilful abuse of the comforts of life?

In making these serious reflections, far be it from my wish to check that convivial disposition, which gives a relish and a zest to social enjoyments. There are undoubtedly occasions when the honest heart will naturally expand, and the agreeable companion ought to relax from those severe restraints, which, if too rigidly observed, would deprive life of some of its essential pleasures, and rob society of many of her principal charms.

Industry and punctuality in the observance of engagements, are also important virtues. Man was not intended for an inactive life; but every one, according to the sphere in which he finds himself, is bound by the social tie, and by his duty to his Divine Parent, to contribute his mite to the public stock. By this general co-operation, and by the happy diversity of grades and professions, into which communities are distributed, nations prosper, while individuals promote their own and each other's welfare. Idleness is not only the bane of society, but it is its own curse; for while the industrious citizen provides for the comfortable support of his family, sees every thing thriving around him, inculcates by his meritorious example, industrious habits on his children, enjoys the fruits of his labor, and the respect of his countrymen, the idler, after wasting his time in chimerical speculations or specious projects, which he wanted activity to undertake, tired and ashamed of his existence, skulks into some obscure corner, forgotten, or only remembered to be despised.

Contentment, in whatever situation a man may be placed, is a blessing which belongs not to all; but it is one which all should strive to attain; how many have fallen victims to that restless disposition, which stimulated by mistaken and misapplied principles, has urged them to abandon a substance to grasp at a shadow? It is natural for a man to strive, by active industry and economy, to better his situation; but let him not repine at an apparent inferiority of condition, and at too slow a transition from obscurity to honor: let him not, to accelerate his progress, embrace means unworthy of a good citizen. In the natural progression of things, industry and frugality must exalt some to riches and honor, while idleness and profusion will sink others to dependence and obscurity. By this revolving course of events, the children of the industrious mechanics of the present generation will probably be hereafter independent gentlemen, while the children of the idle gentlemen of the present generation will be hereafter industrious mechanics.

A scrupulous adherence to our engagements is a high masonic virtue: a strict observance of good faith between man and man enlivens the toilsome path of business and makes our duties easy and pleasant; whereas captious and evasive practices add fresh burthens to our labors, and obstruct us with difficulties, far greater, than those naturally incident to the ordinary operations of trades and professions. As there is no being more despicable than a tricky character, one who is always on the watch to overreach his neighbor and take advantage of his credulity and indulgence, so is there none more respectable than an honest and industrious mechanic, who maintains and educates his family benefits mankind by his work and example, and honorably fulfils his engagements. Such a citizen is indeed far more respectable and infinitely more useful to society, than many of a different description, frequently and improperly called gentlemen.

Among the duties which we owe to society, is that of properly educating our children. In governments like ours, every one should know his rights, that he may learn to prize them. Ignorance is incompatible with free governments: it may be called the grave of liberty. Mankind has been ingeniously divided into three classes, the wise, the fools, and the knaves: in public contests, the knaves get possession of the fools, and are then frequently an overmatch for the wise. In the United States, which enjoy superior advantages over other nations in this respect, as in all others, education has been so much attended to, that ignorance bears a smaller proportion in the general scale than elsewhere. Still public happiness depends so much on the diffusion of knowledge, that education cannot be too leading an object of our regard. Let every one therefore, whatever his situation in life, give the best education to his children, within his means, without however interfering too much with the profession or trade to which they may be destined. A proper education is by no means inconsistent with the practice of a mechanic art. Every citizen, in every station, ought to know enough to be able to judge for himself in all the great transactions of life, and to be proof against the practices of the ambitious and the designing. An ignorant man in the hands of a knave is like a mischievous weapon in the hands of a madman; but a well-informed citizen is not only the guardian of his own rights, but the safeguard of the honor and rights of his fellow citizens.

From the contemplation of these domestic and neighborly virtues, allow me to lead your minds to the sublime contemplation of a virtue which acts on a more enlarged theatre, and swells the bosom to a more comprehensive scope of reflection.

You will readily perceive that love of our country is the noble sentiment alluded to. A good freemason must be a good patriot; but patriotism, like many other virtues, has been so often prostituted, by the ridiculous mummeries and wicked artifices of impostors, that it is necessary to discriminate between genuine and spurious patriotism.

When I speak therefore of this virtue, I mean not that mock patriotism, which, in all ages, and in all free countries, has been seized on by the ambitious as a cloak to cover base and insidious designs; which, bedecked with the alluring garb of tinsel jargon, has been assumed to conceal the foulest purposes; which, under the mask of hypocrisy, and with the parade of pompous language, has ever been found subservient to the most despicable and selfish views; which, at one time, has been employed as a step ladder to power, and at another, as an engine of destruction to rival popular and obnoxious competitors; I mean not that mock patriotism, which has been the siren song of seduction of the knaves, to cajole and ensnare the fools; I mean not that satire or patriotism, which blazons its own merits in ranting declamation and frothy professions, which draws from time to time out of non-existence little ephemeral insects, which glitter for a moment in the glare of their own creation, and then dissolve into their original nonentity; I mean not that profanation of patriotism, which, while it utters from the lips the most precious and pious ejaculations for the public weal, impiously bears in the heart the most atrocious designs against public order, public tranquility, and national independence. But I mean that heaven-born patriotism, which announces itself in deeds of public utility; which delights in the maintenance of law, in the support of order, in respect for the magistracy, inforcing by precept and example, every moral and religious practice; which displays itself in habits of industry and frugality, in a virtuous education of one's family, and in the faithful performance of all the relative duties of a man and citizen.

Enlarging still further his views, every good freemason should embrace, in his system of philanthropy, the whole human race; universal benevolence should share in his breast a place with those social affections, which are of a more local complexion.

This expansive and magnanimous philanthropy will of course excite him, while he delights in his own domestic prospect to invoke the divine protection for those unhappy nations, which are now desolated by the scourge of war, and every public calamity; and to implore the Almighty Ruler of the universe to stay the avenging sword, and to restore peace, liberty and happiness, to so many millions of our miserable fellow creatures.

Finally, my brethren, let me exhort you to proper attention to your religious duties. Religion, were it not even inculcated by our divine Master, would recommend itself to all enlightened men and civilized societies by the purity of its precepts and the excellence of its practices. Religion, by softening the manners and subduing the unruly passion, unites mankind in the bond of brotherly love, and, like freemasonry, constitutes a most salutary and durable cement to society. Do we not learn from history, that in proportion as nations have receded from the principles and practices of religion, they have advanced to ferociousness or relapsed into barbarism? And in our own country, is it not undeniable that in proportion as religion sheds its benign influence over society, do justice, order, and public felicity prevail?

I have now rapidly passed over some of the most prominent features in this beautiful system of moral freemasonry. To have enumerated them all, or to have dwelt more minutely on those that have been selected, would have exhausted your patience. You will have observed, my brethren, that to accomplish the views of the Great Artificer of the world, and to be approved as true and perfect freemasons, you have many important duties to perform; you will likewise have observed, that beginning within the circle of the more domestic and social duties, your bosoms must dilate to the more enlarged circle of the public duties you owe to your country; and that, not confining your affection even there, the heart must afterwards expand to the spacious circle of human nature, and swell with emotions of universal love and benevolence. A due cultivation of these virtues will invigorate the cementing principle of brotherly love, which is the grand basis of freemasonry; for nothing is more true, than that the better men are, the more they love one another. The practice of these virtues, will also smooth away those asperities, which are found in the rugged vale of life, and make us glide more gently down it, to that future state of bliss, which a life so spent will insure us.

Thus having fulfilled the purposes of your creation, and done honor to the inestimable principles of this institution, you will, by approving yourselves good freemasons, at the same time approve yourselves good men, good citizens and good christians.

HISTORICAL.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

No hero makes so distinguished a figure in ancient history as Alexander the Great. His courage was undaunted, his ambition, boundless, his friendship ardent, his taste refined; and what is very extraordinary he appears to have conversed with the same fire and spirit with which he fought.

Philip, his father, knowing him to be very swift, wished him to run for the prize at the Olympic Games. "I would comply with your request," said Alexander, "if kings were to be my competitors."

When Alexander made a libation to the heroes who fought in the Trojan war, he placed a crown of gold upon the tomb of Achilles; saying, that Achilles was the most fortunate man in the world; for while he lived, Patroclus was his friend; and when dead, Homer perpetuated his memory.

Alexander went to Delphi to consult the oracle there, wishing to know to what success was likely to attend the projects of his vast ambition. The priestess pretended that it was not lawful for him to consult her at the time, and refused to enter the temple. Alexander, impatient and impatient, seized her by the arm; and as he led her in by force, she cried, "Ah, my son, no one can resist you." "I want no more," exclaimed Alexander. "This oracle is sufficient."

When he passed into Asia to attack Darius he made rich presents to his general officers, inasmuch that Parmenio asked him, "Sir what do you keep for yourself?" His reply was "hope."

After the battle of Issus the complete rout of the Persian army put Alexander in possession of the camp of Darius, in which his mother, wife and children. A rumor has been spread that Darius was slain, and this threw all the captive royal family into the deepest affliction. Alexander, anxious to inform them that this report was false, and wishing to give them comfort, paid them a visit. As he entered the tent of Darius, Hephæstion, his most intimate friend, who was very handsome, and rather taller than Alexander, was close by his side. As soon as they approached, the queen-mother, who had fallen prostrate, raised up her head, and addressed herself to Hephæstion, supposing him to be Alexander. The attendants telling her of her mistake, she was much embarrassed, and began to make apologies. Alexander allowed her not to proceed, but raised her up, and in the most gracious manner said, "It is of no importance, madam, for he too is Alexander."

Which of the two (says Valerius Maximus, from whose work this anecdote is taken) should we first congratulate; him who had the disposition to make such a speech, or him who had the felicity to bear it spoken of himself?

When he was dying, his attendants asked him where his treasures were deposited. His answer was, "In the hands of my friends."

THE GATHERER.

SENTENCE OF THE ST. LOUIS MURDERERS.

On the morning of the first, the four blacks convicted of the recent murder and arson in St. Louis, were brought into court to receive their sentence. They were all asked by the Judge if they had any thing to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon them. Madison answered, "I have nothing to say for myself." The others simply inclined their heads, but said nothing. The Judge then proceeded to read the sentence, condemning them to be hung on Friday the 9th day of July next.

Madison did not appear to be affected in the slightest degree. Brown betrayed considerable emotion. Warrick and Seward appeared as if they had made up their minds for the worst.

The St. Louis New Era says it is understood that Brown and Madison have been concerned in many robberies at that place within the past year—in those at Galena early this spring, and in numberless ones at New Orleans. Probably the whole West and South has suffered from their depredations. They have been engaged too, in a regular system of operations, by which the slaves of the South were assisted in making their escape to Canada. Brown says that it was on one of these occasions that he committed the only murder that can be charged against him except that of Weaver. He had under his charge a negro from one of the Southern States, who was fleeing to Canada. Some cause led him to be apprehensive of detection, and he determined to make way with slave. Accordingly, at night he decoyed him to the guard of the steamboat, tipped him over into the water, and that was the last he heard of him. Brown admits the justice of his sentence, and consoles himself with the idea, that his wife and child are in independent circumstances—the fruits of years of villany.

PUNCTUALITY.—His late Majesty, George the III. once ordered Mr. S. a tradesman of some eminence in London, to wait upon him at Windsor Castle, at eight o'clock in the morning of the day appointed. Mr. S. was half an hour behind the time; and upon being announced, his majesty said,—"Desire him to come at eight o'clock the next day after the time, and received the same command. On the third morning he contrived to be punctual. Upon his entrance the king said, "Oh! the great Mr. S. What sleep do you take, Mr. S?" "Why, please your majesty, I am a man of regular habits; I usually take eight hours." "Eight hours" said the king, "that's too much—six hours' sleep is enough for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool, Mr. S.—eight for a fool."

LAWS OF HONOR.—As much talk has been expended with regard to the right of the challenged party to choose his weapon, perhaps the following story may settle the question: Some years ago, an American captain was challenged by a French gentleman in Paris. The captain had been a whaler, and chose the harpoon for his weapon. The Frenchman shrugged his shoulders—"Eh, diable, je ne scias pas, vat is de harpoon; I vill meet you, as in jantilhomme, with my small sword." But the old whaler was inexorable. The dispute was submitted to a court of honor, which decided that the Frenchman must fight with the harpoon, or apologize. He shrugged his shoulders a second time—"Begar, monseur captain, I beg pardon; I ave no skill in de harpoon; I am not on whale; I beg pardon, begar." Thus matters ended peaceably, and the harpoon of Nantucket whaler did not make a pincushion of the body of the Gaul.

SELF-DENIAL.—Youth are prone to be ill-natured and disobliging. It is hard for them to endure a little self-denial, or suffer inconvenience for the promotion not only of their own happiness, but the happiness of those who take an interest in their welfare. They do not look forward to see the beneficial results of certain courses, which are marked out by their friends, when deprived of present enjoyment, they deem it justice and unkindness, and manifest their feelings by sour looks and stubbornness of behavior. They treat ill those to whom they are the most indebted, and to whom in after life they will look back as their best and kindest friends.

THE MECHANIC'S WIFE.

A working man needs a working wife; but to the qualities of the mind, manners, and morals, she cannot run too high in the scale. There is an error prevalent concerning this. Giles says, "I do not want a wife with too much sense." Why not? Perhaps Giles will not answer, but the shrug of his shoulders answers. "Because I am afraid she will be an overmatch for me." Giles talks like a simpleton. The unfortunate men who have their tyrants at home, are never married to women of sense. Genuine elevation of mind cannot prompt any one, male or female, to go out of his proper sphere. No man ever suffered from an overplus of intelligence, whether in his own head, or in his wife's.

A proper self-respect would teach every noble-hearted American, of whatever class, that he cannot set too high a value on the conjugal relation. We may judge of the well-being and honor of the community by its wives and mothers. Opportunities for acquiring knowledge and accomplishments are happily open to every class above the very lowest; and the wise mechanic will not fail to choose such a companion as may not shame his sons and daughters in that coming age, when an ignorant American shall be as obsolete as a fossil fish.

Away with flouncing, girling, dancing, squandering, peevish, fashion-hunting wives! The woman of this stamp is a poor comforter, when the husband is sick—or bankrupt to her Adam:

For no good lover can be found
In woman's heart to study household good
And good advice in her husband to promote.

I have such a mechanic's wife in my mind's eye; gentle as the antelope; untiring as a bee; joyous as a linnet, neat, punctual, modest, and confiding. She is patient, but resolute; aiding in counsel; reviving in troubles; ever pointing out the brightest side, and concealing nothing but her own sorrows.

BORROWING.

We have received a letter from a correspondent in which he speaks in strong terms of reprobation of borrowing in general, and paper borrowing in particular. He talks like a man who has suffered some. He says he lived at one time on the banks of the Mississippi, and gives the following as a specimen of the extent to which the practice is carried there:

"Will you lend me your axe? you won't want to use it, I reckon."

"Why yes, I'll let you take it, s'cein' you want it."

In about two months the owner does want to use his axe, and applies to the borrower of it, but he has not got it; "the last he seed on't, Mr. Fletcher had it to cut some roots with."

The poor owner then goes to Mr. Fletcher: "Stranger, have you seen my axe I lent Mr. Bent t'other day?"

"Why yes, I reckon Mr. Bower's got it; he said he wanted it to chop some firewood, so I lent it to him. You'd best ask him for it."

He goes, "Mornin', Mr. Bower—how's your wife?"

"Lively, I reckon—how's your'n?"

"About right, I reckon—have you had hold of my axe?"

"I reckon I have. I have smashed the handle—it was a powerful weak one—but you can mend it; and when you have done it, I'd like to borrow it again, cause I have a smart chance of wood to cut, and want to use it specially."

GREEN ERIN.

The Irishman who exploded the powder in his cap the other day was lectured upon the evils of intemperance by an acquaintance of his—and the injury he had received by the explosion, was pointed out as the effect of his having drank too much.

"Then you think it was bad luck that I tuck the liquor," responded Pat.

"Yes."

"Och, but your edication's been neglected young man. You're not scientific by no means. It was good luck for me that I tuk whiskey enough to make me limber in the knees, or the powder would have druv me fut in the ground."

THE BITER BIT.

It seems that a gentleman, who kept a boarding-house in this city, found one fine morning that one of his boarders had "sloped," without inquiring for his "little bñl," which on being sometime after presented to him he refused to pay, for the very best of reasons, viz: he had not the wherewith. The debtor and creditor met several times since on the very best of terms, and on the morning we allude to, they agreed to take a drink together, and accordingly repaired to a bar-room, when the creditor remarked that his ex-boarder was getting corpulent, which the other replied to by alluding jocosely to the very sleek appearance of his quondam friend and host of the boarding-house, who ended his observations by an offer to bet the liquor on their size. Things were at this crisis, when the debtor taking off his coat, (which by-the-by, happened to be a pretty good one) gaily observed to the other that by trying it on, the difference of rotundity could be perceived by the by-standers. Done! was the word, and our hero of the boarding-house, who luckily happened to be in his shirt sleeves at the time, was in a trice invested with the glossy broadcloth and settled the matter pro tem. by peremptorily claiming the coat in part payment of the boarding bill. Blows were prevented, and the boarder walked off minus his coat.—N. O. Bulletin.

FIRST NIGHT OF THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO.—Many hours before the opening of the ticket office, I really believe that half the population of Paris was at the doors. Here was a triumph for Beaumarchais! If he sighed for popularity, he had gained it. Persons of the highest rank, even princes of the blood, besieged him with letters, imploring to be favored with the author's ticket. At eleven o'clock in the forenoon the Duchess de Bourbon sent her valet to the office to wait till the distribution of the tickets, which was to take place at four o'clock. At two o'clock the Duchess d'Osnon laid aside her accustomed dignity and haughtiness, and humbly solicited the crowd to allow her to pass; and Mme. de Talleyrand, doing a violence to her parsimonious disposition, paid triple price for a box. Condons bleus were seen elbowing their way through the crowd, jostled by Savoyards; the guards were dispersed, the doors forced open, the iron bar broken down, and an inconceivable scene of confusion and danger ensued. One half of the people had not been able to procure tickets, and threw their admission money to the door-keepers as they passed, or rather, as they were carried along. But whilst all this was happening outside, the disorder which prevented within the theatre was, if possible, still greater. No less than three hundred persons, who had procured tickets at an early period, dined in the boxes. Our theatre seemed transformed into a tavern, and nothing was heard but the clattering of plate and the drawing of corks. Then, when the audience was assembled, what a brilliant picture presented himself! The élite of the rank and talent of Paris was congregated there. What a radiant line of beauty was exhibited by the first tier of the boxes.—Memoirs of M. Fleury.

THICKER THAN THREE IN A BED.

The hotels at Washington on the 4th of March, were so crowded that the visitors were compelled to sleep upon chairs and tables, after the beds were all packed full. One of the accounts we have seen reminds us of an old Boston story which we heard in our younger days.

A Vermonter 'came down' during the winter with a couple of frozen hogs in his pung or lumber box, and drove up to a hotel at the North End. The house was as full as it could hold and the bar-keeper one of the driest wags that ever cracked a joke.

"Can I have my horses put up and get lodgin' for myself in this ere tavern?" said the Vermonter, kicking the snow from his shoes, and addressing the bar-keeper.

"You can have both, sir," rejoined the bar-keeper.

Well, I wish you'd flax round and git supper as fast as you can 'cause I'm al-fired hungry and tired tu.—I've driv all the way from Chemsford since dinner, and some saysaygas or something of that sort wouldnt go bad jest now," continued the Vermonter.

"I'll take your measure," said the bar-keeper reaching a piece of tape from a nail and stepping from behind the bar.

"Oh! get out," said the Vermonter. "You don't measure folks for a meal of vittles du you?"

"Always," retorted the roughish bar-keeper. "We always measure strangers, and more particularly than ever when they call for sausages. About four feet would do for you, I should think," drawing the tape around the waist of the astonished Green Mountain Boy.

The supper was soon smoking on the table, the Vermonter made a hearty meal, and shortly after came to the bar-keeper and said he was ready to go to bed.

"You have no objections to sleep more than one in a bed, have you," said the wag.

"Not the least airthly objection in the world," retorted the Vermonter.

"Well, there is no necessity for my showing the way up," continued the bar-keeper, taking his lodger to the foot of the stairs and handing him a candlestick. "You will go up four pair of stairs when you will come to a ladder. Go up that and you will see a rope hanging down through the scuttle. You will then have the kindness to put the candlestick between you teeth, spit on your hands and climb the rope hand over hand. There is one bed in the loft with only nine men and boys in it and plenty of room for one more by crowding in under the eaves. Sorry I can't do any better for you to night, but we're very full!"

It is needless to say that that bar-keeper was joking all the while and afterwards gave the Vermonter a comfortable 'bunk' on the floor, but not until he had frightened him badly at the idea of taking so long a journey at that time of night up stairs, ladders and ropes.—N. O. Pic.

CURIOUS CASE OF SOMNAMBULISM.

We find in Upham's "Outlines of Disordered Mental Action," a curious case of somnambulism, which was published in the newspapers at the time the case occurred. A farmer in one of the counties of Massachusetts had employed himself for some weeks in winter threshing his grain. One night, as he was about closing his labors, he ascended a ladder to the top of the great beams in the barn, where the rye he was threshing was deposited, to ascertain what number of bundles remained unthreshed, which he determined to finish the next day. The ensuing night, about 2 o'clock, he was heard by one of the family, to arise and go out. He repaired to his barn, being sound asleep, and unconscious of what he was doing, set upon his barn doors, ascended the great beams of the barn where his rye was deposited, threw down a flooring, and commenced threshing it.

When he had completed it, he raked off the straw, and shoved the rye to one side of the floor and again ascended the ladder with the straw, and deposited it on some rails that lay across the great beams. He then threw down another flooring of rye, which he threshed and finished as before.

Thus he continued his labors, until he had threshed five floorings; and on returning from throwing down the sixth and last, in passing over part of the hay mow, he fell off, where the hay had been cut down about six feet, on to the lower part of it, which awoke him. He at first imagined himself in his neighbor's barn; but after groping about in the dark a long time ascertained that he was in his own, and at length, found the ladder, on which he descended to the floor, closed his barn doors, which he found open, and returned to his house. On coming to the light, he found himself in such a profuse perspiration, that his clothes were literally wet through. The next morning, on going to his barn, he found he had threshed, during the night, five bushels of rye; had raked the straw off in good order, and deposited it on the great beams, &c.; carefully shoved the grain to one side of the floor, without the least consciousness of what he was doing, until he fell from the hay.

THE MYSTERIOUS HOMICIDE.

FROM THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF LAUNCELOT LINMER CLERKE.

Pedro was not a coward, but he had not self-possession to prepare himself for danger in time, and his life was at the mercy of another, before he could collect his scattered senses. Seeing his young mistress had fainted, and was lying on her father's bleeding bosom, with the struggling moonbeams rendering her pale face more palid and death-like, he promised every thing the robber required, gave up his weapons and betook himself to assisting his captor in restoring her consciousness. While they both were thus engaged, stooping over the fair unconscious being, the mask which the robber wore partly fell off from his face, and gave Pedro a glimpse of his features. He hastily restored it to its position, but a glance taken at such a moment could not fail to make a deep impression. The robber was most assiduous in his efforts for the restoration of the maiden, and finally succeeded he placed her back upon the saddle, and turning their horses' heads the way they came, he bade both mistress and servant God speed to Tarragona. Much did the daughter plead for her father's body, but the bandit said they should not encumber themselves with it that night; but if they would send for it the next day, they would find it near the spot, carefully protected against farther injury. After Pedro and his mistress were fairly out of sight, the robber proceeded to gather up his booty, and rapidly disappeared through a by-path across the mountain.

Early the next morning, the alcaide began to prepare for the arrival of his friend Don Antonio, and for the approaching nuptials of his son. The day wore away till past noon, but brought no tidings of his friend and the bride with her rich dowry, and the worthy magistrate began to feel somewhat nettled and impatient. The good Don Vincente had been some time in the village, and foreseeing what would be the feelings of the alcaide at this apparent slight and delay on the part of the rich merchant, thought it a good time to address him in behalf of Ferdinando and Julia. He had called at the widow's cottage on his way to the village in the morning, and bestowed upon the fair Julia the same dowry that Don Antonio had promised to give his daughter. The alcaide entertained the highest respect for Don Vincente; but when he saw him coming, he supposed that the benevolent cavalier was going to trouble him about the old business of the robbers, and had not felt in an humor for it just at this moment, when his mind was agitated by the non-appearance of Don Antonio. But Don Vincente knew very well what was passing in the mind of the worthy magistrate, and had sufficient sagacity to approach him with the most adroit and skillful address. He began by complimenting him upon the tact and judgment he had discovered in forming so advantageous an alliance for his son, and was indignant at the suspicion that had begun to be whispered about in the village, that the rich merchant was after all going to jilt them. He continued, by discussing various little points of etiquette and ceremony proper to be observed on such occasions, and occupied some time in general and desultory conversation; and finally, after the impatience of the magistrate began to assume the character of indignation, he ended by adroitly insinuating to his friend, who attentively listened, that there were other as good matches for his son as that with Don Antonio's daughter; and that for one, he should like to see the rich merchant most flattered by forming an other as good an alliance for the young and gallant Ferdinando.

The alcaide, whose ruling passion was pride, and whose wrath waxed fiercer and fiercer every moment, began to feel almost willing in his heart that his son should marry the poor widow's daughter, in order to avenge his old friend's neglect, and was of course very easily persuaded to consent to it, when he found that she had a dowry of ten thousand dollars. Don Vincente, finding his triumph complete, hastened to the young lovers, and communicated his success, while the liveliest emotions of joy swelled his heart, and beamed in his open and benevolent countenance.—The twain were at once united in wedlock; and it was universally remarked, that it was difficult to determine who were the happiest, the kind Don Vincente, or the youthful lovers.

As soon as the murder and robbery of the rich merchant Don Antonio was bruited abroad Don Vincente hastened to the alcaide, manifesting the greatest consternation at the event, and the deepest interest in putting an effectual stop to all further outrages of the kind. He offered at once to arm his servants and retainers, and to post them himself every night, as a patrol, under his own particular supervision, at the most dangerous passes of the mountains. The worthy magistrate was overwhelmed at this act of patriotic generosity; and as the troops of the government were at a great distance, and much needed in other quarters, he thankfully accepted the proffered aid, and vested Don Vincente with full power to protect the whole mountain region. He entered at once upon the discharge of his new duties with great zeal. He posted a great number of his retainers, thoroughly armed, at such parts of the mountain passes as he thought most needed protection, with strict orders for none of the parties to leave their posts, under any circumstances, even though they heard firing in other directions, lest the discipline and order of his arrangements should be disturbed. Thus night after night did he establish the patrol on the mountains, and was observed himself to go from post to post, frequently depriving himself of sleep all night, in his zeal to render his plan of protection complete. But notwithstanding all these efforts and plans, the robberies and murders continued to increase in frequency and the whole matter seemed involved in the most impenetrable mystery. Although the posts were changed nearly every night, the perpetrators appeared to know, as if by intuition, the parts that were left unguarded. In one or two instances, the noise of the affray between the robbers and the travellers was heard by some of the patrolling parties; but it was beyond their beat, and the sounds might proceed from another patrol, their instructions from their master precluded their interference.

The mystery grew more extraordinary every day, and various conjectures were made as to the cause, by different persons, according to their fancy, their temperament, or their respective degrees of sagacity and information. Some of the more ignorant and superstitious began to surmise that some evil spirits, or perchance the Evil One himself, haunted the mountains; others, more enlightened, considered that they must be in human shape, as the tracks left behind exhibited no obliquity; some, who possessed the invention, supposed that they must have dens in caverns in the mountains, whose entrance was so concealed by rubbish, or other means, as to prevent the success of the search; while a few were bold enough to assert that the robbers must be some of their own fellow citizens, inasmuch as none others could anticipate so exactly all their movements; and as particularly, on one occasion, on the night of an extensive robbery, an individual in disguise was pursued as far as the castle and only escaped by dropping his mask, which he did in such a way as led his pursuer to suppose that he had jumped with it down a very steep precipice, while in fact he escaped under cover of the night, and the delusion of his stratagem, in a different direction.—The mystery was now assuming a very painful aspect. Neighbors began to suspect each other, especially where there were any family feuds; circumstances in the conduct of individuals began to be closely scrutinized, and strange inferences were drawn from actions before perfectly harmless; a great many were brought before the alcaide on suspicion; and though they were always discharged for want of proof, still the mere fact of being arraigned on such charges, created heart-burnings and enmities, that destroyed the peace of the hitherto quiet and happy village.

The benevolent Don Vincente did all he could to do to these natural outbursts of human passions, and was particularly industrious in trying to allay the universal suspicion that now began to get afloat, that the robbers were citizens in disguise. His largesses and benefactions were if any thing greater than ever, and there seemed no end to his vast resources for purposes of benevolence. But this created less wonder among the mass of people, as they were ignorant of the fact that he had squandered away his other estates, and still supposed he received from them a large portion of the means he lavished upon others with such noble and extraordinary bounty.

In the meantime, the worthy Alcaide Pietro d'Almanzor sickened and died, and his son Ferdinando succeeded him in his magisterial office. Though young and inexperienced, Ferdinando prosecuted the investigation into the outrages upon the mountains with more energy and vigilance than his father. He caused several villagers, and even some retainers of Don Vincente, to be arrested and brought before him on the charge of being concerned in these during infractions of the public peace. Among the latter, was Don Vincente's porter, near whose lodge had been found a mask, dropped one night by the robber, in his hurry to escape pursuit. The interest created by these proceedings was intense throughout the whole surrounding country. The young alcaide held a court of investigation almost every day in the village; but although much testimony was taken, little light was thrown upon the mysterious affair. On one occasion, however, more than usual interest was manifested. It was rumored that Pedro, the servant, who was with Don Antonio at the time he was waylaid and murdered was to be examined, and the court-room was filled with anxious listeners. Among the rest was the alcaide's young and beautiful wife, who sat near her husband, and directly in front of the witness.—Pedro gave a circumstantial account of the attack upon his master on the mountains, as above detailed, and was proceeding to give a minute description of the person and appearance of the ruffian who perpetrated the horrid deed, when the court was interrupted for a moment by the entrance of Don Vincente. He pressed through the crowd, bowing and smiling kindly upon all, and receiving on all sides the strongest manifestations of favor, passed by near the witness, Pedro, and was proceeding to take his seat by the side of the alcaide, when a sudden exclamation of surprise and horror arrested the attention and thrilled the bosoms of all present. It proceeded from Pedro, who stood pale and trembling, with his eyes half starting from his head, but fixed upon the calm countenance of Don Vincente, half shrinking from the object, and returned quickly again to it, by some horrid fascination.

The agitation of the witness threw the whole court into confusion, and created the more astonishment and concern, that no one could discover any adequate cause for such extraordinary emotion. As soon as the alcaide had somewhat recovered from his surprise he demanded of Pedro the cause of his agitation; but it was some time before he could be made to comprehend that there was any one present except Don Vincente. As soon, however, as his eye wandered from the one object, and he saw other faces around him, he exclaimed, with great vehemence, and in a tone of deep horror, pointing to Don Vincente, 'There is the murderer of my master!'

The whole assembly rushed forward, as if with one accord, to seize the base traducer of so much virtue; and Pedro would have been torn to pieces on the spot had not Don Vincente himself interfered, and waving his hand to command silence, exclaimed slowly:

'My friends, peace! Heed not this poor man's delusion. He doubtless means well, but has been deceived. Let us proceed in the examination.'

'I will at once,' said the alcaide, 'if you desire it, send this base slanderer to a dungeon, instead of seeking any more information from one so little entitled to credit.'

'By no means,' replied Don Vincente: 'I insist that you proceed with the examination. It is possible that some fancied resemblance, which has led the witness to make this egregious mistake, may lead to the detection of the true offender.'

'Well, as you please,' said the alcaide.

'After you caught an accidental glimpse, as you say, of the ruffian's face, what happened next?' inquired Don Vincente.

Pedro began now to recover his self-possession, and to perceive that he had placed himself in a very unpleasant situation. He possessed natural shrewdness when not overcome by his excessive timidity; and reflecting that at least his person was protected from violence by his very position, he felt reassured, and answered Don Vincente's questions with so much firmness and precision, that the latter evidently appeared less inclined to go very minutely into particulars.—

Pedro's tongue, however, had now got fairly loose, and ran over the subject as briskly as his eye did over the person of Don Vincente. Suddenly his eye was arrested by the hilt of Don Vincente's sword; but going on with the testimony, he said:

"To go back a little with the story: when the robber first fired from the rock, and leaped down upon the path, as I told you, he hit against the rock, and struck something which glittered as it fell from his person, and which I picked up; and it fits here!"

So saying, and sudden as a flash of lightning, he seized Don Vincente's sword, placed a kind of gold button upon the hilt, and thrust it immediately before the face of the alcayde.

The boldness of the deed, the suddenness of the action, and the palpableness of the evidence, perfectly overwhelmed Don Vincente, and threw the alcayde and all the assembly into the utmost consternation and horror.

Donna Julia, dissolved in tears, rushed to her husband's feet, imploring mercy for their benefactor; and all present, on their knees, joined in the petition, for there was not one who had not experienced his kindness and generosity. Each one had some noble deed of the good Don Vincente to recount to the alcayde; some insisted that such a man could not have been guilty of murder; others thought if guilty, he should be pardoned for the good he had done; and all agreed that, whether guilty or innocent, the alcayde, of all men in the world, should be the last to feel any doubt how to act in such an emergency. Thus pressed on all sides, his wife weeping at his feet, and all his friends and neighbors joining in her entreaties, the poor alcayde was sadly perplexed what to do; although his conscience told him he should merge the friend in the judge, and forget his private obligations in his public duty. While thus wavering, and overwhelmed with perplexity and grief, he was relieved in some measure by Don Vincente himself, who, recovering from his confusion, and assuming his usual calm and placid manner, thus addressed the assembly:

"My friends!—for I have some title to call you such notwithstanding the confession I am about to make—I pray you listen calmly to what I have to say, and if you cannot pardon my acts, you can at least appreciate for you have felt, my motives. The impulse of benevolence was natural to my heart, and grew into a passion by indulgence. As long as my fortune lasted I indulged it without reserve; but the very cause that exhausted he one, added fuel to the other. I found myself almost penniless, but with habits of munificence which assumed the character of a morbid passion, without the means of gratification. Madrid, the scene of my triumphs and my enjoyments, became irksome to me; and thinking that perhaps the income of my estate here on the mountains might afford me the means of indulging my passions proportionate to the simple wants of the objects around me, I came here unconscious of the fatal violence of the flame that was consuming my bosom, and unsuspecting that the desire for doing good could become so uncontrollable as to lead directly to the perpetration of evil, and another every principle of conscientiousness in the feeling of benevolence. But such, unfortunately, is human nature; impulses are stronger than principles; and when the former have vanquished the latter, they fall into conflict with one another. It is not until the internal fires of the ear have burst the restraints that nature imposes, and rush forth through the superincumbent crust in volcanoes, that the ferocious conflict of the elements commences; until then, how harmless, and unconscious are we even of their existence, while above them, the calm sunshine sleeps upon green bank, quiet lake, and lovely flower! It was your hand," continued he, turning to the alcayde, "that helped to break through the restraining crust of my heart; not, as you supposed, to let forth sweet waters, but fatal fires to consume and destroy. Your sorrows excited my sympathies to such a pitch, that I could restrain them no longer; and impelled by an unconquerable desire to relieve them, at all hazards, I conceived the project of furnishing Donna Julia with the requisite dowry, and removing her rival at a single stroke. The idea being conceived bore down reflection; and indeed I had no time to reflect. Don Antonio was on his way to claim your hand for his daughter. Strange infatuation!—The thought of promoting your happiness so completely engrossed me, that I was totally insensible to the misery I was inflicting on others, and the crime on which I was polluting myself. Carried away by this impetuous passion, it was I that murdered Don Antonio, and robbing him of his money, furnished Donna Julia next morning with her dowry. I see you all shrink from me with mingled incredulity, pity, and horror. I could expect but this, so soon as my conduct should be known. All I ask is, that in condemning me you impute my crimes to their true cause."

Don Vincente sunk back in his chair, covering his face with his hands, while his bosom heaved with contending emotions. He remained silent for some moments, while the bystanders gazed in each other's faces in silent amazement.

The alcayde broke the painful silence, by saying that his own feelings, if not the law, put this case beyond his jurisdiction; and Don Vincente, seeing how much he was affected and overcome by his grief, offered of his own accord to surrender himself up to the higher authorities of the kingdom.

The next day Don Vincente was sent with an escort on his way to Madrid, there to receive his trial; but he was not doomed to witness his own disgrace amid the scenes of his former glory; and even the last act of his life was destined to exhibit the ruling passion strong in death. On his way to the city, the horse of his guard became fractious, while passing down a narrow path on the side of a mountain, with a frightful precipice yawning below; and Don Vincente riding up to his assistance, was himself unfortunately plunged with his horse over the fearful chasm, and both were instantly dashed to pieces.

THE STRATAGEM.

"I really don't know which I love best," said Jane Manvers to her friend Marian Westall, as she returned from a splendid party, where she was the "admirer of all admirers, William Stanton or Frederick English. Out of a host of admirers that my fortune, now that I am heiress, has brought to my feet, I have selected them. They are neither rich—both are filled with sentiment of honor, as fit as expressions and conduct go. Both love me. Neither have expressed it in strong terms, but either only wait for necessary encouragement, I am sure, to pop the question. To either my fortune would be an advantage. They may; it is an ungenerous thought, but I cannot entertain it; love my fortune not me. Marian, I have strong thoughts of putting their love to the test."

"How can you do it?"

"I have thought of a way. You may remember that I had a cousin who was supposed to be lost at sea, and the property which has made a poor unnoticed girl so much courted, was to be his, if he were living."

"Yes, but you have full and positive proofs of his decease."

"I know it, but the world does not, nor can my favorite lovers be acquainted with the fact. I therefore propose to state in the papers that my cousin is not dead as was supposed:—to give up for a time my splendid establishment and to retire in comparative poverty. It is said that kings and heiresses rarely hear truth from the flatterers by whom they are surrounded. This will at least test my friends: what think you of my plan?"

"Excellent—try it, by all means."

The idea was acted upon, and it was curious to see how Jane's admirers dropped off one by one. Her two lovers waited upon her at first in her retirement, and Jane was more puzzled than ever which to choose. Frederick English visits in a short time became more like angels,—that is few and far between; while Wm. Stanton's were constant.

Upon one of them he said, "My dear Miss Manvers, I have known you long. In the days of your prosperity; surrounded as you were by many lovers who were affluent, I did not dare to disclose to you a passion which has grown and strengthened with my acquaintance. Now that you are poor like myself, the difference that had else hermetically sealed my lips from divulging my heart's passion, is removed. I am not affluent, but I can support you with respectability at least, and if you will accept for your husband one who loves you devotedly, I do not think you will ever regret the hour that makes you mine. At least, I will try never to give you any cause."

"I believe you dear William," said Jane, "and if you will accept a beggar, for I am little better—"

"Say not so dearest, I cannot listen to such wrong, even from your lips."

"Your fortunes will not suffer by the union."

"That they never can. When shall our marriage take place?"

"Next week if you will."

"At your lodgings here?"

"No at the house of a friend. Call for me, and then we will proceed together there."

At the day appointed, William was in readiness, accompanied by Frederick English. They were both surprised at the magnificence of Jane's attire; and thought it somewhat out of character with her circumstances, but how much more were they surprised when they stepped into a carriage with Jane and Eliza, they were driven to Jane's former residence, and found her still the mistress and heiress, and learned the plot by which she had tested her lovers.

Girls you who possess money, make it a point of finding out, before the irrevocable knot is tied, whether you are loved for yourself or your fortune.

A SKIM MILKED CHEESE, WITH A VENGEANCE.

The Boston Post says that up at the west end of that city, there is a good-natured, fun-making negro, named "Parsis," who hovers round the grocery stores in that neighborhood rather more than is desirable.—Like many other gentlemen of color, he prides himself upon the thickness of his skull, and he is always up for a bet upon his butting powers; and well he may be, for his head is hard enough for a battering ram. The other day he made a bet in a store that he could butt in the head of a flour barrel, and he succeeded. He then took up a bet to drive it through a very large cheese, which was to be covered with a crash cloth, to keep his wool clear of cheese crumbs. The cheese, thus enveloped, was placed in a proper position, and Parsis, starting off like a locomotive, buried his head up to his ears in the inviting target. Parsis now began to feel himself irresistible, and talked up "purty considerable." A plan, however, was soon contrived to take the conceit out of him. There being some grindstones in the store for sale, one of them was privately taken up, and wrapped up in the same manner as the cheese had been, and looked precisely as if it were a second cheese, and Parsis readily took another bet for ninepence, that he would butt his head thro' it as easy as he sent it through the first. The interest of the spectators in the operation became intense.—Everything was carefully adjusted, and upon the word being given, Parsis darted off like an arrow at the ambushed grindstone—he struck it fair in the centre, and the next instant lay sprawling in the middle of the floor, upon which he recoiled. For some minutes he laid speechless, and then he raised himself slowly upon his knees, and scratching his head, said, with a squirming face—"Dam hard cheese, dat, massa. Dey skim de milk too much alongedder before dey make him; dat's a fac."

AN ANIMAL MAGNETISER OUTWITTED.—The Libéral du Nord states that M. Laurent, a magnetiser, was discomfited at Lille a few weeks since, by the discovery of his system of collusion with the young woman whom he pretended to put to sleep, and who then played a game at cards with her eyes bandaged with a piece of silk. A medical man present proposed that, instead of having her eyes bandaged, he should be allowed to apply his thumbs to the interior corners of her closed eyelids. This M. Laurent would not consent to, and on the audience insisting upon it, he awoke his magnetised female, and deramped with her. The medical man then explained the trick; he desired any person to come forward, and have his eyelids well rubbed with oil; this was done to a young man, and he immediately played the game of cards as well as if nothing was over his eyes—the oil had made the silk transparent!

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, June 19, 1841.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

The Committee, in behalf of the several Masonic bodies of this city, have chartered the steamboat Mount Pleasant, Capt. Brainard, in reference to the proposed celebration on the 24th June, at the city of Hudson.

The boat will leave the dock foot of Lydius street on Thursday morning the 24th, at seven A. M. precisely, and it is particularly desirable that brethren with their ladies, should be on board at that hour.

The price of tickets for going and returning, will be $1 to each brother, including one or more ladies.

Gentlemen not belonging to the fraternity, who may wish to participate in the excursion, can be supplied with tickets, on application to either of the Committee, at $1, which will include a gentleman, and one lady.

Suitable refreshments will be provided, on board, excluding all intoxicating drinks. At 2 o'clock, after the public exercises, a collation will be served up on board, for those ladies who may desire it.

A Band of Music will be in attendance.

Those ladies, of the affinity of mother, wife, sister or daughter, to any of the brethren, are requested to provide themselves with a piece of blue ribbon, $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch in width, suitable to tie on the left arm.

Each Brother is particularly requested to procure for himself a suitable regalia. Previous to the landing of the Boat at Hudson, the several Lodges will clothe and arrange themselves in form, in order to be placed under the direction of the Marshal at Hudson.

ARRANGEMENTS AT HUDSON.

An Address will be delivered by W. Br. JOSEPH P. PIRSSON, of New York, G. S. of the G. Lodge and Representative of the Grand Lodge of the State of Georgia, to the Grand Lodge of the State of New York.

The Masonic Brethren from New York will call at the Hudson House.

The Brethren from Albany, at Badgley's Mansion House.

The Brethren from Troy, and all those who may come in company with them down the river, at Hart's City Hotel.

The Brethren from Dutchess, Columbia and Rensselaer counties, also from Massachusetts and Connecticut, at Bartlett's National Hotel.

The Brethren from Green co. will meet at the Lodge Room.

Committees will be in attendance to receive the Brethren as they arrive.

A committee will also be in attendance to conduct visiting Ladies to the Church.

The procession will form at 10 o'clock, under the direction of Br. Col. CHARLES DARLING, as Chief Marshal. Assisted by Br. Wm. CALVIN DEWEY, and six Deputy Marshals.

Lodges, Chapters and Encampments, are requested to appear in their several appropriate bodies, as far as convenient, and will report on their arrival, in what capacity they appear, to the attending Marshal.

Dinner will be furnished for $1. The Committee of Arrangements deem it inexpedient to furnish any stimulating beverage on the approaching Festival, and advise that no wines or intoxicating liquors be drunk at the public table on that occasion.

Further particulars of the order of procession, will be given on the bills of the 24th inst.

TEMPERANCE, vs. INTEMPERANCE.—It cannot but prove a source of much gratification to the friends of the temperance reformation throughout the world, to perceive the growing disposition manifested on the part of the people (and more particularly the working classes,) to discuss, fairly and impartially, the subject of temperance, vitally important as it is, and involving as it necessarily does, some of the most paramount interests of the community. This desirable consummation has not been effected by any sudden revolution in public sentiment, but is the result of a thorough investigation of the subject, which, when conducted by intelligent persons, devoid of prejudice, and desirous of arriving at the truth, is most generally, we may say invariably, productive of a firm conviction of the injurious effects of an indulgence in alcoholic stimulants, and the benefits obviously to be derived from an abstinence therefrom.

It is not our present design to deliver a temperance lecture, but simply, to make a few remarks relative to the subject, expressive of our gratification that the matter is at length beginning to receive some portion of that consideration on the part of the public, to which its obvious importance unquestionably entitles it. The whole country appears to have aroused to a consciousness of the melancholy effects of intemperance, and many who were formerly addicted to this debasing habit, have abandoned it entirely, and, by the accounts they have given of the subsequent improvement in their health and fortunes, have incited others to emulate their laudable example. Many, who have become entirely prostrated by a long indulgence in ardent spirits, are beginning to awaken to a sense of their degraded condition, and some have already reformed, and are worthy and respectable citizens. All this is indicative of the onward progress of the principles of temperance, which, when carried out to their fullest extent, are invariably productive of the happiest results.

Business in New-York—Theatricals—The Weather—Courts—Battery, etc.

Dear Sir,—Since I last corresponded with you, business has been very brisk. Merchants generally have purchased their Spring supplies, and the constant arrival and departure of ships from foreign countries, are bringing in an abundance of commodities of various kinds, and speculation is on tip-toe, its votaries eagerly embracing every opportunity to purchase goods as soon as they are landed.

Nothing of much interest is now transpiring at the Supreme Court of this city, excepting the case of the "Maleck Adel," now undergoing investigation. The vessel is supposed to be a piratical one. Although everything as yet appears enveloped in mystery, from the evidence adduced, concerning this suspicious vessel, still there is a determination on the part of the court to learn the facts of the case.

The Park Theatre was opened on Monday evening with Fanny Elssler. Long before the appointed hour for the door to open, hundreds were collected, eagerly seeking admittance. Fanny seemed to be quite an attraction, for the house was literally thronged; therefore I presume that the Elssler mania has not yet subsided, nor the silly admirers of the "divine danseuse" yet extinct.

The Bowery Theatre is doing a very respectable business. The legitimate drama continues triumphant, as the public are well assured that this is the only place in the city where it can be properly performed. On Tuesday evening, Shakespeare's tragedy of Hamlet was represented: Mr. Hamblin took the part of the 'philosophic prince,' and the house was crowded; the thunders of applause that greeted the performance as it proceeded, evinced on the part of the audience, a proper estimation of the distinguished abilities, of Mr. Hamblin, as a tragedian.

The 'Olympic,' under the management of that well known and popular Manager, Mitchell, has been closed for a brief season, to enable his efficient corps to take a short theatrical tour to Philadelphia, to fulfil an engagement at the Chestnut street Theatre—after which, he returns directly to New York, to resume operations again at his popular establishment.

The Battery is one of the most fashionable places in the city. Thousands nightly congregate here for the purpose of inhaling the balmy and nutritious breezes of the Hudson. Although, as yet, Castle Garden is not open for the season, still there is every reason to anticipate its opening some time ere the "dog days." Yours, &c., S. C. C.

Messrs. GALES & SEATON, have been elected Printers to the House of Representatives by a vote of 134 to 73—6 scattering.

HARD TO CATCH!

"Will you pay me my bill, sir?" said a tailor in Chartres street to a waggish fellow who had got into him about a feet.

"Do you owe anybody anything?" asked the wag.

"No sir," said the tailor.

"Then you can afford to wait." And he walked off.

A day or two afterward the tailor called again.—

"Are you in debt to anybody?" asked the wag.

"Yes sir" replied the tailor.

"Well: why the devil don't you pay?"

"Because I cannot get the money."

"That's just my case, sir! I am glad to see you can appreciate my condition—give us your hand."

GOING THE ENTIRE.—A fellow was recently met in great haste going towards a pill manufactory in one of our northern cities.

"Hallo, Jim which way so fast?"

"The fact is, I have taken two boxes of fashionable pills, directions, boxes, and all, without doing me any good. I'm going to swallow the agent now, to see what effect he will have."

No man ever regretted that he was virtuous and honest in his youth, and kept aloof from idle companions.

The old lady's Wheel.—"Ah! Jerry," said a good matron to her son, then an eminent Judge in a neighboring State, "ah, Jerry, you needn't despise the wheel, for I spun many a day to send you to college."

Intelligence.

Further Developments.—The negroes sentenced to be executed on the 9th of July, have made a number of disclosures which will appear in due time. Among the developments was a confession by Madison, of stealing a gentleman's trunk from the National Hotel last fall, containing $300 in money. The trunk was found at Leath's house. Peter Charleville her husband, was arrested and fully examined, but dismissed for the want of testimony. Leath made tracks either from the consciousness of guilt or from fear of consequences. Ennis, the chief witness against the negroes in the transaction of the night of 17th has left the city. St. Louis Republican.

Suicide.—On Thursday evening, a young lady named Wray, in the Northern Liberties, in a fit of insanity, brought on by sickness inflicted upon her neck a wound with a knife, from the effects of which she soon died after.

Mr. Oakey, who recently killed Mr. S. Wright in a duel at New Orleans, is a native of Albany, and a son of Mr. Abraham Oakey, formerly deputy Treasurer of the State.

The Presbytery of Niagara, N. York, have passed a formal resolution, declaring that Byron's works and Bulwer's novels "are books of an infidel and licentious character."

A young Swiss named Burdel was drowned at Spring Garden, Baltimore, on Saturday evening.

Castor oil is manufactured in large quantities in Illinois, and as a material for light, is preferred to sperm oil. A thousand barrels are said to be made annually in Randolph county alone.

Mr. Jotham Webster, was killed at Prospect, Maine on the 9th, by falling from the top of the mast of a vessel.

Thomas Park, Esq. M. P. for the county of Middlesex, has received the appointment from the government, of Surveyor General of the Province of Canada.

The lady of Lieut. Maguire was very dangerously injured at Washington on Thursday evening last, by being kicked in the breast by an unruly horse which her husband was driving.

A Mexican named Hosea Merida, was recently shot in the back near Austin, Texas, and almost instantly killed. The motive of the crime is unknown.

John Shultz, aged 64 years, died at Philadelphia on Sunday, from the effects of falling into the hold of the ship Chester.

A free colored man, named John Beddow, threw himself into the Potomac on Wednesday, and was drowned.

Another wife Murdered.—A man named Hughes murdered his wife on board a canal boat in the little basin at Albany on Sunday morning. They were from Little Falls, and had not lived together for a year. She was a servant on board the boat. He shot her with a pistol through the face. He was secured, and is in Albany jail. He is said to have been incited to the act by jealousy.

In a Fix.—An ex-officer in Philadelphia, named Dugan, a few days since attempted to arrest a man without process, at a house in Tenth street; Mr. Dugan, upon entering a room, was himself locked in and detained prisoner for several hours; in the mean time the person whom he came to arrest, jumped over a fence and went off.

Steam-Boat Explosion.—The Steamer Duncan M' Rae, on her passage from Hamburg to Savannah, on the 8th inst. was blown up by the bursting of her boiler, scalding three men—two of them negroes, fatally—and the captain. She sank in about seven feet of water. The boat is an entire loss.

Fatal Occurrence.—Yesterday while a street sweeper named James Walsh was sweeping at the corner of Cortlandt st. and Broadway, a Cab driven by a man named James F. Johnson, drove against Walsh, knocked him down, and killed him on the spot. A Coroner's inquest was held on the body and a verdict found that "James Walsh came to his death by being run over by a Cab, driven by J. F. Johnson, through carelessness, he being at the time under the influence of liquor." Johnson has been committed to prison.—Jour. of Com.

Geo. Eggleston, an Englishman aged 24 years, was accidentally drowned in a mill pond, at Byron, Gen. county, a day or two since.

Steam on the Canal.—We should not be surprised to hear within a week or two that the enterprising Proprietors of the splendid Packets between this city and Buffalo, were propelling their boats from Lockport to the latter place by steam tow boat. There are no bounds to the go ahead facilities of the Yankees.—Roch. Dem.

On the 30th ult. at his residence in the town of Livingston, Gen. SAMUEL TEN BROECK, in the 96th year of his age. He was one of the few surviving Patriots of the Revolution, who, having rendered his country much valuable service in her struggles against oppression from the commencement of that contest to its termination, lived many years afterwards to rejoice in her blessings, and by his counsels aid her legislative halls; and having, during a long life, completed his duties of philanthropy and benevolence, he now sleeps like the good man, admired when living, and in his departure, mourned by those who knew his distinguished virtues. The memory of this venerable citizen will linger long in the recollections of those who have been often entertained at his hospitable board, or relieved by his many untold charities.—Hudson Gazette.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED.

THIS Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers, and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 159 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families. Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes' walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams, &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old customers and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12 1/2 cents. June 19—1y A. W. STARKS.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.

Hudson Lodge No. 7, Hudson R. A. Chapter, No. 6, and Lafayette Encampment, No. 7, will celebrate the coming Anniversary of "ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST," on the 24th of June next. Masonic Brethren, generally, are respectfully invited to unite in the festivities of the day.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to be buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegant engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons on satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen with pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

ON A GRAVE-YARD.

How oft, at eve, when all was still,
And balmy fragrance fill'd the air,
I've wandered o'er yon grassy hill,
To gaze on nature's landscape fair;
And as I walk'd with ling'ring feet,
O'er sadder scenes my fancy sped,
When I approach'd this last retreat,
Where rest the quiet, slumbering dead.

A holy stillness reigns around—
The breezes play with gentler breath—
With lighter footsteps o'er each mound
I tread—for 'tis th' abode of death!
And over all, in saddest gloom,
The emblematic cypress waves,
Both where doth stand the sculptur'd tomb,
And where are humbler, lowlier graves!

Beneath this slab, of purest white,
Lies one, whose fair and lovely form,
That once with beauty beam'd so bright,
Now feeds the foul and cankering worm;
In early youth's bright, laughing hour,
Remorseless death came quickly by—
So sinks the sweet and fragrant flower,
That blooms awhile to fade and die.

Alas! how sad to gaze on all
That once rejoiced in beauty's bloom,
When death throws o'er his sable pall,
And brings the darkness of the tomb!
How soon earth's glories pass away—
How brief our hours of pleasure seem;
How soon our brightest hopes decay,
And vanish, like some fleeting dream!

ADIEU TO THE NORTH.

Adieu to the scenes of my childhood!—Adieu,
Ye bright rippling waters and mountains of blue;
Yon dark waving woodland no more shall I see,
Where in boyhood I wandered so joyous and free.

Away in the land of the stranger I roam,
Afar from my kindred and once happy home;
Yet in fancy I'll visit my own native shore,
And sigh for the land I shall visit no more.

Though the vales of the South may be sunny and green,
And a pure azure sky deck the picturesque scene,
Yet warm from my bosom the sigh will break forth,
When I think of my own native hills of the North!

How often transported by fancy's bright wing,
I shall seem to recline by the cool crystal spring,
And watch its bright waters the white pebbles lave,
While o'er it the elm-branches gracefully wave!

But, when o'er the billows the sunbeams retire,
Proudly capping the surges with summits of fire,
I may roam like a wreck that the wave has cast forth,
Afar from my own native hills of the North!

Duanesburgh, April, 1841.

SHE WAS NEVER HEARD OF MORE.

LINES ON THE LOSS OF THE PRESIDENT.

Her mighty sails the breezes swell,
And fast she leaves the less'ning land;
And from the shore the last farewell
Is waved by many a snowy hand;
And weeping eyes are on the main,
Until its verge she wanders o'er—
But from the hour of parting pain,
That ship was never heard of more!

In her was many a mother's joy,
And love of many a weeping fair,
To her was wasted in its sigh,
The lonely heart's unceasing prayer.

And oh! the thousand hopes untold,
Of ardent youth, the vessel bore;
Say, were they quenched in waters cold?
For she was never heard of more.

When on her wide and trackless path
Of desolation doomed to flee,
Say, sank she 'midst the burning wrath
Of racking winds and rolling sea?
Or where the land but mocks the eye
When drifting on a fatal shore?
Vain guesses all—her destiny
Is dark—she ne'er was heard of more.

The moon has three times changed her form,
From glowing orb to crescent wan,
'Midst skies of calm and clouds of storm,
Since from her port that ship has gone:
But Neptune keeps his secrets well,
And though we know that all is o'er,
No eye hath seen—no tongue can tell
How sank that wreck for evermore!

TO THY ANCESTRAL OAKS.

BY THOMAS H. LANE.

I love those noble oaks which proudly stand,
And with stern hardihood e'en time defy,
Their firm roots strengthened by th' Almighty's hand,
Their sinewy arms outstretch toward the sky,
Or with the whirlwinds dance in mockery.

There's grandeur in their dense and tow'ring forms,
And music, too, wild as from petrel throats,
When sweeps the north wind harbinging of storms—
But as the breeze of twilight gently floats,
It murmurs thro' their boughs, soft as Æolian notes.

They are the green earth's bulwarks, and do fling
Back to the sultry skies th' imperious rays,
That else would sear each young and fragile thing
That 'neath their shade in sweet luxuriance plays,
Unknowing of the heat that's in the day-god's gaze.

They seem the giant guardians of thy home,
Which once I sought as my young feelings' shrine,
Tho' now, alas, I may not hope to come
To mingle with thy breathings sighs of mine,
Or to my soul's wild beating press that heart of thine.

YOUTH AND SUMMER.

BY MARY HOWITT.

Summer's full of golden things!
Youth it weareth angels' wings!
Youth and love go forth together,
In the green-leaved summer weather,
Filled with gladness!

Summer, rich in joy it is,
Like a poet's dream of bliss;
Like unto some heavenly clime,
For the earth in summer time
Doth not wear the shade of sadness!

Radiant youth, thou art ever new—
Thine's the light, the rose's hue;
Flowers' perfume, and winds that stir,
Like a stringed dulcimer,
All the forest!

Joyous youth, thou art fresh and fair,
Wild as wildest bird of air;
Thou, amidst thy ringing laughter,
Look'st not forward, look'st not after,
Knowing well that joy is surest.

Brighter than the brightest flowers,
Dancing down the golden hours;
Thus it is in every land,
Youth and love go hand in hand,
Linked for ever!

Youth, thou never dost decay!
Summer, thou dost not grow gray!
We may sleep with death and time,
But sweet youth and summer's prime
From the green earth shall not sever!

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1.—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The Line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in point of speed by any boats in any country, nor equalled in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptedness to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.
For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock.

EXTRACTS

FROM THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK, JUNE 2D, A. L. 5841.

The Grand Annual Communication of the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of the Ancient and Honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons, of the State of New-York, was held at the Grand Lodge Room, in the city of New-York, on Wednesday Evening the 2d of June, A. L. 5841, and opened in due form, and with solemn prayer.

Present, the Grand Officers, Representatives of the Grand Lodges of Ireland, District of Columbia, and New-Jersey, and the Representatives and Past Masters of 40 Lodges.

The minutes of the Grand Lodge at the Quarterly meeting on the 3d of March, 5841, were read and approved.

The minutes of the Grand Stewards Lodge, held on the 26th of May, were read and confirmed.

The D. G. Master announced the recent decease of our worthy Brother H. H. Brown, one of the Grand Stewards of this Grand Lodge; whereupon it was Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to address a letter of condolence to the Widow, and that the Grand Lodge be put in mourning during the present session.

The Grand Secretary then read his Annual Report, which was accepted, and from which we extract;

That at the time of the last Annual Communication there were some debts standing against the G. Lodge, which originated at a period when the invested funds were unproductive, by the non-payment of Bank Dividends, and when the pressure on the Charity committee was unusually heavy. This debt on the first of June last, was estimated at about $600, and would have been entirely extinguished in the course of the year, but for the failure of three dividends from the Greenwich Bank; notwithstanding which, the outstanding debt at the present time, is comparatively small, and will probably be met by the G. Treasurer in the course of the present quarter.

The receipts from all sources from the 27th of May, 1840, to the 26th of May, 1841, amounted to $1839 77.

For Returns and Dues,	$1132 15
" Dividends,	473 37
" Dispensations,	90 00
" Certificates,	80 00
" Warrant to Mixville Lodge,	32 00
" Dispensation to Wash'n Lodge, Alb.	32 00
" Constitutions,	25

Paid to the Right W. Grand Treasurer, $1839 77

The warrants of the following Lodges have been revived since the last Annual Communication, and will require their proper numbers:

Western Light Lodge, in Broome Co.	June 1840.
Cameron "	Steuben " Aug. 1840.
Montgomery "	Saratoga " Oct. 1840.
Hamilton "	Mont. " Oct. 1840.
Alexandria "	Jefferson "

A Warrant was issued on the 5th of June last, for a Lodge at Mixville, in the county of Allegheny, by the title of Mixville Lodge, of which Hiram Couch was appointed the first Master, Elijah Patridge S. W. and Philip Dill J. W. The Lodge was constituted with ten members, on the 7th of October.

On the 6th of February last, a Dispensation was issued for a lodge to be held at Albany, under the title of Washington Lodge, of which W. George S. Gibbons was appointed Master, John Owens S. W. and Thomas Stewart J. W. This lodge was organized with 15 members, on the 15th February. The Dispensation has been returned with their records and by-laws, and the brethren ask for a Warrant.

On the 2d of April, a Warrant was issued to Julius Edwards Loth, as Master, Augustus F. Boden S. W. Frederick Wallis J. W. and five other Master Masons to hold a Lodge in the city of New-York, under the title of Pythagoras Lodge. The business of this Lodge is to be conducted in the German Language, but a copy of the minutes is to be kept in the English also. This Lodge has not yet been constituted.

In meeting the Grand Lodge at this annual communication, with a report of an increased and increasing revenue, an increase of eight lodges in the course of the year, and but few delinquents, I trust that my brethren will rejoice with me in the signal triumph which our Institution has achieved over all its external foes. Local difficulties do indeed still embarrass and retard particular Lodges, but taken a broad view of the Order in this State, we have abundant cause to congratulate each other, and to thank God for our preservation, protection, and prosperity.

The Committee on Foreign Correspondence appointed at the last annual communication, have prepared a full report on our relations with the various branches of the Fraternity in correspondence with us, but one subject I beg leave to lay before the G. Lodge as it did not come before that committee in the correspondence of the year.

On the 2d Tuesday, of September next, two very important Masonic bodies have appointed to meet in this city, they are the General Grand Encampment and the General Grand Chapter of the United States. These bodies meet triennially in the principal cities of the Union. It has been the custom of the Fraternity in other cities to entertain the distinguished Masons who compose those bodies, as guests; and in accordance with that custom which has always been attended with happy effects, it is the desire of a large portion of our brethren that the Grand Lodge should appoint a committee to unite with one already appointed by the Grand Chapter of this State, in giving a fraternal and hospitable reception to the Visiting Brethren on that occasion.

It was announced that the W. Joseph P. Pirsson, who had been appointed Representative of the Grand Lodge of Georgia, was waiting for reception, whereupon, the Grand Secretary introduced the W. Brother Pirsson, of the Grand Lodge of Georgia. His commission from the Grand Master of Georgia, was read. The Rt. W. William Willis, Deputy Grand Master, then received and welcomed the Representative of the Grand Lodge of Georgia, in the following address:

Worshipful Brother Pirsson,—

The Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Georgia has ever been one of the firmest and most faithful friends of this Grand Lodge. In the government of the Craft within its jurisdiction, its course has been marked under various and sometimes trying circumstances, by firmness, prudence, wisdom and dignity, which has secured our respect and reverence. With this high regard for the Most Worshipful Body whose Representative you have been appointed, "near the Rt. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New-York," it affords me very great satisfaction to recognize you, and to receive and welcome you in your official capacity. Your zeal for the Masonic Institution, and all your talent and industry will have a new, and wide, and an honorable field for their exercise. As a Mason you could enjoy but few higher honors than is conferred upon you by this commission, which constitutes you, "Representative of the interests, rights, and dignity of the Grand Lodge of Georgia," and by which you "are charged and required to hold official and social Masonic intercourse" with us, in relation to matters pertaining to the benefit of the Craft, and the extension and diffusion of the benign principles of our glorious order, and to report to the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Georgia." The alliance between these Independent Masonic Governments, is now strengthened, and it in a great measure rests with you so to carry out the design of your constituents, that the importance and utility of the Representative system may be made manifest beyond question. While therefore this Grand Lodge is exerting its energies for the diffusion of Light and Truth, for the maintenance of order, and the conservation of the ancient Landmarks, I trust that you, Worshipful Brother, will prove a faithful guardian of the rights and interests entrusted to your care.

Worshipful Brother, you will please communicate to the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Georgia, the assurances of our high respect and esteem, and please accept for yourself the congratulations, and best wishes of the Fraternity, for your future welfare and happiness.

To which the Representative of the Grand Lodge of Georgia replied as follows:

Right Worshipful Sir,—

The Grand Lodge of Georgia, impressed with a sense of the importance of a perfect concert of action among the whole Fraternity, have very readily adopted the Representative system which emanated from this body, and which if carried out, will afford to every Masonic community throughout the world, facilities of information which they have never heretofore possessed. The Grand Secretaries of the different bodies their official organs, could not possibly enter into a minute correspondence with so extended a Fraternity as ours, and hence beyond the ordinary business transactions, of each body, the Brethren have been totally ignorant of the local affairs of each other.

Every Government in Christendom has its Representative, who maintains its rights and dignity abroad. At the time of our recent troubles when a large body of masons rebelled, and brought upon themselves the ban of excommunication, had this system prevailed, it is not all likely that in a neighboring State, an individual Lodge would have had the hardihood to take part with those refractory brethren, and admit them into Masonic communion; neither would two Past Grand Masters of that State have enacted the farce of erecting a Grand Lodge out of such fallen spirits—Well meaning Brethren from utter ignorance of the true position of our local matters, are at this moment associating with expelled masons, who, under the mantle of a charter surreptitiously obtained, are received as good men and true, for want of a proper understanding of the case. The high minded and chivalric State, whose Grand Lodge I have the honor to represent, is keenly alive to the honor and dignity of the craft, and having the most perfect confidence in the integrity and honor of this Grand body, will never raise the question, "why such and such things have been done," or to assume the right to sit in judgment on its acts, but content itself with a knowledge of the fact that it is done, to concur in its justice.

It affords me great pleasure to be the chosen instrument of communication between the two Grand bodies, and I trust that I shall not be wanting in diligence and fidelity, whatever I may lack in talents, in the performance of the high and honorable functions assigned me, and as a member and officer also of this Grand body, my duties and responsibilities are so interwoven as to insure, and I trust perpetuate the most friendly relations between the two governments.

As our Institution has no geographical limits, and knows neither sect, country or tongue, but embraces every creed and nation, and language; how beautifully would its sublime principles be carried out by a universal system of Representation, recognizing each Grand Body as a Masonic Government, (as it in reality is,) and each those Governments having an ambassador at the other. By this means a uniformity of work would be established, and the grand landmarks of our order would not be invaded as they too often are for the want of this Masonic intercourse, which embraces travelling Brethren, and sometimes bars the door of the Temple to their entrance. It would also be a certain shield against imposture, to which we are now perpetually exposed; for how many of the negligent and unfaithful of the Craft partake of our bounties and honors who would be noted and known, if the community they hailed from was represented in the ones whose hospitalities they sought.

This correspondence between the immediate Representative of the respective governments residents at each, would identify every refugee from the pale of Masonic justice, and hand him over to the jurisdiction he fled to, as an outlaw from our order.—The wandering mendicants who prey upon our vitals, shewing diplomas from the most respectable communities, and claiming passports to others, with alms to bear them from place to place, would be detected in their frauds, while the deserving would be more gratefully received and more usually benefited.

This system I understand has long prevailed in many of the Governments of Europe, and two of them have interchanged representatives with us; and I doubt not, that when the proceedings of this communication shall be transmitted to the others, they will do the same. With the banners of our respective governments floating over our heads when in grand convocation, and in full paraphernalia of our stations, an imposing spectacle will be exhibited, which will silently work its way to the heart, and banish that bickering and contentions spirit which is sometimes too freely indulged in, by those who allow the head to usurp the place of the heart. It will tell the Craft, that we are a body of men dispersed over the universe, whose bond of union is that mystic tie,

"Which none but craftsmen ever knew."

and that among Masons no contention or emulation should ever exist, but that noble contention and emulation of "who can best work, and best agree."

Being "charged and required to hold official intercourse with the worthy brethren of this Grand Lodge in relation to matters pertaining to the benefit of the Craft, and the extension and diffusion of the beaigen principles of our glorious Order, and to report thereon to the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Georgia," and "to represent the interests, rights, and dignity of said Grand Lodge of Georgia, near this Right W. Grand Lodge," and so to represent them "in the several communications of this Grand Lodge." I shall never absent myself from any of your communications, unless compelled to do so by sickness or some other unavoidable emergency, and while paying the homage due to your august body, shall claim the same for mine.

Bound as I am to respect the constitution and ordinances of this G. Lodge, and its officers supreme and subordinate, (among the latter of whom I myself rank,) I have an additional obligation imposed upon me, which points to duties of a delicate character, and requires the exercise of unceasing vigilance, self-scrutiny, and a courteous and bland demeanor. It adds to my weight of character, and calls on me so to conduct myself, that the honor, glory, and reputation of my constituents may remain unscathed in the person of their Representative, and the Craft at large convinced of the good effects of this system.

I shall not be slow in communicating to my government, "the assurances of high respect and esteem" you have expressed for it and also the courteous and dignified reception you have given to its Representative. Permit me Rt. Worshipful Sir, in the name of Georgia, to tender you the right hand of Fellowship, and to invoke for yourself individually, and for the august body of which you are the chief, the choicest gifts of Heaven, and a long career of prosperity and peace."

The committee on Foreign Correspondence, appointed at the last annual communication, made their Report, from which we extract.

They state, that from the extensive view which they have thus been enabled to take of the state of the Masonic Institution, in the past year, they may congratulate the Fraternity on its advancement in peace and prosperity. Although in some sections of the United States, there appears to be less zeal and activity than heretofore they have known to exist in the same quarters; yet there is a steady, firm and dignified maintenance of principles, discipline, and harmonious action every where apparent.

In the Western, and South Western States, and Texas, the order is rapidly increasing, and from the decision and energy of the Grand Lodges, and the vigilance and indefatigable attention and talent manifested by the Grand Officers in those sections of our continent, we have reason to believe the Order will not be permitted to lose character by the increase of numbers.

It will be remembered, that last year a proposition was received from the G. Lodge of Alabama, for the appointment of a delegate by this Grand Lodge, to attend a convention at Washington, in March next for the purpose of determining on a uniform mode of work throughout the U. States, and to make other lawful regulations, for the interest and security of the Craft.

We observe that some of the Grand Lodges have acted on the proposition, but that others have not done so.

The Grand Lodges of Florida, Georgia, Maryland, Indiana, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, have resolved to appoint Delegates. The Grand Lodge of Ohio, has laid the subject over till October; and the Grand Lodges of Kentucky and Tennessee have declined; the Grand Secretary of Alabama, in a letter of 24th of March last, writes, that he has no doubt a majority of the Grand Lodge will assent.

The Grand Lodge of Texas, has removed its seat from Houston to the city of Austin, and has fifteen Lodges within its jurisdiction.

In relation to the propriety of recognizing Masons initiated in Lodges practising the French and Scottish rites, a subject reported by a Committee of this Grand Lodge, in 1838; to be of the highest importance to the whole Masonic Fraternity, and which was submitted to the Grand Lodges of this Union, for their consideration, we regret to state that few of the G. Lodges have as yet informed of their views.

In addition to what has heretofore been reported, we find the following in a letter from the late D. G. M. of Massachusetts.

"With regard to the proposition made by you some time since, that relating to the fellowship with brethren of the Scottish rite, was acted upon by this Grand Lodge, and a copy of the report was, I think directed to be transmitted to the Grand Lodge of N. Y. Its tenor as far as I now recollect was this, 'that the G. Lodge of Massachusetts always recognized the authority of Foreign Grand Lodges in regular standing, and had made no distinction on account of any peculiarity in their rites.'"

The Most Worshipful Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, writes, "There is hardly any difference between the York, Scotch and French rites in the three first Degrees, and this was one of the reasons for which the Scotch and French Lodges in New Orleans, put themselves under the jurisdiction of our Grand Lodge, who alone has the power of constituting Lodges of those rites in Louisiana."

The Grand Lodge of Kentucky expresses itself in favor of the communion.

A letter from the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, which we shall presently give at length, alludes to the same subject liberally. Thus it appears the question has presented itself simultaneously in both Hemispheres. The Committee cannot but indulge the hope that so important a question, will meet with the attention it deserves.

The G. Lodge of Missouri, expresses its decided disapprobation and censure of the "practice of performing any work whatever, (except what directly relates to the conferring the Degrees of Entered Apprentice and Fellow Craft,) in any other than a Lodge of Master-Masons."

The Grand Lodge of Mississippi and Tennessee, coincide in that opinion. The practice thus complained of, has very recently been introduced in this State, but your Committee have long disapproved of it, and recommend its discontinuance.

Your Committee observe that it is a general rule in nearly all the Grand Lodges in correspondence with us, to examine the By-Laws of Lodges, and to approve the same before their adoption. This is a wholesome practice, and we recommend that measures be taken to collect copies of the by-laws of all the lodges in this State, for examination by a special committee, on or before the next annual communication, and that hereafter all new Lodges be required to submit their by-laws to the Grand Lodge for approval before they are made obligatory on their members.

We observed with great pleasure that many of the G. Lodges at their last annual meetings, were presented with reports from their Grand Masters, or G. Secretaries, showing the state of the Institution within the jurisdiction during the year. The G. Lodge of Ohio, has made this duty obligatory hereafter on their Grand Master; and the Grand Lodges of Indiana requested their Grand Master to address a circular letter to the subordinate Lodges, on the subject of Masonry in general, and urging on them, First, a more rigid scrutiny into the character of applicants for the privileges of Masonry; Second, a more strict conformity to the Constitution and by-laws of the G. Lodge and subordinate Lodges; Third, more particular and supervisory control over the moral character and conduct of their members; and the Grand Lodge of Mississippi appropriated one Thousand Dollars a year for a Grand Lecturer.

From the effects which are already apparent in those States where the Fraternity, and especially the Grand Officers are most alive in their duties, it is evident that there the Institution flourishes with most vigor and beauty. Your Committee adopt the following language from the report of a Committee of the G. Lodge of Mississippi, and hope it will be confirmed by this G. Lodge, viz.

"Your Committee further represent, that, as many of the subordinate Lodges are in the practice of initiating two or more candidates in the first degree of Masonry, at one and the same time, which in the opinion of your Committee, is contrary to all ancient usage, they therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this Grand Lodge requires, and strictly enjoins upon the subordinate Lodges, within its jurisdiction, from and after the passage of this resolution, that they do not under any pretext whatever, be the emergency of the case ever so great, confer the First Degree on more than one candidate (in the working part,) at a time."

ARCANA OF SCIENCE.

PRESERVING MEAT.

A French gentleman in Paris, who some time ago made known his discovery of a plan of preserving dead bodies from putrefaction by injecting chemical solutions into the veins, and thence through the whole mass, lately read a paper to the Academy of Sciences on preserving meat by similar processes. It is thus alluded to in the Literary Gazette of April 3:—"He remarked that, under the name of gelatine, three distinct substances were commonly confounded—geline, gelee (jelly), and gelatine properly so termed. The second of these substances was deduced from the first by means of water and heat; and the third, better known as glue, from the first by air and heat. He had found that the only two substances in animal bodies liable to putrefaction were the geline and the albumine; and it was to prevent the action of the putrefying process on these substances, that his experiments had been directed. The common method of salting meat was not only slow and expensive, but did not always effect its object, and much altered the nutritive powers of the meat. The method of preserving meat by exhausting the air from it, and keeping it in hermetically closed vessels, was good in theory, but by no means easy of practice. He had discovered that the injection of an aluminous solution caused the preservation of the animal substance without altering its nutritive qualities. Neither the sulphate of aluminae nor the acetate admitted of ready application, independently of their communicating an unpleasant taste, and he had therefore adopted the chlorine of alumine in a very pure state, such as at 10 degrees of Baumé's areometer. With two pounds of this chemical salt, and six quarts of distilled water, a liquid fit for all purposes of this kind would be obtained, and it required only three pounds' weight of this liquid to inject a whole ox. The method was this: The carotid artery and jugular vein were opened simultaneously, so as to allow as much blood as possible to escape; a syphon was then introduced, downwards, into the carotid artery; the jugular vein was closed by a ligature, and the injection was made. When the animal was perceived to be sufficiently injected, the syphon was withdrawn, and the artery tied up; after twenty minutes the body might be skinned and cut up according to the usual methods, only the bones and the fat might be left along with the flesh, being equally preserved from decomposition by the injection. The only part of the animal spoiled by the injection was the lungs.—The flesh might then be hung up in the open air, if flies were carefully prevented from depositing their eggs in it, and the meat would keep in this way a long time perfectly fresh and good. If the meat were to be kept for a very long period, it would be necessary to wash it with a solution of chlorure of sodium at 10 degrees, and chlorure of alumine; and the meat should then be hung up in a current of hot air in a chimney-corner. When dried, the meat, thus prepared should be put in casks hermetically closed. Such meat, before being cooked, should be soaked in water for twenty-four hours. If, however, the meat was to be kept fresh (not dried,) it should be piled up in casks, and a saturated solution of chlorure of sodium, or of common salt, should be poured over it to prevent it from getting mouldy. All such meat should be boiled only half the time that newly killed meat required. He had fed some dogs for three months on meat so prepared, and had found it perfectly nutritious. Many improvements and modifications would he had no doubt, be introduced into his method when it came to be applied on a large scale, but he was sanguine as to its general results; and he produced specimens of meat preserved fresh in this manner for two or three years. A commission was named to report on this process."

Miscellany.

A PUBLISHER'S PRIZE.

In a late edition of Fielding's Novels, we find the following passage respecting the author's sale of Tom Jones to the original publisher:

"Fielding having finished the manuscript of Tom Jones, and being at the time hard pressed for money, went with it to one of your second-rate booksellers, with a view of selling it for what it would fetch, at the moment. He left it with this trader in the children of other men's brains, and called upon him the succeeding morning, full of anxiety both to know at how high a rate his labors were appreciated, as well as how far he might calculate upon its producing him wherewithal to discharge a debt of some twenty pounds, which he had promised the next day. He had reason to imagine, from the judgment of some literary friends to whom he had shown his manuscript, that it should at least produce twice that sum. But alas! when the book seller, with a significant shrug, showed a hesitation as to publishing the work at all, even the moderate expectations with which our Cervantes had buoyed up his hopes, seemed at once to close upon him at this unexpected and distressing intimation.

"And will you give me no means of hopes?" said he in a tone of despair.

"Very faint ones, indeed sir," replied the bookseller; "for I have scarcely any that the book will move."

"Well, sir," answered Fielding, "money I must have for it; and, little as that may be, pray give me some idea of what you can afford to give for it."

"Well, sir," returned our bookseller, again shrugging up his shoulders. "I have read some part of your 'Jones,' and in justice to myself, must even think again before I name a price for it. The book will not move; it is not for the public; nor do I think that any inducement can make me offer you more than twenty five pounds for it."

"And that you will give for it?" said Fielding, quickly.

"Really, I must think again, and will endeavor to make up my mind by to-morrow."

"Well, sir," replied Fielding. "I will look in again to-morrow morning. The book is yours for the twenty-five pounds; but these must positively be laid out for me when I call. I am pressed for the money, and, if you decline, must go elsewhere with my manuscript."

"I will see what I can do," replied the bookseller.

Our author, returning homeward from this unpromising visit he met his friend Thomson, the poet, and told him how the negotiation for the manuscript he had formerly shown him stood. The poet, sensible of the extraordinary merit of his friend's production, reproached Fielding with his headstrong bargain, conjured him, if he could do it honorably, to cancel it, and promised him, in that event, to find him a purchaser whose purse would do more credit to his judgment. Fielding, therefore, posted away to his appointment next morning, with as much apprehension lest the bookseller should stick to his bargain as he had felt the day before lest he should altogether decline it. To his great joy, the ignorant trafficker in literature, either from inability to advance the money, or a want of common discrimination, returned the manuscript very safely into Fielding's hands. Our author set off, with a gay heart, to his friend Thomson, and went in company with him to Mr. Andrew Miller, a popular bookseller of that day. Mr. Miller was in the habit of publishing no work of light reading but on his wife's approbation; the work was, therefore, left with him, and some days after, she, having perused it, bade him by no means let it slip through his fingers. Miller, accordingly, invited the two friends to meet him at a coffee-house in the Strand, where, having disposed of a good dinner and two bottles of port, Thomson at last suggested, "It would be as well if they proceed to business." Fielding still with no little trepidation, arising from his recent rebuff in another quarter, asked Miller what he had concluded upon giving for his work. "I am a man," said Miller, "of few words, and fond of coming to the point; but really, after giving every consideration I am able to your novel, I do not think I can afford to give you more than two hundred pounds for it." "What!" exclaimed Fielding; "two hundred pounds!" "Indeed, Mr. Fielding," returned Miller; "indeed, I am sensible of your talent, but my mind is made up." "Two hundred pounds!" continued Fielding, in a tone of perfect astonishment; "two hundred pounds, did you say?" "Upon my word, sir, I mean no disparagement to the writer or his great merit, but my mind is made up, and I cannot give more." Allow me to ask you," continued Fielding, "to ask you—whether—you—are—serious!" "Never more so," replied Miller, in all my life; and I hope you will candidly acquit me of every intention to injure your feelings or depreciate your abilities, when I repeat that I positively cannot afford you more than two hundred pounds for your novel." "Then my good sir," said Fielding recovering himself from this unexpected stroke of good fortune, "give me your hand; the book is yours. And waiter," continued he, "bring a couple of bottles of your best port."

Before Miller died he had cleared eighteen thousand pounds by Tom Jones, out of which he had the generosity to make Fielding presents, at different times, of various sums, till they amounted to two thousand pounds; and he closed his life by bequeathing a handsome legacy to each of Mr. Fielding's sons.

The publication of such a statement as this, admitting it to be true, which we greatly doubt, is in some measure calculated to raise an impression, that authors who sell manuscripts are an unfortunate and ill-used class of mortals, while the publishers are the only and real gainers. To obviate the chance of any such impression, it should be explained that this case of Tom Jones was a mere happy hit on the part of Mr. Miller; and for every such successful speculation, we will venture to say that he did not realize a penny.—

The business of publishing is exceedingly precarious, and few are lucky enough to make money by it. We could mention the names of dozens of works for which authors were paid, that proved a dead loss to those who speculated upon them. These are the blanks, however, of which nothing is heard; society only hears of the prizes.

THE CROPS.—The Baltimore American says that two gentlemen of long experience in grain growing, and who have just returned from making the tour of the western counties of Virginia, and of Frederick and Washington counties in Maryland, represent the present prospects for a full yield of wheat, as very cheering. The same paper also states that a much larger quantity of wheat was sown last fall than usual, the farmers having to a considerable extent substituted it for rye.

A Skaneateles paper says, "the weather is fine, and the crops full of promise."

The Portsmouth N. H. Gazette says the crops of corn, grain and grass, never looked better.

The Harrisburg Pa. Reporter says—the wheat and rye crops are comparatively light: hay, corn, oats and potatoes, promise an abundant yield.

The Buffalo and Rochester papers refer to copious showers in that section of the state, and express hopes of a tolerably plentiful harvest.—Argus

A splendid wedding "came off" at Montreal a few days since. The happy couple were a Mr. Desbarats and a Miss Selby. The ceremonies were conducted in the Roman Catholic form, and are said to have been witnessed by not less than five thousand persons.—The bride was attended by twelve filles d'honneur, and the bridesmaid by an equal number of garçons d'honneur. The beautiful and accomplished bride was attired in a magnificent dress of white flowered satin.—Her filles d'honneur were also dressed in white, with a wreath of a white roses around their heads, and ample lace veils reaching to their heels.

The Ghost at Lockport turns out to be the landlord of the Half-way House. The groans, instead of coming from the bed of the creek, came from the bottom of his lungs. The trick was played off by him upon the credulity of persons for his own benefit.

Death from Fright.—Mr. Immerdoffer the druggist in Race-st. cor. of Sterling Alley, Philadelphia, who, from fright, caused by the thunder storm on Tuesday afternoon, was seized with a fit of nervous apoplexy, died at 12 o'clock the same night. He was a kind, humane and charitable man, and was much respected by his friends and neighbors.

Danger of Deception.—Samuel McMillan, of Lancaster, Pa. a young man about fifteen years old, was drowned on the 21st ult., while bathing. It is said that he was in the habit of pretending to be on the point of drowning, while swimming, and afterwards laughing at those who came to his assistance. Several persons were on the bank, and witnessed his death struggles, but supposed they were feigned, and used no effort to rescue him. The wite saying that "a liar will not be believed though he speak the truth," seems to have been fully verified in this instance.

Who can beat this?—Mr. Charles Burchard, has a cow of the common breed which will average for weeks in succession, 64 pounds of milk per day, without extra feeding or any other advantages above a good pasture. She has produced 67 pounds a day.—Who can beat this? We pause for a reply.—Hamilton Palladium.

A meeting of members of the Church of England was held in London, on the 7th April, for the purpose of establishing and perpetuating a fund for the promotion of religion in the British Colonies when the subscriptions exceeded thirty thousand pounds sterling. Among the subscribers are the Queen Dowager £2000, the Archbishop of Canterbury £1000, Bishop of London £1000, Archbishop of Armagh £500, and many others ranging from the latter sum to £10. One mercantile house in Liverpool, Messrs. John Gladstone & Sons, subscribed £1000.

THE WARNING.

During the early part of summer, a mortal fever had been raging in the populous village of Overburn, from which the scene of our little story was not distant more than a mile. Of those who were attacked, some had recovered, but by far the greater part had died; and, as is common enough in all cases of the kind, a degree of alarm and consternation prevailed for several miles round. Among those in the town, as it was called, who had gone to their long homes—their last silent resting-place in the churchyard—many were connected one way or other in the country; and thus minute and detailed accounts of almost every death were circulated among the families of cottagers, farm-servants, and rural labourers, to a considerable distance. The fever, and those victims who day after day fell before it, formed the prevailing topics of conversation, till people had talked themselves into a degree of imaginary terror, and worked their minds into that state of excitement which made them willing to listen to the most incredible and marvellous accounts, while they were, at the same time, willing to trace to the most extraordinary origin the very simplest occurrences.

History as well as observation has established the fact, that there is in the mind of man, when left untutored, or even in a partially enlightened state, a strong predisposition to believe in supernatural agency; and, in the present instance, this principle soon began to manifest itself. The excited imaginations of the poor people whose relatives were bidding adieu to this world converted every noise which they heard—even a bat flapping its wing against the window, or the night wind sighing among the chimney-tops—into a warning of the solemn event about to take place, communicated by some invisible power. Their minds brooded over these mysterious indications of death, which in most instances were fatally verified. They became the subject of conversation in the sick-room, depressing the spirits of the patient, and thus hurrying him on to his doom, if they did not of themselves produce the very event of which they were believed to be only portents; they formed the theme of superstitious wonder and melancholy speculation among the friends of the deceased, after death had apparently sealed their truth; and from thence they travelled to their acquaintances in the country, with all their details exaggerated and exhibited through a magnifying and not unfrequently a false medium.

It was the very pride of the year, being the month of July, and hay-making had commenced. Scarce a breath of wind was felt—the sun shone with unclouded splendour—the blooming clover, from which the bee was busy extracting its “nectar store,” sent forth the richest perfume, and the calm and sultry air seemed alive with the song of birds and the ceaseless hum of insects. As already said, the hay-makers had gone forth to their task in the field—the men with off-repeated sweep of the keen-edged scythe to sever the crop from the ground, and a troop of sun-burnt girls, and other individuals of the softer sex, to tie it up in sheaves and prepare it for being carried to the farm.—Such a season and such a combination of the sexes, notwithstanding the oppressive heat, and the severity of the labour which calls them abroad, has been characterised by mirth and rural enjoyment from time immemorial. Ancient poets have sung of hay-making; the benevolent heart still warms over their descriptions of rustic happiness during this joyous season; and, sooth to say, there is not wanting realities which will correspond to their glowing pictures. But, on the present occasion, there was an air of sadness mingled with the mirth of the hay-makers at Minnow-brigs: their laughter was more fitful and less loud than it used to be: the jests were of a subdued order; and altogether a feeling of apprehension—a something ominous—seemed to sit heavy on the hearts of both lad and lass, as often as silence gave them time for reflection. Instances of the fever having penetrated from the town into the country, had of late become more common; and John Jarvie and his wife, both of whom should have been among the band, now lay dangerously ill of that fearful disorder.

On the day in question, the mowers were reduced to two, the others having been called off to do something else about the farm; and these in returning from their breakfast, with the bottles of small beer, which were to serve for their forenoon's refreshment in their hands, called at the cottage to inquire for their sick fellow-labourers. Fortunately, upon this occasion the accounts were cheering. The medical attendant, who had just left the house, had pronounced the disease past its height, and said that he now confidently expected a favorable issue. As a confirmation of this opinion, at the time when the mowers called, both patients were enjoying a peaceful slumber, from which the doctor had forbidden them to be awakened. Gladdened by the happy change, the workmen took their way around by the end of the house to the field in which they were to be employed, and, after a short consultation, exactly opposite to a back window, they commenced the labors of the forenoon.

Towards eleven o'clock, both patients awoke, apparently much refreshed by the sleep which they had enjoyed, and, as it seemed in a fair way of recovery. But by this time a number of neighbors and gossips, from the surrounding cottages, had assembled in the house, some overjoyed at the prospect of their restoration to health, and others, strange as it may seem, secretly but not the less certainly discontented at the event not having answered exactly to their previous predictions—thus leaving room for cavillers to question the truth of their pretensions to a knowledge of futurity.

“I aye thought they might recover as lang as the warning wasna gien,” said Margaret Toshick, an old woman who belonged to the last-mentioned class of visitors; “and we have a great reason to be thankful for their betterness. But for a’ that, and though the doctor has said that they are sure to recover, folk should never be owre certain; for the doctor sees as short gait afore him as his neighbors, and the fever may soon relap, and the warning may be sent, and them that rejoice may soon have cause to mourn.”

While the last word was yet on her lips, a short, sharp sound was heard, which, to the terrified group, appeared to come from under the bed, and which, in their estimation, resembled the report of a pistol.—The loudest peal of thunder that ever was heard by mortal ears, would have failed to produce half the effect upon their imaginations which was produced by that momentary noise. All stood silent for a few seconds, while their trembling limbs, quivering lips, and suppressed breathing, gave unquestionable proof of that indescribable state of feeling for which fear is not a proper name—that mixture of awe, terror, and mystery, which does not find a ready utterance in words.

“What’s that?” at last whispered one of the company, in a voice so low, and so choked with apprehension, as to be scarcely audible.

“Ay, ye may well speer what’s that?” rejoined Margaret Toshick, who, notwithstanding the state of her own feelings, seemed to have been waiting for some such question. “That’s the warning,” she continued; “nae doubt about it ava noo! and either the aye or theither—John or Jennet—maun e’en awa’ to the lanesome kirkyard, as I said there was owre muckle reason to fear they would do when they took the disorder. The doctor may say what he likes about bein’ colescent, but, when it comes to as guid, we maun a’ say, ‘The Lord’s will be done; and what is foreordained to be, will be in spite o’ a’ his palavers, and his learned faces, and his drugs, and his doctory. Peggy there, puir thing, did a’ his newfangled ways, and keepit the doors and the windows open, as he bade her, though that was never wont to be done in my day, and the folk had just as muckle skill then as they ha’e yet. But mark the upshot. At the very time when he thinks he has gained a victory, and, may be, at the very minute when he is braggin’ of his performance to someither body, there’s Ane aboon—blest be his name—wha laughs at his vain glory, and sends the warning far anither world; and weel for them for whom it was sent, if they’re only prepared.”

In the state of feeling which then existed, Margaret’s reasoning was conclusive. No one attempted to answer her, and no one appeared to doubt the truth of what she had said. But though they had been determined to do both, time was not allowed; for she had scarcely been silent two seconds, when they were again alarmed by a repetition of the self-same noise, or at least a noise like the first, that no one could distinguish between them; only to their terrified imaginations it seemed doubly loud. A short period of awe-struck silence followed, during which even Margaret appeared to have nothing to say.

The girl who acted as sick-nurse, and who had all along taken a deep interest in the fate of the patients, was the first to speak. “That crack came from the back window,” said she; “and I could wager somebody has flung a stone at it, or something else, to make the noise.” While she thus spoke, there was a degree of tremor in her voice, which showed that she scarcely believed what she herself had asserted. From her attention having been steadily devoted to the sufferers, she had seen, in their saddened looks and stifled moans, an evidence of the unfavorable effect which the former warning and the conversation which followed, had produced upon them; and, with more sense than the rest, she now wished to save them from an increase of those feelings of dismay which she saw they could not long endure. Her efforts, however, were rendered fruitless by the more orthodox Margaret Toshick, who had never before been put down upon any occasion of the kind.

“Na, na, Peggy, my woman,” said she; “there has been naething at the window but an unseen hand wi’ the warning o’ death! Howsomever, to satisfy you I shall gang and see.” She accordingly went round to the back of the house, and returned in little more than a minute, with, “It’s just as I said; nae one within cry, except the twa hay-cutters, and they’re baith owre the knowe, and out o’ sight. Fools may put the evil day afar aff; but death will come at the appointed time for a’ that; and it’s braw thing to be prepared for the coming of the great enemy.”

Notwithstanding the positive evidence which Margaret had brought to bear upon the subject, Peggy was not yet fully satisfied; and, at her suggestion, the house was searched to see if any thing could be found within its walls, which by any possibility, could have produced the noises in question. But nothing could be discovered which had the slightest chance of emitting even a minimum of sound; and at last the poor girl herself was forced to hang down her head in dismay, and acknowledge that there had been something beyond the ordinary laws of nature in what they had heard.

This state of affairs was the most favorable that could have been imagined for Margaret again to take up her testimony. “Ay, ay,” she resumed, “it’s just as I thought, after a’; the first warning for John, honest man—I aye said he was farrest gane—and the second for Jennet; and noo baith maun awa’ to their lang hames, for there’s nae remission o’ that sent nce. Howsomever, things are a mixed wi’ mercy and they’ve had a blessed time to prepare for death. But see, Peggy,” she added, once more addressing the young woman who acted as sick nurse, and, lowering her voice, which hitherto had been loud and sonorous, to a whisper, “look at John’s face; I’m far deceived if there’s no an alteration there. And, as I tell’d ye before, in spite o’ a’ the doctor’s palavers about colescence, I muckle doubt the last enemy has begun to deal wi’ him noo!”

For some time past the party had been too deeply engaged in thinking over the mysterious occurrences already noticed, and in listening to Margaret discussing the merits of the question at issue, to pay much attention to the sufferers. The last observation, however, had an instantaneous effect in altering the current of their thoughts; and, on turning once more to the sick-beds, the fixed and glazing eye of the poor man, the hands which tugged with feeble effort at the bedclothes, or tried to grasp imaginary objects in the air, and his thick and convulsed breathing, told, in a language not to be mistaken, that he was in the last agonies of nature. His strength had been completely exhausted before the fever abated; and though it had left him, in the estimation of his medical attendant, with a fair prospect of recovery, when the appalling sound fell upon his ear, together with the ominous observations afterwards made upon it—thus fixing, as it were, the certainty of his fate—the deadly impression had sunk so heavily upon his heart, that worn-out nature could no longer sustain the weight.

and the feeble spark of life was on the verge of being extinguished.

In a few minutes more, he died; and his wife, unconscious of what had happened, appeared to be fast following him to "that bourne from whence no traveller returns." But almost at the same moment, one of the mowers, who had no means of knowing how matters stood within, called at the door to ask for "a drink of water" for himself and his fellow-laborer. He said farther, "that they had deposited two bottles of beer, which were intended for their forenoon's refreshment, behind the house, thinking that they would be out of the sun; but from the extraordinary heat of the day, as he supposed, both had thrown the corks, and both were almost empty, so that they had nothing left wherewith to quench their thirst save water."

As fortune would have it, these words were addressed to the very individual who had formerly been so anxious to discover a natural cause for the ominous sounds. With the word bottle, an idea had dawned upon her mind that this circumstance might perhaps lead to a solution of the mysterious question, more in accordance with her own opinions than any thing she had heard from Margaret Toshick; and she was careful to suppress, as far as possible, her own agitation, and at the same time, not to interrupt the man till he had reached the end of his story. Having made herself fully acquainted with the particulars of the case, and supplied him with a quantity of water, the whole of which was the work of little more than a minute, she hastened back to the chamber of death, where she found the poor woman, who was still ignorant of her husband's decease, just beginning to recover from a state of temporary insensibility; and, though the lifeless remains of a fellow creature lay untouched upon the other bed, there was a something of triumph in her air as she addressed the dame who hitherto had been the principal speaker.

"Margaret," said she, "your warnings, after a' have been nothing mair than two bottles of ale casting the corks at the window!"

The sound of her voice, as she uttered these words, seemed to give an immediate relief to the remaining sufferer, who once more opened her eyes and looked around the bed, while she also began to breathe more freely. Margaret, however, was mustering breath for a defence, and, to the heart of the sick woman, there can be little doubt that she would have renewed all the terror of the warnings; but, fortunately, before she could speak, the doctor entered. Having overheard Peggy's last words, and guessing to a certain extent what had happened, he immediately ordered the whole party, except the nurse, to quit the sick-room. As he concluded, Margaret, ever willing to show the superiority of her understanding, raised her hand, and pointing to the bed on which lay the body of the deceased, she was beginning to remonstrate upon the folly of giving such orders at such a time. Had she been allowed to proceed, it was evident that she intended to say something about the necessity of having "the corpse dressed;" but before she could finish the second word of her harangue, he checked her by raising his hand to her face, and addressing her in a stern whisper.

"Recollect," said he, "the two pounds which you owe me ever since I cured your husband of a dangerous illness. You must either pay the sum immediately, or do as I bid you, and so escape incarceration for debt." Margaret knew not what incarceration meant; she had never heard the word before, but she felt that it must be something terrible. She was not at the time able to pay the money, and she had, moreover, no intention of ever doing so, unless forced to it; and thus she was the very first to leave the apartment, and in a few minutes after she left the house, in which she considered, she had been grossly insulted.

The doctor's next business was to draw Peggy aside and to learn from her, as minutely as time would permit, the import of what had passed since his last visit. A few words sufficed to make him understand the whole affair; and he saw at once, that, to give the poor woman the slightest chance of recovery, her mind must be kept perfectly tranquil. A short slumber into which, from the exhaustion occasioned by previous excitement, she almost immediately fell, favored his benevolent purpose; and, while it lasted, he promptly arranged measures for having the corpse quietly removed to the other end of the house. By a humane deception, the death of the husband was concealed from the wife for nearly a week; she was even led to believe that he had only been removed to another apartment for freer air, and that there was still a chance of his recovery; and it was not till she was considered able to bear the shock, that she was gradually made acquainted with her widowed condition. With the advantages of quiet, kind, and careful treatment, she ultimately recovered; and though she felt deeply the effect of the warning in the death of her husband, she was forced to acknowledge, that there was mercy in the dispensation which spared her to watch over and in some measure provide for, the wants of a young family.

There was something so ludicrous in the idea of the springing of a bottle of small beer being mistaken for a warning of death, that when the story got into circulation, people could scarcely refrain from laughing at it; and they did laugh outright at the lugubrious observations of Margaret Toshick. The medical men of the district, too, who had all along labored to discountenance a belief in supernatural warnings, laid hold of the opportunity thus afforded for bringing the whole into ridicule. They narrated the circumstances to the friends of their patients, and to the patients themselves, assuring them, that if the whole of those warnings, which had produced so much terror and alarm, had been rightly investigated, it would have been found that they proceeded from causes in themselves as little terrible as "a bottle of ale casting the cork!" And whether it were the natural consequence of the new state of feeling thus produced, or that the disease had already exhausted its virulence, we know not, but the fever almost immediately became less mortal in the populous village of Overburn, and soon after, it entirely disappeared.

From the foregoing little story, the evil effects of some particular kinds of superstition must be evident to the reader; and yet it would appear that superstition in some shape or other is almost inseparable from humanity in certain stages of society. Among an ignorant or only half-enlightened people, things must be accounted for, as well as among philosophers; and as they have not those powers of investigation which would enable them to arrive at truth, they immediately fall back upon supernatural agency. Superstitions no doubt have been, and always will be, modified by the peculiar temperament of the people among whom they exist, by their civil institutions, and their notions of the Deity. The manner in which their worship is conducted, too—whether in a joyous, solemn, austere, or gloomy style—must have a considerable influence in moulding the creations of fancy; but till something like rational knowledge begins to prevail, and till effects have been traced to their causes, and the connexion between them established upon incontrovertible evidence, the great mass of mankind will always account for much which might be easily accounted for upon other principles, by attributing it to supernatural agency. Even at the present day, those who are not minutely acquainted with the humbler ranks of society, would scarcely believe to what an extent superstitious notions prevail among them. In some parts of the country, and by some individuals in all parts of it, every trifling dream is still noticed; and, however incongruous or absurd may have been the scenes which it represented, some terrible or at least some important events is expected to follow. It were endless to attempt even an enumeration of the different modes of interpreting these illusions of the night. With the exception of those sybils who pretend to have studied the art, every one adopts an interpretation of his own; these interpretations are always influenced by circumstances, and by the whims and caprices of the individual; but one result uniformly follows. If within a month, or, if the dream has been a remarkable one, within a year from the time at which it occurred, any thing should happen into the most distant resemblance of which it can by any possibility be tortured, then it is remembered and set down as another incontestible evidence that "dreams are not sent for nought." But if nothing at all extraordinary occurs within a limited time, then the dream, and all the terror and alarm which it occasioned, are forgotten; and thus evidence is constantly accumulated on the one side, while on the other no care is taken to preserve a single circumstance which might tend to invalidate it. By these means, a belief in dreams, spells, omens, and warnings, has been long kept alive embittering, with unnecessary apprehensions and idle fears, any little happiness which mortals may enjoy. We may hope, however, that the time is not now very far distant when knowledge will chase these remaining phantoms of the darker ages from our moral hemisphere, and warnings, and other imaginary causes of terror, cease to be among the evils with which humanity has to contend.

CHINESE HORROR OF THE WORD "DEATH."—The Chinese having a great horror of the word "Death," they substitute in its place various paraphrases, such as "absent," "rambling among the genii," "he being sick, occasioned a vacancy," i. e. dead. The Empress having died during the month of June, 1833, an Imperial Mandate was published, stating that her "departure" took place at four o'clock on the sixteenth of the month. His majesty says he was married to Tung-hea twenty-six years previously; that she was the principal person in the middle harem; that she was ever full of tenderness, filial piety, and was most obedient—but being attacked by an inveterate dysentery, she had taken the "long departure;" and that it caused him much pain at the loss of his "domestic helper"—his "interior assistant." His majesty set forth her great virtues ever since she had been consort to heaven (i. e. the Emperor,) during the thirteen years she had held the relative situation of earth to imperial heaven. An edict was published at her death, ordering that no officer should have his head shaved during one hundred days; nor have any marriage in his family during twenty-seven days; nor play on any musical instrument during one year; and that the soldiers and people should not shave their heads for one month; nor engage in marriage during seven days; nor play on any musical instrument during one hundred days.

CANTON.

The name of Canton on Chinese maps, is written Kwang-tung-sang-ching that is, the capital of the province of Kwan-tung; but when speaking of the city, the natives call it San-ching, the "provincial city," or the "capital of the province." It is built on the north bank of Choo-keang or Pearl river, stands inland, and is in a direct line, about sixty miles from "the great sea." The scenery around the city, in the adjacent country, is rich and diversified, but deficient in boldness or grandeur.

On the north and northeast of the city, the country is hilly and mountainous. In every other direction a wide prospect opens to the view of the beholder. The rivers and canals, which are very numerous abound with fish, and are covered with a great variety of boats which are continually passing to and from the neighboring towns and villages. Southward from the city, as far as the eye can see, the waters cover a considerable portion, perhaps a third of the whole surface. Rice-fields and gardens occupy the lowlands, which are diversified with a few hills, rising here and there, to relieve the otherwise unbroken aspect.—The extent of the city, including all within and without the walls, is not very great; thought very populous; it derives its chief importance from its extensive domestic and foreign trade. Canton is one of the oldest cities in this part of the Empire; since the foundations were first laid, it has undergone numerous changes.

It is not easy, perhaps impossible, to determine its original site and name, or to ascertain the time in which it was first built. Although either of the questions is unimportant to the reader, a brief account of what the Chinese themselves narrate, respecting one of their largest and most populous cities may interest him. Their classics speak of Canton being in existence four thousand years since; that it was then called Nankeon, and Ming-too, the splendor of capital. It first began to pay tribute to the Emperor of China in the year B. C. 1123. The historians of the Empire are only able to trace the origin of Canton to the last Em-perors of the Chow dynasty, two thousand years since; it was then surrounded by a stockade composed of bamboo and mud. We find it was but little visited by foreign vessels till the year one thousand B. C., when they held intercourse with eight "barbarous" nations from Teeu-Chuh, (India.)

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, July, 10, 1841.

THE FOURTH OF JULY, or rather the fifth was duly honored in this city. The boys clothed in their holiday attire, with their squibs and rockets and "double-headers," were as happy and as merry, as we children of a larger growth were before them. So may it ever be with them, and their children, to the end of time.

The military and civic societies, made a fine display, although owing to peculiar causes, not so numerous as in former years. Gen. Dix delivered the Oration, and by those who heard it, it is said to be worthy of his high reputation.

In the afternoon, the Young Mens' Association, turned out in their strength, and after marching thro' the principal streets, proceeded to the Second Presbyterian Church, where the exercises of the day were to be concluded. The Declaration of Independence, was read by Mr. E. N. Horsford, then a national Hymn written for the occasion. The Annual Poem was written and recited by Mr. Frederic W. Cole. The various papers speak of the poem as highly patriotic and poetical, and of a high order of merit. The Oration was pronounced by Arthur C. Southwick, Esq. and is spoken of in the highest terms of admiration. Several original Odes from the pens of young ladies of this city, were sung, all of them excellent, and appropriate. We copy a beautiful one in our paper of today.

In the celebration of this year, there was a novel and distinctive feature given to the day, entirely different from that of former years. For some time past the cause of temperance, has been the all-engrossing subject, among a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and efforts were made on this day, for its friends to unite in one body, and as a band of totalabstainers, exhibit to the public view, the reformed moderate drinker, the tippler, and the drunkard. These three classes comprised the procession; and werejoice to say, its influence has been most happy and salutary—it has awakened public attention, and within our personal knowledge, we know of more than twenty instances, where the intoxicating draught will be thrown aside, and the efforts and example of its former votaries, be now added to the good cause.

According to previous arrangement the several Temperance Societies assembled in the Capitol park, at 9 o'clock, and from thence proceeded through our principal streets to the Middle Dutch Church. Our limits will not permit us to enter into detail, but we cannot forbear to notice the Address of Mr. Nott, delivered on that occasion. We have seldom listened to one with more interest—for it was just such a one as was suited to the subject—plain, practical, clear, cogent, convincing, common sense, as well as highly patriotic. The performance by the Choir was highly creditable, and the volunteer Address of the Rev. E. N. Kirk, was fraught with patriotic sentiment and sound views in relation to the proper mode of celebrating this memorable day. The procession was by far the largest of the day—and would doubtless have been much larger were it not for the shower that fell about the time for assembling. We trust our cold-water friends will not suffer the favorable impression made by it, to pass by without an effort to follow up the advantage they have gained over the tyrant alcohol.—

"The light of the 19th century admits of no neutrality; total abstinence from all that can intoxicate," should be our motto, and, our course like the Eagle's "be onward—still on!"

The day passed off with more than usual eclat, and we have not heard of a single accident to mar the harmony of the occasion, owing no doubt in a great measure to the limited use of intoxicating drinks.

THE GRAND LODGE REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM.

We cannot too strongly call the attention of our brethren, here and abroad, to the Address of W. Br. Pirsons, the Representative from Georgia, to be found among the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of this State. Its beneficial, and in fact, positively necessary existence, cannot but be apparent, with but half an eye to the subject. Let this system be thoroughly adopted, and the various outlets to imposition, will be effectually closed, not only to the countenance innocently given to bad masons, but as effecting a salutary check, to the "travelling mendicants" alluded to.—Experience has convinced us, that full half, if not more, of the applications for masonic charity, in sojourners, is a misapplication of the bounty, legitimately contemplated by the rules of the Order. It is the unfortunate and worthy brother, whom we are to succour and befriend, not the idle, the vicious, or profligate whose masonry goes no farther than the fact of his being able to make himself known. A well digested system of representation cannot fail of correcting many evils, under which as a fraternity, we now labor, and we do most sincerely hope, for our mutual protection, that this course will be carried out in its fullest extent.

TEXAS.—Those of our readers who may desire the services of a competent Agent to transact any business in this country, we would invite their attention to the card of Mr. Geo. Fisher of Houston, in another column. From the various high and important trusts which have been committed to the charge of Mr. F. in this Republic, and from our own knowledge of his character and attainments, we cheerfully commend him to the favorable consideration of those who may desire his services.

A LITTLE BEHIND THE AGE.—The Presbytery of Niagara, have passed a formal resolution, declaring that Byron's works and Bulwer's novels, are books of an infidel and licentious character. To make the anathema complete, Willy Shakespeare should be included.

"THE DIVINE FANNY," has closed her engagement at the Park. "The Sun" says that this "goddess of dances and dunces, has ample occasion for perfect satisfaction with the result of her engagement." An effort was made for her benefit, to enact the New Orleans foolery of letting seats at auction to the highest bidder. It was however, a failure, and poor Fanny was only able to realise from 1500 hundred or $2000 for her performance.

The notes of the U. S. Bank, of Pennsylvania, are selling at a discount of 22 per cent, for specie in Philadelphia.

[We accidentally omitted reading the proof of the following, which is printed under its proper head. As published, it contains errors which are now corrected.]

At a meeting of Temple Encampment held the 9th of April, 1841, in this city, the following Sir Knights were elected Officers for one year.

Sir G. B. Glendenning Grand Commander. J. McKown, G. J. M. Garfield, C. G. W. F. Walker, P. J. O. Cole. S. W. H. Arnold, J. W. Wm. Voorhees, Treas. J. I. Goewey, R. J. P. Mitchell, W. A. Wilder, S. B. R. Par, S. B. A. Sickles, Sentinel.

The remains of Gen. Harrison on the 2d reached Pittsburg, where they were received with becoming honors by the people and the military, and immediately placed on board a steamboat for North Bend.

A SPECK.—Within the last few weeks, ten additional regiments have arrived at Quebec. Victoria, is determined to be ready, if we are not.

THE CROPS.—The Hudson Gazette, says, that "the fine rains and warm weather since the 24th ult., has changed the face of nature and the face of our Farmers. Despondency has yielded to cheerful smiles and nature, refreshed and invigorated, promises an abundant harvest.

"COFFEE," &c.—The Editor of the Southern Universalist, says in his paper, of a Mr. Hope,—"we pronounce him a theological coward!" Mr. Hope is bound to call the editor out; but nothing but the theological pistol must be used.

Mrs. Hughes, who was so barbarously shot, a few weeks since, by her husband, on board of one of our Canal Boats, is, we understand, in a fair way of recovery.

An exchange paper says that the most dignified, glorious, and lovely work of nature is woman, the next is man, then Berkshire Pigs.

Major Gen. Scott, has been appointed commander in chief of the army, in place of Gen. Macomb, lately deceased. The appointment is a good one, and will be received with favor by the people of the U. S.

Martin Harris, the lieutenant of Joe Smith, the Mormonite is hot "shot through the head," as was reported. He is "all alive,"—hates his captain Joe, but does not eschew Mormonism. N. B. Newspapers do not always tell the truth.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

Fifteen days later from Europe.—The steamship Britannia, Capt. R. B. Cleland, arrived at Boston at half past 7 o'clock on Saturday morning, in 13½ days from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 19th ult.

Nothing farther had been heard from the President, and the last hope of her safety is now abandoned. It appears that the vessel seen near the Azores by the Portuguese ship Conde del Palma was the French steamer Tonnere, on her return from Rio and Brazil. There is nothing new from China. Heavy reinforcements are going out to the British army in India.

France.—Marshal Soult recently resigned on account of the defeat of an obnoxious bill for remitting the army, but was induced to reconsider his decision.

The French have experienced additional checks in Algiers and Abdel Kader is in great force there. The abandonment of that country is again talked of.

Spain.—Affairs seem to be getting worse in Spain. The Treasury is empty, and the Ministry can find nobody to lend them. The young Queen's health is critical. There has been a serious riot or commotion at Barcelona.

Portugal is almost in commotion. The Ministry have been outvoted and resigned, but hold on until others are found to take their places.

Turkey.—The Plague rages throughout Syria. The French have 98 ships of war carrying 2804 guns in the Mediterranean.

It is stated in a letter from Carlarhue, that the small town of Parsberg has been entirely burnt down; 224 houses were consumed.

The Precursor of Antwerp says, on the authority of letters from Holland, that a marriage between the Prince de Joinville and the Princess Sophia, daughter of the King of Holland, may be considered as agreed upon.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—Lord John Russell, is soon to marry Lady Fanny Elliott, daughter of the Earl of Minto. His age 48, her's 25.

The eldest daughter of Sir Robert Peel is to marry Viscount Vilhers, son of the earl of Jersey.

Lord Ebrington's marriage with Lady Somerville is deferred by the death of his father.

By a recent accident on the West Feliciana Railroad, the cars will be prevented from running for several months. The engineer, Mr. Hanman, has been crippled for life by the overturning of the locomotive.—N. O. Pic.

Appointments.—We learn that Professor Ingraham has received and accepted the appointment of Secretary of the Legation to Spain. The Professor speaks the Spanish language as well as the English.

Penitentiary Rogues Caught.—We learn from the St. Charles Free Press that all the prisoners who murdered the keeper of the penitentiary at Jefferson City, some time since, and made their escape, have been taken and again committed to prison.

The Sea Serpent has returned to his old haunt off Nahant, and was seen on the 2nd inst., by "a cloud of witnesses."

Distressing.—George Collins, a young man 19 or 20 years of age, was on Thursday last struck with lightning in a field near Lancaster, Pa., and expired in an hour afterwards.

A Good Example.—It is said that a Miss Charlotte Mitchell, of Georgia, appeared on her wedding day dressed entirely in silk of her own manufacture—cap, gloves, stockings and dress—equal to the best pongee. Girls, do you hear that? Such a girl would be worth more to a young man just starting in the world, than a thousand dollar farm, and a dozen pinanos to boot, says a thoughtful contemporary.—Urban Citizen.

Horrid Death.—A person named Grinnell, employed as a deck hand on a lake boat, met his death a few days since by the falling of one of the canal bridges, a few miles west of Utica. It appears that the boat, being under full headway, the capstan caught against the bridge, tore it from the supporting piers, and the whole mass fell upon the unfortunate man, who was on the deck of the boat. For several hours he was in this dreadful situation, the whole weight of the bridge being upon him; and all attempts to pry it up being of no avail, so long as the boat kept afloat. When the bridge was removed his body presented a horribly mangled appearance, and life was totally extinct. His body was brought to this city on Thursday evening, and delivered over to his friends.—Daily Adv.

Justice slow but sure.—Morton, the murderer of Layman James, in Jackson co. Alabama some twelve years ago was arrested last month in Missouri, through the vigilance and impetuosity of Mr. McRenolds and is now in custody.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED.

THE Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 159 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families. Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams, &c. The subscriber thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old customers and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12 1/2 cents.

PEOPLE'S LINE STEAM BOATS.

FOR NEW YORK FOR 1841—DAILY NIGHT LINE—PASSAGE $1—The public are informed that during the past winter extensive alterations have been made in the People's Line, by substituting the North America in the place of the Utica, and by adding thereto the South America, a splendid new boat now building in New York, and which will be ready to take her place in the line on the opening of navigation. The line will then consist of the ROCHESTER and the NORTH and SOUTH AMERICA, three of the most splendid steam boats ever run on the North River, and will commence and continue to run for the conveyance of passengers and light freight between New York and Albany and intermediate places, during the coming season of navigation. The above Steamboats are not surpassed in extent and elegance of accommodation, and general adaptability to the business in which they are engaged. The owners of the line are practical steamboat men, and their personal attention, with the advantage of fifteen years experience in the business will be devoted to the management of this new enterprise, so necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the travelling community, and they look with confidence to a discerning and liberal public for patronage and support.

One of the above Steamboats will leave Albany for New York, daily, at 5 o'clock P. M.
For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the dock.

POETRY.

THE MOTHER'S GRAVE.

BY WILLIAM GRIGG, M. D.

It was a morn in summer. Nature smiled
 'Neath the rich mantle of the glorious sun,
 Who, like a god, majestically rose
 From his bright chamber of eternity.
 And o'er the earth his golden vapor poured,
 And waters spread their crystal face, a wide,
 Unbroken mirror of the ambient sky,
 While on their polished surface lightly played
 The dazzling sunbeams of that quiet morn.
 The sporting zephyr, with the pensive leaves
 In gentle dalliance, newer beauty gave,
 As they were wakened from their holy rest,
 And joyed, yet trembled, in the liquid light
 Which bathed them in its flood. Day's balmy breath,
 Rich with the morning tribute of the flowers,
 Floated along to pour its hallowed sweets
 Among the dwellings of the busy world.

I stood within a churchyard. Art had there
 Mingled its column with the moss-grown stone
 That marked the spot where humble beings lay.
 The urn-crowned monument, that proudly stood
 Upon the ashes of the highborn dead,
 In golden blazonry described the chain
 Of proud, ennobled ancestry that claimed
 The buried praised one as its brightest link.
 With careless eye I scanned the epitaphs
 That stained the marble's purity with words—
 The vainest mockery of the silent dead!
 What work of art can speak the thrilling tones,
 The voiceless utterance of the silent grave?
 The measured movement of the plumed hearse,
 The marble pile, the gilded epitaph,
 Speak not the language of the broken heart.

There was a simple stone whereon was writ
 "A Mother's Grave." How eloquent the words!
 They waited me far back to other times,
 When in the days of artless infancy
 The silent stone hath told my mother's name.
 That tale seemed told again. Though youth was past
 And the cold calmness of maturer years
 Had lulled the pangs my early boyhood knew,
 Yet in that tongueless marble lurked a spell,
 That wove around me memory's deathless joys.

'Twas evening when I sought that spot again.
 Beside the grave three little children stood.
 The oldest was a boy, who scarce could claim
 Eight summers' sports his own—the next, a girl,
 Whose tender spring had known but six returns—
 And then, a lovely cherub, like the bud
 Whose annual visit she four times had welcomed.
 Each infant's hand was in the other's clasped—
 A living crescent, at their mother's grave—
 And fondly gazing on that sacred spot
 They read the withering words which said their friend,
 Their dearest, truest friend, slept the deep sleep
 Which wakens only in eternity.

Oh! is there in the waste of human things
 A stream so pure and clear as that which swells
 From the deep fountain of a mother's heart?
 No! no! by the stern laws of nature, no!
 In infancy's soft hour the bud is bathed
 In the warm fondness of maternal love,
 And nourished to expand in the full bloom
 Of unpolled youth—and even when
 It ripens into fruit of age, the same
 Nutritious fount supplies its manly strength,
 And knows no hindrance to its pleasant course,
 Down to the barriers of the eternal grave.

A mother's love! the strongest, truest type
 Of the pure love the Saviour bears mankind!
 Brightest in darkest hours! most seen when clouds
 Of ignominy rest upon her boy!
 And, like the diamond, showing best its power
 When other gems are lost in shades of night,
 Her love shines out and yields its secret rays,
 When trouble lowers the blackest o'er her child.

I since have visited that holy tomb.

A pensive willow bending o'er it,
 And a small basket filled with fresh plucked flowers
 Standing beside the stone, assured my heart
 That grave was not forgotten.

What rich joy
 Those duteous children feel, whose bosoms echo
 To the soft strains fond memory loves to waken
 O'er some green spot on time's receding shore,
 Brightly illumined by a mother's smile!
 But how much holier theirs, who, looking back
 Along the course their devious footsteps knew,
 Perceive no stain upon the hallowed snow
 Of childhood's grateful duty!

BEWARE THE BOWL!

BY A. B. STREET, ESQ.

Sung before the Temperance Societies of the city of Albany, on the celebration of the 65th Anniversary of American Independence.

Beware the bowl! though rich and bright,
 Its rubies flash upon the sight,
 An adder coils its depths beneath,
 Whose lure is woe, whose sting is death.

Beware the bowl! though round it twine
 The wreaths from Pleasure's rosiest shrine,
 The thorn is lurking mid the bloom
 That strews the entrance to the tomb.

Beware the bowl! though wit may gleam,
 And song sound loudly o'er its stream;
 That gleam will change to lightning-glare,
 That song will cease in mute despair.

Beware the bowl! by all the woe
 That lies within its poison'd flow—
 By all the hopes that cheer the soul,
 Through life, in death, beware the bowl.

The following beautiful Ode, from the pen of one of our young ladies, was sung during the exercises of the Fourth, at the 2nd Presbyterian Church, before the Young Men's Association.

"THE SPARTAN MOTHER FOR THE FIELD."

The Spartan mother, for the field,
 In armor clad her willing son;
 Bade him return upon his shield,
 Or else to tell of conquest won!
 And so Columbia's Daughters gave
 Their sires and sons to battle toil—
 Bade them repel Oppression's wave,
 Or dye with blood their native soil.

But History's page has told it well—
 How strong men struggled in their might.
 How true they fought—how fast they fell,
 In that fierce war, of wrong with right.
 Not unavenged, those Heroes bled.
 The Tyrant's power was crushed to earth.
 But while a Nation mourned their dead,
 They hail'd with joy fair Freedom's birth!

The God of Battles gave us Peace,
 The tide of War was roll'd away;
 He bade the work of carnage cease,
 And smiled on Freedom's natal day.
 And now, behold our banner wave,
 To every breeze, on every sea—
 Blest Signal to the struggling slave,
 Beloved, and honored, by the free!

And still our loved and happy land,
 The favored Canaan of the West—
 Upon thy breast the weary sleep,
 The wanderer finds a welcome rest.
 Columbia's soil is Freedom's own,
 The dear-bought home of Liberty;
 And still a voice from years long flown,
 Resounds—be glorious, great and Free!

From Graham's Magazine.

I. I. N. E. S.

Why do we live? Is it to fade
 From glory to the tomb,
 Wrapt up in its melancholy shade.

Inheritors of gloom!
 Struck like the stars from Heaven we die;
 Quench'd is the spirit's light;
 Youth's cheer and Hope's sweet melody
 Are hush'd in sorrow's night.

Why are we here? but to depart?
 'Tis anguish thus to fade.
 Shall grief oppress a single heart
 When we are lowly laid?
 Thank God! th' immortal soul no blight
 Of earth can e'er decay;
 On high, to realms of endless light
 It flashes far away.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to be buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons—on satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writ-ter, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST
NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany."
 Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, if they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Masonic Bodies assembled at the city of Hudson, June 24th, 1851.

BY JOSEPH P. FIRSSONS.

MY BRETHREN AND FRIENDS,

We are assembled to commemorate the birth-day of one of our patron saints. The Heavenly messenger John the Baptist! whose raiment was camels' hair and whose food, locust and wild honey! The forerunner of our Blessed Savior! He whose voice cried in the wilderness, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord! make his path straight!"

With such a patron,—under such auspices,—and on such an occasion, can any heart fail to throb with sensations of devout emotion and gratitude to the giver of all good, for being permitted thus to assemble, and to claim for our order, the benefit of a name so sacred; and which is so intimately connected with that of the great founder of our religion; who is the sole and only channel from this vale of tears, to the realms of everlasting bliss!

May his blessing rest on us, on this interesting occasion, and when we shall retire from this sacred edifice, may our festivities be of such a character that at the recollection of them hereafter, we may never have cause to blush!

Masons are called upon in a peculiar manner to walk uprightly in their several stations before God and man; to square their actions by the Square of Virtue; and to recollect, that they are "travelling upon the level of time, to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns!" These are the great ruling principles of masons throughout the world; and belong to the Pagan, the Mahomedan, the Jew, and the Christian, indiscriminately. But the Christian mason is taught to make the Bible the rule and guide of his faith—comprehending all the sacred scriptures. The Jew is governed by that part of the same standard which comprises the old Testament only; and therefore we of this communion of masons, whether Christian or Jew; having a faith well founded, should walk and live by that faith. But in how especial a manner, is that mason called upon to live a life of piety, who has had the Christian mark indelibly conferred on him, and who has symbolically visited the Holy Sepulchre of our Lord. How solemn are his responsibilities! How beatific his character, when he lives up to those responsibilities! That All-seeing Eye, whose presence the mason of every grade and nation professes to acknowledge, is not closed to these awful responsibilities; and can we doubt that those who make them with unhallowed lips, and thus enter the veil of the second temple, have a dread account to give at the bar of an offended Deity.

We are assembled here as a body of Freemasons from the Entered Apprentice to the Knight Templar, with all the appendant orders. We have invited our friends to be with us. We declare to them that we are an order of men combined for beneficent purposes, whose origin the prying eye of the historian and antiquary has searched in vain to trace, but which it is well known is coeval with science, and that through all the mutations of time, and of States and Empires, it has survived.

"Time shakes the stable tyranny of thrones!
And tottering empires rush by their own weight."

But masonry still flourishes, and will continue to flourish.

Uahurt, amidst the war of elements;
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds!

Of the origin of freemasonry, we have no certain records, but there are proofs deduced from the writings of the ancients, to establish its existence at a very early period.

A little over a century ago, many valuable documents relating to the Order, were destroyed by some scrupulous brethren, to prevent an improper use being made of them.

The most universally received opinion is, that the first society of freemasons was established during the reign of Canute.

But it is said, that William the Conqueror, was the first great patron of freemasonry in England. When he went over from Normandy in 1066, his liberal policy threw out tempting offers to many of the first artisans of France to emigrate to his newly acquired kingdom, where he found the people in a state little better than that of barbarism. "With regard to the manners of the Anglo-Saxons," says Guthrie, "we can say little, but that they were in general, a rude, uncultivated people, ignorant of letters, and unskilled in the mechanical arts, untamed to submission under law and government; addicted to intemperance, riot, and disorder. Even so late as the time of Canute, they sold their children and kindred into foreign parts. Their best quality was their military courage, which yet was not supported by discipline or conduct. Even the Norman historians notwithstanding the low state of the arts, in their own country, speak of them as barbarians, when they mention the invasion of the Duke of Normandy. Conquest placed the people in a situation to receive slowly from abroad the rudiments of science and cultivation, and to correct their rough and licentious manners; these emigrants were initiated into the Order of freemasons, and greatly contributed to raise its fame as an operative masonic institution. It is also stated, that many of the artisans were expert masons at the time of their emigration." This Historian also remarks, that William introduced the Norman laws and language. He built the stone square tower at London, bridled the country with forts, and disarmed the old inhabitants. In short, he attempted every measure possible to obliterate every trace of the Anglo-Saxon constitution; though at his coronation, he took the same oath, that had been taken by the ancient Saxon kings.

"Architecture in all its branches," says Dr. Henry, "received as great improvements in this period as agriculture. The truth is, that the twelfth century may very properly be called the age of architecture, in which the rage for building was more violent than at any other time."

The great and general improvements that were made in the fabric of houses and churches in the first years of this century, are thus described by a cotemporary writer. "The new Cathedrals and innumerable churches that were built in all parts, together with the many magnificent cloisters and monasteries, and other apartments of monks that were then erected, afford a sufficient proof of the great felicity of England in the reign of Henry the First."

The extensive works in Architecture which were commenced by the Conqueror, were not completed until the reign of his third son Henry I., who not only went on with those stupendous works, but increased the number beyond any of a previous or succeeding reign. He found his subjects in a very different situation to what they were on the arrival of his father.—They had been instructed in Architecture in the reigns of the two Williams, who are said to have been great promoters and patrons of the craft; and it is stated in history, that architecture was improved to a greater extent in England at this time, than it would have been but for this adventitious circumstance;—alluding to the patronage and encouragement given to freemasonry.

The operative mason, (although a member of the fraternity at the time,) was not acquainted with the sublime principles of the Order; and it is a serious fact, that even in this enlightened day, there are vast numbers of the fraternity, who know as little of them, as those operatives did in the dark age of which I am speaking. To the mere craftsman, the masonic symbols were perfectly unintelligible; but he was awed by the grandeur of the show which it made, and he was never allowed to progress in the art, until he had gained sufficient intelligence to be raised to the Royal Arch, when he was complimented with the title of Companion, and placed on an equality with those who had heretofore been his superiors. But he was only thus honored, by attaining a knowledge of the symbols and ceremonies, which would lead him to a discovery of the hidden scheme upon which freemasonry was founded.

Laurie, a very sensible writer in his statistical account of Scotland, observes: "The principles of the Order were even imported into Scotland, where they continued for many ages in their primitive simplicity, long after they had been extinguished in the continental kingdoms. What those causes were, which continued the societies of freemasonry longer in Britain than in other countries, may not perhaps be easy to determine, but as the fact itself is unquestionably true, it must have arisen either from favorable circumstances in the political state of Britain, which did not exist in the other governments of Europe, or from the superior policy by which the British masons eluded the suspicions of their enemies, and the superior prudence with which they maintained the primitive simplicity and respectability of the Order.

In this manner did freemasonry flourish in Britain, when it was completely abolished in every part of the world.

That freemasonry was introduced into Scotland, by those architects who built the Abbey of Kilwinning, is manifest not only from those authentic documents by which the existence of Kilwinning Lodge has been traced back as far as the end of the fifteenth century, but by other collateral arguments which amount almost to a demonstration.

In every country where the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope was acknowledged, there was a continual demand, particularly during the twelfth century for religious structures, and consequently for operative masons proportional to the piety of the inhabitants, and the opulence of the ecclesiastical establishments; and there was no kingdom of Europe, where the zeal of the inhabitants for popery was more ardent—where the kings and nobles were more liberal to the clergy, and where of consequence, the church was more richly endowed, than in Scotland. The demand therefore for elegant cathedrals and ingenious artists must have been proportionably greater than in other countries, and that demand could have been supplied only from the trading associations on the continent. We are authorised therefore to conclude, that those numerous and elegant ruins which still adorn the villages of Scotland, were erected by foreign masons, who introduced into that island the customs of their order.

It is a curious fact, that in one of these towns there is an elegant Abbey, which was built in the 12th century, the author of the history referred to, remarks, "he has often heard, that it was erected by a company of industrious men, who spoke in a foreign language, and lived separately from the town people; and stories are still told about their petty quarrels with the inhabitants."

It was probably about this time, that freemasonry was introduced into England; but whether the English received it from the Scotch masons at Kilwinning, or from other brethren who had arrived from the continent, there is no method of determining.—The fraternity in England however, maintain, that St. Alban was the first that brought Masonry to Britain, about the end of the third century; that the brethren received a charter from King Athelstane, and that his brother summoned all the lodges to meet at York, which formed the first Grand Lodge of England, in the year 926. This account, however, Mr. Laurie considers to be mere assertions, not only incapable of proof from authentic history, but inconsistent also with several historical events which rest upon indubitable evidence. In support of these opinions indeed, it is alleged, that no other lodge has laid claim to greater antiquity than that of York, and that its jurisdiction over other lodges of England, has been universally acknowledged by the whole fraternity. But this argument only proves that York was the birthplace of freemasonry in England; it brings no additional evidence in support of the improbable stories about St. Alban, Athelstane and Edwin.

A great deal of speculation has been indulged in as to the origin of freemasonry, but it still remains in obscurity. This obscurity is a sure test of its antiquity. Its origin was undoubtedly in the East, and it was brought to the West by the Phenicians, who being merchants came from the East to extend their commerce. Its first general extension is attributed to the Grecian philosopher Pythagoras, who hearing of the fame of the Phenicians travelled into Egypt and Syria, and through every country where Masonry had been propagated by them. Among them, he learned the art, being admitted into all the lodges, and then settled himself at Grecia Magna, where he formed a great Lodge at Crotona, and made numerous masons, "many of whom travelled into France, and there made many more, from whence in process of time it passed into England."

In relation to the secrets of freemasonry, a great deal has been said. In a community like ours, having no sectional limits, and avoiding all distinctions of rank and condition, there must necessarily be a great many ignorant people; and it is to this class of the fraternity that we are indebted for most of the obloquy that has been cast on us in relation to our secrets, which have been tortured into unlawful combinations for dark purposes, and inimical to the best interests of mankind. But we have no secrets, unless it is the secret of doing good. Our Order is a science of high and ennobling character, and is no more a secret than any other science that a person is unacquainted with; and many who have taken its degrees, are ignorant of its abstract principles, because it is intermixed with a great deal of the lore of the ancients; and it is prefigured by signs, symbols, and allegories all tending to one point—the inculcation of virtue—but which the superficial observer only contemplates a something wonderful, without being able to explain or comprehend their meaning; and thus it is, that indiscreet and uninformed brethren have made a parade and a boast of their fellowship with us, which to the initiated has tended to cast the odium on us complained of; the same as a canting hypocrite, brings a scandal on the sacred character of religion.

The secrets of freemasonry, are the secrets of every art and science: for masonry embraces these. What is there, in the silent tongue, the listening ear, and the faithful and obedient heart, that is not enjoined by every precept of morality and religion. In the ancient records, it is stated, that "masons have always from time time communicated to mankind such of their secrets, (mysteries) as might be generally useful,—they have kept back such only as would not be beneficial without the necessary teaching joined thereto in the Lodge." The same record in speaking of the arts which masonry has taught mankind, enumerates the following, Agriculture, Astronomy, Arithmetic, Music, Poetry, Chemistry, Government and Religion. To which may be added, Grammar, Logic, Rhetoric and Architecture.

Masonry is the perfection of order, and in addition to the inculcation of the liberal arts and sciences, there are three great duties which it particularly teaches: To God! Our neighbor! and Ourselves. To God in never mentioning his name but with that reverential awe, which is due from a creature to his creator. To implore his aid in all our laudable undertakings, and to esteem him as our chief good. To our neighbor, in doing unto him, as we wish he should do unto us; and to ourselves, in avoiding all irregularity and intemperance, which may impair our faculties, or debase the dignity of our profession. It teaches us, to be quiet and peaceable citizens, true to our government and just to our country. Not to countenance disloyalty or rebellion, but patiently submit to legal authority, and conform with cheerfulness to the government of the country in which we live; and in our outward demeanor to be particularly careful to avoid censure or reproach.

Another charge, has been brought against us, which the institution of freemasonry is entirely opposed to; and although there are individual cases in which in times past it has prevailed to some extent, I believe it is now pretty generally abolished. I allude to the custom of giving masonic entertainments.

A French writer, Mons. Laurens in alluding to this custom in the French lodges, uses the following language, "What is the origin of that wearisome quantity of healths, with which the masonic entertainments were formerly burthened which have been the occasion of so much sarcasm against freemasonry, and which a good taste has now wisely reformed. Is not this immoderate use of a custom innocent in itself, an usage of the too often repeated toast which so much distinguishes English clubs. The love of good cheer,—the profusion—the lengthening out of the feast—the imtemperate drinking—which are contrary to French sobriety, and which reason and decency have long since banished to the taverns of London, to which they legitimately belong Can these have any relation to the object of masonic fellowship, of which they are at best only a despicable parody! The grossness of these practices introduced into France, is too nearly allied to the taste of the English nation, not to be attributed to their invention."

From the above extract, it is pleasing to remark, that the custom complained of, is abolished in England and France; and the tone of society in relation to temperance, has brought it into pretty general disuse in this country. A custom for which we as well as France are indebted to our English brethren, and who were the first to establish it.

THE TRAVELLER.

OPIUM-SMOKING.

Lord Jocelyn, late military secretary to the China mission, in a small work just issued from the press, "Six months with the Chinese Expedition," makes the following observations on opium-smoking, which prevails not only in China, but in the adjacent islands of India:—

One of the objects at this place [Singapore] that I had the curiosity to visit, was the opium-smoker in his heaven; and certainly it is a most fearful sight, although perhaps not so degrading to the eye as the drunkard from spirits, lowered to the level of the brute, and wallowing in his filth. The idiot smile and death-like stupor, however, of the opium debauchee, has something far more awful to the gaze than the bestiality of the latter. Pity, if possible, takes the place of other feelings, as we watch the faded cheek and haggard look of the being abandoned to the power of the drug; whilst disgust is uppermost at the sight of the human creature levelled to the beast by intoxication. [What beast?—we do not know any animal but man who indulges in intoxicating liquors.]

One of the streets in the centre of the town is wholly devoted to the shops for the sale of this poison; and here in the evening may be seen, after the labors of the day are over, crowds of Chinese, who seek these places to satisfy their depraved appetites. The rooms where they sit and smoke are surrounded by wooden couches, with places for the head to rest upon, and generally a side-room is devoted to gambling. The pipe is a reed of about an inch in diameter, and the aperture in the bowl for the admission of the opium is not larger than a pin's head. The drug is prepared with some kind of conserve, and a very small portion is sufficient to charge it, one or two whiffs being the utmost that can be inhaled from a single pipe, and the smoke is taken into the lungs as from the hookah in India. On a beginner, one or two pipes will have an effect, but an old stager will continue smoking for hours. At the head of each couch is placed a small lamp, as fire must be held to the drug during the process of inhaling; and from the difficulty of filling and properly lighting of the pipe, there is generally a person who waits upon the smoker to perform the office.

A few days of this fearful luxury, when taken to excess, will give a pallid and haggard look to the face and a few months, or even weeks, will change the strong and healthy man into little better than an idiot skeleton. The pain they suffer when deprived of the drug, after long habit, no language can explain; and it is only when to a certain extent under its influence that their faculties are alive. In the houses devoted to their ruin, these infatuated people may be seen at nine o'clock in the evenings in all the different stages:—some entering, half distracted, to feed the craving appetite they had been obliged to subdue during the day; others laughing and talking wildly under the effects of a first pipe; whilst the couches around are filled with their different occupants, who lie languid, with an idiot smile upon their countenances, too much under the influence of the drug to care for passing events, and fast merging to the wished for consummation. The last scene in this tragic play is generally a room in the rear of the building—a species of dead house—where lie stretched those who have passed into the state of bliss the opium-smoker madly seeks—an emblem of the long sleep to which he is blindly hurrying."

Lord Jocelyn contends that the stoppage of the opium trade from India would prove most disastrous to British interests in that great empire. The rajahs and petty princes are the chief growers of the poppy, and it is important to conciliate their favor. The best opium is produced in Malwa, a district of India.—From that quarter it pays at Bombay a duty of 125 rupees (L. 12. 30s.) per chest, fetching in that market from 400 to 500 rupees (L. 40 to L. 50). This quantity sells on the Chinese coast for 700 dollars (L. 151 5s. 4d.) and perhaps much more. The temptation to get so large a profit sets all plans for stopping the traffic at defiance. "The opium-trade (his lordships observe,) however hateful it may appear in the eyes of many, is, it must be recollected, a source of great benefit to the Indian government, returning I have heard, a revenue of upwards of two millions and a half yearly. It therefore becomes those who are so eager for its suppression to point out some method of making up the serious defalcation of revenue that must necessarily accrue, to the Indian government, whose expenses already outrun its present income." The question, which is surrounded with a thousand difficulties, ought to be treated calmly, and on large and enlightened views.

Miscellany.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE CONTRAST.

Do you see that proud, overbearing man, riding in his gilded carriage? Look! he stops before a magnificent mansion, and liveried lacquies, obedient to his nod, assist him to descend.

Do you see that poor, miserable boy, whose tattered clothes scarcely shield him from the inclemency of the weather? Mark! with a beseeching look he solicits the rich man to purchase a pencil or a card of pens; and behold, how contemptuously he is spurned!

Twenty-five years ago that pompous man was as poor, as friendless, and as wretched as the urchin he despises.

Twenty-five years have passed since that day. The same parties meet: lo! the contrast.

The once poor boy stands in the pride of manhood, active, intelligent, rich. A lovely woman, his wife, leans upon his arm, and three blooming girls are by his side. Grace in every action, benevolence in every expression, and affluence smiles in his unostentatious adornments.

An old man approaches. The tottering step, the thread-bare garments, and the painful expression that frets in every feature, too plainly denote a man of want and woe. Better to be dead, than thus to drag on a miserable existence!

This may at the first blush appear to some an improbable romance. It is a truth.

In a country like ours, there is no man, however poor, if aided by industry, economy, and virtue, but may rise from the lowest ranks of society to the highest. The knowledge of this fact is a blessed incitement to the young, and cheers them on to struggle nobly in the paths which lead to honor and independence, despite the thousand obstacles that oppose their course.

There is no man, however affluent, but by extravagance, and morals lax, may fall from his high estate, and close his days in woe.

Let none despise the poor because of their poverty; let none flatter the rich because of their wealth. We may conquer poverty; wealth may subdue us. All men of equal virtue are equals. If one man possess more intelligence than his fellows, though that of itself may not elevate him in the ranks of the good, yet it brings him added respect, and wins a willing admiration from all men:

"The good alone are great."

A ROVING YANKEE.

Mr. Stephens, in his incidents of Travel in Central America, describes as follows a native of New York, whom he found in his travels in Guatemala:

"Approaching the town, I remembered that Mr. Handy, who had travelled from the United States through Texas and Mexico with a caravan of wild animals, had told me of an American in his employ, who had left him at this place, to take charge of a cochineal plantation, and I was curious to see how he looked and flourished in such employment. I had forgotten his name but, inquiring on the road for an American del Norte, was directed to the nopal of which he had charge. It was one of the largest in the place, and contained four thousand plants. I rode up to a small building in the middle of the plantation, which looked like a summer-house, and was surrounded by workmen, one of whom announced me as a "Spaniard," as the Indians generally call foreigners. Dismounting and giving my mule to an Indian, I entered and found Don Henriques sitting at a table with an account-book before him, settling accounts with the workmen. He was dressed in the cotton jacket of the country, and had a very long beard; but I should have recognized him anywhere as an American. I addressed him in English and he stared at me, as if startled by a familiar sound, and answered in Spanish. By degrees he comprehended the matter. He was under 30, from Rhinebeck Landing on the Hudson river, where his father keeps a store, and his name was Henry Pawling—had been a clerk in New York and then in Mexico. Induced by a large offer and a strong disposition to ramble and see the country, he accepted a proposal from Mr. Handy. His business was to go on before the caravan, hire a place, give notice, and make preparations for the animals. In this capacity he had travelled all over Mexico, and from thence to Guatemala. It was seven years since he left home and since parting with Mr. Handy he had not spoken a word of his own language: and as he spoke it now it was more than half Spanish. I need not say he was glad to see me.

ÆSOP ILLUSTRATED.

"I have come to ask a favor of you," said an old friend one day to the cautious Mr. —: "I am a little put about for money just now, and I would take it kind if you would let me have your bill for a hundred pounds, for a short time." "I have no doubt of your taking it kind," returned the cool sarcastic man of business; "but I have made up my mind never to give my bill except for value received." "Indeed!" said the indignant applicant; "you seem to have forgot, sir, that when you were in distress, I gave you my bill for a similar sum, and though you have now got rich, you should not forget old friends." "I remember the circumstance you allude to, but really, my dear sir, if you thought me in distress, your doing the needful was no great proof of your wisdom; however, as I paid the bill, you had reason to be thankful that you were no sufferer, by doing what you now wish me to consider an obligation. In the mean time, in return for your favor," continued the good man, "I will give you a word of advice—read the fable of the Fox and the Crane; be thankful for your escape, and never again attempt to relieve a friend in distress with your bill."

A TRUE SKETCH.

A short winter day was just drawing to a close as a young and poorly clad girl reached the door of a splendid mansion in Bleeker street. The servant ushered her into a large and elegant apartment, where sat Mrs. M., the mistress of so much wealth and grandeur, in conversation with a friend. The young girl stood a moment and then courtesied, and presented to Mrs. M. a small bundle, saying, "I hope the work suits you, ma'am."

"The work is well enough," said Mrs. M., examining it carefully, but why did you not bring it before? It is at least a week past the time it was promised.—Unless you are more punctual, and keep your word better, I cannot let you have any more work."

It was growing dark, and the room was not yet lighted, so that the tears that gathered in the girl's eyes could not be seen, but her voice was very tremulous as she answered.

"I did not mean to break my word, ma'am; but my mother has been much worse, and my little brother in chopping wood cut his foot; so I have had"—here her voice became inarticulate, and she hastened out of the room.

"That is always the way with these people" said Mrs. M. "a sick mother, or a cut foot, any thing for an excuse."

Meantime Mary reached the little dwelling she called home. Whether her feelings were laboring under the wound so thoughtlessly inflicted on her mother's illness distressed her, or her heart sickened at the thought of helpless poverty, or it might have been the contrast between the room she had left and the one she had just entered, which forced itself upon her; whatever was the cause, contrary to her usual serenity and care to appear as cheerful as possible before her mother, she covered her face with her hands, and leaning upon the rude table before her, burst into a passion of tears. It was but for a moment, for a faint voice from the bed called; "Mary." She started from her posture of grief, and went to her mother's bed side.—"Mary, dear, wipe your eyes, and sit down by me here, and read the thirty-fourth Psalm; it will do us both good." Mary reached from the shelf the well worn Bible, and seated at the foot of her mother's bed, in a subdued voice read aloud. She had just finished reading the verse, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of them all," when a gentle tap was heard at the door. A little girl some years younger than Mary, opened it and a lady entered.

"Is this where Mary Morris lives?"

Mary started from the bed, "That is my name ma'am."

"Ah yes, you are the one I just saw at Mrs. M.'s. I inquired you out, and have come to see if I can be of any service to you; how is your mother?"

The last tallow candle was dimly burning beside the bed where Mary had been reading. The lady went towards it, and took the hand of the emaciated sufferer.

"Have you any physician?"

"No ma'am. My poor husband's sickness cost me so much, that I have nothing left to pay one. I hope I shall get better in a few days, and then all will go on well; but now it is very hard for poor Mary."

"But you have a high fever, and should be attended to: my husband is a physician, he will call and prescribe for you, and here are some provisions for the children, and Mary just open the door, my servant has brought you a wheel-barrow load of wood ready split; give all your attention to your mother, and you shall be well provided for."

Their hearts were too full for expression of thanks but the lady needed them not to convince her, that there was no luxury like that of doing good. There were tears shed in that humble room that night, not of bitterness, and there were thanksgivings that would put to shame the feeble gratitude of thousands that are increased with good and have need of nothing."

N. B. Mrs. M. went that night to witness the performance of a popular tragedy, and was so overcome by the distresses of the hero and heroine, as to be unable to attend to anything else for several days.

It is said that a printing press has been discovered in China that has been buried over 1000 years. So there is nothing new under the sun.

SHAKERISM.

Mr. Carter, a renouncing shaker, visited this place a few weeks since, and gave two or three lectures on shakerism, and sung some twenty songs, danced, exposed Millers's theory, and did several other things for the amusement of his audience.

The Shakers' creed is a very curious one. They believe in one God, and two persons in the Godhead—male and female, or father and mother—called Power and Wisdom.

They believe that Adam was the Father of the Old Creation, and Eve was the Mother—both being created after the image of God; and that Christ is the Father of the new creation, and Ann Lee the Mother—and that the Millennium commenced with the appearance of Ann Lee on earth.

They believe in the immortality of animals, as well of men. They say that John saw horses in the world of spirits as recorded in Revelations. They believe that all the ugly and venomous animals on earth are symbolical of the evil spirits that inhabit the lower regions of the invisible world, and that all the beautiful creatures, such as birds with gorgeous plumage, are symbolical of the good spirits in the mansions of bliss.

They believe that the souls of shakers, in their trances and visions, really visit the heavenly world. The lancet has been applied to them and their flesh has been sacrificed, while in this state, without producing a particle of blood. One person who visited the land of spirits in a trance, saw all the patriarchs and kings of olden time; saw King David travelling, and Solomon on a snow-white horse; saw Christ and all the Apostles.—Newburyport Watchtower.

A MAN RUINED BY SUDDEN WEALTH.—The Baltimore Sun gives an account of a young man named Benson Starks, from Athens, Ga., who had been remarkably industrious and had acquired a respectable property, but whose intellect was completely disordered by his suddenly coming in possession of $7,000.—Having collected his funds, he took the stage for Baltimore, through which he passed on to Philadelphia, New York and Boston, and ultimately returned to Baltimore having spent nearly all he had. A young gentleman from Virginia came on to induce him, if possible, to return home, but failing in this, requested the police at Baltimore to take him into custody. He had, when taken, two pistols valued at $75, forty-seven pieces of gold coin, amounting to about $235; $91 in paper, and $1 in silver, making in all $402. Five fine gold watches were found upon his person—the chains running around his neck and body. Three valuable breast-pins of the largest size glittered in his bosom.

Cleaning Bottles.—A correspondent is of opinion that a great deal of sickness is produced by the practise of cleansing bottles with shot—the shot containing arsenic. He proposes to avoid this evil by the substitute of paper for shot: as thus—half fill the bottle with spring water, and for shot use waste paper torn into small pieces; shake the bottle well till the water froths, and the bottle will be cleansed in half the time and much better than if shot is used; and, in addition, all danger will be avoided.—Sun.

Dr. Johnson and Miller.—When Dr. Johnson had finished the copy of his Dictionary, which had wearied Miller the bookseller, exceedingly, the latter sent the following card to the Doctor: "Andrew Miller sends his compliments to Mr. Samuel Johnson, with the money for the last sheet of the copy of the Dictionary, and thanks God he has done with him."—The Doctor sent the following brief reply: "Mr. Samuel Johnson sends his compliments to Andrew Miller; he has received his note, and is happy to find that Andrew Miller has the grace to thank God for any thing."

Strange.—A man died on one of the flat boats on the Levee at New Orleans on the 8th, of a disease which baffled his physician. A post mortem examination took place, and upon examining his brain, it was discovered that an insect of about an inch long, known by the name of a centipede or thousand legs, had crawled into his ear, causing thereby an excruciating death.

POPULAR TALES.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

FRANK HEPBURN, A TALE OF TALE-BEARING.

All mankind have agreed that the badge of the informer is infamy; and when a child goes to school, one of the first things he is made to understand by his companions, is that "to tell tales" is to the last degree dishonorable, and that, see what he may that is wrong or contrary, to the laws established, he must keep his knowledge to himself.

That there are many benefits derivable from this arrangement, is not to be denied, but the practice has also its disadvantages, and, carried to its utmost limits, in youth as well as in matured age, is productive of serious harm to society. In the humbler departments of domestic life, the practice of concealing what it is of importance should be made explicitly known, is in a great degree demoralising, and also injurious to the interests of over-confiding employers. An honest girl goes into a situation where she soon discovers that the butler is making too free with his master's cellar, or the lady's maid with her mistress's wardrobe; that the cook is making dishonest perquisites in the kitchen, or the groom in the stables; but she allows the mischief to go on—perhaps hints it to a few of her acquaintances, expresses her disapprobation, wishes master and mistress knew it, but "one don't like to speak—it gets one such an ill name." By and by, the delinquents are discovered; the innocent are confounded with the guilty; they are presumed to have countenanced and approved what they have only acquiesced in for want of courage to interfere; the whole establishment is condemned—they are a bad set, and must take a general clasp. The honest girl loses her place with the rest; and when she seeks another service, she finds the lady "can't take her, because she was one of the gang that were all turned off from Mrs So and So's." The girl loses caste, sinks into a lower grade of service and worse company, and probably ends by committing the very crimes which she at first disapproved of, but had not courage to expose. We have known more than one instance of this in our lives but the worst case that have come under our observation, and those where silence has been both most mischievous and most criminal, has been where the health and safety of young children were concerned—infants too young to make known their own griefs, or to comprehend their amount. There are nurses who drink and neglect their charge; there are others who have violent tempers, and beat and ill-treat them; and there are some, alas! so depraved or so ignorant, that that in order to obtain leisure or liberty, or to avoid being disturbed in the night, they will not scruple to administer alcohol or narcotics, most pernicious draughts to infant lips. More than one little life we have known sacrificed within the last two years by this wickedness, and in each case the crime was not only unpartaken but highly condemned by the under-nurses, who, nevertheless, witnessed the commission of the enormity in silence; and when at length the sufferings of the little victims led to a discovery, had nothing to say but "we didn't like to speak!" One might almost be tempted to ask what human tongues were given for, if not to be used on such an occasion.

When Frank Hepburn was about thirteen, he was apprenticed to Mr. Drummond, a fashionable silk-merchant, residing in Pall Mall; and as he had been respectably educated, brought a good character from school, and was the only son of a widowed mother, whose affection he returned with filial piety, he entered life with as fair prospect of doing well as most lads in the like sphere. Frank's business by day was, at first, chiefly confined to handing things about from counter to counter, and waiting on the shopmen; but at night he was often engaged assisting the shop porters till ten or eleven o'clock in carrying home goods to the different purchasers in various parts of the town. One evening, Frank, after a fatiguing peregrination, which had extended from St. Paul's the east to Hyde Park corner in the west, was overtaken on his way to Montague Square by a sudden thunder storm. The rain poured down in torrents, and as the parcel he was conveying consisted of a delicate satin, whose only defence from the weather was paper wrapper, he thought it advisable to seek shelter for a few minutes till the violence of the shower abated. It was past ten o'clock and although many shops were still open, the doors were universally shut; so Frank turned into the first public-house he saw, by accident he overheard snatches of a conversation in an adjoining room. He thought he knew one of the voices; and when the door was opened by the waiter in answer to the bell, he described one of Mr. Drummond's shopmen, whose name was Lines, sitting by a table, on which were the remains of a supper, in company with another man. Not from any desire to conceal himself, or to listen to the conversation, but simply because the situation of Lines being much superior to his own, he did not feel himself entitled to intrude on the party, Frank took no steps towards making known his proximity, but remained quietly where he was. In a few minutes, the thread of a previous discourse was resumed. "Altogether, then," he heard the stranger observe, "you must make a capital thing of it."

"Not so bad," answered Lines, "considering the salary is but eighty pounds a year; but the perquisites bring it up to about three hundred, and a fellow may contrive to rub upon that." "Rub on!—I fancy so," said the other. "But tell me, Ned, how do you manage it?"

"Easy enough, in such a concern as ours," answered Lines, "where every body's in a bustle, and there's a constant succession of strangers."

"But what's the trick?" inquired Jack.

"Why," replied Lines, "on every article I sell, that is, when the purchasers are strangers, and I see they are going to lay down the money, I put on two pence or threepence a yard, according as I see who I've to deal with; sometimes on a shawl or a cloak, or goods that sort, I get as much as ten or twelve shillings. I have got as much as a pound at one slap. Every body is so busy, there's no time to be looking after each other; besides, I've only to say I made a mistake in the mark, and there's an end of it."

Here the conversation sunk to whispers; and, sufficiently shocked with what he had heard, Frank rushed from the house, and proceeded on his errand, his head full of Lines' disclosures. "What a rogue," thought he, "that fellow is!—and to think that I should have found him out by such a mere accident! But rouse-ry is always found out sooner or later. I wish master knew it—I think I ought to tell him. But I suppose if I do, I shall make the place too hot to hold me;—they'll all be against me, I'd bet any thing, and ask what business it was of mine—and, to be sure, it's no business of mine. Tell tales are certain to get the worst of it, so I suppose I'd better hold my tongue; he'll be sure to be found out before long, one way or other." And consoling himself with this persuasion, he returned home and went to bed; and although the next morning, when Mr. Drummond spoke kindly to him, and inquired when he had seen his mother, he felt strongly prompted to communicate what he had heard, yet the apprehension of the ruin he should bring on Lines, and the contempt and reprobation he might himself incur, deterred him, and kept him silent.

His curiosity being so far excited, however, he could not help, after this, watching Lines when he saw him serving the customers; contriving often to be standing near; or passing behind, at the moment the accounts were being settled. He observed that Lines always proceeded to the till immediately, and apparently deposited the amount; but by close observation he discovered that some minutes afterwards, when he was clearing away the goods he had been serving, he took an opportunity of conveying the surplus to his pocket.

It was impossible, however, for Frank to continue long this system of espionage without attracting the attention of Lines; and once or twice their eyes happened to meet at the very critical moment when the dishonest gains were finding their way into their destined receptacle. Lines, in short, saw that he was watched, feared that he was discovered, and, naturally set about to consider how he should elude the danger, and remove the boy from his path. In the mean time as a precautionary measure, he changed his tactics, rarely ventured to make a surcharge when Frank was in the shop; and when he did, instead of depositing his booty in his pocket, he watched his opportunity to conceal it, sometimes in one place sometimes in another, till an opportunity offered for him to go out and take it with him. Thus, in the interim, if a suspicion had arisen, and he were searched no money would be found about him; and if by chance the hidden store, were discovered, it would not be easy to find on the owner.

As he feared Frank, and looked upon him as his enemy, he of course hated him too; and in the hope of finding some opportunity of throwing discredit on the boy's character, and thus diminish his power to harm himself, he watched as intensely as he was watched. But to no purpose. Frank was an honest steady lad, and did his duty; and the more Lines watched him, the less chance he saw of accomplishing his purpose. But here fortune came to his aid in a manner altogether unexpected.

One night, or rather morning, for it was towards two hours after midnight, Frank, who had a bed in a close entering from the shop, was awakened by a knocking at the door, and after listening a moment to make sure he was not deceived, the boy arose, and asked who was there.

"Open the door, for God's sake!" cried a hurried voice: don't you know the house is on fire?—the people will be burnt in their beds!"

Deprived of all presence of mind and power of reflection by this terrific announcement, Frank turned the key and withdrew the bolts at once; and the moment he had done so, a stout man and a lad rushing in, exclaimed, "Run for your life and wake some of the people while we try to save some of the property." And away flew Frank up the stairs, thundering at all the doors, and crying "Fire!" without ever stopping to ascertain where the fire was.

Roused from their heavy sleep, confused and scared, the inmates of the several rooms turned out—some with a counterpane, some with a blanket hastily drawn over their shoulders, some with nothing on but their night clothes, and some with trousers or petticoats in their hands, that for their lives they could not find the way into. "Where is the fire?" resounded on all sides, as they rushed down the stairs, preceded by Frank. "Where's the fire?" reiterated every body when they entered the shop, where all was still dark. Frank, who was foremost, ran into the street, and looked up for the flames he expected to see bursting through the windows. Not a gleam of light was to be seen. The boy stood confounded. "Where's the fire you young jackanapes?" cried Lines; "come this way sir. Where's the fire I say!"—and he grasped the boy by the arm.

"I don't know," said Frank; "the watchman knocked at the door and told me of it, and sent me up to wake you all."

"I!" exclaimed the watchman, who, drawn to the spot by the commotion, had just arrived in time to hear this explanation; "I told you of it! I did no such thing! I haven't been out of the street for the last half hour."

"I can't tell who it was, then," said poor Frank.—"I saw two persons, and I thought they were watchmen, I'm sure; and was so afraid that you'd all be burnt in your beds, as they said you would, that I never stooped to look at them, nor to see where the fire was either."

By this time, Mr. Drummond, who had been hitherto occupied in looking after his wife and children, approached the group; and some one having procured a light, the whole party returned into the shop, Lines keeping fast hold of Frank's arm, and dragging him along with him. It was perfectly clear that the alarm was a false one; and Mr. Drummond, having sent his family to bed again, began calmly to inquire of Frank the meaning of what had happened; but Frank could only repeat what he had said before. Strange as the story seemed, Mr. Drummond, having a good opinion of the boy, was disposed to believe him; but Lines shook his head significantly, and suggested that it would be as well to see if there were any thing missing out of the shop; for his part, he did not like the looks of the business at all.

Upon this hint, a survey being made, it was discovered, that from a small room at the extremity of the shop, where the books were kept, a drawer of the desk had been carried off, which contained cash to the amount of several pounds.

This cleared up the mystery as to the motive of the visitors; and, but for the malice of Lines, would have to go on, established in Mr Drummond's mind the truth of Frank's story. But Lines took care not only to make a parade of suspicion himself, but contrived to put it into the heads of others to suspect too; till presently there arose a murmur amongst the bystanders, "that the boy's account of the affair certainly might be true but that it was very extraordinary, and ought to be looked into;" whilst the watchman, who had been huffed at Frank's insinuation that two intruders had been doing duty on his beat, thought proper to take the same view of the case, and strongly recommended that the youth should be conveyed straightway to the lock-up-house, and kept there till morning.

To these energetic proceedings, however, Mr Drummond, who was a temperate man, would not consent; but he did yield so far as to allow Frank to be locked up in a bed room up stairs, whilst another apprentice took his place in the shop for the rest of the night.

Thoroughly disturbed by all this commotion, indisposed to sleep by being turned out of his usual dormitory, and forseeing, besides, that Frank being in a sort of arrest, his usual duty of cleaning and setting the shop in order would fall to his lot, this young man arose with the dawn of light, and commenced his operations; and acting upon the well-established axiom that "new brooms sweep clean," he set about the business in a much more radical manner than Frank would have thought necessary—routing out every little hole and corner, waking the flies, disturbing the spiders, dusting and knocking about the things at an uncommon rate; and having in the full energy of these proceedings overturned a pile of empty card boxes, he discovered, stuffed in behind them, a little pile of loose cash, silver and pence, amounting to about five pounds.

The money had evidently been purposely concealed, and the lad, when he remitted it to Mr. Drummond, on that gentleman's appearance, suggested that it was most likely part of the sum abstracted from the cash drawer. "But that is improbable," objected Mr. Drummond; "why should they leave it there?" Frank, who had been released from his confinement by his master, and was standing beside him at the moment this observation was made, involuntarily looked toward Lines; their eyes met; Frank knew who had hidden the money, and Lines knew saw that he knew it.

The moment was critical; fear is cruel; and Lines was rendered desperate by the excess of his peril. "Perhaps," whispered he, just loud enough to be heard, "perhaps it is the youngster's share of the booty."

In an instant every eye was turned on Frank. "You know better," said he, bursting into tears; "you know very well who put it there."

"I!" exclaimed Lines with well-feigned astonishment; "how should I know any thing about it?"

"You know you put it there yourself," sobbed the boy. The testimony of an eyewitness, who had sworn that the money found was, as Lines had suggested, Frank's share of the booty, could not have told more decisively against the poor lad than did this apparently random accusation—flung out, as it appeared to the bystanders, against Lines, who so honestly had never been doubted, for no other reason in the world but that he had been the first to hit upon the true interpretation of the mystery. The boy was forthwith pronounced a shameless young vagabond; nobody, not even Mr. Drummond, would listen to a word he had to say in his own vindication; and whilst an officer was sent for to examine the premises, the reputed criminal was locked up in the room whence the cash had been abstracted.

When the constable arrived, and had been duly put in possession of the circumstances, and the suspicions attached to Frank, he was conducted into the place of the boy's confinement, that he might inspect the immediate locality of the robbery, and examine the supposed criminal, who, with head on the table, and his face buried in his pocket handkerchief, was shedding torrents of repentant tears for not having done his duty by exposing Lines in the first instance, when no ill motive could have been assigned for the accusation, and when Mr Drummond might have easily satisfied himself of its justice.

When the officer had spent a becoming time in examining the room, the door, and the desk, and proved to a certainty, what every body knew before, that the drawer was gone and the cash with it, he desired Frank to hold up his head and give his account of the matter. When the boy had concluded his story—which, of course, was only a repetition of what he had said before—the officer, who had been looking attentively, asked him if he were sure he was not acquainted with the men he had let into the house, and whether he had not been in the habit of meeting them at "the Lock and Key" in the Edgeware road. Frank declared he had never been at "the Lock and Key" in his life, and that, as for the men, he had not only never seen them before, but that he should not know them if he saw them now, having been too frightened and hurried to think of looking at their faces. All he knew was, that one was a stout man, and the other a little one. "Ay, ay," replied the officer, "I know 'em well enough. But are you sure now you was never at 'the Lock and Key'?" Recollect yourself, I think I saw you there myself once."

"It's no use recollecting," answered. "I'm quite sure I never was there."

"It's a pity young gentlemen have such short memories," remarked the officer. "What! you wasn't there one wet Saturday night about three months ago, eh? Didn't I see you when you came out of the door?"

The recollection of the public house where he had taken shelter, and where he had first acquired the knowledge of the shopman's dishonest proceedings, now flashed upon the boy's mind; and as memory recurred to him, the innocent blood rushed into his cheeks.

"Ah, I think you remember it now!" said the official, chuckling at the boy's confusion, and the triumph of his own sagacity—"I thought I should bring it to recollection;" and then, taking Mr. Drummond aside, he proceeded to relate how, having an appointment, connected with his office, at "the Lock and Key," which was a well-known flash house, on the night in question, he had there seen Frank issue from the door in a more than usual hurry.

Mr. Drummond was thunderstruck by this confirmation of Frank's guilt, and shocked at the extreme perversion which such habits argued, contrasted with his external prudent bearing and almost demure demeanor. Fortunately however, for the boy, Mr. Drummond was both a sensible and a merciful man, and shrunk from condemning the culprit to the hopeless destruction both of morals and of character that would be the consequence of a committal to jail. He therefore obstinately declined the constable's proposal of taking him to Marlborough-street at once; and dismissing that indignant official with a promise of sending for him when he was wanted, he locked the door of Frank's prison, and dispatched a messenger to Mrs. Hepburn, requesting her immediate presence.

The poor lad, choked with tears, and hopeless of being believed, had made no attempt to account for his visit to "the Lock and Key" before Mr. Drummond and the officer; but when his mother arrived, he started to his feet, and throwing his arms around her neck, he eagerly poured out the whole history to one whom he knew would faith in his narration. And the mother did put faith in it, and she told his master that she would answer with her life for her Frank's honesty and truth.

Mr. Drummond had a high opinion of the widow, and did not think himself justified in slighting her testimony. He told her, therefore, that she must take her son away with her till he could make up his mind further on the subject, enjoining on her, in the mean time, absolute silence with respect to the story Frank had told in his own justification. He then privately employed a person he could rely on to watch Lines, both in the shop and when he went out of an evening.

His enemy being removed, Lines thought himself safe; and it was not long before, by the pursuit of his criminal gains, he had betrayed his own guilt, and vindicated the truth of his accuser. He was dismissed with ignominy and loss of character, whilst Frank was honorably reinstated in his situation and in his master's favor.

But had Frank been a motherless boy, or Mr. Drummond a hasty and inconsiderate man, the chances are many that the lad would have been irretrievably ruined, because he had not the courage to expose guilt, in which he not only did not participate but which he utterly abhorred.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

For the American Masonic Register and Literary Companion.

DRINKING FROM SKULLS.

It does not appear from the writings of the Classics that the Romans were addicted to intemperance.—Their general convivial beverage was water mixed with wine. It has often, therefore, been asked "whence did the Anglo-Saxons, take their custom of immoderate drinking?" Probably all the northern nations, "the swarm of Barbarians which desolated the Roman Empire, were more or less prone to Intemperance.—Among the Scandinavian tribes, it was deemed the highest point of felicity, that they should in a future state, be seated in the hall of Odin, and there get intoxicated by swallowing strong drinks from the Skulls of those over whom they triumphed in battle.

"Bibemus cerevisiam.
Ex concavis craniorum crateribus."
"from hollow Skulls we'll drink our ale."

The Latin is a translation from one of the old Runic Songs. Consequently we observe that it was not from the refined and literary ancient Romans, but from the violent, bloodthirsty and ruthless semi-savage that drunkenness may date its origin, so far at least, as relates to the various nations subjugated to the Roman power.

The Italian Poet Marino, to whom, it is said, Milton owes not a few of the splendid Images in Paradise Lost, makes the corclave of the damned in Pandemonium, "quaff wine from the pericranium of Minerva." Mandeville relates that the old Guebres exposed the dead bodies of their parents to the fowls of the air, reserving only their Skulls, of which he says, "the son maketh a cuppe and therefrom drinketh with great devotion."

In the early English dramatists, mention is not unfrequently made of converting skulls into drinking cups. In Middleton's "Witch," when the Duke takes a bowl, and is told it is a skull, he replies,

"Call it a soldier's cup;
Our Duchess, I know, will pledge us, 'ho! the cup
Were once her Father's head, which as a trophy,
We'll keep till death."

Massinger has frequent allusions to this custom; and in "Dekker's wonder of a Kingdom," Torrenti says,

"W.uld I had ten thousand soldiers' heads,
Their skulls set all in silver to drink healths
To his confusion who first invented war."

But as Sir Thomas Browne observes, "to be knaved out of our graves, to have our skulls made drinking bowls, and our bones turned into pipes to delight and sport our enemies are tragical abominations"—yet it has been often related, that of this tragical abomination a British nobleman and Poet has been guilty.—It is reported that Lord Byron when a youth ransacked the cemetery of his ancestors at Newstead Abbey, for a Skull,—sufficiently capacious and sound, to convert into a carousing bowl. That he had it mounted with silver, and wrote an inscription to be put on it.

Enough has been said to convince the reader that the crime of drunkenness was more prevalent among the savage and barbarous nations; that the summum bonum of their rewards hereafter, was a hope of being in a beastly state of intoxication, mixing with it the disgusting pleasure of drinking out of Skulls!! It is not to be wondered at, that so long as the most refined pleasures of a whole nation should consist of such degrading traits of human nature, no higher degree of intellect should exist in nations so greatly demoralized; consequently we find scarcely a dawn of Science, through a long course of ages—all was dark, horrible, fearful, gloomy, and hopeless, in the benighted souls of such a race.

MOLLY PITCHER.

We recorded, says an exchange paper, the death of Lynn, of Mrs. Rebecca Short, aged 76, daughter of the celebrated "Moll Pitcher." A correspondent makes the inquiry "who was the celebrated Moll Pitcher?" A scrap from the history of American revolution will give a full answer.

In the beginning of the renowned battle of Monmouth, Molly Pitcher was occupied in carrying water from a spring to a battery, where her husband was employed in loading and firing a cannon. He was shot dead at last, and she saw him fall. An officer rode up and ordered off the cannon. 'It can be of no use now' said he. But Molly stepped up, offered her services, and took her husband's place, to the astonishment of the army. She fought well, and half pay for life was given her by congress. She wore an epaulette, and was ever after called captain Molly.

John Randolph's Grave.—A gentleman on a visit to the residence of the late John Randolph, writes to the National Intelligencer, as follows: "The body of this extraordinary man reposes beneath the tall branches of a veteran pine, about forty paces from his summer dwelling. No marble marks the place of his repose. He was buried, according to his own request, with his head to the east, and his feet to the west, with a white unpolished stone at his head, and a black one at his feet. He sleeps where he lived in the peaceful bosom of his native forest."

At a camp meeting held in Connecticut, a preacher delivered himself of the following.

"I would that the gospel were a wedge and I a beetle, I would whack it into every sinner's heart among you."

Story Telling.—It is a curious circumstance, that blockheads are generally far better story tellers than clever men. This is indeed so often true, that when I hear of a person's being great, I am apt to place him in the catalogue of asses.—Macnish

Albany, Saturday, July, 24, 1841.

THE PRIZE ADDRESS.—We would remind those whom it may concern, that we shall expect, all such Addresses to come to us free from cost. There is a package now lying in the post office, from Holly-Springs, (Miss.) on which is taxed some $2 postage. Any package out of the State, sent to New-York, by private hand, and dropped in the box at that Post office, directed to the care of James Herring, Esq. Grand Secretary will safely reach us. As this facility, may induce efforts from those who would be unwilling to pay the postage on their Articles, we have thought it expedient to extend the time from the fourth of August, to the first of September next.

A BANKRUPT LAW.—A large and respectable meeting of citizens, was held at the Capitol on Tuesday evening last, in relation to the passage of a general Bankrupt law. The Mayor, presided, and suitable resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting were passed. There appears throughout the country, a general disposition for the passage of such a law, which no doubt in the main, would be attended with beneficial results. If a man honestly fails to meet his engagements, and surrenders up all his possessions, both the laws of justice and humanity seem to require that the "pound of flesh" should not be exacted. Society, as well as the wants of a family require the bone and sinews of almost every man; and we believe this is all which the contemplated law is expected to give him. Many a sterling merchant—many an ingenious mechanic has been lost to community—whose early prospects had been clouded by misfortune, who being unable to raise themselves under the pressure of their responsibilities, have sunk under the weight of them; and reckless of character or health, plunged in dissipation, until death has finally balanced the ledger, between them and their creditors. There is no doubt but rogues will take advantage of such a law; and their case can only be reached by severe enactments. All good laws are subject to this objection; but because evils will arise, we see no reason why the unfortunate should be made to suffer.

A CAUTION TO BOYS.—A lad, 12 or 13 years, son of Mr. John Connery, of this city, in attempting to get on one of the rail-road cars, as it was entering the city, fell on the track, and before the train could be stopped, several of them passed over his leg and arm, mangled them in a shocking manner. After lingering for several hours in the utmost distress, he expired. We have often observed, with extreme terror, the daring temerity of boys in climbing on the cars, while under full speed; and it is only a matter of surprise to us, that no more accidents occur. Those having charge of the cars, should strictly prohibit boys from coming near them. It was probably owing to a mistaken act of kindness, on the part of the driver, that this little fellow lost his life.

LITERARY.—The Argus of Tuesday last, contains two rare specimens of splendid literary effort on the part of two young ladies, at the recent examination at the Albany Female Academy. We observe but one defect in these "compositions" to mar their otherwise singular and unspeakable beauties—which is to be found in the three introductory lines being in the English language. Had this not been the case, ninety-hundredths of the readers of the Argus would have arose from the perusal of the "compositions," equally delighted and edified.

The rogues are making improvements in their line of business. Several robberies have lately been committed, when for a certain percentage, the money is promised to be returned, provided no questions are asked. Several official gentlemen have been negotiators, in this kind of business, who are no doubt as honest—as circumstances will admit.

THE OLD ALBANY ARTILLERY, second to no company in the state, are to have an excursion to Catskill, on Monday next, on board of the Steam Boat Illinois, chartered for the occasion, with her barges. It is to be a temperance affair throughout. A cotillion band will be in attendance, and we feel assured that the party will enjoy all they anticipate, from this rational and healthy mode of passing away a prospectively hot day. Tickets $1, designed for a gentleman and two ladies.

The American Magazine and Repository of Useful Literature, is the title of a new monthly just published in this city, by Mr. B. Wood. It is neatly printed, and its matter is chiefly original. It is afforded at $1 50 per annum.

The Senate of the U. S. by a vote of 23 to 20, have passed the Loan Bill, and it now only awaits the signature of the President, to become a law. This bill authorises a loan of 12,000,000 of dollars, at an interest of six per cent, reimbursable in not less than three nor more than eight years.

MADAME RESTELL, has been found guilty in her late trial for producing the death of Mrs. Purdy.—Madame Restell was a celebrated female physician in New York, who lent her aid to attain the most disgraceful results. She will now soon receive her reward.

Troy has raised two thousand dollars for the sufferers at the late fire at Waterford. Should not Albany do something?

POVERTY.—In France out of a population of thirty-two millions, twenty-two millions have but six cents a day to defray all expenses—food, lodging, raiment, and education. England and Ireland are in no better condition.

The U. S. ship Ohio, a 74, com. Hull, from the Mediterranean, arrived at Boston on Saturday morning last.

It is now understood, that the council for McLeod, will not appeal his case to the Court of Errors. McLeod, is now anxious to go before a jury. He is sanguine of an acquittal. His trial will take place in Utica, in September next.

Sir Robert Peel, in his speech to the Electors of Tamworth, states that the number of slaves annually brought from the coast of Africa to Cuba, is at least 50,000.

A clerk in the employ of Marie & Decoppet, 59 Wall-street, N. York, absconded on Saturday with $9000 of his employers funds—$500 is offered for his detection.

Mr. Fredericks, the tragedian, and Charlotte Cushman, well known on the Albany boards, have united their destinies, "for better for worse." If Fredericks don't make an affectionate husband, Charlotte will whip into it. She is amply able.

An attempt was made a few days since, by a colored girl, living with Dr. Cooke of Williamsburg, to poison his whole family, by mixing arsenic with the tea water. The girl, it appears entertained a hatred to some of the ladies, and took this means to be revenged.

MISSION TO CHINA.—The Washington correspondent of the N. Y. Express says that it is not improbable that a special mission will soon be created to China, to represent and protect American interests in that important quarter of the world.

The celebrated Abernethy, on being asked, what was good for the gout, replied, live on sixpence a day, and earn it.

An American Bishop in Prison.—The following is handed to us for publication, as a copy of a letter communicated to the Secretary of State. We have no knowledge of the character of the author of the letter, but are informed by him that he had seen the Bishop of Detroit in Rome, and vouched for the truth and soberness of his address to the Government. We are not fully aware of the extent of the power of the Pope over those who acknowledge their allegiance to him, but we had supposed that his supremacy was only spiritual, and did not profess to extend to temporal matters, or to the lives and liberties of American citizens. We know not to what conditions Bishop Rese may have subscribed as the price of his liberty, but as an American citizen, claiming the protection of his Government, he is entitled to it, unless he has been guilty of some crime against the laws where he is imprisoned. The arrest and imprisonment of McLeod, under more justifiable circumstances for aught that we see, set England in a blaze. What will Americans say and do if it shall appear that one of their citizens has been arrested and incarcerated by a foreign power, without any violation of civil or criminal law?—Madisonian of Sat.

To the Hon. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State.

Sir:—I hasten to make known to the Government of the United States of America, a fact of a serious character, and highly interesting to the national dignity of the country.

The Bishop of Detroit, Michigan, Mr. Reese, an American citizen, is confined in a dungeon of Rome without communication with any living person, and consequently without the knowledge of the American Minister resident there—a target for the blackest calumnies, and a victim of the most atrocious persecutions from his colleagues here in religious matters. He was summoned to Rome towards the end of 1838, if I am not mistaken; and in 1839, when I made his acquaintance, he was confined in a Convent under an ecclesiastical prosecution. On the process being completed, he was ordered to resign. This he refused to do; and then he was thrown in a dungeon, perhaps of the Inquisition, where three other Bishops are lying. There he is overwhelmed with sufferings, and tortured to oblige him to resign, and all possible measures were taken to prevent him from invoking the protection of the diplomatic agents of his own country. A similar case had happened to the Bishop of Philadelphia, Mr. Cornwell. But this prelate, whilst in the same position of Mr. Reese, was fortunate enough to make his escape from Rome; and arrested in Paris, under Charles the Xth, by order of the Pope, was set at liberty through the intervention of the American Minister.

Thinking that the Government of the United States are to look upon their citizens under no religious aspect, but merely as free citizens of this Union, I could scarcely believe but that, in consequence of this disclosure, ready and efficacious steps will be taken to cause the Papal Government to be called to account for such scandalous abuse of its spiritual power.

I have the honor to be

Your most obedient servant,

BERNARDIUS CASTELLI.

PIRACY.—Levin Lawson, captain of the schooner Sylph, of Indian Key Florida, was yesterday arrested on the complaint of Mrs. Elizabeth Housman, owner of the said vessel, which was licensed for the purpose of wrecking on the coast of Florida, and on the 18th of June last, Lawson decamped with vessel and cargo without her knowledge or consent, and as she believed, with a felonious intention.—Express.

Awful Effects of Intemperance.—A most horrible accident occurred last week in the Co. of Two Mountains, Lower Canada; a man, while in a state of intoxication, having fallen into a kettle of boiling potash, was completely dissolved. Search was made for his body, but not the least particle of it could be found.

THE MARKET, JULY 20.—Flour stands just as for several days past. Sales Genesee $5 50; Ohio $5 37; Georgetown dull at $5 50. The first sample of new wheat appeared this morning from North Carolina; it looks well, but was not sold. Rye is in demand at 62¢; no sales of Corn. 500 bbls. Whole Oil sold at 30 cents. Pot Ashes have risen to $5 50 sales, and holders ask $5 75. Pearls remain at $5 25.—Jour. Com.

Peoples' Line Steamboats.

The boats of the Peoples' Line being now all in complete order, will continue to run between Albany and New-York, until further notice as follows:

THE ROCHESTER, Capt. St. John, and SOUTH AMERICA, Capt. Brainard, will form a daily Night Line, one of them leaving the foot of Hamilton street every evening (except Sunday) at 7 o'clock, through without landing.

HALF DAILY NIGHT LINE, at 5 o'clock.

THE NORTH AMERICA, Capt. Truesdell, will run a Half Daily Night Line, leaving the foot of State street, every other evening at 5 o'clock, making the regular landings.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the Pier, foot of Hamilton street. jyl7.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED

THE Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 159 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families. Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old customers and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12 1-2 cents per day—jyl9—ly

A. W. STARKS

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons, on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to: "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

GENERAL AGENCY, for Foreign and Domestic Law, collecting and transacting business. Office Main street, opposite the "TELEGRAPH" office, Houston, Republic of Texas.

The undersigned has made arrangements in the United States, England, France, Germany, and Mexico, for attending to claims of every kind, and to the settlement of the estates of deceased soldiers and others.

All kinds of documents, public or private, made cut in original, in the English, French, Spanish, German, Russian, and Italian languages, or translated from either of them into any one required.

Old settlers will find the services of the undersigned useful in completing their land titles, in cases where any of the formalities of the Mexican laws are wanting; or the execution thereof by the authorities omitted, by procuring authentic copies of the same, from the Mexican records to complete the chain of titles.

New settlers and land speculators can avail themselves of his services, by having examined the Spanish titles to Texas lands, and consulting him in relation to the genuineness and validity of the same, previous to entering into final contract.

Commanding of every description executed. jyl10

POETRY.

For the American Masonic Register.
POEM,

Pronounced before the Young Men's Association, July 5th, at the 2nd Presbyterian Church.

BY FREDERIC W. COLE.

A filial care was that which sought
The martyrs' grave in Scotia's land,
And back from cold oblivion brought
The men'ry of that hunted band
Whose Bethel spots were fields and caves
Which Persecution's murderous hand
Has marked and hallowed with their graves:
A pious hand that yearly came
To deepen on the mossy stone
The ever-venerated name
Of each good Cameronian
Who Church and Court corrupt withstood
And conscience kept at cost of blood.
We love the man* who thus could keep
The spots where Covenanters sleep,
For they were privileged to be
The Pioneers of Liberty.
We love his work: We meet to-day
Our father's monuments to view,
To sweep the cumbering dust away
And touch each epitaph anew.
We need not seek them on the height
To which Aurora's car of light
First ushers the exulting day
Fresh born from Massachusetts Bay;
Nor do we see them over those
Who met our infant country's foes,
Where boasting Britain howed again,
On Saratoga's sandy plain.
We need not on their ashes rear
Like serfs of old, a senseless stone,
For monuments to them are here—
Yes here! nor are they here alone:
Their names and deeds with graphic art
Are traced upon the Nation's heart.
Not wrought upon a summers' day
For Time's gray wing to brush away,
No—he may toil with restless care
This spirit sculpture to decay,
But millions yet to come shall swear
Each year to grave it deeper there!
The men who Freedom's battle fought,
And with their blood for us have bought,
The right of liberty and life
From manly sires their spirit caught,
Who won the priceless right of thought,
Amid the Reformations strife.
That blood which the invader's steel
Draw forth, the Patriot pledge to seal,
And which our Fathers freely gave,
Through centuries, from sire to son
Knew not the pulses of a slave,
But coursed through Freeman's veins alone.
Who were those Freeman? Men who fled
A church and state Procrustean bed.
The Brownist, by the Mayflower borne;
The Huguenot, from Gallia torn;
The follower of fearless Fox;
The non-conforming son of Knox;
The Catholic; all sought the west,
By Persecution's hellish ire,
By pillory and rack and fire—
Weaned from their mother country's breast.
The church that needs the civil arm
As her support and shield from harm,
Might well in such bold spirits see
A source of trouble and alarm:
The light of truth had made them free.
From those—like a Mellenial morn
Our Nation springs, Minerva born.
What though the Pilgrims in their turn
Inflicted torture they had known,
And what they taught, refused to learn;
The truth they planted had not grown.
Penn, Williams, Calvert nursed the shoot,
The Revolution was its fruit.
Behold it now! The noble tree

Of our religious liberty.
Its branches are our bulwarks made,
The christian graces love its shade,
And near its root where they have grown
Our civil rights its shelter own,
While Europe hears, beyond the seas,
When it is swept by Freedom's breeze,
Its boughs a triumph song rehearse
O'er Priestcraft's conscience binding curse.
Who whispers that this tree will fall
Or trembling says it must decay?
His coward heart is fit for thrall,
He has no part with us to-day.
Who, in this exiled stranger's land,
As in derision of our hope
With bigot heart and faithless hand
Points a suspicion at the Pope?
For shame! Forgetting Maryland,*
He loads with his oppression hate
The memory of Baltimore;
And in the act we celebrate
O'erlooks the part that Carroll bore.
Our hearts, these high and holy themes
Warm with a constant genial glow,
But Luxury's delusive dreams
May weave a web of future woe.
Soon, where our banner courts the wind,
A hundred stars shall greet the eye,
A hundred states our Union bind,
And, Eden like, its centre lie
Where mixing with Missouri's tide
The Mississippi's waters boil,
And with majestic swiftness glide
To glut the hungry sea with soil.
Then we may need for Freedom's sake
The echos of this day to wake—
This band that holds the sacred past
In union close, and firm and fast
To all that faith the most sublime
Can hope for man in coming time—
Who, if we break this precious chain
Will weld its magic links again?
No! Freeman still this feast shall keep,
And guard in love from year to year
The places where our heroes sleep
Not with the mourners sigh and tear
But with a high and honest pride
In holding that for which they died.
Not darkly will they view the past
As if to find perfection there
But holding all its lessons fast
Improve the good with grateful care,
And errors mark with honest pen
Of every age.—Aye, even this!
They'll grant to no frail, erring men
A fulsome apotheosis;
Nor yet ungrateful will they prove
To those who benefit the state,
For they shall learn from us to love
The nobly good, and truly great:
Then badges, shame such idle fears;
And we, alas! have seen of late
The witness of the Nation's tears
That none of all her good and brave
Shall sink unhonored to the grave.
No beaten path Columbia treads
Of Europe's time-worn precedent,
Her feet are now above the heads
Of those to whom old sages bent;
And still she rises, still her track
Is upward, like her eagle's flight,
Nor shall she turn in weakness back
Till, from that undiscovered height
Where man is man, and all his wrongs
From fellow man are turned to right,
She sheds on earth's unnumbered throngs
Her dew of love and beam of light.
No conquest marks this brilliant way—
Our Eagle is no bird of prey;
He screams to wake no slavish fears
Nor wets his crest with woman's tears;
His high ambition is to bring
Balm for the Nations on his wing.
And he is strong! Ah yes, to drag
The serpent from his mountain crag!

(*) Geo. Calvert, (Lord Baltimore) founder of the Colony of Maryland, first gave the world an example of Religious toleration. He was a Roman Catholic.

Shall he not guard his nest as well
As when first breaking from his shell?
He loves the Olive's gracious bough,
And fondly clasps it even now,
But let no naughty foe forget
He firmly holds his arrows yet.
The grandest glory of the past
Is but a beam of promise, cast
Like Iris on the cloud, to show
How bright the future day shall glow,
Let not our eyes, bedim'd with night,
Shut out the flood of coming light,
But with a glad and grateful gaze
Hail each precursor of its blaze;
And dare to hope that social grief
May here receive its full relief.
Here shall the reeking brow of toil
Preside upon its own domain,
Which now too long has been the spoil
Of idle pomp and greedy gain.
Here labor shall be seen to be Too big with blessings to be sold,
And sloth be stamped with infamy
Though glittering in ancestral gold.
And here Religion, modest maid,
Now sickly from her recent thrall,
In panoply of truth arrayed
Shall sway the willing hearts of all.
Unhappy maid, of heavenly birth!
How sad her history on earth.
With flowing robe, with trumpet voice
And men to make the heart rejoice,
Her only trust Messiah's name
Forth from the wilderness she came.
But Prince and Priest must needs engage
To dress her for a courtly cage—
She spurned their care, and wild with fright
West, o'er the waters took her flight
To bring her precious boon to us.
Thus Daphne fled from Delius;
And as the god, when he had found
His love transformed to laurel, bound
The smooth and ever verdant bough
As Glory's guerdon to his brow,
So did Columbia in youth
Win the rich crown of Christian truth.
Nor shall it ever cease to shed
Its sacred halo round her head.

MASONIC ODE,

BY THOMAS POWER, OF BOSTON.

Blest ART of ancient fame!
Let echo's voice proclaim
The welcome word:
May this divine decree—
Man's dearest bond shall be
Indulgent CHARITY—
Still sound abroad.

When chaos fled from earth,
Then ORDER first had birth
In forms of LIGHT:
'Twas Wisdom's own behest
That STRENGTH should ever rest
Where BEAUTY stood confess'd
In radiance bright.

Then God's most perfect plan,
In love to feeble man,
Was kindly given:
With LEVEL, PLUMB and SQUARE,
Form rose from rudeness there,
Proportions just and fair:
The boon of Heaven.

Should sorrow seek relief,
Then be another's grief
In kindness there:
A tear for human woe,
Soft pity's warmest glow,
Let each true brother know
Our constant care.

Come join a brother's joy;
In sweetest notes employ
This festal day:
Let each fraternal tie
Its purest FAITH imply,
Our HOME still fixed on high,
In cloudless ray.

MASONIC.

For the American Masonic Register

ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Masonic Bodies assembled at the city of Hudson, June 24th, 1841.

BY JOSEPH P. PIRSSONS, ESQ.

I do not admit however that the custom of masonic entertainments was ever by any means universal in this Country. It was always discountenanced by discreet brethren as a direct violation of our principles; and where it was practised, it arose from social and generous impulses.

It cannot be denied, that the custom is a baneful one, and I rejoice that it is fast falling into decay.—We cannot my brethren, be too cautious in our carriage and behavior; for recollect, that we are bound "to support the dignity of our character on every occasion, by steadily persevering in the practise of every commendable virtue." Nevertheless there are peculiar seasons of festivity set apart in the masonic calendar; (like the present,) when it is perfectly right and proper that we should relax into innocent hilarity, having first, with all due reverence by appropriate ceremonies, paid homage to the day.

It is within the plan of this day's celebration to partake of an entertainment before we disperse to our respective homes, in accordance with the usage of the craft from time immemorial; and also to bring brethren living far apart together, and of giving them an opportunity of becoming personally known to each other. And it was very grateful to my feelings to read in the programme of ceremonies published in a newspaper of this city, and which was transmitted to me by a most estimable brother, companion and fellow pilgrim, "that the committee of arrangements deem it inexpedient to furnish any stimulating beverage."

Why should intoxicating liquors be introduced at all at our feasts? Does conviviality necessarily spring from inebriation? Is there no fellowship at the festive board without the stimulating glass? Is there no elevation of soul, no mental light to inspire the high wrought toast or sentiment? Will not the bounties of nature that are spread luxuriously before us, dictate the outpourings of grateful hearts?

This is refreshment in its proper sense! It invigorates the body,—keeps the mind clear and unruffled; and is indeed

"The feast of reason, and the flow of soul."

The ancient masons, dedicated their Lodges to King Solomon, who is said to have been the first Most Excellent Grand Master. But masons professing Christianity, dedicate their Lodges to St. John the Baptist, and St. John the Evangelist, the two great christian patrons of our Order. Let it not be supposed that a mason of the Christian faith, has no religious obligations to fulfil: for although masonry in the abstract "does not interfere with a man's religious or political principles, be they what they may;" it does not set him adrift on the ocean of life, without the christian chart, to mark his bearings and soundings! What is meant by this religious latitude is simply that a christian mason is perfectly at liberty to belong to any sect or denomination of christians he thinks proper; and that masonry does not compel him to profess any particular creed, or to worship according to any prescribed mode; leaving these particulars to the guidance of his own conscience. But the very expression in the masonic charge above quoted, implies the possession of religious principles. Every candidate who is presented at the altar of masonry to be initiated into its mysteries, is supposed to be a religious man, and no enquiry is made into his particular profession of faith; but, he is told that there is nothing in masonry, that will interfere with those religious principles. That is to say:—Be he Episcopalian! Baptist! Methodist! Presbyterian! Roman Catholic! or Quaker! or of any other christian denomination, the christian mason is satisfied, for we are not sectarians. If we of the christian faith, are not bound by christian obligations as masons, then what a mockery is the celebration of this day! What a deception is this in the face of a christian community, and in God's Holy Temple! Would it be proper to celebrate heathen rites here?—or those of the mosque? Are we not assembled as christians? And have we not a set form of worship? A Liturgy! breathing strains of exalted piety, and of a tone and character, which will not suffer by a comparison with that of the church; to which indeed, it bears a very strong resemblance.

In this Liturgy, we have a standard of religious worship, in which our Savior is acknowledged as the direct medium of communication with the Deity, and by and through whom alone, we can obtain remission of our sins!

Christian masons, among their numerous symbols and allegories, have one which is particularly beautiful, as going to shew beyond dispute, the real ground of our faith. It is this: "There is supposed to be a certain point within a circle, embordered by two perpendicular parallel lines representing St. John the Baptist, and St. John the Evangelist; upon the top of which rests the Holy Scriptures; and while a mason keeps himself circumscribed within their precepts, it is impossible he should materially err."

There are numerous other allegories equally striking, with maxims and sentiments which illustrate every situation and circumstance in life, whose moral when well explained and duly appreciated, captivates the heart, and leads it irresistibly to the adoration of the great omnipotent Architect of the Universe, whose glory is the end and aim of every degree of our sublime order from the Entered Apprentice to the most ineffable degrees of the christian orders.

Faith, Hope and Charity, Relief, Truth and Brotherly Love, Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence and Justice, are our prominent characteristics! We are taught to have Faith, which is a belief of the revealed truths of religion; Hope, which is an expectation of some good,—an expectation indulged with pleasure; and Charity, which is tenderness, kindness, good will, benevolence and liberality to the poor; and which is defined by Hooker to be, the theologic virtue of universal love. And these three combined, admonish us to have faith in God, hope in immortality, and charity to all mankind. But the greatest of these is Charity! For Faith may be lost in sight, and Hope end in fruition; while Charity extends beyond the grave, through the boundless realms of eternity!

That divine attribute Truth, "which is the foundation of every virtue;" Temperance, "which is that due restraint upon our affections and passions, which renders the body tame and governable, and frees the mind from the allurements of vice;" Fortitude, which is "that noble and steady purpose of the mind, whereby we are enabled to undergo any pain, peril or danger;" Prudence, "which teaches to regulate our lives and actions, agreeably to the dictates of reason; and is that habit, by which we wisely judge, and prudentially determine on all things relative to our present, as well as to our future happiness; and Justice, "which is that standard or boundary of right which enables us to render to every man his just due without distinction." These are the leading tenets of masonry, and the further we advance in the order, the nearer do we come to the standard of perfection, if that advancement is worthily acquired.

Those who mark well their course, as weary pilgrims travelling through time to eternity, are the most estimable of mortals, and the higher they advance in the order, the more meek and lowly they become.

In discussing the subject of masonry, we are unavoidably led into theological matters; or rather into comparisons of character of the professor of religion, and the mason; for the institution of freemasonry being a religious order, no man should become a mason who is not a religious man. That there are apostates, and bad men, and infidels and hypocrites, in both the human and divine institution, is a melancholy fact, too notorious to admit of a moment's dispute. But if we take the broad ground of the Jews, and the primitive christian masons; ours is not a mere human institution, but an order of divine origin, said to have been received directly from God by Moses, who communicated it to Aaron, and his sons Eleazar and Ithamar, and the several Elders of Israel.

Be this as it may, where there is no religion, there is no freemasonry! There are professors in both, who are not possessors! How many men are there, who from habit go to church, and how many more are there who do so merely for the sake of example, as they freely admit? Those less candid however, without possessing a single spark of religion, flatter themselves, that they really are good christians, and endeavor to beguile the world into the same belief. They observe all the externals—join in the prayers—and listen attentively to the sermon. If the minister is eloquent and popular, he (instead of their maker,) is the object of their worship; and instead of leaving the house of God with subdued feelings, and pious meditations, they hurry forth in ecstasies at the honied words of the preacher, and all their praise and glory is of him!

And it is even so in the masonic communion. Vast numbers of our order, are guilty of this man worship, to those who hold prominent stations among us. It is not what the order teaches, that they enquire into, but what these men, say and do. Its sublime principles are lost sight of, in the tinsel and shew which surrounds it. Its high sounding terms and titles, captivate the fancy, while the eternal truths that it teaches fail to reach the heart.

Can we wonder then, that if the sacred ordinances of religion are thus lightly passed over, there are so many among us, who are unprofitable and unfaithful! Reflect on this dear Brethren, and let the world see, that in becoming masons, we are set apart from the world, as burning and shining lights on the ineffable mountain of Truth, where our sublime edifice displays its glory.

I do not wish in the foregoing remarks, to be understood as confining the institution of freemasonry to Christianity, for were it so, it could not prevail throughout the universe as it does. But, I repeat, that it is a religious order and that it partakes of the religion of the country in which it flourishes. The very foundation of it, is the belief in a Supreme Being; and there is no nation civilized or savage, (that I know of,) but what has this belief, unless it be the Epicureans. Piety and virtue, have ever delighted in the existence of a Supreme Being. The world has never produced more refined moralists, than those of pagan Greece and Rome. Their maxims and sentiments may be studied with advantage by the most fastidious moralist.—How sublime are the teachings of morality of those master spirits of the heathen world, Cicero, Plato, Socrates, and Seneca. But these heathens believed in an overruling Providence, and in the existence of a Supreme Being. How incomparably superior were they, to the Voltaire's, the Bolingbroke's, the Chesterfield's, the Volney's, the Paine's and the host of infidels of modern times, who living under the light of the gospel, not only deny the Saviour, who bought them with his own precious blood, but impiously attribute all the wondrous works of the Great Creator to chance, and say, that matter and motion, are the cause and effect of every thing! Yes! Masonry is a religious order, and no man that does not revere religion, is a fit subject for it; and it is to be feared my brethren, that many of us, now present, do not live up to the standard of our profession. Is there any such present, let him resolve, while in the more immediate presence of the Majesty on high, in this his holy temple (with his divine grace and favor,) to live up to that standard for the future. Then will he go forth, unspotted before the world, a free and truly accepted mason.

I have dwelt so long on this point, for the purpose of impressing my hearers, both in and out of the order, with a just estimate of the noble institution, of which I appear before them as the humble advocate; and to admonish the brethren to walk worthy of their high vocation. None but good men are genuine masons! The profligate and licentious, the infidel and the inebriate, are no masons! How numerous are the cases which daily occur within our own observation of apostates from the religion of which they were once the pride and ornament. Men fallen from grace by the allurements of the world and become abandoned characters. Yet no honest man ever attempts to revile religion on that account. These unhappy men are no longer religious characters, although they have once been received into the bosom of the church.

Away then, with the ungenerous and bigoted slurs against masons, because vile characters have insidiously crept in among them, and others who were once estimable, have since become depraved. And with regard to these latter, it is the duty of every mason, as well as every christian to adhere to the injunction given by St. Paul, in the 3d chap. of his 2d Epistle to the Thessalonians, which is as follows:

"Now we command you brethren, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which ye received from us. For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us; for we behaved ourselves not disorderly among you, neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labor and travel, day and night, that we might not be chargeable to any of you. Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an example unto you, to follow us. For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any man would not work, neither should he eat. For we hear that there are some, who walk among you, disorderly, working not at all, but are busy bodies. Now them that are such, command and exhort, that with quietness they work and eat their own bread. But ye brethren, be not weary in well doing. And if any man obey not our word, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet, count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother."

Here we have a rule of conduct laid down in the scriptures, and in so simple and familiar a style, that the meanest capacity can understand it. While its tone is the most meek and gentle, there is a glow of eloquence about it, which is truly sublime. It should be attentively studied by every mason, and engraven on his heart. Thus would his own character be established, and his line of conduct to others, distinctly marked out.

Let also those ancient people of God who are still looking for the Messiah to come, be wary among those of their own dispersed nation, how they give cause of offence, and thereby scandalize the order, which no class of men among us profess more to revere than they do. Let those who emphatically style masonry a holy mystery, and style it as being handed down by God himself to Moses, and pray, "not to be numbered amongst those who know not the statutes of the Lord, nor the divine mysteries of his secret cabala," be particularly cautious how they walk before their brethren.

I speak it to the shame of these people, as well as of many of the christian portion of the order, that there is too much carelessness in the admission of members:—and this is the grand secret of all our troubles. Are not some of the Lodges flooded with candidates at every meeting; among whom it is known that there are exceptionable characters.

And then the finger of scorn is pointed at the order. because it is said, "Look at such a man. Does he not belong to your fraternity? Of what materials are you made, when such a fellow as that is one of your chosen associates and companions?"

It is no excuse to fall back upon religion, and speak of the boasted revivals of certain sects, and of the multitude who flock into their portals, and profess miraculous conversions at those periods of excitement—from which they speedily slide back into all their former evil courses:—and because they say to all classes, come in and join us, we should do the same. Let it be remembered, that there are fanatics in religion—many zealots, who from good motives perhaps, do incalculable mischief, and actually scandalize and profane its sacred character. In this case the homely adage may well be applied, "that two wrongs do not make a right."

The evil of this course, is greater in our communion, than it is in the religious world. For religion of course will right itself, as piety is its own expositor! But the expelled mason cannot be distinguished by the world from the one in full communion and good standing; and hence the care that should be taken to receive none into the order, who have even the suspicion of a taint on their character.

These remarks apply with more force to the large metropolis from whence I hail, than they do to smaller communities,—and I would beg particularly to be understood as making no allusion whatever, to those whose lot is cast in this ancient city. From the high reputation they maintain among their brethren, at large, and the space they fill in society here, I would turn to them as proud exemplars of the masonic character; and what greater proof need a spectator require of the estimation in which the Hudson brethren are held, than the one which is now presented in the brilliant array of female loveliness with which we are honored on this occasion! Oh, go with us, ye fair! Esouse our cause, and vindicate our rights! So shall ye find us not ungrateful; but that all your blandishments are well bestowed, and every endearment fully reciprocated in the faithful, fervent breast, of the true and genuine mason.

THE LEGENDARY.

From the Edinburgh Journal.

HIGHLAND TRADITIONS.

In the number of the Statistical Account of Scotland noticed by us a short time ago under the head Kildonian, Sutherlandshire, the author offers some traditional anecdotes of the clan Gun, a name apparently identical with that of Gwynne among the Welsh. These traditions are curious, and give a vivid idea of the unruly manners of a past age.

"Towards the end of the fifteenth century, the chief of the clan Gun was George Gun, who lived in feudal dignity in his then impregnable castle of Halbury; but he was better known as the Crowner Gun, or as he was called by the Highlanders, "Nm Brais-tach-more," from a great brooch which he wore as the badge or cognizance of his office of crowner. He had a deadly feud with the chief of the Keiths; and having met in St. Syre's chapel for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation, but without success, they there solemnly agreed to decide their quarrel, if they could not do so amicably on a future day, by equal combat between twelve sons or relatives of each chieftain. This compact was concluded by mutual vows accompanied with religious rites within the chapel, that the meeting would take place in a solitary part of the country, where no interruption could occur, and the escort of each leader was fixed at twelve armed horsemen. The crowner had been twice married, and had a numerous family of sons; but some of them resided in Sutherland, and it was also agreed that he should form his party there, and proceed into Caithness with them by the Strathmore rout, while the Keiths would move, on the appointed day, towards the confines of Sutherland, and in the same direction, so that the two parties would meet in a retired district, remote from any chance of being disturbed. The chiefs, each followed by twelve horses and their riders came within sight of each other on the appointed route, and soon thereafter met at a burn called Alt-na gawn, below the glut of Strathmore. The crowner and the leader of the Keiths approached each other in full armor; but it was soon discovered by the Guns that there were two riders on every horse in the party of the Keiths, and consequently the latter party had twenty-four men opposed to the twelve followers of the crowner. This vile stratagem instantly revealed to the Guns that their destruction, by unfair means, was determined upon. They scorned, notwithstanding the great odds against them, to retreat before their enemies the Keiths; and both parties dismounting, the huge double-handed sword, and other formidable weapons of the period used in close combat, were furiously and destructively wielded, amidst horrid imprecations, and remorseless vows of each clan's never-dying vengeance, which raised to madness the rage of the combatants.

The Guns fought most desperately, but could not withstand the great odds that opposed them; and after a long-continued struggle, the survivors on both sides were so much exhausted, that the combat was mutually dropped—the Keiths being so far the victors as to leave the field with their banner displayed, and to be able to carry with them their slain companions; while in the ranks of the Guns, the crowner and seven of his party were killed, and the remaining five were all severely wounded. The Keiths proceeded to Dilred Castle, in Strathmore, then occupied by Sutherland of Dilred, where they were hospitably entertained.—The five surviving Guns, who were all sons of the crowner, also retired, but tarried at another stream, since then called Alt-Torquil, after Torquil Gun, one of the survivors, who there dressed the wounds of his brothers. Towards evening, Henrybeg, the youngest of the surviving brothers of the Guns, proposed that they should follow the Keiths, and endeavor to obtain revenge, even by stratagem such as the Keiths had recourse to: but his brothers considered such a step as leading to their certain destruction. Henry, however, could not be restrained from his purpose, and swore that he would never rest until he should kill a Keith, and recover possession of his father's sword, helmet, shirt of mail, and brooch of office, which the Keiths had taken off the dead body of the crowner.—Two of the brothers were so severely wounded: that they could not move to any great distance, but the other two accompanied Henry, who arrived at Dilred Castle soon after night fall. On approaching the castle, its wooden windows or shutters were found open, and around a large fire in the lowest apartment the survivors of the Keiths were quaffing bumpers of ale; and Henry, who went close to one of the windows, heard them narrate, with boisterous delight, the losses sustained by the Guns. The chief of the Keiths, not apprehensive of any danger, accidentally approached the window where Henry stood, and the latter then bent his bow, and in another instant his arrow pierced the chieftain's heart; Henry at the same time boldly accompanying the deadly flight of his arrow with the exclamation (afterwards used in the North Highlands as a proverb) of "The Gun's compliments to Keith." The old chief dropped down dead; a panic seized the other Keiths; and the three Guns, having darted forward to the door of the castle, slew some of the first persons who ventured out by it; but finding that they could not retain their position long, Henry and his two brothers retired silently under cover of the darkness of the night, and hurried back to the assistance of the other brothers, who had been unable to accompany them."

ANOTHER SNAKE STORY.—Nothing flourishes now a days like snake stories; they grow larger every day. We believe the following, from the Mill's Point (Ky.) Herald, is the greatest out:

A neighbor of ours, who is a farmer from this county, tells us, that a few nights ago he awoke and felt a cold and slimy body crawling over his hand; he jumped out of bed. The noise awoke his wife, who likewise left her couch. On making a light, they discovered an immense rattlesnake in bed, measuring after it was killed, six feet, and having seven rattles. The alarm and fright this unwelcome visitor occasioned, drove away all idea of sleep for the balance of the night. As soon as daylight dawned, the farmer opened the door and discovered another large snake lying on his door steps. He killed the same with the fire tongs. He then approached the stables to feed his horses; there he again saw another snake; he pursued and saw it enter a hole near an old stump. He immediately sent his son for some of his neighbors. On their arrival, they dug down near the stump and found a den of snakes all coiled up together—all of which they killed. On counting them, they found that they had destroyed forty-six rattlesnakes of all sizes, from eight inches to five feet long—which, with the two killed in the house, make the enormous number of forty-eight.

Miscellany.

THE PERSECUTED LEARNED.

Those who may have labored most zealously to instruct mankind, have been those who have suffered most from ignorance; and the discoverers of new arts and sciences have hardly ever lived to see them accepted by the world. With a noble perception of his own genius, Lord Bacon, in his prophetic will, thus expresses himself: 'For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations, and the next ages.' Before the times of Galileo and Harvey, the world believed in the stagnation of the blood, and the diurnal immorality of the earth; and for denying these the one was persecuted and the other ridiculed.

The intelligence and the virtue of the Socrates were punished with death. Anaxagoras, when he attempted to propagate a just notion of the Supreme Being, was dragged to prison. Aristotle, after a long series of persecution, swallowed poison. Heraclitus, tormented by his countrymen, broke off all intercourse with men. The great geometers and chemists, as Gerbert, Roger Bacon, and others, were abhorred as magicians. Pope Gerbert, as Bishop Otho gravely relates, obtained the pontificate by having given himself up entirely to the devil: others suspected him too of holding an intercourse with demons; but this was indeed a devilish age.

Virgilius, Bishop of Salzburg, having asserted that there existed antipodes, the archbishop of Mainz declared him a heretic, and consigned him in the flames: and the Abbot Trithemius, who was fond of improving steganography, or the arts of secret writing, having published several curious works on this subject, they were condemned, as works full of diabolical mysteries; and Frederick II, Elector Palatine, ordered Trithemius's original work, which was in his library, to be publicly burnt.

Galileo was condemned at Rome publicly to disavow sentiments, the truth of which must have been abundantly manifest. 'Are these then my judges?' he exclaimed in retreating from the inquisitors, whose ignorance astonished him. He was imprisoned, and visited by Mikon, who tells us that he was then poor and old. The confessor of his widow, taking advantage of her piety, perused the mass of this great philosopher, and destroyed such as in his judgement were not fit to be known to the world!

Gabriel Naude, in his apology for those great men who have been accused of magic, has recorded a melancholy number of the most eminent scholars, who have found, that to have been successful in their studies was a success which harassed them with continued persecution, a prison, or a grave!

Cornelius Agrippa was compelled to fly his country, and the enjoyment of a large income, merely for having displayed a few philosophical experiments, which every school-boy can perform; but more particularly having attacked the then prevailing opinion, that St. Anne had three husbands, he was so violently persecuted, that he was obliged to fly from place to place. The people beheld him as an object of horror; and not unfrequently, when he walked, he found the streets empty at his approach. He died in an hospital.

In these times, it was a common opinion to suspect every great man of an intercourse with some familiar spirit. The favorite black dog of Agrippa was supposed to be a demon. When Urban Grandier, another victim to the age, was led to the stake, a large fly settled on his head: a monk, who had heard that Beelzebub signifies in Hebrew, the God of Flies, reported that he saw this spirit come to take possession of him. Mr. De Lange, a French minister, who employed many spies, was frequently accused of diabolical communication. Sixtus the Fifth, Marechal Faber, Roger Bacon, Cæsar Borgia, his son Alexander VI, and others, like Socrates, had their diabolical attendant.

Cardan was believed to be a magician. The fact is, that he was for his time a very able naturalist; and he who happened to know something of the arcana of nature was immediately suspected of magic. Even the learned themselves, who had not applied to natural philosophy, seem to have acted with the same feelings as the most ignorant; for when Albert, usually called the Great, an epithet he owed to his name De Groot, constructed a curious piece of mechanism which sent forth a distant vocal sound. Thomas Aquinas was so much terrified at it, that he struck it with his staff, and to the mortification of Albert annihilated the curious labor of thirty years!

Petrarch was less desirous of the laurel for the honor, than for the hope of being sheltered by it from the thunder of the priest, by whom both he and his brother poets were continually threatened. They could not imagine a poet, without supposing him to hold an intercourse with some demon. This was, as Abbe Reenel observes, having a most exalted idea of poetry, though a very bad one of poets. An antipoeitic Dominican was notorious for persecuting all verse makers the power of which he attributed to the effects of heresy and magic. The lights of philosophy have dispersed all these accusations of magic, and have shown a dreadful chain of perjuries and conspiracies.

Descartes was horribly persecuted in Holland, when he first published his opinions. Voetius, a bigot of great influence at Utrecht, accused him of atheism, and had even projected in his mind to have this philosopher burned at Utrecht in an extraordinary fire, which, kindled, on an eminence, might be observed by the seven provinces. Mr. Hallam has observed, that 'the ordeal of fire was the great purifier of books and men.' This persecution of science and genius lasted till the close of the seventeenth century.

If the metaphysician stood a chance of being burned as a heretic, the natural philosopher was not in less jeopardy as a magician, is an observation of the same writer which sums up the whole.

PEERS.—A Peer, sitting in judgment, is not required to give his verdict upon oath, like a commoner, but upon his honor. What a stigma on the other class of the community? Just as if a Peer alone had honor, and all others were base perfidious slaves, from whom truth could only be extorted, when they had been forced into the presence of their Creator. A member of the lower house is the deputy or representative of others, and cannot delegate his powers; but a Peer represents only himself, and may vote by proxy on any question, even though he has never been present to discuss its merits. If a thief break into a church and steal the surplice or cushion, it is not like stealing a ledger or a cash-book from a shop or counting-house—it is sacrilege. If a man scandalize a Peer by speaking evil of him, it is not common scandal, it is scandalum magnatum, that is, great scandal, subjecting the offender to indefinite punishment. If a Peer jobs in the funds as many of them do; or if he gets up bubble companies, as some of them have done, to dupe credulous people; and if he involve himself in debt by these fraudulent practices, you cannot imprison him to enforce payment; neither can you make him a bankrupt and sequester his estates. The property of a Peer, like his person, has a dignity about it, and must not be violated.—English paper.

Crops, &c. in East Tennessee.—The following is an extract of a letter from a very extensive farmer in Green county, East Tennessee, to his friend in this city dated July 10, 1841:

"The crops of corn in our county are probably more promising for an abundant supply than they have been for years back. If the season should continue good for some three or four weeks longer, corn will be a cheap article on the 1st of December next. The wheat crop was also quite good; the best I ever raised except the year before last. Oats are plentiful, yet short to what they would have been had the month of June continued wet; but, as we had a dry June, the people were enabled to work their corn in fine style. Since that time we had just enough to suit the corn crop. The country is quite healthy, and when we look around us, seeing no sickness worth speaking of, an abundant crop of every thing just before us, the fruit trees loaded with fruit, as well as the forest trees with acorns, we ought to be thankful to an All-wise Creator."—*Nat. AGED HEROES.—A writer in the Express states that there are but five officers of the regular Revolutionary Army in New York city, and adds the very remarkable circumstance that the ages of these advance ser-tim from 85 to 89. Their names and ages as follows:—Lieut. Abraham Leggett, in his 85th; Major Leonard Bleeker, in his 86th; Major General Morgan Lewis, in his 87th. [Gen. Lewis, is the present Grand Master of the G. L. of this State;] Captain Theodosius Fowler, in his 88th; and Major William Popham, in his 89th. They are all in good health.

ASTONISHING SAGACITY OF A HORSE.—A young lady, while crossing a river in South Carolina, a short time since, on horseback, was by a blunder of the horse, accidentally thrown off into the stream. She was borne down some distance by the current. When the animal recovered its feet and found that its rider had been placed in so perilous a situation, it immediately went in pursuit, overtook the fair prize, caught her garments in his teeth and carried her triumphantly and safely to the shore, thus saving a life which otherwise, in all probability, would have been lost in a watery grave.

A CIRCUMSTANCE WORTH RECORDING.—Dr. John R. Watrous of Cochester, called at our office on Tuesday, and paid for the Connecticut Courant, to January 1, 1843. He remarked that he had taken the paper, with the exception of about six months, 47 years, and generally paid his subscription in advance. The Doctor was a surgeon in the army of the Revolution; although he is now in the 88th year of his age, he has the appearance of a person of 60, and bids fair to live many years. We have somewhere seen it stated, that those persons who take a newspaper and pay for it punctually generally live to a good old age. The originator of this saying, has in the above case a verification of his assertion.—Hartford Courant.

THE FORCE OF SYMPATHY.—The Sandy Hill Herald tells the following good anecdote:

"I'll tell you," says an ex-member of Congress, in Michigan, "how I secured my election in this district several years ago. When I was nominated, the party to which I belonged, was in the minority, and there was no hope of succeeding unless something more than ordinary was resorted to. After reflecting some time I came to the conclusion to steal a hog from one of my neighbors, which I did, and in the morning the neighbor traced me to my dwelling, and ascertained beyond a doubt that I was the thief, and published me as such; when I immediately appealed to the sympathies of the people, and asked them if they thought I would steal a hog? They swallowed the bait—said it was persecution on the part of the neighbor, who was politically opposed to me; and the consequence was, I was triumphantly elected. But the next time I was a candidate for the same office, a Yankee, from Vermont, was the opposing candidate, who having learned the secret, stole a sheep, and run me sky high."

COURTLY ADROITNESS.—The Duke of Grammont, was the most adroit and witty courtier of his day.—He entered one day the closet of Cardinal Mazarin, without being announced. His Eminence was amusing himself by jumping close-legged against the wall. To surprise a Prime Minister in so boyish an occupation, was dangerous; a less skilful courtier might have stammered excuses and retired. The Duke entered briskly, and cried, "I'll bet one hundred crowns that I jump higher than your Eminence; and the Duke and Cardinal began to jump for their lives. Grammont took care to jump a few inches lower than the Cardinal, and was six months afterwards Marshal of France.

DIARRHŒA.—People need not be long troubled with that disorder, so generally prevalent at this season, commonly known as the summer or bowel complaint, when the certain remedy therefore may be found on every man's dinner table, in the shape of salt and vinegar. Two tea spoonful of the former, dissolved in half a gill of the latter, and swallowed at a draught, in half a gill of the latter, and swallowed at a draught, will in most cases effect an instant cure. The second dose, if needed, will assuredly accomplish it. This recipe should be published annually, every summer.—Nantucket Eng.

POPULAR TALES.

RICHARD WARBECK.

[Those of our readers who may have a penchant for the horrid, will find the following tale to contain that particular merit, to a very eminent degree. The story occupies more room, than we usually give to such matters; but we thought that it would be more acceptable in one paper, than to divide it. It is copied from a recent No. of Bentley.]

'Nay replied the Major,' 'we need not go so far back as the days of Dr. Faustus and Don Juan, for examples. There was a man in my native town, a schoolmaster of the name of Warbeck, who sold himself to the devil merely that he might have his revenge upon a fellow-townsmen, who had carried off his sweet-heart. My father was his doctor, and in the course of his attendance upon him, learned the full particulars which I have often heard him relate.'

'Let us hear them,' said Mr. Carliel.

The Major, who was never so happy as when he had an opportunity of telling all the marvellous stories he had collected, drank off his cup of coffee, and began.

'Richard Warbeck, when I knew him, was a tall, thin, pale-faced, hollow-eyed, and grey-headed old man, limping about upon crutches; but in his younger days he was accounted handsome, and a very devil among the women.'

'We may guess what sort of women,' remarked Miss Grooby, drawing herself up several inches.

The Major went on, 'Among these with whom he fell in love was one Grace Amos, a farmer's daughter, a beautiful creature, as I have heard. But I remember her too: Goody Amos she was then called, and she gained a scanty livelihood in summer, (in winter she used to go into the workhouse,) by gathering wild flowers, making them into nosegays, and selling them from door to door. Every body bought, of her, when Richard had his revenge; and no wonder, as you'll say when you hear what it was. I have told you she was one of his sweethearts, and they were to have been married; but before the day came, there came another lover in the way, a dashing recruiting sergeant, named Wilkinson; and Grace Amos became Mrs. Wilkinson instead of Mrs. Warbeck.'

When Richard heard that Sergeant Wilkinson was about to marry Grace, and when he had wrung from the poor girl herself a confession of the truth, he laid his hand upon her arm, and said, "If there is a God in heaven, or a Devil in hell, you shall rue this!" And with these words he left her.

'It appeared he had in his possession an old book upon necromancy, where he found instructions how, by hellish charms at potent spells, to raise the Evil One. Though he refused to tell my father all the means he employed—declaring, indeed, that he dare not—he related very exactly the horrible scene which followed.

'He was in his bed room towards midnight, it being the seventh night of his incantations, when, just as the church clock struck twelve, a rushing noise like a violent gust of wind, passed through the chamber, extinguishing the lights, and leaving him in total darkness. Nothing dismayed, he performed the remaining part of his fearful task, which was to open a vein in the left arm, and catch as much blood as would fill a wine-glass. This he was to fling, or rather sprinkle, towards the four corners of the room, saying, as he did so, "I call you east—I call you west—I call you north—I call you south—come and speak to me!"—He had no sooner uttered these words than he felt himself grasped round the waist as if a belt of hot iron encircled him, and a voice, that resembled the hissing of a serpent, whispered in his ear—

"I am come to thee,
Now come with me!"

'Richard lost his senses, and remembered nothing more till he found himself standing in the church porch, by the side of a little old man leaning on a crutch-stick. He was not more than four feet in height wore a sort of Spanish dress, with a black velvet mantle, and a hat of the same material, turned up in front, which disclosed a countenance remarkable for its intense malignity of expression, rather than for any thing either hideous or diabolical. Richard, who was bewildered, forgot that the demon had no power to speak till spoken to; so there they stood for several minutes, he looking at the fiend he had evoked, trembling from head to foot, and the fiend glaring upon him with eyes that every moment grew more and more lustrous with rage, till at last they appeared like two globes on fire.

'The Lord protect me!' exclaimed Richard, at length, as he perceived the increasing fury of his companion.

'Then the demon said, "Thou fool! thou couldst have no power to summon me till thy soul had renounced heaven. I am thy lord now—thy lord and slave—thy lord to command, thy slave to obey thee. What wouldst thou have? Wealth? 'Tis thine!—The power to gratify every earth-born wish! Fifty years thou shalt revel in worldly bliss, in whatever region or clime thy fancy may desire; but at the end of that time, though thou wert at the farthest verge of earth, hither must thou return—to this spot—and at the same hour of night as now—where I too shall be to meet thee. Speak—what wouldst thou have?"

"Revenge!" replied Richard.

"Then thou shalt have it. Behold how."

He struck upon the church doors with his crutch stick: they flew open. Richard saw, as in a vision, Grace Amos kneeling at the altar with his rival, and receiving the nuptial benediction.

"There is to-morrow" said the fiend.

"There is hell!" exclaimed Richard.

"And here is heaven—thy heaven!" continued the fiend, pointing in the direction of the entrance to the church-yard, where Richard beheld a funeral train approaching, and Grace Amos in her bridal dress following a coffin. The next moment the whole vanished.

"Come this way said the demon. They walked into the middle of the church-yard. "Here," he continued, striking his crutch-stick into the ground, "is his grave! He will not lie in it, but he shall be ready for it by to-morrow night."

"In what manner?" asked Richard.

"In this manner. To-morrow he weds her who was thine. He is quarrelsome and choleric. As he leaves the church, with his bride upon his arm, do thou cross his path. Leave the rest to me."

"Will you be there?"

"Yes—but unseen of any, save thyself."

"How then?"

"Question me no farther—I must be gone. Is it a bargain? I tell you he shall wed but never bed your mistress. Is not that revenge enough?"

"Ay—glorious revenge!" said Richard, clenching his teeth.

"Well, then, is it a bargain?"

"It is."

"Richard stretched out his hand, which the demon seized.

"Wear that mark," he exclaimed, "till I claim it."

As he spoke, Richard felt the sinews of his right hand contract and knit together; at the same time he heard a chuckling laugh in the air. He looked up, but could see nothing. He turned towards the demon—he was gone!

'The next morning,' said the Major, 'Richard was awakened from a disturbed sleep by the merry chimes of the church bells. He arrived at the church just as the wedding party were leaving it. The bride trembled violently at the sight of him.

"Grace," said Richard, addressing her, taking no notice of Sergeant Wilkinson, "did I not declare you should rue this day, if there was a God in heaven or a Devil in hell?"

"Oh! Richard, Richard!" exclaimed the faithless girl, "I did not think to see you here. Why have you come?"

"To keep my word, Grace."

"Keep your distance," said the sergeant, thrusting him aside.

A blow followed, which Richard struck with his right hand. It seemed to fall upon his rival's breast like a blow from a sledge hammer, and he staggered beneath it. Richard when relating the circumstance to my father, declared that it appeared to himself as if he had struck with some heavy instrument instead of his hand. The sergeant drew his sword and was about to rush upon his unarmed assailant. Grace hung upon his neck, and besought him not to move. His and her friends gathered round to prevent the effusion of blood. He flung his bride from him—he disengaged himself from the others—his eyes flashed fire—his pale lip quivered—he advanced towards Richard, who stood calm and unmoved; for now he saw the demon by his side, pointing with his crutch-stick in mockery and scorn at the uplifted sabre. He made a thrust at him—it was parried by the demon. Richard receded a few paces, followed by his infuriated antagonist, round whom his friends had again gathered, and to whom Grace again clung in an agony of terror, imploring him to be calm. She held him by one arm as he dragged her along, following Richard, who still retreated, and aiming furious blows at him, which were still turned aside by the demon. The screams and cries of the bridal party were terrific.

"Come on," said Richard tauntingly. "Why don't you strike home?"

At that moment the sergeant stumbled on the very spot where, the night before, the demon had struck his crutch stick into the ground, and said, "Here is his grave." He fell, dragging Grace with him; his sword slipped from his grasp, and Richard saw the demon turn its point so, that, as he fell it pierced his heart. Scarcely uttering a groan, he rolled upon his face, (Grace lying partly beneath him, drenched with his blood,) and expired. A loud laugh, which none but Richard heard, rang through the air. The demon was no longer to be seen.

Horror was upon every countenance save Richard's who surveyed the scene with a calm brow. Bitter upbraidings were heaped upon him by those who stood around.

"Why what have I done?" said he. "I came to tell that perfidious woman, (pointing to Grace, who was lying insensible in the arms of her bridesmaids,) of what she had done—withered a heart which was hers or nothing. I forewarned her I would do so; and if that choleric fool could have been content to let a wronged man complain, this had not happened. He fell by his own hand not mine."

"You struck him, villain!" exclaimed old Giles Amos, the father of Grace. "It was that blow that was the cause of all."

"He might have returned it," replied Richard, "and would have done so had he not been a coward, drawing his sword upon a defenceless man."

"God forgive you, Richard!" rejoined Giles. "You have had your revenge; and may God forgive you."

Laughter was heard, and a voice exclaimed,—"He has had his revenge, and bought with it God's curse!"

"Who is that?" cried several voices at once.

"Harken to thy doom, Richard," said Grace, starting wildly up. "Harken to thy doom! I heard it pronounced, and I shall see it fulfilled—there—there!" pointing to the sky. "Oh! Richard, Richard, you have indeed kept your word; but why were you not merciful? Have I deserved this at your hands?" she continued, bursting into tears as her eyes glanced upon the bleeding corpse of her husband. "Could you not have desisted, hated me, for my falsehood, but spared me this? Oh! my heart will surely break!"

She fell upon her knees by her husband's body, took his hand, and covered it with tears and kisses.

"When I loved you most," said Richard, gazing at her with a stern upturning eye. "I never looked upon you with half the pleasure I do now. I bore hell's torments for thee, thou false one!—and I could have continued to bear them, or anything, except seeing you another's. That maddened and—"

"What?" demanded Grace, springing to her feet, as if the thought had suddenly flashed across her mind of what Richard had done.

"And," he continued, smiling contemptuously, "I resolved to welcome the new-made bride at the earliest moment, even as she came from the altar. I have done so; and now I leave you with the husband of your choice!" So saying, he turned upon his heel, and quitted the churchyard.

"And what became of poor Grace?" inquired Mary.

"Ah!" said the Major, shaking his head, "there was a bad beginning, but a worse ending to my mind.—Who can explain a woman? Who can understand the movements of that moral machinery which makes them such beautiful contradictions.'

'Beautiful fiddsticks!' exclaimed Miss Grooby, violently agitated. 'I have no patience, brother, to hear you talk such nonsense. The creature was nothing better than a vile harlot,—a lewd minx, who did not care what she did so as she got a husband; and rightly was she served when she married the vile wretch Richard Warbeck.'

'What!' said Mr. Carliel, 'did she afterwards marry Richard?'

'I can't deny it,' replied the Major, shaking his head again, as if he really felt for the honor of the sex; 'I can't deny it. She certainly did marry him; but I shall always think she was the victim of unholy practices. At first,' said the Major, 'she was like Calypso, inconsolable for the loss of her Ulysses,—but in time she took the Ephesian dame for her model. Seven years had elapsed, during which she never once laid aside her widow's weeds, and no one ever saw her smile. Many were the offers she had during this period, all of which she peremptorily and even sternly repulsed. What had become of Richard nobody knew; for immediately after the death of his rival he left the place without saying whither he was going; but it was generally thought he had gone to sea. At the expiration of seven years, however, he came back, and set up a school. His frame seemed shattered, and his deportment was that of a man ill at ease. If a stranger appeared in the town, he was the first to inquire whence he came, and whether any one knew his errand. Sometimes he would receive letters with a foreign post-mark, and these he examined intently, the seal, the folding, the writing, before he opened them. Then he always slept with two lighted candles in his room, and would never go to bed till midnight, and in summer time not until the day had dawned.—All these things were noted by his friends and acquaintance, the more charitably disposed of whom ascribed them to remorse for the fate of poor Wilkinson.

'When, or under these circumstances, he renewed his intimacy with Grace I never heard; but within three months after his return, to the utter amazement of all who heard it, the banns of marriage between them were published one Sunday morning. Her father, who was present, started up, and in a voice of fury forbade them; but when the poor old man went into the vestry after service was over to assign his reasons, he could give none that amounted to a valid prohibition: so the marriage took place.

'You will repent this,' said Giles to his daughter the evening before the wedding.

'I know it father,' replied Grace. 'I feel that I am about to do something terrible; but I have no power to resist. Richard has got hold of me. If he were to bid me hack my flesh off my bones, I should do it. He marries me, because it is his will. I do not marry him,—nor would I; but when he asked me if I would, I could as soon have trod the air as said anything but the one word he himself breathed into my ear,—yes.' And ever since I have moved in a sort of waking dream, God help me; for I know I am a doomed woman, though I cannot explain what it is that makes me think so.'

'Next morning they were married. Such a bride! and such a bridegroom! and such a marriage! Richard would not allow any one to accompany her, but insisted upon their meeting at the church door, where she found him waiting. He forbade her to lay aside her widow's weeds; and he was dressed in exactly the same clothes he wore when he went to meet her the morning she was married to Sergeant Wilkinson. Well, the knot was tied, and they were returning. Richard stopped at the spot where first her husband fell and died in that fatal scuffle. Looking sternly in her face, he said,

'Grief for the fool who lies buried there, not love for me, has kept you mine till now. There was a time when I would have married you—oh, how gladly!—for love; now I have married you for revenge. Go—your sight is hateful to me—worse: it calls up the past, and makes the horrible future stand before me. Go—treacherous devil! the wedded of two husbands, the wife of neither; and if I could bring down the curses on your head, it should be that your heart may wither as mine has, in hopeless love,—that with a hand you dare not give, you may be tormented with longing desires to bestow it. Go—and quickly, or the thought of what your perfidy has driven me to will make me mad, and I shall be tempted to have thy blood upon my soul.'

'Grace, who had stood with her head bent, her hands clasped, and her limbs trembling, while these terrible words were addressed to her, now, without once raising her eyes to look at Richard, slowly withdrew, and returned home.

'She went to her bed, from which she never rose again for three months. A violent fever with delirium came on, and the things she raved about were dreadful to hear. In the end she recovered her health; but her reason was gone, and that she never recovered. It was a gentle and harmless insanity, which showed itself chiefly in attending every wedding that took place, and presenting the bride with a nosegay composed of wild flowers. This she never failed to do, till at last Grace Amos (for so the people continued to call her by her maiden name) was as regularly looked for in the churchyard—(the church itself, nothing could induce her to enter)—when there was a marriage, as the young couple who were going to be married.—Her poor father died soon afterwards, and the little property he left was applied to her maintenance by a friend of the family; but gradually it wasted away; and gradually too, charity, which at first supplied its place, wasted away, and grew cold and scant; and then poor Grace had no home but the workhouse.—But, as I have said, this was only during the winter months; for the moment there were flowers to be seen she would beg to be let out, and she supported herself during the spring, summer and autumn, by gathering and selling them.'

'And what became of the wretch who brought her to this condition?' inquired Mrs. Dagleish.

'At first,' said the Major, 'he tried to bear up against the general scorn and indignation which his treatment excited; but it would not do. He was shunned by every one; his school went to decay; and at the end of a few years he left the place.

'Grace Amos, who lived to be nearly seventy, had been dead about two years, when one winter's evening my father was called out to visit an old gentleman who was staying at the principal inn, where he arrived only the day before. He went, and was shown into a room lighted with six large wax candles. On a sofa near the fire was lying the person who had sent for him, wrapped up in a black velvet cloak trimmed with sable fur, and seemingly in the last stage of debility.—His hair was silver white, and hung loosely over his face and shoulders; a beard of the same colour descended to his breast. His face was wrinkled, his voice feeble, and everything about him denoted extreme age and decay except his large prominent black eyes, which were full of youthful fire, and glanced incessantly round the room with a restless expression, that led my father to conclude he had a case lunacy to deal with.

'When they were alone, the stranger inquired how long my father had lived in the town.

'Nearly twenty years,' said he.

'The stranger seemed to be considering for a moment how far that would carry him back.

'Forty years ago,' he continued, looking steadfastly at my father, 'there lived in this place two persons whom I knew well. They were before your time; but perhaps you may have heard something of them,—Richard Warbeck and Grace Amos?'

'I certainly heard of them both,' replied my father, astonished at this address, 'and one of them I knew, Grace Amos. The poor old creature died in the workhouse hard by, not more than two years since.'

'Dead!' murmured the old man to himself, as he lay with his eyes closed, 'dead! There is a comfort in that word which I can never know! Now she is mistress of my secret. Only two years,' he continued.

'Not more,' replied my father. 'But happy had it been for her, poor soul, had she died when that Richard Warbeck you spoke of betrayed her into a false marriage with himself. That was a foul business I have heard.'

'It was: but I was the fiend's—I was the fiend's, and had pawned my soul for revenge! Look here—(pointing to the knotted sinews of his right hand)—this is his mark. I pawned my soul, I say, for revenge, and I must surrender myself to him, if you cannot find a way to save me.'

'I!' said my father, who supposed he was raving. 'What can I do?'

'Give me a strong poison—one that will lay me in the grave. But where can such a one be found? I have sought it through the world in vain.'

'Compose yourself,' said my father, who still believed it to be a case of mental delusion, 'and I shall be able to give you some relief from these sufferings.'

'Kill me, and you may,' said the old man, 'else not. It is death I want—death not life. I will give you wealth beyond your utmost need, if you can send me to my grave. One year, five months, eleven days, and six hours you have to do it in. What say you?—Are you so skilled in medicine, think you, that you can compound a poison potent enough to quench the spark of life that still flickers within? You know St. Nicholas churchyard?'

'Certainly,' said my father. 'I live in St. Nicholas' parish.'

'Well, then,' replied the old man, with a deep sigh, 'to sum up all in a few words, let there be (speedily, if possible, but at any rate before the expiration of one year, five months, eleven days, and six hours—I count the time by hours) a grave dug in St. Nicholas' churchyard. In that grave let me be laid, and for my epitaph nothing more than "RICHARD WARBECK," and I will make you master of all I have.'

'Richard Warbeck!' exclaimed my father.

'I am he! You think me mad. Hear how calmly I can talk. Mark how rationally I will discourse, and tell you of things,—some of which you know, others you may have heard,—that shall convince you I am the person I say.'

'The old man, after resting a few moments to recover from his agitation, proceeded to relate such matters connected with himself, his own early life, the former inhabitants of the town, Grace Amos, the death of Sergeant Wilkinson, and various other things, as satisfied my father that he was really and truly no other than Richard Warbeck.

'When Richard had finished, for Richard it was,' observed Major Grooby, 'and such I shall now call him,—he imposed one condition upon my father, and received from him the most solemn assurance that he would observe it, viz. to keep his secret.

'I would not,' said he, 'be known to the living generation. Let me therefore pass among ye, until I pass away, (and a shudder came over him as he spoke the words,) for Mr. Glencowe, the rich East India merchant, who has ruined his health in amassing riches abroad, and has come here by the advice of his physicians, to retrieve it.'

'It was under that name I knew him when a boy; a tall, thin, pale-faced, hollow-eyed, and grey-headed old man, limping about upon two crutches. My father attended him regularly, and was congratulated (not envied, of course,) by his professional brethren, upon having such a rich fellow for a patient: one, too, who seemed likely enough to last a reasonable time, provided he was physicked judiciously.

'In the course of his attendance, he learned from time to time most of the particulars I have related; but I do not think he ever gave up his opinion that everything Richard told him respecting his compact with the devil was the effect of insanity. He was forced however, to pretend otherwise; for I have heard him say it was dreadful to behold the wretched man's sufferings whenever he found him incredulous upon that point. He had no particular body ailment that required medicine, but drugs of a harmless kind were daily administered, which he greedily swallowed, believing they were slow poison, of certain efficacy, prepared by my father after much labour and research.

'The one year, five months, eleven days, and six hours, had dwindled down to the eleven days only, and Richard became an object ghastly and fearful to look upon. He had no suspicion of the deception my father was practicing; he only feared his efforts would be unavailing within the prescribed time. He would roll and writhe about till the preperation fell in large drops from his face, and scream at each contortion, as if every sinew were being wrenched from its place.—To allay these sufferings, my father once or twice administered opium in very large quantities; but it did not seem to possess the slightest narcotic influence.—Richard, who knew what it was from the taste, used to complain bitterly of giving him "that baby drug," which, he said, he had swallowed again and again, in doses sufficient to kill a hundred men, with the same impunity that he would have drunk a glass of water.

"At length came the morning of the eleventh day, and my father visited him early, resolving not to quit him for a single moment till six hours after midnight, that he might observe every changing symptom of his malady, and be at hand to employ promptly such remedies as he might consider necessary. When he arrived, he found Richard in a deep sleep, breathing gently, and a faint color in his cheeks. The nurse said he had been in that state the whole night, almost without motion, and showing scarcely any other sign of life but that of a soft, quick respiration. My father felt his pulse. It beat firm and full under his finger.

"This is miraculous," said he—"it confounds me! Nature is working mysteriously, for some end which I cannot explain; let us watch patiently for the result."

"They did so. All that day till sunset Richard continued in the same death-like slumber; for, except that he breathed, and that his pulse beat, and his cheek retained its tinge of red, he might have passed for one who had already ceased to live.

"It was summer time. The sun had gone down.—The clock struck nine—ten—eleven. My father was still sitting by his side, holding his hand, with his finger upon his pulse, and laboring under the most exciting feelings, when suddenly Richard awoke, raised himself up, and looking upon vacancy, said in a low, firm voice, 'I know it—I must be there—I come.'"

"As he uttered these words, to the amazement of my father and the nurse, he stood upon his feet, without requiring any assistance, or the support of his crutches, a thing he had not been able to do before for several months.

"I have had revealed to me in sleep," he continued, "why this strength is given. It is, that I may go alone whither I must go before the clock strikes twelve. The hour I have been running from for so many years has come at last."

"No," said my father, "this is only the eleventh day that is drawing to a close. There will then be six hours."

"You are right," interrupted Richard. "Tarry here those six hours until my return."

"Where would you go?"—"To the porch of St. Nichols' church."

"What to do?"—"Keep my word."

"When was it given?"—"Fifty years ago—exactly fifty years ago."

"Must you be alone?"—"Yes."

"Say you will remain here another half hour, and I will not oppose your going."

"Will not?—you cannot. An angel could not pluck me from perdition now. This you will see.—You have already seen that you have no power over my life. I placed it in your hands; besought you to rid me of it; tempted you with wealth; entreated you with tears; implored you in agony; and all your efforts failed."

"Yes," said my father; "I do acknowledge that none of the means I tried succeeded; but I have not exhausted my art—I did not wish to do; I clung to the hope that it might not be necessary, and I reserved for the last moment—if the necessity could no longer be doubted—a portion of such deadly quality, that a single drop is sufficient to destroy life."

"Man!" exclaimed Richard, clutching my father fiercely by the arm, and looking at him with a countenance violently agitated, "do not trifle with me now! I am past that. If you speak truth, I'll kneel and worship you. If false, may that hell which is gaping for me be your portion also. Have you this portion about you?"

"I have."

"Give it me!—give it me, I say!" and he grasped my father's throat with both his hands. "Minutes are precious with me now."

"It requires a little preparation," said my father, vincing no alarm at Richard's violent manner.—

"Sit down. Compose yourself. I will get it ready." "In less than half a minute my father returned with a small phial in his hand, containing a transparent yellow fluid.

"I tremble to think what I am about," said he.—"Wait in this room until you hear St. Nicholas' clock strike twelve, and the evil spell that is upon you will be destroyed."

"Do you think I would not do so if I could?" he asked, in a tone of such utter misery and despair, that it went to my father's heart. "Have pity on me!" he continued, stretching out his hands for the phial, and bursting into tears.

"But twenty seconds more," said my father "and I will yield."

"As he uttered these words, with his eyes still upon the timepiece, he slowly drew the cork from the phial, which Richard, by a sudden spring, snatched from his hands, and draining its contents, broke out into a wild laugh, as he flung the empty bottle from him.

"Rash man!" exclaimed my father, "what is it you have done?"

"Traitor!" cried Richard, "what is it you have done? Betraye me to the fiend! There he stands! There! With that devilish mock upon his countenance which he wore fifty years ago, when he clasped my hand, and by this token made me his. There goes the hour, too! Hark! St. Nicholas strikes! How the deep booming of that bell crushes my brain! One! Two! Three! I am on fire! Four! Five! Six!—my sinews, arteries, veins, are all shrivelling up within me!—Seven! Eight! Nine! a sea of blood is heaving and swelling at my feet!—Ten! Eleven! TWELVE!—and now! now!—O God!—O God! my bones are being ground—ground—ground—ground to very dust!"

"He fell into strong convulsions, uttered one terrific shriek, and expired!"

"A most extraordinary story, certainly," said Mr. Carliel, and how to explain it I know not. I think you said," he continued, addressing the Major, "that the only knowledge your father possessed of Richard's supposed dealings with the Evil One he derived from himself?"

"Entirely," replied the Major.

"Ay," said Mr. Carliel, with a nod of self-satisfaction, "there's the key to the whole mystery. The poor man was crazed—that's clear; and your father formed a right judgement of the case from the first."

"Not quite so clear," answered the Major, "even to my father; for, though he would never confess in so many words that it was not a case of mental delusion, there were two or three circumstances which he was utterly unable to account for upon that hypothesis."

"What were they?" inquired Mr. Carliel.

"Why believing until the very last that Richard's mind was diseased, he thought if he could any way get him over his hour of imaginary danger, all might be well. So, what did he do? In the first place, the phial contained nothing but colored water; in the second, he spoke to the sexton, and had the bell of St. Nichols', which tolled the hour, muffled, so that it could not be heard even in the churchyard; and in the third, he put back the hand of the old timepiece a quarter of an hour. But what followed? Precisely at twelve o'clock, when the timepiece was pointing to a quarter to twelve, and when no human being could hear the church clock, he became violently agitated, began to count the hours, and raved—if raving it was—in the way you have heard. His whole frame was fearfully convulsed; his eyes seemed bursting from their sockets; his face grew livid; his writhings and contortions were those of a man suffering intense bodily pain; and when the last hour struck he fell back on the sofa so doubled up that it was impossible to straighten his limbs."

Daring Adventure.—Mr. James Smith, of Presque Isle, U. C., crossed Lake Ontario, from that place to Genesee River, a distance of seventy miles, in a small skiff, which he performed in 20 hours—rowing with oars the whole distance.—Koch. Dem.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, July, 31, 1841.

BEAUTIES OF TAPPANISM.—The N. Y. Sun says, that a colored man of some notoriety, by the name of David Ruggles, brought an action of assault and battery, against the Agent of the New Bedford Rail Road, for ejecting him from a car in which there were three white ladies. Ruggles had bought a ticket, with a knowledge of the usages of the road, but persisted in his right of sitting where he chose, until force became necessary to remove him. The court decided very correctly, that no assault was committed not warranted by the circumstances. The blacks of this country, after all, are more to be pitied than blamed. The abolitionists and amalgamationists, are the men who should if possible, be held accountable for the mischiefs they are bringing on these people. By filling their heads with notions, which can never be realised in this land, they are making them insufferably insolent, and in many cases, exciting them to acts of personal violence. The papers are now teeming with an unprovoked outrage on the body of a Captain of one of our vessels at New Orleans by a black, and if we are to rely on the statements from the same source, a feeling against the blacks is being engendered in that city, which will be awful in its consequences, unless a better spirit soon prevails. The safety of the black is in the protection which the white man will give him, so long as he looks up to him for aid. When he is misled by his own ignorance, or the counsels of evil white men, to assume a station he will never be permitted to enjoy, he will array the better feeling of the whites against him, and provoke in the bosoms of thousands (always ready) a revenge which would trample down all law or reason. The abolitionists of our own State, have engendered a bad and bitter feeling. If in our own State, where we have no other interest than feeling, what must be the state of things in States where abolitionism is pestilence and death. The Abolitionists are morally and legally answerable for all the mischief now existing, and the Great Ruler of Events, alone knows when and where it is to end.

A FACT TO THINK ON.—The Pottsville Miners Journal, says that among the many conjectures indulged in, in the probable destruction of the Steamer President, fire by spontaneous combustion may have been the cause. That paper says that all the Atlantic steamers use bituminous coal, which is liable to become ignited by being collected in large masses, with the "fire damp" in it. The agents of the steam companies, it is said, have used every precaution to conceal this alarming fact from the public. Of course, what the Journal says, must be taken with some grains of allowance, because the paper is more or less under the influence of the Anthracite coal Company. But public attention should be turned to the subject. It appears to us, very reasonable, that bituminous coal may be as capable of producing spontaneous combustion, as many other articles, from which experience has given all a practical demonstration. If it is true, as is asserted, that the Agents of the steamers are acquainted with this danger, their mercenary conduct cannot be too severely condemned. It makes the blood curdle to think for a moment, that this may have been the fate of the President.

BANKRUPT LAW.—This bill has passed the U. S. Senate, by a vote of 26 to 23.

MECHANICS AND STATE PRISON LABOR.—The Mechanics of this city had a large meeting at the City Hall, a few evenings since, in reference to the present odious system of employing the convicts in our State Prisons. The meeting was a spirited one, and those present appeared determined to go to work and remedy the abuses which now exist. The following is among the resolutions passed on the occasion.

Resolved. That we have no cause to rely upon either the magnanimity or justice of mere politicians, as we have appealed to them at times and in numbers sufficient to test both their insincerity and indifference to all appeals but such as they could turn to party capital: And believing with poor Richard, that "God helps them that helps themselves," therefore it now becomes the mechanic to take such help as shall insure a redress of their most palpable wrongs: And also to give those politicians who give us a honeyed word only when their fears are excited or when it can do us no good; who keep only the word of promise to the ear, never to be fulfilled; that "fine words butter no parsnips," and we want no more of their insincerity; and that hereafter we intend to help them that help us.

The above resolution is full significant enough. It expresses views which we have before advocated. If the various Mechanics are only true to themselves; and will adopt some feasible concert of action for the approaching fall elections, a legislature will fill our hall; who will not turn a deaf ear to their just complaints. Support no man whose vote can have an influence on this question, who will not pledge himself to remedy the evil. If either political party find the mechanics to be now in earnest, the right man will be put in nomination by both. It is immaterial to the pullers, which wire they take hold of; so that no mechanic need be under apprehension of being compelled, to sacrifice personal political predilection, at the expense of the Great Mechanical Interest. If the mechanics intend to accomplish anything, UNION must be engraved on their breast-plates.

A BAD TEACHER.—For some days past the Rev. Mr. Van Zandt, of Rochester, has been the lion of the day—having been accused of the seduction of a young lady, under circumstances very aggravating. The fact is stoutly denied by the Rev. gentleman, as well as his friends in that quarter; and the crime laid to the door of a nephew, who it is alleged was sent home to New York, on its discovery. We were in hopes, for the cause of religion, that this would turn out to be the case; but the Evening Journal, of Thursday, says, that Mr. V. Z. with the assistance of a brother is endeavoring to evade the punishment of the outrage, by affixing it on his nephew, who has been spirited away to Europe for that purpose. If this be true, the Rev. gentleman deserves all the law can give him in this world and a large slice of what the devil has in store for him in the next. Van Zandt is said to be rich, middle aged, a popular preacher, with a lovely wife and several children. His victim is respectable, and under sixteen years. Verily, the world is sadly out of joint.

REMARKABLE DEATH.—Mr. S. R. Merrill, proprietor of the Mechanics' Hall, Troy, died very suddenly, on Sunday last. He was sitting in a chair, in a barber's shop, with his head thrown back on the cushion, apparently well, while the barber was making the usual preparation. On the barber's turning around, it was discovered that he was dead. Life had left him without a struggle or a groan. His disease was supposed to be an enlargement of the heart.

CITY AFFAIRS.—Police justice Kane was removed from office, on Monday evening last, by the Common Council, for granting some time ago, a warrant against Alderman Simpson on the oath of a notorious rioter, who alleged an assault, while Ald. Simpson was endeavoring to quell a riot. The decided stand which Alderman Simpson has taken since his election in dispersing the rowdies, and breaking up the disorderly houses in the lower part of the city is worthy of all commendation. His zeal and untiring perseverance in effecting these objects, is a subject of general remark and praise, among the inhabitants of the ward to which he belongs. There is evidently an improvement in the good order of the city, which is to be attributed to the exertions of all the members of the board. No act has done so much good, to the morals of the city, as the closing of the grog shops on Sunday.

ALMOST ANOTHER SCRAPE.—Capt. Drew, one of the villains who destroyed the Caroline, was passing on the St. Lawrence, a short time since, in a steam boat, when the captain of the boat, gave out his intention of stopping at Ogdensburgh, which was done, notwithstanding the entreaties and remonstrance of Drew. Fortunately for the valorous Captain, and unfortunately for the halter of Justice, the distingue's arrival in our waters was not noised about, and he escaped.

A BASE INSINUATION.—A man in New Orleans, supposed to be insane, was narrowly watched during the forepart of the day; in the afternoon his lunacy was confirmed by the fact of his making application for a marriage license. So says the N. Y. Sun. The editor of the Sun must be a crusty old batchelor, to insinuate such a thing.

INTERCOURSE WITH TEXAS.—The post master at New Orleans in answer to several enquiries made, informs us, that all communications intended for any part of Texas, will go safely by adding, after the usual subscription, "to the care of William Bryan, Esq. P. O. Agent and Texian Consul, New Orleans." Letters must always have the postage paid, to New Orleans.

POLICE.—The way the Sand lake coal pedlers have been fined this week, we should suppose would forever be a caution to all improvements on the old-fashioned bushel.

The Boston Post says it is confidently reported that the keels of four or five government steamers will be laid immediately, viz.—two at Charlestown, one at New York, and one at Philadelphia.

Bennett, of the N. Y. Herald, has had three several bills of indictment found against him for libels.—He has been held to bail, in $3000.

CANADA.—Col. Prince, the cold-blooded hero of Windsor, who is now a member of the provincial parliament, has given notice in that body, that he will move an address to the governor, for an amnesty to all political prisoners, even the New South Wales men, excepting only Drs. Roph and Duncombe, and Mr. Mackenzie.

The editor of the Columbia Spy, a downright clever fellow, says that last week, he has taken a partner in the firm, by the name of Miss HARRIET SCOTT.—We hope it will be a long time before a dissolution of the firm will take place.

The July No. of the Ladies Cabinet Magazine, is out, and a glance at its contents, strengthens our opinion of its high character. We take a very pretty piece of poetry, from one of its pages, by Mrs. E. H. W. Esling.

LIBERALITY.—Thos. W. Blachford, of Troy, has recently presented the Young Mens' Association of that city, with a large and valuable collection of minerals.

FATHER MATHEW IN ENGLAND.—This distinguished apostle of temperance has accepted an invitation to attend the opening of the Roman Catholic cathedral at Birmingham, England, the 23d inst., after which he will dine with a large party at the Town Hall in that borough.

DIED.

THE VACATION.

In gay delight
Sparkling and bright
The school-girls home are wending;
Giddy little throng,
They trip along
With mind and heart unbending.

Each sweet bright eye
For a month may pry
In the hearts that round are wooing;
Leaving a sting
That love must bring
Some conquer'd lover suing.

Then away they'll bound,
O'er plain and mound,
On the breeze with ringlets flying;
And hotly contend
To the race's end,
But they always reach it sighing.

With brow still clear
As now, no tear
To leave its mark undying,
May they as dear
Long hence appear
With truth and beauty vying
July, 16th.

"ONE GLASS MORE."

Stay, mortals, stay! nor heedless thus
Thy sure destruction seal,
Within that cup there lurks a curse,
Which all who drink shall feel.
Disease and death forever nigh,
Stand ready at the door,
And eager wait to hear the cry,
Oh! give me "one glass more!"

Go, view that prison's gloomy cells—
Their pallid tenants scan;
Gaze—gaze upon these earthly hells,
And ask when they began:
Had these a tongue—Oh, man! thy cheek
Would burn with crimson o'er,
Had these a tongue they'd to thee speak,
Oh, take not "one glass more!"

Behold that wretched female form,
An outcast from her home:
Crushed in affliction's blighting storm,
And doom'd in want to roam:
Behold her? ask that prattler dear,
Why mother is so poor,
He'll whisper in thy startled ear,
'Twas father's "one glass more!"

Stay, mortal stay! repent, return!
Reflect upon thy fate;
The poisonous draught indignant spurn,
Spurn—spurn it ere too late;
Oh fly the alehouse's horrid din,
Nor linger at the door,
Lest thou perchance should sip again,
The treacherous "one glass more!"

THE BEAUTY OF THE HEART.

BY MRS. C. H. W. ESLING.

There is a beauty sweeter far
Than dwells in sparkling eyes,
Or blushes on the tinted cheek
That wears the rose's dyes.

To no bright jewel'd coronet,
Or touch of magic art
Owes it its birth—it springs undeck'd—
The Beauty of the Heart.

I've seen it in the starting tear,
When Mercy's founts o'erflow,
When Hope, with Heavenly Promise came,

To cheer another's woe.

No Eastern monarch ever set
So priceless, pure a gem
As that soft trembling, dewy tear,
Within his diadem.

And it hath whisper'd to my soul,
In some low, gentle voice,
Beside the sufferer's couch of pain,
Bidding his heart rejoice.

Some lone stricken one, who thought
Unmourn'd he would depart;
But Home and Friendship, smiled again
In Beauty of the Heart.

I hold it as the richer dower
Which our good God hath given,
It delegates to mortal hand,
The highest power of Heaven.

And the sweet soul that seeketh woe
To heal its venom'd smart,
Is mission'd from the Eternal Throne
With Beauty of the Heart.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

BYE PAST TIMES.

The sky is blue, the sward is green,
The leaf upon the bough is seen.
The wind comes from the balmy west,
The little songster build its nest,
The bee hums on from flower to flower,
Till twilight's dim and pensive hour;
The joyous year arrives; but when
Shall bye past times come back again?

I think on childhood's glowing years—
How soft, how bright, the scene appears!
How calm, how cloudless, pass'd away
The long, long, summer holiday!
I may not muse—I must not dream—
Too beautiful these visions seem
For earth and mortal men; but when
Shall bye past times come back again?

I think of sunny eyes so soft,
Too deeply felt enjoyed too oft;
When through the bloomy fields I roved
With her, the earliest, dearest loved;
Around whose form I yet survey,
In thought a bright celestial ray
To present scenes denied; and when
Shall bye past times come back again?

Alas, the world at distance seen
Appeared all blissful and serene.
An Eden, form'd to tempt the foot
With chrysal streams and golden fruit;
That world, when tried and trod is found
A rocky waste, a thorny ground!
We then revert to youth; but when
Shall bye past times come back again?

W O M A N,

BY O. O. M'CLEAN.

The heart of woman, like the diamond, has Light treasur'd in it. There a ray serene
Of Heaven's own sunshine evermore had been.
And tho' each star of hope and joy may pass
Away in darkness from life's stormy sky,
If man but rightly keep that heart, he'll find
Sweet gleams of consolation there enshrined,
That will again allume his spirit's eyes,
And thro' all time, and trial, and distress,
Beam on him with a constant blessedness.
Oh! did he always love her as he should,
She never would forget him, Did he strew
Nothing but thornless flowers or kindness through His "household ways," her happy spirit would Gather from them love's honey like a bee,
And hive it in the cells of memory,
In after years to be his manna food,
When worn and faint in sorrow's solitude.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay ~~twenty-five~~ FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FOURTH OF AUGUST NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED

THE Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 159 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families.—Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams, &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old customers and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12 1-2 cents.

AN ADDRESS

Delivered on the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist the 24th June, at the city of Houston, Republic of Texas.

BY BR. JOHN E. REID.

FELLOW CITIZENS:

The ceremonies of this occasion are intended as a link in that extended chain of honor which binds to coming ages the memory of a Saint and Philosopher—a Christian and a Mason. The Festival of St. John the Baptist, illustrates the great effects which intellect, when under the control of legitimate moral principles, is capable of producing upon the condition of universal society. This eminent philanthropist, without scrip or staff, guided by the illumination of a divine intelligence and protected by the cabalism of an ancient mystery, fearlessly and with a moral energy which can never elicit too great admiration, invaded the fastnesses of superstition, and demolished the temples, which for centuries had been consecrated to the observances of an idolatrous ritual.

In the wilderness of Judea, he raised the altar whose fires, kindled from Heaven, have for eighteen centuries given beauty to death and a holy warmth to the coldness of the grave. Without lance or spear, shield or sword, wealth or worldly prerogative, he boldly planted his banner in the empire of his moral enemy, and as the holy winds of Palestine came over its ample folds, the Gentile with the fictions of his gorgeous mythology, the Jew with the Urin and Thumum of his Mosiac creed, the Infidel with the cabala of Eastern Philosophy, the Greek and Roman, with their Wisdom and Grandeur, all yielded to its triumphs. This champion of Masonic virtue and Masonic religion spoke and the great Pantheon fell. In examining the biography of St. John, we can scarcely determine which to admire the more, the constitutional fortitude of the Saint, or the illustration by his success of the vast importance of Masonic principles in furishing, even among the most savage and inhospitable, a passport to Truth. However novel the position may seem to the uninitiated, it is nevertheless a fact, supported by the testimony of an unbroken tradition, that in the apostolic ages, the doctrines of the cross were disseminated by the auxiliary influence of Freemasonry. The wise men of the East, as they followed the Star of Bethlehem until it stood over the manger of the holy child, worshipped the infant Saviour in the intelligence and universal charity of our craft; and as they laid at the feet of Israel's king, their jewels and precious stones and incense from their native forests, the offering was devoutly consecrated as coming from the wisdom of an ancient mystery and a welcome to the new light from Heaven. The dispenser of universal charities, the handmaid of religion, the world for nearly six thousand years, has been the beneficiary of her kindness. Kings, Empires, Dynasties have sheltered under her wing; the exile and outcast, the famished and poverty-stricken, the persecuted of tyranny and the victim of misfortune have been fed and clothed from her bounty, and none have ever been disappointed who petitioned at the beautiful gates of her temple. On this the natal of one of our brightest lights, we improve an opportunity of placing before this audience a brief sketch of the history of our institution, embracing in the detail the character of Masonry and its legitimate tendencies.

The institution of Masonry can be traced to the building of the Temple by King Solomon. That wise and great monarch in conjunction with Hiram, King of Tyre, and Hiram Abiff, laid the foundation of that moral building whose structure, magnificent in design and universal in its influence, is not surpassed by that gorgeous pile of cedar and fir, of gold and silver, precious stones and choicest marble in which the God of Abraham was worshipped. Indeed, five thousand years have passed away since the wealth of the world was concentrated in the erection of that greatest and most magnificent of all holy temples, and on their surface, no track nor vestige of Jewish glory can be found. The mighty volcano burst from the Roman shores of Italy swept the fields of Palestine and in that burning flood sunk the fair city of Jerusalem, with her songs and dances, her joys of the timbrel and harp, her pleasant places and beautiful gates; the holy ark and her sacred altars; and the sayr and corinorant and bittern, now build their nests and rear their young amid the ruins where once a thousand trumpets and ten thousand minstrels mingled in the worship of Israel's God.

But the great moral temple which this master Mason reared, still exists, firmly built on the corner-stone of universal mind; not a marble shaken, nor pillar fractured, turret and tower proudly erect in the sunshine and clear sky of Heaven, unaffected by the storms of proscriptions, the tempests of war, the thunders of the vatican or the wild and vicious persecutions of the mighty—but ignorant. When an institution is built upon the principles of universal charity, the God of Heaven is its ally.

Such, my fellow citizens, is Masonry. Virtue is its utelar divinity; its foundation Benevolence and Charity; its pillars Wisdom, Strength and Beauty.

Although it is legitimate to suppose that the principles of our craft existed as coeval with order and proportion, yet as we have evidence sufficiently strong to illuminate the darkness which rests upon the world's history, behind the era of King Solomon, we esteem an investigation as useless, because unsatisfactory, and we call not on credulity to subscribe to any proposition unless fortified by the monument of unbroken testimony. As I have stated, the more immediate origin of our society is derived from King Solomon. He is our patronymic. At the building of his temple, his chief care was to form his workmen into regular lodges, thereby securing order and system, and by the institution of wholesome laws, and officers to enforce said laws, and superintend the great undertaking, he laid the foundation of that harmony, love and friendship, among the brotherhood whereby the grand design was pursued with unceasing industry, and the members at the same time, impressed with the value of secrecy, prudence, morality and good fellowship.

This being the practical origin of our order, we now regard ourselves as moral builders, subordinate to the great architect of the universe, and our symbol indicates, in theory at least, our devotion to the service of the true God. "As our society exists, it is a voluntary association on religious and charitable principles; and our rules, orders, emblems and symbolic representations enjoin us to live a life of the strictest morality and to be found always working in the duties of charity, good offices and brotherly love;" and my brethren know that the mystic representations and furniture of our lodges are intended to illustrate the mightiness and wisdom of God, the uncertain tenure of earthly things and the many vicissitudes to which life is exposed. The world had long suffered in the conflict of opposite creeds. Humanity had wept tears of blood over the scenes of carnage and discord, which so long stained the beautiful picture of God's creation and long had Philanthropy sighed for some common principle of union which all society could unite some common fireside, where shut out from the bufftings of sectarianism, brothers of the great family of man could meet in the warm embrace and common welcome of sincere hospitality.

Such is Masonry—disinterested friendship being a basis, so is unanimity and brotherly love the cement and glory of our profession.

Our system disclaims any interference with the Religious, Political or Domestic Economy of society.—We go into the world of human suffering, and when a brother is found, we administer to his wants, whether that brother be a disciple of the cross or crescent, whether he be serf of royalty, slave of despotism or the freeman of a written constitution; whether a thousand slaves bend the knee at his coming, and the commerce and luxury of all climates be subsidiary to his desire, or whether from the sweat of his brow, he obtain his daily sustenance—and when the orphan cries to God for bread, and the chill wind freezes the blood in his little veins; when death has hid in the grave the light and warmth of a father's love, then does the true Mason, as God's messenger, answer that orphan's prayer and kindle fresh affections in the heart of the afflicted child, and too, when the stay of woman's love and woman's hope is laid in dust, and the dark weed is placed on the brow, which but yesterday was all bright and sunny with the visions of happiness and gaiety of requited love—Masonry with its angel voice offers the consolations of the upper sanctuary and is the home and refuge of that heart, until its widowed affections return to their long-treasured resting place.

Friendship, Humanity, Pity, Charity and Benevolence, as uncircumscribed as the love of Heaven, are the elements of our society; Virtue its guiding principle, and God and Eternal Happiness its consummation.

Worshipful Grand Master, Wardens and Brothers:—It little behoves me, who but yesterday, became invested with the symbols of our Fraternity, to address those who have sustained the burden and heat of the day in the labors of the temple. But the words of truth are sacred, though they fall from the lips of a child. In the land of our fathers, the light of Masonry is high in its meridian. Founded upon the institutions of a Republican Government, its illuminations like fires upon a thousand hills, have radiated over every enterprise, and its genial influence has warmed into existence, the active charities of a great and christian people.

We are the representatives of the same people; their virtues and faults; their excellencies and infirmities are our inheritance. The sympathy which binds us together as distinct sovereignties, owes its existence no less to Masonic, than to moral and political similitude. It is our exalted destiny as a nation, with the gaze of the Monarchical and Republican world fixed upon us, to carry out in this land so lately redeemed from the captivity, of an ungenerous and treacherous foe, the great principles of political self-government, nobly commenced in our Father Land. As masons, we are specially invoked to assist in an undertaking so stupendous. This can only be accomplished, my brethren, by a rigorous individual censorship, and in a country so fair as this, the reward is a full warrant for the task. It is an allegory of the Moors that the Deity dwelt in the Heavens which hung over the fair gardens of the Alhambra. It a profusion of all that can charm the eye and captivate the taste, a soil as rich as the gardens of the Euphrates, mountains filled with mineral treasures, rivers threading boundless prairies, all rejoicing and blossoming like the rose; a broad gulf bounding half of our territory and one upon whose waves may be seen the white wings of a thousand ships; a government where all are free, and the free happy in their virtuous independence—if all these constitute a paradise, then too, may, we believe with the Moor that the wing of Heaven is stretched far and wide over our adopted country. The heritage which we enjoy is coupled with the highest trusts—we are the watchmen on the walls of human liberty, and as the star of empire takes its westward way, the bright light of Masonry accompanies it, either to make tyranny odious, or liberty joyful. The professions which we make to the world, die not with us.

After we have ceased from our labors, whether the marble and epitaph mark our tombs, or the prairie flower grows over our unvisited graves, still the memory of our actions will live. Mind is immortal, and that immortality is impressed upon its results. How manifest then is our duty as Masons! By our conduct we have it in our power so to exalt the character of our country, that benighted man, as he sails on the ocean of political adventure in search of political happiness, will take his observations from the SINGLE STAR. By our conduct we can give direction to the moral tide of the universe. By our conduct we can make our Texas the great eleemosynary home of suffering humanity, its charities falling as the dew of Heaven, upon every heart, and its philanthropy the common property of mankind.

For what we can tell, the Society of Ancient York Masons, established in this New Republic, is the radiating point of political virtue or political vice, as the tide of emigration swells onward from the Gulf to the Pacific.

For what we can tell, the light caught from the altar of the Jewish temple and which we have this day kindled afresh, may guide thousands in the paths of justice and truth, and shining through the vast range of future ages, increase in brightness, until the world shall be one great brotherhood of charity, and vice be forever lost in the blaze of Universal Virtue.

The task is before us; the duty plain—we have every incentive; love of home, friends, country, the human family—while there is a want in the heart or a tear on the cheek, we cannot sleep. Go then brethren; let the example of the blessed St. John be continually before us! Fear not an enemy! Founded on the rock of Eternal Truth, our society can feel no attack. Its venerable head is unbent by age—Immortal youth is on its brow, and undying love gives energy to its heart.

Like some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale and midway leaves the storm;
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Ages have passed over the dust of its founder, and its tall spires still rise up to Heaven, and ages will roll over the dust of its disciples, and the temple will be filled with worshippers. Then be it ours so to square our actions as to embrace them within the compass and rule of Truth.

"So build up the Being that we are—
That deeply drinking in the soul of things,
We shall be wise perforce.
Whate'er we see—whate'er we feel.
By agency direct or indirect,
Shall tend to feed and nurse our faculties
Shall fix in calmer seats
Of moral strength and raise to Lossier heights of love divine,
Our intellectual soul."

BAR WIT.—"I'll handle your witness without gloves," said one lawyer to another.

"That you may do with safety, but it is more than I would venture to do with yours," was the reply.

Miscellany.

THE MEANING OF LANGUAGE.

Among the impediments to knowledge youth incur while in many of our schools, there is, perhaps, none so much to be deplored as the neglect of teachers to make them fully acquainted with the meaning of every difficult word they meet with in their reading. Children are taught to read select pieces from the most classic English authors: pieces replete with information, and every public or private duty: but unless they know the meaning of the language, they make not the least attainment in virtue or science. I have many times, took up "the Speaker," and requested Boys and Girls to read a few paragraphs, to which they have always complied willingly—it is true, they read tolerably well, and used good accentuation, but the moment they came to a word seldom used in common parlance they were nine times out of ten ignorant of its meaning. Thus, Mr. Editor, you can observe, that as this unknown word is very commonly a verb, the very gist (if I may so express it) of the whole sentence is frequently lost and the child receives no greater addition to his stock of knowledge, than he would by reading many lines from a Latin author.

The teacher should never permit a child to pass a difficult word without being certain he understand its signification. This subject brings to my mind an anecdote of the learned Dr. Parr. A clergyman who frequently visited the Doctor requested he would permit him to preach a sermon to his parishioners: the Doctor assented upon condition that the sermon should not contain any word which was not easily understood by the peasantry. When the Sermon was over, the clergyman asked the Doctor if he had not fulfilled the condition. To which the Doctor replied in the negative, insisting that all his congregation did not understand the word "Felicity," which had been mentioned in the pulpit. The clergyman could scarcely believe this. To test the point the Doctor called in his manservant, and asked him if he understood the whole language of the sermon. The reply was in the affirmative. "Well," said the Doctor, "do you know what the word Felicity means?" "Oh yes" was the reply. "Well then," rejoined the Doctor, "give us the meaning of the word." Ah! there was the rub. The man hesitated, and after stammering a considerable time, said—he believed Felicity meant something in the inside of a Pig!!

HEREDITARY DESCENT OF MENTAL TALENT.

From a number of facts, a few of which we select for the purpose of illustration, it appears singularly striking that the inheritance of mental talent is more generally derived from the maternal than the paternal side. The examples we have chosen have been made with reference to the different varieties of mental superiority. Lord Bacon: his mother was skilled in many languages, and translated and wrote several works, which displayed learning, acuteness, and taste. Hume, the historian, mentions his mother as a woman of "singular merit;" and who, although in the prime of life, devoted herself entirely to his education. R. B. Sheridan: Mrs. Frances Sheridan was a woman of considerable abilities. It was writing a pamphlet in his defence that first introduced her to Mr. Sheridan, afterwards her husband. She also wrote a novel, highly praised by Johnson. Schiller, the German poet: his mother was an amiable woman; she had a strong relish for the beauties of nature, and was passionately fond of music and poetry. Schiller was her favorite child. Goethe thus speaks of his parents:—"I inherited from my father a certain sort of eloquence, calculated to inforce my doctrines on my auditors; from my mother I derived the faculty of representing all that the imagination can conceive, with energy and vivacity." Thomson, the poet: his mother was a woman of uncommon natural endowments, possessed of every social and domestic virtue, with a warmth of imagination scarcely inferior to her son.—Boerhaave's mother acquired a knowledge of medicine not often met with in females. The mother of Lord Erskine was a woman of very superior talent and discernment. Sir Walter Scott's mother was a woman of great accomplishments and virtue; she had a good taste for, and wrote poetry, which appeared in print in 1789. We might further mention the mothers of Napoleon, Marmonel, Sir William Jones, and a host of others. We will conclude our list with the words of Mrs. Jameson, who, in an admiral sketch of Mrs. Siddons (given to the second volume of her "Visits Sketches at Home and Abroad") says—"Mrs. Siddons, with all her graces of form and feature—her magnificence of deportment—her deep-toned, measured voice, and impressive enunciation—was in reality a softened reflection of her more stern, stately, majestic mother, whose genuine loftiness of spirit and of bearing—whose rare beauty and imperious despotism of character—have often been described to me as truly awful; even her children trembled in her presence."

PERILOUS ADVENTURE.—A friend sojourning at Niagara Falls, gives the following account of the escape of a man from one of the small islands, just above the great falls. The story has been briefly told in the newspapers, accompanied with the suggestion that the man had purposely got upon the island. But our correspondent, as may be seen, details the circumstances shewing that there was no joke in the poor fellow's predicament.

"You will remember that two years since I gave you an account of a most heroic feat performed by Peter Robinson, by which he saved the life of an unfortunate man, who, falling into the rapids from the bridge, was luckily thrown on an island very near the cataract, and was rescued from his perilous situation by the efforts of this daring man. Peter has again given proof of his dauntless courage, and of his eminent humanity, as the annexed narrative will prove.

On Friday evening last, about 10 o'clock, a man crossing the river in a boat, from Chippewa, owing to darkness of the night got into the rapids before he was aware how far down the current had forced him. On perceiving his perilous situation, he immediately turned the head of his boat against the current, and in his violent exertions to reach Goat Island, was so unfortunate as to break one of his oars—you can imagine the horror of his situation, with but one oar to attempt to stem that mighty current, a contest soon found useless, for he was rapidly hurried towards the awful precipice. His efforts too, to run his boat on either of the small islands which lie between Goat Island and the Canady shore were without avail; and he, to use his own words, "said his prayers before going it." In passing the small island nearest the Fall, he, as a desperate resource, leaped from his boat, and was fortunate enough to secure a footing, and, with some difficulty, a safe landing on the shore. The boat found refuge at the bottom of the cataract.

On this Island his situation was scarcely more to be envied, for he found himself on a spot which had never before been trodden by mortal foot, surrounded by roaring waters, and within not many yards of the mighty falls. As soon as he was perceived, Robinson was, of course, called for, and readily responded; but his boat was dry and leaky, and had to be caulked and repaired. This was the work of time, and there the poor fellow remained all the next day, and the following night, entirely without sustenance.

On the succeeding day Robinson landed on an island near that on which the victim was—a most hazardous performance—and found that it would be impossible to attempt to save him by rowing a boat to him, without the almost certain prospect of destruction. He then thought of adopting other means, and returning to shore obtained rope and a piece of lead, with which he went back to his former position. By means of a cord attached to a lead, which he threw to the man, the latter was enabled to draw to the island a rope; this he firmly fixed to a tree; Robinson procured another rope, and fastening both to the boat, she was drawn to the sufferer, and then, with her overjoyed freight, was pulled by the hero to his island. Thus by the skill and courage of this man, access was had to an island which had hitherto been unapproachable, and a fellow-being was rescued from an awful death. The achievement was followed by the cheers of the spectators.

I have attempted to give you a slight description of this wonderful feat. It must necessarily be weak; words cannot describe the risks that were run, nor the skill with which they were surmounted."

SCOTCH DEGREES.

When the University of St. Andrews sold her honors—a proceeding which provoked Dr. Johnson to tell the heads of the college that they would get rich by degrees, and which has long since been abandoned—a certain minister, who deemed that his ministrations would be more accepted and more useful if he possessed what the Germans call the doctor-hat, put £15 in his purse, and went to St. Andrews to purchase for himself a good degree. His man-servant accompanied him, and was present when his master was formally admitted to the long-desired honor. On his return "the doctor" sent for his servant, and addressed him somewhat as follows: "Noo, Saunders, ye'll aye be sure to ca' me the doctor, and gin ony body spiers at aboot me, ye'll be aye sure to say the doctor's in his study, or the doctor's engaged, or the doctor will see you in a crack." "That a' depends," was the reply, "upon whether ye'll ca' me doctor too." The reverend doctor stared. "Ay, it's that so," continued the other; "for when I find it out sae little, I ee'n got a diploma myself; sae ye'll just be good enough to say—doctor, put on some pills, or doctor, bring me some whiskey and hot water; and gin ony body spiers at ye aboot me, ye'll be aye sure to say, the doctor's in the stable, or the doctor's in the pantry, or, the doctor's digging potatoes, as the case may be."—*Church of Eng. ANECDOTE OF QUIN.

Of Quin, the actor, the following anecdote lately appeared in Fraser's Magazine:—"Quin at this time, for convenience, having occasion to make frequent professional visits, particularly at an early hour, at Carlton House, retained two small ready-furnished apartments, on the second floor, at the house of a widow in Pall Mall, who lived with her two daughters; one of whom, being very beautiful and talented, attracted the notice of the player, who being most liberal, and a truly excellent-hearted man, he advised the mother to let her go upon the stage. The lady and her daughters were poor; but being most exemplary, they politely declined. Quin, nevertheless, urged the point; and observed, 'Though we players are by foolish constructions stigmatised as vagabonds by statute, I will give you ample references, where you and your friends may inquire into my character and reputation: and I offer you a week for further consideration.' The inquiries were made, proved all that the strictest rectitude could require, and the offer was most gratefully accepted. The benevolent actor delicately presented the mother with a purse containing fifty guineas, and said, finding the young lady intelligent and accomplished, 'You must allow me to be her preceptor, and as I am an honest man I will protect her. When she visits my apartments in King street, Covent Garden, do you, her mother or her sister, come with her, for I will never receive her alone. I will, God aiding, do my best for her, and put her in the way of fortune.' The experiment was made; her instructor was delighted; she appeared on the stage; and she promised to become a theatrical prodigy, when a young gentleman of rank, fortune, and honor being struck with her great beauty and modesty, inquired for the mother, and sought the daughter's fair hand. The mother, who possessed the fine sentiments of a gentlewoman, properly transferred the admirer to Mr Quin, who, she gratefully observed, 'had generously adopted her child.' Quin's feelings on this disclosure, as he afterwards declared, entirely unmanned him. 'Dear, virtuous family!' he exclaimed, and burst into tears. Quin gave away his lovely protegee at the altar, and lived to witness their connubial happiness, even until after they were surrounded by a numerous progeny, the daughters being all fair, and the sons all brave."

Incendiaries are again at work in Baltimore. On Friday night they made two attempts, and on Sunday morning one, to fire the city; but in each case their design was discovered in time to frustrate it.

The Logan Gazette says:—Col. Johnson offers the Wyandots an annuity of $14,000, but the tribe demands $20,000, and will not take less. This comes direct from one of the tribe.

READ A PAPER BEFORE YOU SIGN IT.—King James I, showed his aversion to business at a very early age; so much so, that he was in the habit of signing whatever papers were brought to him without reading or making himself acquainted with their contents. To correct this pernicious habit, his tutor, Buchanan, adopted the following scheme: One day, when the young king was preparing to set out on a hunting excursion, he placed before him a document containing a formal abdication of his kingdom. It was signed, as usual, without inquiring into its purport. On the return of James in the evening, Buchanan produced the paper and pointed out its contents. At the sight of what he had done, the king burst into tears. Buchanan comforted him by throwing the document into the fire; at the same time seizing the opportunity of enlarging on the injustice which he might be guilty of to others, as well as to himself, should he hereafter persist in so indolent and injurious a practice.

THE CROPS.

The papers from different parts of the State give a favorable account of the harvest. The Poughkeepsie Telegraph says that the yield in Dutchess county will be a good one. The Canandaigua Repository, that the surplus will be fair: not so much as to depress prices, nor so small as to command high ones. The New York Herald has the following, in reference to the price of flour, and the prospect of the harvest in the different grain growing States in the Union:

"Flour and grain continue very dull. No foreign demands exists, not any from the eastward although there are only twenty thousand barrels of flour in Boston. We have a small stock; but as there is so much in the interior, and as the crops promise so favorable, none are foolish enough to lay in a large stock."

We have received later intelligence of the crops.—More than half of them have been harvested, and whatever we now report can be relied upon as correct. We give below a table of the result in each State so far as known:

States.	Crops.
New York	About an average.
Ohio	More than an average.
Indiana	Do do do
Michigan	Do do do
New Jersey	About an average.
Virginia	Little short of an average.
Maryland	Fair average crop.
Pennsylvania	Little above an average.
Tennessee	Above an average.
New Hampshire	Fair average crop.
Maine	About an average.
Illinois	About an average.
Kentucky	Little short of an average.

From the returns and recent statistical statements it appears that in the growth of bread stuffs, the States rank as follows:

In wheat—1st, Ohio; 2d Pennsylvania; 3d, New York.

In Indian Corn—1st, Tennessee; 2d, Virginia; 3d, Ohio.

In Potatoes—1st, New York 2d, Maine; 3d, Pennsylvania."

"You've played the duce on my heart!" remarked a gentleman to a young lady who was his partner in a game of whist.

"Because you played the knave," replied the lady, smiling. That was diamond cut diamond.

A Steam Organ.—The Belgian papers announce the invention by M. Sax, of a steam organ—a monster instrument, with vibrating plates, (hugh steel bars, to which immense pressure alone can, communicate vibration)—capable of being heard over a whole province.

If married ladies would consult their husbands instead of their friends, on matters concerning both, there would be less harsh feeling and more comfort among the parties.

Afflicting Event.—Mary and Ellen, aged 16 and 24, daughters of Deacon John Scotten, of great bend, Susquehanah county, Pa., were drowned while bathing in the Susquehanah river a few days since.

THE GATHERER.

DEATH FROM THE BITE OF A TOAD.—The Journal de l'Aveyron relates that a woman aged about 60, while at work in the fields of Saint Come, had her foot seized by an enormous toad, which held so fast that it could not be forced to let go until it was pierced through by a man with a sharp pointed stick. Only a few drops of blood followed the bite, and the woman continued her work, but in a very short time her countenance became flushed, and she experienced a burning thirst, but went to bed without taking any remedies. In the morning she was found dead, and the autopsy of the body gave all the symptoms of death by poison of a venomous reptile, thus contradicting the opinion of naturalists that toads do not possess any venomous qualities.

Supposed Murder.—The body of the beautiful "Cigar Girl," so well known at Anderson's store, Broadway, whose name was Mary Ann Rogers, was found floating in the North River, near the Elysian Fields, Hoboken, on Thursday afternoon, and from the marks of violence upon it, it is supposed the unfortunate girl had been murdered. She boarded at Mrs. Ball's, in Nassau street, and left there early in the week. She had been in one or two equivocal situations. About a year since she was published as having fled with a young man, and a cry of abduction was raised. This was hushed, and a story was put forth that she had been to Brooklyn visiting some friends there. There is no doubt that she has been murdered.—N. Y. Sun.

A Sorrowsful case of Drowning.—Mr. William Henry Pratt, a student in the Rensselaer Institute, was drowned at the foot of the dam on the Hudson River, in this city, at 8 o'clock P. M. on the 30th ult. He was bathing just at evening twilight with several other students; being at a distance from the other students with a young son of Proff. Eaton, the latter having slipped into a gorge containing a great depth of water and appeared to be drowning, he took hold of him to save him from sinking, and at the same instant sunk down into the same gully and was drowned. Young E. by violent struggles rose frequently to the surface and was saved by a Mr. Quinland who was near with a boat.

Thus by an attempt to save another, and a mistake as to the depth of water, an amiable youth in his eighteenth year was withdrawn from this theatre of good and evil.

Mr. Pratt was a native of Chatham, Columbia co., and a most studious, efficient and liberal-minded scholar.—Troy Whig.

Coiners Caught.—The police of New Orleans have arrested three German Jews, engaged in making counterfeit doubloons of German silver. The arrest was effected through the agency of a police officer named Weiss, also a German Jew, who pretended to join the confederacy, and so possessed himself of all the needed information.

An Unnatural Father.—A man named Nicholas Moyer, residing at Fredensburgh, Schuylkill county, Pa., has been committed to jail for killing his own child. Moyer is said to be a man of very intemperate habits, and not long since a child of his died in a very sudden manner, and it was thought was destroyed by the father.

Mr. Wm. Hoover, a respectable and industrious citizen of Williamsport, Md., was killed on Thursday last, by falling from a scaffold which broke down—a stone of three hundred weight fell upon him and crushed him.

Michigan City, July 21st.—Harvest.—The harvest is nearly over, and a kind Providence has blessed the tillers of the soil, with an abundant crop. We believe the wheat from Northern Indiana will excel any thing of the kind ever offered in the eastern market. Gentlemen wheat buyers, come on if you want the finest wheat ever produced, and you can have it.—Gazette.

Half a million dollars worth of steamboat stock is said to be lying up, and out of commission in the creek at Buffalo.

POPULAR TALES.

PEACE AND WAR.

A FRENCH STORY.

The enjoyment of travelling in a carriage, with all due deference to Dr. Samuel Johnson be it said; depends much upon the company in which one is placed at the time. So at least thought the lady whose history is destined to form the subject of consideration at present.

Madame de Sareuil had been married in very early youth, almost in the days of her girlhood; and the partner to whom her parents had united her, was a man well advanced in years. There existed little sympathy between the parties thus thrown together, either as regarded tastes or character, yet Madame de Sareuil conducted herself in such a manner as to defy the reproaches of the world, or of her own conscience—the more severe censor of the two. Her husband, fortunately, was a good-natured man, but he was an invalid, and this circumstance led to a constant trial of the lady's better qualities. She accompanied M. de Sareuil to the springs of the Baden, and watched over him with great attention. It was on their return from that place, while they were passing by easy stages to Paris, that Madame de Sareuil felt the want of good companionship to render her journey interesting. She did not complain of the peevishness of her husband, though he was often peevish; she merely felt a blank—a want of some one to talk with, and reciprocate the sentiments called up by the scenery through which her journey lay. She was within a few hours' travel of Paris, when she began to think her husband's lengthened silence somewhat odd. He had leaned heavily, too, upon her shoulder for some half hour or so. She tried to shift her position a little. In doing so, she took away the support upon which her husband rested and, to her horror, he fell instantly forward upon the front of the carriage. She screamed aloud, and the postilion stopped. On attempting to raise him, it was found that he was dead.

Madame de Sareuil was now a widow, and a rich one. It must be admitted that her sorrow, though of a decent amount of quality, was not inextinguishable. Her husband had never shown that inclination to please which might have compensated the want of congenial years and tastes on his part. Her year of mourning over, Madame de Sareuil certainly felt herself happier in her widowhood than she had ever done in her wedded state. The consciousness that such was the case, made her extremely chary of listening to proposals for her re-entrance into the married state. Such proposals poured in upon her in great abundance for she was beautiful, young, and rich. "They only lose their time," said the widow to her confidential law-agent, a person who enjoyed more of her friendship than she bestowed on any other acquaintance; "they but lose their time. Experience has taught me that greater happiness lies in the single than in the married life, and I will not be foolish enough to give up my liberty again." "But you judge hastily," said the notary; "your late husband was one unfitted to be your companion in life, from difference of years and habits. Another?" "No, no!" answered the lady. "no other, if you please. I am perfectly happy at present, and happy I will remain as long as I can."

But who can foresee what the future has in store? One morning, the same friend of Madame de Sareuil, her notary and agent, called upon her, and requested an interview. On being introduced to her presence, he found the lady somewhat more pensive than he had been accustomed to see her; and the tidings which he brought to her were not of a kind calculated to dissipate the unwonted weight upon her spirits. "I come to inform you, madame," said the notary, "that you are menaced with a process at law." "I menaced with a process!" cried the young widow; "and pray, upon what score?" "Your succession to your husband's property is to be contested," answered the notary. "Ridiculous!" said Madame de Sareuil; "have we not a will in my favor?" "You have," was the notary's reply, "but wills may be attacked." "Is that of M. de Sareuil not in regular form, then?" asked the lady. "The intention of the deceased might be good," answered the man of law, "but it is certainly imperfectly expressed. Ah, if your husband had consulted me! Unfortunately, he chose to make a holograph deed, and I think it my duty to warn you that I am by no means assured of its stability." "If aware of this before, why did not you warn me earlier?" said the widow. "Because I was averse from giving you unnecessary disquiet, and did not imagine that your rights would ever be called in question." "Who is the party disposed to doubt them at present, then? I thought my late husband had no relatives excepting some very distant ones." "You are so far in error," answered the notary; "M. de Sareuil had a cousin—a first cousin—a young man now living." "Strange that he should never have mentioned this relative to me!" said the widow. After a few moments of thoughtfulness, she continued—"And this cousin absolutely wishes to dispute the succession with me? Positively he does, said the notary; "the affair is already in the hands of an advocate, and steps must be taken immediately for defending your rights."

Evil news spread quickly. Madame de Sareuil was young, and a woman; and it must be confessed that her pride was hurt by the immediate impression made on the circle of her admirers by the tidings of her doubtful position. She had imagined that the homage of those around her was only a matter of amusement to her, and she felt annoyed at her own weakness in allowing the coolness of her interested suitors to produce any effect upon her mind. "Ah, madam," said the notary to her, at one of their interviews for consultation, "I always advised you to marry while opportunity was in your power." "What, sir?" said the lady, with a degree of noble pride beaming from her eye; "do you imagine that I regret not forming a union with any of these men, who now show me so plainly what their true sentiments were? Or do you think I can have any feeling but one of rejoicing that no one has been deceived in me—that no one has been bound to me, while believing me rich, though really poor?" "But, madam," said the notary, "if you lose the process, you will not have a penny in the world." This was indeed a grievous reflection, let the widow strive to face it as she might. She had been trained to ease and affluence, and knew well that a change of life would be heavy for her to bear. "My handsome house," said she, "my equipage, my balls, my concerts—must I give them all up, and work for my bread with my hands? And my box at the opera?" "Ay," said the notary, casting a significant look at his client; "to give up the box at the opera—that will indeed be a trial!" Madame de Sareuil blushed as she answered, "What do you mean, sir?" "Oh! nothing—nothing!" said the notary. Whether he spoke the truth or not in saying this, did not appear at the moment. After a pause he continued—"But my dear madam, we must not give up all hope. To tell the candid truth, I fear that your cause, legally considered, is hopeless; but there is one chance of releasing you, in part, from this unfortunate position. It is possible that the other party may enter into a compromise. He may be doubtful of the issue as well as we are. With your permission, I will write to his agent, and propose such an arrangement. It is the only way to secure to you any part of that fortune, to which you certainly have a claim in equity, if not in law." The lady agreed to the proposal of her friendly counsellor.

On the ensuing morning, the notary again presented himself to his client, and produced the answer to his proposal sent on the part of the adverse claimant.—The widow, with natural impatience, desired the notary to read the letter. The following were its terms:—"I am certain," said the claimant, "of gaining this process. Of this no lawyer can have a doubt, on glancing at the will of my late cousin, M. de Sareuil. Nevertheless, it is my desire to act generously. I have never seen Madame de Sareuil, my cousin—if she will allow me to call her so—but I have heard of her beauty and merits, and have resolved upon offering my hand to her, with the re-possession of that fortune which the law might wrest from her. If my proposal is not agreed to, the consequence is clear. The process or marriage; peace or war; such is my ultimatum."

"Insolence!" cried the widow.

"I grant you," said the notary, "that the epistle is a little in the cavalier order; but you should remember that your cousin may be more pitted than blamed.

Doubtless he has had a provincial education, and requires polishing." "And you would have me marry this rude, unmannerly rustic!" exclaimed the widow. "Ah, if he had been such a person as one could love! Aimable, intelligent!"—"And handsome as the young gentleman whom you saw at the opera among some friends, and who appeared so much captivated by you!" The widow blushed deeply. "What!" said she, "you were at the opera, then? You saw him? But what could you notice there? Only a few words passed between us; I do not even know his name." "But he talked well?" said the notary inquiringly. "I will confess to a friend so old as you are," said the lady, still blushing, "that I never met a man so intelligent so every way pleasing, as that stranger at the opera." "Well, madame, but to our answer, said the notary, after a few moments of musing; "what shall the answer be to this epistle?" "I will take my chance," answered Madame de Sareuil, "and the law. Lose or win, I can never bend to such a proposition as is contained in that letter." "But the risk, madame," said the notary, "the danger—the certainty of poverty?" "It matters not," said the lady; "write my answer immediately." "It is unnecessary," replied the notary. "When that letter was left with me, the bearer arranged to call here for an answer; and, madam, who was the bearer, think you? No other than the gentleman whom you saw at the opera, and who proves to be the intimate friend of your cousin. It was I who asked him to call here, indeed. Pray, pardon the liberty."

Before Madame de Sareuil could answer, the servant opened the door, and announced the visitor. It was the young stranger. He seemed somewhat embarrassed, but after a respectful bow to the lady, he turned to the notary, and asked, "if he had communicated the proposal to the lady?" "I have," answered the notary; and war, not peace, is her choice." The young man appeared chagrined. But the words of the notary were confirmed by Madame de Sareuil.—"Yes, sir," said she, "such terms can be met by one reply—a refusal." "But, madam," cried the man, "concessions may be made; had I thought the terms so painful, I would not have proposed them." "Are you a minister plenipotentiary, then, in this affair?" said Madame de Sareuil. The young stranger looked confused. "Certainly," answered he; "it would be strange, indeed, if I were not." It was evident that some confusion, some misapprehension, existed among the parties, though the smiling eye of the notary seemed to indicate that he was not among those so situated. "If you have full powers from your principal," said Madame de Sareuil, half in jest and half in earnest, "sign this paper, which I shall fill up at leisure." The stranger hurriedly signed as directed. Madame de Sareuil glanced at the paper, and exclaimed, "What do I see?—Leon de Sareuil! Is that your name, sir? Are you?"—"Cousin to your late husband," said the young stranger. "And the letter which you wrote me?" said the lady. "I wrote no letter," answered the other; "to your agent I hinted at a mode of compromise which would make me the happiest man on earth; but I wrote no letter!" The notary now put in his word. "Pardon me, madam," said he, "for this little trick. I believed that, through accident, I had discovered your feelings towards this gentleman, your adversary at law; and I brought about this meeting in consequence."

All parties were silent for a moment. "And now, madam," said the notary at last, "is it to be peace or war?" Madame de Sareuil again blushed, as she answered, in a low tone, "Peace, peace. I accept the terms offered."

A happy marriage was the consequence.

Isaac Sharp Rawdon, is the name of a member of Congress, from the West, who wears a common iron skillet on his head. Having had a quarrel with his wife, before he left home, she seized a skillet by the handle and struck at him; the open part of the skillet received his head, and such was the force of the blow that, although a small fit, it was driven fairly on his head, where it remains like a cup with a long tail behind, every exertion to get it off having proved abortive. Mr. Rawdon came near putting out the eye of a member who sat behind him, by suddenly jerking his head back, the end of the skillet striking the honorable gentleman on the eye brow. Mr. Rawdon is known in Washington by the appellation of Iron Head.

BIOGRAPHY.

ELIZABETH.

This great queen, says Marville, passionately admired handsome persons, and he was already far advanced in her favour who approached her with beauty and grace. She had so unconquerable and aversion for ugly and ill-made men, who had been treated unfortunately by nature, that she could not endure their presence.

When she issued from her palace, her guards were careful to disperse from before her eyes hideous and deformed people, the lame, the hunch-backed, &c., in a word, all those whose appearance might shock her fastidious sensations.

There is this singular and admirable in the conduct of Elizabeth, that she made her pleasure subservient to her politics, and she maintained her affairs by what in general occasion the ruin of princes. So secret were her amours, that even to the present day their mysteries cannot be penetrated; but the utility she drew from them is public, and always operated for the good of the people. Her lovers were her ministers, and her ministers were her lovers. Love commanded, love was obeyed; and the reign of this princess was happy, because it was a reign of Love, in which its claims and its slavery are liked!

The origin of Raleigh's advancement in the queen's graces, was by an act of gallantry. Raleigh spoiled a new plush cloak, while the queen stepping cautiously on it, shot forth a smile, in which he read promotion. Captain Raleigh soon became Sir Walter, and rapidly advanced in the queen's favour.

Hume has furnished us with ample proofs of the passion which her courtiers feigned for her, and which with others I shall give, to form the opinion of Vignieu Marville, who did not know probably the reason why her amours were never discovered; which, indeed never went further than the highest than boisterous or extreme gallantry. Hume has preserved in his notes a letter written Raleigh. It is a perfect amorous composition. After having exerted his poetic talents to exalt her charms, and his affection, he concludes by comparing her majesty, who was then sixty, to Venus and Diana. Sir Walter was not her only courtier who wrote in this style. Even in her old age she affected a strange fondness for music and dancing, and a kind of childlike drollery, by which however her court seemed a court of love, and she the sovereign. A curious anecdote in a letter of the times has reached us. Secretary Cecil, the youngest son of Lord Burleigh, seems to have perfectly entered into her character. Lady Derby wore about her neck and in her bosom a portrait: the queen spying it, inquired about it, but her ladyship was anxious to conceal it. The queen insisted on having it, and discovering it to be the portrait of young Cecil, she snatched it away, and tying it upon her shoe, walked long with it; afterward she pinned it on her elbow, and wore it some time there. Secretary Cecil hearing of this composed some verses and got them set to music; this music the queen insisted on hearing. In his verses Cecil sung that he repined not, though her majesty was pleased to grace others; he contented himself with the favour she had given him, by wearing his portrait on her feet and her elbow! The writer of the letter adds, "All these things are very sweet." In this manner she contrived to lay the fastest hold on her able servants, and her servants on her.

Those who are intimately acquainted with the private anecdotes of those times, know what encouragement this royal coquette gave to most who were near her person. Dodd, in his Church History, says, that the Earls of Arran and Arundel, and Sir William Pickering, were not out of hopes of gaining Queen Elizabeth's affections in a matrimonial way.

She encouraged every person of eminence: she even went so far on the anniversary of her coronation as publicly to take a ring from her finger, and put it on the Duke of Alençon's hand. She also ranked among her suitors, Henry the Third of France, and Henry the Great.

She never forgave Buzenval for ridiculing her bad pronunciation of the French language; and when Henry IV sent him over on an embassy, she would not receive him. So nice was the irritable pride of this great queen, that she made her private injuries matters of state.

'This queen,' writes Du Maurier, in the Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Hollande, 'who displayed so many heroic accomplishments, had this foible of wishing to be thought beautiful by all the world. I heard my father, that having been sent to her, at every audience he had with her majesty, she pulled off her gloves more than a hundred times to display her hands, which indeed were very beautiful and very white.'

Another anecdote, not less curious, relates to the affair of the duke of Anjou and our Elizabeth, and one more proof of her partiality for handsome men. The writer was Lewis Guyon, a contemporary of the time, he notices.

'From the Duke of Anjou being desirous of marrying a crown, he d. caused portraits of marriage to be made to Elizabeth queen of England. Letters passed between them and their portraits were exchanged. At length her majesty informed him, that she would never contract a marriage with any one who sought her, if she did not first see his person. If he would not come, nothing more should be said on the subject. This prince, over-pressed by his young friends, (who were as little able of judging as himself,) paid no attention to the counsels of men of maturer judgment. He passed over to England without a splendid train. The splendid lady contemplated his person: she found him ugly, disfigured by deep scars of the small pox, and that he had an ill-shaped nose, with swellings in the neck! All these were so many reasons with her, that he could never be admitted into her good graces.'

Puttenham, in his very rare book of the 'Art of Poessie,' p. 243, notices the grace and majesty of Elizabeth's demeanour. 'Her stately manner of walk, with a certain grandeur rather than gravity, mingling with leisure, which our sovereign ladye and mistress is accustomed to do generally, unless it be when she walketh up and down for her pleasure, or to patch her beauty in the cold mornings.'

By the following extract from a letter from one of her gentlemen, we discover that her usual habits, though studious were not of the gentlest kind, and that the service she exacted from her attendants was not borne without concealed murmurs. 'The writer groans in secrecy to his friend, Sir John Stanhope writes to Sir Robert Cecil in 1594, 'I was all the afternoon with her majesty, at my books and then thinking to rest me, went in againe with your letter. She was pleased with the philosopher's stone, and hath been all this daye reasonably quyet. Mr. Grevell is absent, and I am tyed so as I cannot stirre, but shall be at the house for yt, these two dayes!'

Puttenham p. 249, has also recorded an honorable anecdote of Elizabeth, and characteristic of that high majesty which was in her thoughts, as well as in her actions. When she came to the crown, a knight of the realm who had insolently behaved to her when Lady Elizabeth, fell upon his knees to her, and besought her pardon, suspecting to be sent to the Tower; she replied mildly, 'Do you not know that we are descended of the lion, whose nature is not to harm or prey upon the mouse, or any other such small vermin?'

Queen Elizabeth was taught to write by the celebrated Roger Ascham. Her writing is extremely beautiful and correct, as may be seen by examining a little manuscript book of prayers, preserved in the British Museum. I have seen her first writing-book preserved at Oxford in the Bodleian Library; the gradual improvement of her majesty's hand-writing, is very honorable to her diligence; but the most curious thing is the paper on which she tried her pens; this she usually did by writing the name of her beloved brother Edward; a proof of the early and ardent attachment she formed to that amiable prince.

The education of Elizabeth had been severely classical; she thought, and she wrote in all the spirit of the great characters of antiquity; and her speeches and her letters are studded with apophegms, and a terseness of ideas and language, that give an exalted idea of her mind. In her evasive answers to the commons, in reply to their petition to her majesty to marry, she has employed an energetic word: 'Were I to tell you that I do not mean to marry, I might say more than it is proper for you to know; therefore I give you an answer, answerless!'—Curiosities of Literature.

CHINESE RELIGION.

The ancient Chinese worshippers retained some knowledge of a Supreme Being, yet the worship they paid to the visible heavens, the earth, rivers, bulls, and above all to dragons and the gods of lambs, was open idolatry. Subsequently Confucius arose; he inculcated the necessity of reverencing those whom the ancients had worshipped. His wish was to promote the social happiness of his countrymen, independently of the influence which religion exerts over a nation; his great aim was the introduction of decorum and order into all the duties of life; and to the strict observance of external ceremonies, he reduced the whole of religion. His system being found very deficient, Tao-tze, the mystic philosopher, stepped forward to supply the wants of the multitude by his abstruse speculations. According to his system, all nature is filled with demons and genii, who constantly influence the fate of man. He increased the number of idol gods to an enormous amount, and attempted to define with scholastic precision, their nature and offices. His demonology wanted perspicuity and contained too many palpable absurdities to be generally received. Some of the emperors, though declaring themselves believers in Taoism, could never introduce a general acquiescence in doctrines which no one understood. China wanted a creed which every man might understand; and the Buddhists supplied the desideratum;—accommodating their doctrines to all existing superstitions, they opened the door to every description of convert, who might retain as many of his old prejudices as he chose; they were not rigorous in enforcing the obligations of morality; to expiate sins, offerings to the idols and priests were sufficient. A temple built to the honor of any idol richly endowed, would suffice to blot out every stain of guilt and serve as a portal to the blessed mansions of Budha. When death approached, they promised to each of their votaries, speedy promotion in the scale of metempsychosis, until he should be absorbed in Nirupan or Nirvanu—nonentity. With these prospects, the poor deluded victim, left the world. To facilitate his release from purgatory, the ghostly hypocrites said mass, and supplied the wants of the hungry departed spirit with rich offerings of food, of which the latter enjoyed only the odor, while the priests devoured the substance. As Confucius had raised the veneration for ancestors into idolatrous worship, these priests were ready to perform their pious offices before the tablets of the dead. Thus they became ingratiated with the credulous multitude, who were too happy to avail themselves of their cheap services. But notwithstanding the accommodating spirit of their creed, the Chinese government has at times disapproved of it. As the sanctity of marriage has been acknowledged in China from time immemorial, and almost every person of years of maturity has been obliged to enter into that state, the celibacy of the priesthood of Budha was considered as a very dangerous custom.

Budha regarded contemplation and exemption from worldly cares, as the nearest approach to bliss; his followers, therefore, in imitation of their master, passed and inculcated lives of indolence, and practised begging as the proper means of maintaining themselves. This mode of livelihood was diametrically opposed to the political institutions of China, where even the Emperor does not disdain to plough. It was also in opposition to the actual condition and wants of the people; a system of idleness, in the immense population of the Empire, would have been followed by actual starvation, and a consequent serious diminution in the number of inhabitants; for it is by the utmost exertion that they are able to subsist. These serious objections to the foreign creed, furnished its enemies with weapons by which to destroy it. It was proscribed as a dangerous heresy, and a cruel persecution followed; but it had taken too deep root to be easily eradicated. Among some of the emperors too, it found abettors and disciples. Yet it never became a religion of the state; nor were its priests ever able to exercise any permanent influence over the populace. The Chinese are too rational a people to believe all the Budhis-

tic) fables, nor can they persuade themselves that the numerous images are gods. When we add to this, their national apathy towards every thing connected with religion, their being entirely engrossed with the things of this life, we can easily account for their disesteem of Budhism. Nor can we wonder that they worship at one time, the divinities they despise at another, for ancient custom bids them follow in the track of their ancestors without enquiry or doubt, even when they cannot but ridicule its absurdities.

The priests of Budha are a very despised class, and spring chiefly from the lowest and most ignorant of the people. Their morals are notoriously bad, and pinching poverty has made them cringing and servile.—They wander abroad in search of some trifling gift, and often encounter a very harsh refusal.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, August 7, 1841.

THE G. GRAND ENCAMPMENT, &c.—We informally understand, from the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, appointed in New York, in reference to the triennial meeting of the G. Grand Encampment and the G. Grand Chapter of the United States, in that city, in September next, that the Committee have concluded, in the celebration of the day, to have a PROCESSION and a DINNER. This early notice is given, that Brethren far and near may unite in the celebration, which from the preparation, will vie with any Masonic festival of former years. We shall endeavor to lay the particulars before our brethren in our next paper.

THE END OF THE BEGINNING.—Robert Matthews alias Matthias, the Prophet, formerly a resident of this city, died last month in North Carolina, aged about 60. We knew Matthews well; and a more despicable hypocrite and knave never existed. By trade, he was a carpenter, a first rate workman. He was too lazy to work, which was the only true aberration of mind he was ever afflicted with. In 1828, he became very religious; and for some time acted consistent with his profession, but not finding himself taken the notice of, which his inordinate vanity seemed to require, he became misanthropic and gloomy, neglected his business, and suffered his family, (a very deserving wife and several children) to want for the necessities of life. About this time he began to have remarkable visions; and he submitted to us the plan, very cleverly drawn, of a celestial city, which he intended to form, and which he wished to have put in rule type. He was continually hanging about our office, and we saw enough of him to satisfy us that there was "method in his madness." We plainly told him we believed he was playing the hypocrite for some end. This seriously offended him, and he kept aloof from us, afterwards, unless accidentally thrown in his company.—About this time he began to prepare for his mission, by suffering his beard to grow,—occasionally exhorting when among strangers, and finally threw this community in a fever, by strolling off with his children, who after several days of anxious search by our citizens, were found in his company some 20 miles from their homes. We lost sight of the "Prophet," for some time after this; until one day in 183—we met him in his glory in New York, splendidly and fantastically dressed, sword, chapeau, &c. The "Prophet" in his hen palmy days, surrounded by an "elder," and one or two of the "faithful" (as we understood afterwards) appeared to have forgotten an old friend. Mortified, at being cut by an old acquaintance, we impudently and very irreverently asked him to pay a little due bill on interest, money loaned to him when he was dreaming about the "celestial city." The 'Prophet,' squirmed, and fumed at our insolence, and more than once threatened to draw "the sword of Gideon" on us: but it would not do; we were too hard-hearted; an intimation politely given, that a magistrate's jurisdiction extended further than the "Prophet's," had the effect of settling the affair, amicably. The next news we had from the Prophet was his indictment for the murder of Mr. Pierson, and the incredible Folger affair. Since Matthews' discharge from Prison, on those charges he has been wandering about the land, a vagabond, with probably all the inclination, but lacking the ability from the notoriety of his character, to perpetrate any more of his deeds of villany on the weak and credulous. He has finally died in the land of the stranger, unpitied and unmourned. We know that various opinions exist as to the extent of Matthews' insanity; some believing him partially insane, others that he was totally deranged, and others, that he was entirely knave. Of the last class, are we. From the first, we watched the workings of his mind, through all its ramifications to the denouement, and we are satisfied, that it was all put on.

LEARNED MEN.

It has been remarked, that although the present age can boast of a larger number of moderately learned men in the three professions, than ever lived, yet that there does not exist at the present time so many men of very great talents as some of our former centuries witnessed. Perhaps this may be thus accounted for.—The divine, the lawyer and the physician in former years, severally devoted their whole time and abilities to their peculiar professions; and with a more constant zeal and industry, being destitute of those attractive but lighter works which are now every day issuing from the press. They concentrated in one focus (if we may so express it) the rays of their mental endowments, without permitting them to be diverged from the main object of their several pursuits. We have probably in the aggregate a greater quantity of knowledge, but that knowledge is of a wider range. Let us only advert to the legal profession—it is true we find many in its ranks of eminent talent, but we look in vain for a Coke, a Holt, a Hale, or a Blackstone. A man to be truly great—to shine with extraordinary splendor in either of the learned professions must make that his only study—it must engross his almost constant attention; other, and perhaps, more pleasing paths of literature, must be avoided; or if his foot deviate from the path he has selected, he should consider the step so taken as leading him from the summit of his ambition. The same reasoning applies to the physician and the divine; and, in fact, to every scientific pursuit.

BARBARITY.—The Boston Post has a report of the trial of Robert B. Gove, a teacher in the "Farm School," who was prosecuted for inhuman treatment to one of the scholars, placed under his charge. Gove must have been an original in his notions of school discipline. Squeers of Do-the-boy Hall, could have had many improvements added to his "system" by Dove. The Post says, that on the night of the 23d of April, which was very cold, Locke, the Superintendent of the Farm School, selected out twenty scholars, charged with various offences, (such as neglect of studies and making a noise, and also whispering in the dormitory) for punishment—not, perhaps, a very violent one, to be sure—viz: they were ordered to stand up near the door, without moving, from 8 o'clock till 10. At 10 o'clock it was discovered that 11 of the 20 had laid down, either on their beds or on the floor; and for this disobedience of orders they were made to undress themselves to their shirts, and then whipped with a cowhide by Locke himself. Those who did not undress themselves quite soon enough were quickened in their motions by preliminary blows with the cowhide. This severe punishment was followed by an order that the eleven whipped boys, undressed and wounded as they were, should stand up all night. Among these boys was George A. Gallilee, an orphan, who had been put on short allowance for not getting his lessons. On the 23d, he dug up a last year's carrot, and, to quiet his hunger, ate it. For this he was put among the others to stand up for punishment. By the testimony of Gove's own witness, Locke drew blood from Gallilee's legs when he whipped him. In about two hours, worn out by hunger, fatigue, and flogging, the child fell asleep on the floor. Upon pain of being severely punished, Gove had ordered a lad named Robinson to watch the others, and wake him up if either of them laid down. At one o'clock, Gove was notified that Gallilee was asleep. He then got up, took the cowhide from under his pillow, proceeded to where the boy was lying, raised him up, stripped his shirt up over his back, and held him by the hair with his left hand, while he lashed him with the cowhide with the other till the blood flowed! But only half the story is yet told: about three o'clock in the morning Gallilee sat down on the side of the bed to rest himself, and again fell asleep; and again was he flogged by Gove in the same savage manner as before, and the other scholars, who were not under punishment, were awakened by his screams.

The jury, after hearing all the facts, returned a verdict of guilty, with three hundred dollars damages, the whole amount claimed in the writ. It is fortunate for Gove that he does not live in the neighborhood of Judge Lynch.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONVENTION, recently held at Saratoga Springs, has adjourned, after an interesting and harmonious meeting of three days. In its deliberations, we understand, there was nothing to mar in the least, the holy object for which it was congregated. The cause of Temperance, is silently and effectually working its way to the very heart of our republic; and unless its onward course is impeded, by the ultraism of former years, its friends will live to see its principles carried out in our land to the very length and breadth of their desires. TEMPERANCE, with no riders, other than appeals to the understanding and conscience, is our motto. No politics, no religion, no coercion. The Democrat and Whig—the Catholic and Protestant—the Jew and the Infidel—all have a common field, and a common cause to contend for, without compromising any other principle.

The following was the representation in the convention:—New York, 286; Massachusetts, 50; Vermont, 45; Connecticut, 23; New Hampshire, 4; Rhode Island, 2; Maine, 3; New Jersey, 7; Pennsylvania, 9; Maryland, 4; Michigan, 4; Louisiana, 3; Alabama, 2; Wisconsin, 3; Ohio, 3; Illinois, 2; Georgia, 2; Iowa, 1; Sandwich Islands, 1.

The next movement will be a world's temperance convention at London.

STATEN ISLAND BANK.—The Evening Journal advises holders of the bills of the Staten Island Bank not to sell them at a sacrifice. Additional securities have been placed in the hands of the Comptroller to indemnify the bill holders, and the bank is to resume within fifteen days.

THE BITER BIT.—The New Orleans Picayune tells an admirable story, the substance of which is, that two gentlemen of that city, who had just arisen from the table, with a full supply of the "heavy wet" on board, saw a lady passing, and were determined to have a peep, right or wrong at her face. Accordingly one of our gallants, after pulling from his pocket an elegant and costly handkerchief, staggered up to the lady, and with his hat under his arm, and one of his most winning smiles on his countenance hiccupped—"M-mad-am, you have dropped your handkerchief." The lady, cast a glance from a keen pair of black eyes, on our hero, and with a smile most shockingly provoking, and a half-dropp'd curtesy, said, "I thank you sir, for your politeness," quietly took the handkerchief and left the gallants scratching their heads in perfect astonishment, amid the haw-haws! of a concourse of spectators.

THE YELLOW FEVER.—as we learn from a Tallahassee paper, is making dreadful havoc, among the inhabitants of St. Joseph. Although the population does not exceed some 500 persons, there have been already upwards of 30 deaths from this dreadful disease. The fever was brought by a schooner from Havana, laden with fruit, &c.

ARCTURUS, a Journal of Books and Opinion.—This is the title of a monthly, recently established in New York, at $5. per annum, published by Trevel, 121 Fulton St. and Bartlett & Welford 298 Broadway. It is very neatly printed, and its contents for the present month (which is all we have seen) abound with choice and rare articles. The various criticisms in it are independent and manly. There is no shrinking from responsibility. Arcturus is destined to have an extensive circulation. It certainly deserves it.

SLAVE CONSPIRACY.—The New Orleans papers are filled with a formidable conspiracy of the slaves of that region, which was to have broken out on the first of this month, had it not have been providentially discovered. A white man, a carpenter, was arrested as being connected with the plot. He denies any agency in it, but acknowledges that the blacks frequently spoke to him on the subject. This man, with 40 negroes were confined in St. Francisville Jail. Numerous blacks were arrested and confined, all confessing the same facts. At Point Coupee there had been unusual assemblage of slaves in by-places on Sundays, and Doctor—says that numerous enquiries were made of him, as to what day of the month it was. Some of the negroes have confessed that the combination extended from Bayou Sara, to Natchez. Another report says, that all the white population from Natchez to Baton Rouge were to have been assassinated together with those negroes who refused to join in the insurrection. White men are implicated in the plot, and were to have been the principle leaders. These state of things may be put down as practical commentaries of Abolitionism.

Puffing.—Speaking of the modern system of puffing, the Bostonian says: "By and by we shall be requested to say we have used Dumsfries' Itch Ointment with distinguished success!"

RAPID INCREASE.—The Jews of the Holy Land, have increased within the last five years, from 2,000 to more than 40,000.

Intelligence.

FOREIGN.—The Steam Ship Acadia, arrived at Boston, on Monday morning last, from Liverpool, making the passage in twelve days and fourteen hours. We clip the following.

BALLOON ADVENTURE.—Mr. Green, the Aeronaut, made an ascension in his great Nassau balloon, accompanied with Mrs. Green, Capt. Curry, and four other gentlemen. They met with an awkward adventure which is thus described:

"The balloon, after leaving the earth, took an easterly direction, and had not ascended many minutes before Mr. Green discovered that the valve would not act. With the assistance of Capt. Curry, he applied great force to the valve line, which gave way, leaving the valve unmoved. Mr. Green, in consequence, announced his intention of making as speedy a descent as practicable; but at this period the new church at Eltham was almost immediately under the balloon; and to be certain of not descending on it, Mr. Green found it necessary to discharge ballast. This caused the balloon to ascend to the height of between 6,000 and 7,000 feet. Having no means of discharging gas, Mr. Green opened the neck of the balloon so as to admit as much atmospheric air as possible. This was so successful that a gradual descent speedily commenced. The aeronauts were unfortunately over a very woody country; but Mr. Green succeeded, notwithstanding the inoperativeness of his valve, in effecting a safe and easy descent, after remaining an hour and a quarter in the air, in a clover field at Hextable, near Birchwood, in the parish of Sutton-at-Horne, near Dartford in Kent."

Among the passengers in the Acadia, is Samuel Swartwout, Ex-Collector of the port of New York.

The London Journal of Commerce intimates that the French government are about to send a flotilla to Texas, in order to obtain satisfaction for the insults offered to M. Saligny, the French Minister to that Republic.

An application is about to be made to the Pope to elect a resident Cardinal in Ireland.

A Ministerial paper informs us that an important event is going to take place. A "National Conference of Ministers" of all "Religious Denominations" is to be held at Manchester "commencing Tuesday, Aug. 15, 1841."

Dreadful outrage at Waterford.—A monster, named Morgan, three times deliberately fired a pistol, loaded with slugs at a crowd of boys and girls who were shouting, "Wyse and Barron for ever!" "Down with the Tories." Eleven of the poor children were wounded, and three of them not expected to recover.

The Spanish government had agreed to cede two islands, on the coast of Guinea, to Great Britain for a consideration of £60,000.

The Nile had risen from one to eight cubits, which promised a favorable harvest. The plague had completely subsided in Cairo.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We

are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons on satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FIRST OF SEPTEMBER NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

POETRY.

A LONG WHILE AGO.

[From the Poetical Remains of L. E. L. (Mrs. Maclean,) published in connexion with a Memoir of her life by Mr. Laman Blanchford.]

Still hangeth down the old accustom'd willow,
Hiding the silver underneath each leaf—
So drops the long hair from some maiden pillow,
When midnight heareth the else silent grief;
There floats the water-lily, like a sovereign
Whose lovely empire is a fairy world,
The purple dragon-fly above it hovering,
As when its fragile ivory uncurl'd

A long while ago.

I hear the bees in sleepy music wringing [noon—
From the wild thyme where they have pass'd the
There is the blackbird in the hawthorn singing.
Stirring the white spray with the same sweet tune;
Fragrant the tansy breathing from the meadows,
As the west wind bends down the long green grass,
Now dark, now golden, as the fleeting shadows
Of the light clouds pass as they went to pass
A long while ago.

There are the roses which we used to gather
To bind a young fair brow, no longer fair;
Ah! thou art mocking us, thou summer weather,
To be so sunny, with the loved one where?
'Tis not her voice—'tis not her step—that lingers
In lone familiar sweetness on the wind,
The bee, the bird, are now the only singers—
Where is the music once with theirs combined
A long time ago?

As the lorn flowers that in her pale hands perish'd,
Is she who only hath a memory here.
She was so much a part of us, so cherish'd.
So young that even love forgot to fear.
Now is her image paramount, it reigneth
With a sad strength that time may not subdue;
And memory a mournful triumph gaineth,
As the slow looks we cast around renew
A long while ago.

Thou lovely garden! where the summer covers
The trees with green leaves and the ground with flowers;
Darkly the past around thy beauty hovers—
The past—the grave of our once happy hours.
It is too sad to gaze upon the seeming
Of nature's changeless loveliness, and feel
That, with the sunshine round, the heart is dreaming
Darkly o'er wounds inflicted, not to heal,
A long time ago.

Ah! visit not the scenes where youth and childhood
Pass'd years that deepen'd as those years went by;
Shadows will darken in the careless wildwood—
There will be tears upon the tranquil sky.
Memories, like phantoms, haunt me while I wander
Beneath the drooping boughs of each old tree:
I grow too sad as mournfully I ponder
Things that are not—and yet that used to be
A long while ago.

Worn out—the heart seems like a ruin'd altar—
Where are the friends, and where the faith of yore?
My eyes grow dim with tears—my footsteps falter—
Thinking of those whom I can love no more.
We change, and others change—while recollection
Would fain renew what it can but recal.
Dark are life's dreams, and weary its affection,
And cold its hopes—and yet I felt them all
A long while ago.

ON CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

The mighty lord who sits on high,
Round whom the hovering angels wing,
Enthroned above the starry sky;
To whom the circling planets sing;
Who, in his all-embracing love,
Sustain the sparrow in his flight;—
At whose command the waters move;
At whose word sprang from darkness light;
Superior Power, who gave to man

His own bright image at his birth,
To rule the lower world—great plain!—
The lord—not tyrant—of the earth,
By the same fiat did decree
A Sabbath day—a day of rest;
No labor on that day should be;—
Such was Jehovah's high behest!
A solemn day, reserved to all—
A holy day of peace,
Which men and beast should disenthral,
When all their toil and care should cease.
God's gift to man!—He too did give 'Good will' and, with that gift, the tear—
(Soft Pity's high prerogative!)
The inward voice that makes to hear,
And wilt thou, man! his wrath condemn—
Each better, his her feeling still?—
To sufferings sad the brute condemn,
Regardless of thy Maker's will!
Say, wilt thou Heaven's own vengeance dare,
To torture that thou should'st protect—
The beast whom thou art to spare—
Yet mercy for thyself expect?
The beast lent kindly for thy aid—
This thy return—to doom to pain?
Who for thy slave was never mad—
Blind man! God's will thou dost profane!

WHERE ARE THE DEAD?

—Where hath the spirit flown,
That, past the reach of human sight,
Ev'n as a breeze hath gone!

O whither are they fled,
Those spirits kind and warm,
That, numbered with the dead,
Have nobly braved the storm?
And gained a port at last,
A port of peace and rest,
Where, earthly perils past,
Their happy souls are blest!

In some bright-beaming star
Do they weave the pencil'd rays,
That streaming from afar,
Upon our vision blaze?
Or is the flickering light
That the varying twilight brings,
As it glimmers in our sight,
The waving of their wings?

Perchance along the sky,
The far-off azure dome,
They wing them free and high,
In their lofty spirit-home;
And the cooling zephyr's wing,
As it fans the brow of care,
In its voiceless whisperings
May a message from them bear.

Perchance they lightly glide
Where the friends of childhood dwell,
And linger by the side
Of those they loved so well;
Or in visions of the night,
Come with their whispering tone,
And the dreamer's spirit light
With a magic all their own.

I've read a page that tells
Of a home beyond the sky,
Where the ransomed spirit dwells
With the God of love on high;
Yet their crowns of living light
They cast down at his feet,
To seek this lower night,
And the child of sorrow greet.

Low, where dark shadows fall,
On the heart, and on the brain,
Where earthly pleasures pall,
And the bosom throbs with pain,
There, with kindly lingering stay,
On their ministry of love,
They smooth the thorny way,
And point to rest above!

HAPPINESS—WHERE IS IT?

Is it in wealth? Go probe the breast
Of fortunes' favorite heir;
And why doth woe that heart infest,
And anguish canker there?

Is it in fame? Its empty breath,
Inconstant as the breeze,
Will blast ere long, the laurel wreath
That late it formed to please.

Is it in friendship or in love?
Alas! they soon decay;
The tears of disappointment prove
How feeble is their stay.

'Tis not in all that here excels,
'Tis not in Folly's round;
Look upward, mortals, there it dwells,
And only there is found.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED

THE Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 159 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families. Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old custom is and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12 1-2 cents. jcl9-1y A. W. STARKS

MASONIC.

AN ADDRESS,

BY REV. DAVID PICKERING, OF PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Masonry has not its limits in any particular country, but flourishes wherever freedom unfurls her banner, and the ensigns of liberty unfold the genius of the arts and sciences. It has enjoyed the approbation of the wise and virtuous of the human race, and has withstood the ravages of time's unsparing hand, triumphing over the maddening rage of infuriated bigots, and the persecuting zeal of proud and haughty tyrants.—It has outlived the billowy flood of ancient days, witnessed the downfall of unstable kingdoms, and chanted the requiem of dissolving empires. In every age of the world, and in every country, its principles have been the same, and in the effects which its moral influence has produced upon mankind, there has always existed a striking similarity.

Had masonry been a system of monopolizing influence, calculated to rivet the chains of poverty, ignorance, and slavery, upon a portion of our race; had its genius been such as to abridge the rational enjoyments of any part of community, or corrupt the morals of society, it would long since have been abandoned as an innovation upon the rights and the happiness of mankind, and left destitute of any supporters who are worthy of having their names enrolled in the archives of fame. The virtuous harbinger of Immanuel, and the beloved disciple of the immaculate Saviour, would have frowned indignantly upon it, had they have found beneath the cloak of its pretence, either wickedness, or mere frivolity. From its remote antiquity and the incalculable number of philanthropic men, who have patronised and encouraged the institution, and even suffered torture and death in its defence, we may assert without ostentation that masonry had its origin in virtue, and for its object the improvement, interest, and welfare of mankind.

The peaceful genius of freemasonry is a strong evidence of the purity of the institution.

In the dark ages of the world, when the means of knowledge which we so amply share were beyond the reach of the multitude, masonry diffused its influence to perpetuate friendship, to neutralize the poison of envy, and to soften the virulence of vindictive passion. Never did it raise the unhallowed standard of persecution, or grasp the reins of civil government in any nation; or attempt to dictate a religious creed to man. Never has it opposed itself to the legal authorities of any country; but in all kingdoms, and under all governments, its submission, docility, and peaceful character have been marked with astonishment. While nations have been struggling for liberty, and tyrants, to ascend the thrones of state, have waded through seas of blood; masonry has stood firm upon its ancient and imperishable foundations, and bade defiance to the wild commotion of falling kingdoms and crumbling empires.

While a part of the nominal christian world has been stained with the blood of unhappy victims of its persecuting rage, masonry has stretched forth the hand of charity for the relief of the suffering and the oppressed, and applied the balsam of healing to the wounds of bleeding humanity. But masonry, which has ever proved the faithful friend of the unfortunate, and the kind angel of condolence, has not escaped the iron rod of religious intolerance—in Spain, it has long groaned beneath the disgraceful burden of despotic arrogance, and in different kingdoms it has alternately been the subject of jealousy and oppression. Such persecution and oppression would be less intolerable, were it administered by the hand of the idle and the openly profane: but when men professedly engaged in promoting the benevolent religion of Jesus Christ, resort to the bloody engines of persecution, reason stands aghast, religion drops the tear of regret, and philosophy discovers in the semblance of christianity the rugged features of the apocalyptical beast!

We have seen the rise and progress of masonry, and we have beheld in times of peril and danger, as well as in prosperity and security, the peaceful paths which its votaries have pursued. We now turn to consider the benefits derived from a strict adherence to the principles of the institution.

It discountenances and prohibits vice in all its Protean forms, as destructive of happiness and degrading to the dignity of its subjects. It recommends the peaceful paths of true wisdom, as the only course of safety for man; and strongly inculcates the duties of friendship, without the alloy of indifference; of morality, without the mixture of ostentation; and of brotherly love, without the imposing shadows of dissimulation.

That freemasonry has sustained a peaceful character, and urged the practice of its sublime virtues upon the members of the whole fraternity, will not be doubted by any serious reflecting mind, who will be at the trouble to examine the records of its progress in various parts of the world, and especially in times of persecution. It has never lifted its hand to crush the civil power. It has never summoned its votaries to erect the standard of rebellion, or seize the reins of government: but it has uniformly inculcated the duty of submission to the legal authorities of every nation, and solemnly enjoined an undeviating adherence to the precepts of justice, which would perpetuate the invaluable blessing of peace to the world.

Had masonry been a system of rancorous policy, its deformity would long ere this have been exposed, and its ranks deserted by virtuous men. But instead of rancor and pride, it teaches the lessons of humility and condescension to the prince, the ruler and the judge; while it descends to the vale of obscurity, and exalts the man of humble virtue to a level with the great. The warm undeviating friendship of brotherly love is considered by masonry as the proper centre, towards which all the actions of its friends should verge.

Wherever the genuine principles of the institution are cherished in the heart, the bosom is caused to glow with love, and the finer feelings of the soul are excited and become interested in the welfare of a brother.—This effect is accounted for by the fact, that masonry holds fellowship with pilgrims in distress; cordially hails the sons of want, and welcomes them to the board of plenty, administers to the wants of a penniless brother, and regards with the tender solicitude of fraternal affection the unfortunate children of affliction and pain.

The mason who is worthy of a mason's name, can meet on the same level, and greet with the same cordiality, a Briton, a Frank, a German, or a native of the forest, and fellowship them as brethren, if they are acquainted with our art. How wildly soever the members of this fraternity may differ in their opinions, he who acts up to the sentiments and rules of this noble institution, must lay aside his prejudices, and on the masonic pavement, hail in the melting voice of friendship, a brother of a different denomination.

The worthy mason is taught to visit the widow in distress, to substitute the oil of consolation and joy for the tears of affliction, to clasp in the arms of charity and affection each helpless orphan, and administer to their necessities. His heart is taught to regard with emotions of grief the distresses of others, and to aid in the alleviation of human misery; in a word, the natural influence of freemasonry is; to tame the ferocity of men, allay the prejudice of those whose tenets are the most dissimilar, promote peace in society, correct the morals of the irreligious and profane, encourage arts and social intercourse among mankind, and engage the hearts of men in the exercise of virtuous friendship and love.

To exemplify the charitable genius of this venerable institution, it is only necessary to remark, that in the last memorable struggle with one of the most formidable powers of Europe, the unfortunate captives from beyond the Atlantic, shared largely the bounty of lodges, in many of our populous towns and cities, where their funds were liberally imparted for the relief of brethren, compelled by the laws of their country to sustain the character of an invading foe. And permit me to add, if the lessons which freemasonry inculcates were universally observed by its professed friends, the tongue of slander would be bound—the wise politician, the worthy religionist, and the sage philosopher, would rejoice in its upbuilding, and feel themselves honored in having their names enrolled with the fraternity, and deposited in the archives of the middle chamber.

I have entered thus far into the history of the origin and progress of freemasonry, elucidated its real principles, and treated of its genius, its influence upon and relation to society, its tendency and the benefits derived from a knowledge of the institution, nor for the instruction of the experienced and well informed mason, but for the purpose of refreshing their minds with a recollection of those truths on which the prosperity of the craft depends, and to aid the young and inexperienced in the just estimate of the principles which mark the importance of our order.

But I am aware that two objections are urged with great pertinacity against the fraternity, and give rise to inquiries which demand a reply.

First. If masonry be of any real benefit to the world why is it kept secret?

Second. If the institution be good, and has a tendency to reform mankind, why are there immoral members found in its ranks?

In answer to the first, it is proper to reply, that in order for the secrets of freemasonry to be generally known, it would be necessary that its privileges should be indiscriminately bestowed, which would not only subvert the design of the institution, but render it familiar, it might like many other important theories, lose much of its influence upon the mind, and gradually sink into disregard. The general neglect of the sublime and infinitely important truths of Christianity furnish striking illustration and evidence of the truth of this position. Besides, it is a fact which has not escaped the observation of the most discerning, that whatever is new and difficult to be obtained, is the more highly prized on account of the obstructions in the way of acquisition; and more sure to awake the curiosity, and encourage the perseverance of the inquiring mind.

These considerations, in conjunction with the arguments already adduced in support of its peaceful tendency, and its moral influence upon its members and upon society, will not only justify the exclusion of the world from a knowledge of the art, but prove with sufficient clearness that in order the more effectually to extend the benefits of the institution, its secrets should be inviolably kept within the walls of the fraternity.

In answer to the second question, which relates to immoral members, we may reply, although it cannot be denied that such members are sometimes found in our ranks, yet from that consideration it cannot be inferred with certainty that the institution itself is corrupt: for such an inference would justify the unreasonable conclusion that no member of community could act unworthy of his profession. Where can a society be found on earth, of any description whatever, that can boast of having no bad members? And shall we pass the uncharitable censure that all institutions are corrupt, because some of their members walk in a disorderly manner? If what has already been advanced be not sufficient to explode the objection, let the objector consult the sacred history of the apostolic fraternity, where he will find penned in living characters, the treachery of one, and the falsehood and profanity of another! It is true that sometimes we are troubled with disorderly or immoral members, and find it necessary to admonish, rebuke, and exhort them to reformation, with long-suffering and charitable forbearance: but when gentle means fail to reform their lives, we have recourse to the painful expedient of expulsion, and forever withdraw from our fellowship as Masons.

The latter alternative is truly painful to the fraternity, and deeply disgraceful to him who merits such treatment. To be forever excluded, and stripped of the honors and denied the confidence of a Society, whose principles are founded upon the most rational and manly piety; whose laws are dictated by justice and reason; the principles of whose actions are sympathy and benevolence; which breathes universal peace on earth, and promotes good will among mankind, is deemed a sufficient punishment for us to inflict upon the refractory.

To preserve unstained the reputation of the craft; to ensure prosperity to the designs of this ancient and honorable fraternity, and to aid the cause of universal improvement in the science of happiness, it is only necessary that we attentively pursue the path marked out by the sublime precepts and excellent moral instructions inculcated within our walls, and urged with silent, but forcible eloquence by the numerous emblems of the masonic Carpet.

DEATH IN THE SCHOOL-ROOM.

A FACT.

Ting-a-ling-ling-ling!—went the little bell on the teacher's desk of a village-school one morning, when the studies of the early part of the day were about half completed. It was well understood that this was a command for silence and attention; and when these had been obtained, the master spoke. He was a low thick-set man, and his name was Lugare.

"Boys," said he, "I have had a complaint entered that last night some of you were stealing fruit from Mr. Nichols' garden. I rather think I know the thief. Tim Barker, step up here, sir."

The one to whom he spoke, came forward. He was a slight, fair-looking boy of about 14,—and his face had a laughing, good-humored expression, which even the charge now preferred against him, and the stern tone and threatening look of the teacher had not entirely dissipated. The countenance of the boy, however, was too unearthly fair for health; it had, notwithstanding its fleshy, cheerful look, a singular cast; as if some inward disease, and that a fearful one, were seated within. As the stripling stood before that place of judgment—that place so often made the scene of heartless and coarse brutality, of timid innocence confused, helpless childhood outraged, and gentle feelings crushed—Lugare looked on him with a frown which plainly told that he felt in no very pleasant mood. Happily, a worthier and more philosophical system is proving to men that schools can be better governed than by lashes, and tears and sighs. We are waxing toward that consummation, when one of the old fashioned school-masters, with his cowhide, his heavy birch rod, and his many ingenious methods of child-torture, will be gazed upon as a scorned memento of an ignorant, cruel and exploding doctrine.

"Were you by Mr. Nichols' garden fence last night?" said Lugare.

"Yes," answered the boy, "I was."

"Well, sir, I'm glad to find you so ready with your confession. And so you thought you could do a little robbing, and enjoy yourself in a manner you ought to be ashamed to own, without being punished, did you?"

"I have not been robbing," replied the boy quickly. His face was suffused, whether with resentment or fright it was difficult to tell. "And I didn't do any thing last night that I'm ashamed to own."

"No impudence!" exclaimed the teacher passionately, as he grasped a long and heavy rattan; "give me none of your sharp speeches, or I'll thrash you till you beg like a dog."

The youngster's face paled a little; his lip quivered but he did not speak.

"And pray, sir," continued Lugare, as the outward signs of wrath disappeared from his features; "what were you about the garden for? Perhaps you only received the plunder, and had an accomplice to do the more dangerous part of the job?"

"I went that way because it was my road home. I was there again afterward to meet an acquaintance—and—and— But I did not go into the garden, nor take any thing away from it. I would not steal—hardly to save me from starving."

"You had better have stuck to that last evening.—You were seen, Tim Barker, to come from under Mr. Nichols' garden fence, a little after nine o'clock, with a bag full of something or other over your shoulders. The bag had every appearance of being filled with fruit, and this morning the melon beds are found to have been completely cleared. Now, sir, what had you in that bag?"

Like fire itself glowed the face of the detected lad. He spoke not a word. All the school had their eyes directed at him. The perspiration ran down his white forehead like rain-drops.

"Speak sir!" exclaimed Lugare, with a loud stroke of his rattan on the desk.

The boy looked as though he would faint. But the unmerciful teacher, confident of having brought to light a criminal, and exulting in the idea of the severe chastisement he should now be justified in inflicting, kept working himself up to a still greater and greater degree of passion. In the meantime, the child seemed hardly to know what to do with himself.—His tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth. Either he was very much frightened, or he was actually unwell.

"Speak, I say!" again thundered Lugare; and his hand, grasping his rattan, towered above his head in a very significant manner.

"I hardly can, sir," said the poor boy faintly. His voice was husky and thick. "I will tell you some—some other time. Please to let me go to my seat—I can't well."

"Oh yes; that's very likely;" and Mr. Lugare bulged out his cheeks and nose with contempt. "Do you think to make me believe your lies? I've found you out, sir, plainly enough; and I am satisfied that you are as precious a little villain as there is in the state. But I will postpone settling with you for an hour yet. I shall then call you up again, and if you don't tell the whole truth, I'll give you something that'll make you remember Mr. Nichols' melons for many a month to come—go to your seat."

Glad enough of the ungracious permission, and answering not a sound, the child crept trembling to his bench. He felt very strangely, dizzily—more as if he was dream than in real life—and laying his arms on his desk, bowed down his face between them. The pupils turned to their accustomed studies, for during the reign of Lugare in the village school, they had been so used to scenes of violence and severe chastisement, that such things made but little interruption in the tenor of their way.

Now, while the intervening hour is passing, we will clear up the mystery of the bag, and of young Barker being under the garden fence on the preceding night. The boy's mother was a widow, and they both had to live in the very narrowest limits. His father had died when he was six years old, and little Tim was left a sickly emaciated infant, whom no one expected to live many months. To the surprise of all, however, the poor child kept alive, and seemed to recover his health as he certainly did his size and good looks. This was owing to the kind offices of an eminent physician, who had a country-seat in the neighborhood, and who had been interested in the widow's little family. Tim, the physician said, might possibly outgrow his disease, but every thing was uncertain. It was a mysterious and baffling malady, and it would not be wonderful if he should in some moment of apparent health be taken suddenly away. The poor widow was at first in a continual state of uneasiness: but several years had now passed, and none of the impending evils had fallen upon the boy's head. His mother seemed to feel confident that he would live, and be a help and honor to her old age. And the two struggled on together, mutually happy in each other, and enduring much of poverty and discomfort without repining, each for the other's sake.

Tim's pleasant disposition had made him many friends in the village, and among the rest a young farmer named Jones, who with his older brother, worked a large farm in the neighborhood on shares—Jones very frequently made Tim a present of a bag of potatoes or corn, or some garden vegetables, which he took from his own stock; but as his partner was a parsimonious, high-tempered man, and had often said that Tim was an idle fellow, and ought not to be helped because he did not work, Jones generally made his gifts in such a manner that no one knew anything about them, except himself and the grateful objects of his kindness. It might be, too, that the widow was loth to have it understood by the neighbors that she received food from any one; for there is often an excusable pride in people of her condition which makes them shrink from being considered as objects of "charity" as they would from the severest pains.

On the night in question, Tim had been told that Jones would send them a bag of potatoes, and the place at which they were to be waiting for him was fixed at Mr. Nichols' garden fence. It was this bag that Tim had been seen staggering under, and which caused the unlucky boy to be accused and convicted by his teacher as a thief. That teacher was one little fitted for his important and responsible office. Hasty to decide, and inflexibly severe, he was the terror of the little world he ruled so despotically. Punishment he seemed to delight in. Knowing little of those sweet fountains which in children's breasts ever open quickly at the call of gentleness and kind words, he was feared by all for his sternness, and loved by none. I would that he were an isolated instance in his profession.

The hour of grace had drawn to its close, and the time approached at which it was usual for Lugare to give his school a joyfully received dismissal. Now and then one of the scholars would direct a furtive glance at Tim, sometimes in pity, sometimes in indifference or inquiry. They knew that he would have no mercy shown him, and though most of them loved him, whipping was too common there to excite much sympathy. Every inquiring glance, however, remained unsatisfied, for at the end of the hour Tim remained with his face completely hidden, and his head bowed in his arms, precisely as he had leaned himself when he first went to his seat. Lugare looked at the boy occasionally with a scowl, which seemed to bode vengeance for his sullenness. At length the last class had been heard, and the last lesson recited, and Lugare seated himself behind the desk on the platform, with his longest and stoutest rattan before him.

"Now Barker," said he, "we'll settle that little difficulty between us."

Tim did not move. The school room was as still as the grave. Not a sound was to be heard, except occasionally a long drawn breath.

"Mind me, sir, or it will be the worse for you.—Step up here and take off your jacket."

The boy did not stir any more than if he had been of wood. Lugare shook with passion. He sat still a minute, as if considering the best way to wreak his vengeance. That minute passed in death-like silence, was a fearful one to some of the children, for their faces whitened with fright. It seemed, as it slowly dropped away, like them into which precedes the climax of an exquisitely performed tragedy, when some mighty master of the histrionic art is treading the stage, and you and the multitude around you are waiting with stretched nerves and suspended breath, in expectation of the terrible catastrophe.

"Tim is asleep, sir," at length said one of the boys who sat near him.

Lugare, at this intelligence, allowed his features to relax from their expression of savage anger into a smile, but that smile looked more malignant, if possible than his former scowls. It might be that he felt amused at the horror depicted on those about him, or it might be that he was gloating in pleasure on the way in which he intended to wake the poor little slumberer.

"Asleep! are you, my young gentleman?" said he, "let us see if we can't find something to tickle your eyes open. There's nothing like making the best of a bad case, boys. Tim, here, is determined not to be worried in his mind about a little flogging, for the thought of it can't even keep the little scoundrel awake."

Lugare smiled again as he made his last observation. He grasped the rattan firmly, and descended from his seat. With light and stealthy steps he crossed the room and stood by the unlucky sleeper. The boy was still as unconscious of his impending punishment as ever. He might be dreaming some golden dream of youth and pleasure; perhaps he was far away in the world of fancy, seeing scenes, and feelings delights, which cold reality never can bestow. Lugare lifted his retan high over his head, and with their true and expert aim which he had acquired from long practice, brought it down on Tim's back with a force and wacking sound which seemed sufficient to awake a freezing man in his last lethargy. Quick and fast, blow followed blow. Without waiting to see the effect of the first cut, the brutal wretch plied his instrument of torture first on one side of the boy's back and then on the other, and only stopped at the end of two or three minutes from very weariness. But still Tim showed no signs of motion; and as Lugare, provoked at his torpidity, jerked away one of the child arms, on which he had been leaning over on the desk, his head dropped down on the board with a dull sound, and his face lay turned up and exposed to view. When Lugare saw it he stood like one transfixed by a basilisk. His countenance turned to a leaden whiteness; the ratan dropped from his grasp; and his eyes, stretched wide open, glared as at some spectacle of horror and death. The sweat started in great globules seemingly from every pore in his face; his skinny lips contracted, and showed his teeth; and when he at length stretched forth his arm, and with the end of one of his fingers touched the child's cheek, each limb quivered like the tongue of a snake; and his strength seemed as though it would fail him. The boy was dead. He had probably been so for some time, for his eyes were turned up, and his body was quite cold. The widow was now childless too. Death was in the school room and Lugare had been flogging a corpse!

THE GRANARY.

A TALE WHICH EVERY PERSON WILL READ.

BY THE REV. A. C. THOMAS.

"Whoso readeth, let him understand."

Jonathan Homespun, having purchased an extensive farm, and provided himself with every thing requisite to prosperous husbandry, proposes to furnish subscribers with one quart of wheat weekly, for one year, at the low price of two dollars in advance, or two dollars and fifty cents if paid after six months.

"The facilities afforded by the government, for the transportation of wheat to every section of the Union and adjacent provinces, are such as must prove satisfactory to every subscriber; and the proprietor of the Granary assures all who may patronize him, that he will exert himself to supply an article of the best quality. N. B.—Agents will be allowed a generous per centage. Address (post paid) Proprietor of the Granary, Hopewell.

Such was prospects issued by my friend, Mr. Homespun. Feeling a lively interest in his welfare, I visited his farm, although it was a long journey from my home, and was pleased to find every thing in nice order. He informed me that he had contracted a large debt in the purchase of the premises, stock and implements of husbandry, but that he had no doubt of his ability to discharge every obligation in a few years. He also stated he had already received many hundred subscribers, and that in four or five weeks he would commence the delivery of the wheat according to his proposals.

The scheme appeared plausible; and my friend was so confident of success, that I had not the slightest doubt of his prosperity. I entered my name as a subscriber, and when I left him he was preparing many thousand quart sacks.

Every week, for the space of two years, I received my quart of wheat, and concluded from its excellent quality and prompt delivery, that every thing was with Jonathan Homespun and his farm. So I gave myself no concern about my indebtedness to him—for said I, "to a farmer so extensively patronized as he is the small pittance of two years' arrearages would be but a drop in the bucket." It is true, there was occasionally printed on the sacks a general notice to delinquents—but I never suspected that this was intended for his friends.

The notice, however, became more frequent; and having leisure, I concluded I would visit my friend, the proprietor of the Granary. He greeted me cordially—but I saw there had been trouble. He was evidently worn with toil and anxiety; and in the conversation of the evening, he entered in particulars.

"Here I have been laboring day and almost night for two years, and I am more in debt than when I began. My creditors are pressing for payment; I am conscious of inability to meet their demands, and can perceive no result but bankruptcy and ruin."

"But have you not a large list of subscribers?" said I.

"Yes, a very large list," was the reply; "but many of them are like you!"

"Me!" I quickly rejoined in amazement; "too many like me!"

"Pardon me," said my friend, in a melancholy tone—"pardon me, for oppression will make even a wise man mad. You have had a quart of wheat weekly for two years—and I have not had a cent of payment; I have a large list of the same kind of patrons scattered here and there over thousands of miles. If they would pay me the trifles they severally owe me, I should be directly freed from embarrassment, and go on my way rejoicing. But they reasoned; and, among you, I am brought to the door of poverty and ruin."

I felt the full force of the rebuke, and promptly paying arrearages at the increased price named in the prospectus, and also a year in advance, I shortly bid adieu to the worthy and wronged farmer, resolving to do every thing in my power to repair the injury which had been accruing from my delinquency.

O ye patrons of Jonathan Homespun! wherever ye are, or whoever ye are! you who have received and eaten the wheat, from his granary, without making payment! Ye are guilty of a grievous sin of commission. Therefore repent. Pay the farmer what you owe him. Uncle Sam's teamsters bring the sack of grain every week, Uncle Sam's teamsters will carry the money safely to Jonathan Homespun.

MINUTE WRITING.

The Iliad of Homer in a nutshell, which Pliny says that Cicero once saw, it is pretended might have been a fact, however to some it may appear impossible.—Ælian notices an artist who wrote a distich in letters of gold, which he enclosed in the rind of a grain of corn.

Antiquity and modern times record many such penmen, whose glory consisted in writing in so small a hand that the writing could not be legible to the naked eye. One wrote a verse of Homer on a grain of millet, and another, more indefatigably trifling, transcribed the whole Iliad in so confined a space, that it could be enclosed in a nutshell. Menage mentions, he saw whole sentences which were not perceptible to the eye without the microscope; and pictures and portraits, which appeared at first to be lines and scratches thrown down at random; one of them formed the face of the Dauphiness, with the most pleasing delicacy and correct resemblance. He read an Italian poem in praise of this princess, containing some thousands of verses, written by an officer in the space of a foot and a half. This species of curious idleness has not been lost in our own country; where this minute writing has equalled any on record. Peter Bales, a celebrated calligraphist in the reign of Elizabeth, astonished the eyes of beholders by showing them what they could not see; for in the Harlem mss. 530, we have a narrative of "a rare piece of work brought to pass by Peter Bales, an Englishman, and a clerk of the chancery;" it seems by the description to have been the whole Bible "in an English walnut not bigger than a hen's egg. The nut holdeth the book; there are as many leaves in his little book as the great Bible, and he has written as much in one of his little leaves as a great leaf of the Bible." We are told that this wonderful unreadable copy of the Bible was seen by many thousands. There is a drawing of the head of Charles I, in the library of St. John's College at Oxford, wholly composed of minute written characters, which at a small distance resemble the lines of an engraving. The lines of the head, and the ruff, are said to contain the book of Psalms, the Creed, and the Lord's prayer. In the British Museum we find a drawing representing the portrait of Queen Anne, not much above the size of the hand. On this drawing appear a number of lines and scratches, which the librarian assures the marvelling spectator, includes the entire contents of a thin folio, which on this occasion is carried in the hand.

On this subject it may be worth noticing, that the learned Huet asserts that he, like the rest of the world for a long time considered as a fiction the story of that industrious writer who is said to have enclosed the Iliad in a nutshell. But having examined the matter more closely, he thought it possible.

One day in company at the Dauphin's, this learned man trifled half an hour in proving it. A piece of vellum, about ten inches in length and eight in width, pliant and firm, can be folded up and enclosed in the shell of a large walnut. It can hold in its breadth one line which can contain 30 verses, and in its length 250 lines. With a crow-quill the writing can be perfect. A page of this piece of vellum will then contain 7500 verses, and the reverse as much; the whole 15,000 verses of the Iliad. And this he proved in their presence, by using a piece of paper, and with a common pen. The thing is possible to be effected; and if on any occasion paper should be most excessively rare, it may be useful to know, that a volume of matter may be contained in a single leaf.—Curiosities of Literature.

ANECDOTES OF FASHION.

A volume on this subject might be made very curious and entertaining. For our ancestors were not less vacillating, and perhaps more capriciously grotesque, though with infinitely less taste than the present generation. Were a philosopher and an artist, as well as an antiquary, to compose such a work, much diversified entertainment, and some curious investigation of the progress of the arts and taste, would doubtless be the result; the subject otherwise appears of trifling value; the very farthing pieces of history.

The origin of many fashions was in the endeavor to conceal some deformity of the inventor; hence the cushions, ruffs, hoops, and other monstrous devices.—If a reigning beauty chanced to have an unequal hip, those who had very handsome hips; would load them with that false rump which the other was compelled by the unkindness of nature to substitute. Patches were invented in England in the reign of Edward VI, by a foreign lady, who in this manner ingeniously covered a web on her neck. When the Spectator wrote, full-bottomed wigs were invented by a French barber, one Duviller, whose name they perpetuated, for the purpose of concealing an elevation in the shoulder of the Dauphin. Charles VII of France introduced long coats to hide his ill-made legs. Shoes with very long points, full two feet in length, were invented by Henry Plantagenet, Duke of Anjou, to conceal a large excrescence on one of his feet. When Francis I was obliged to wear his hair short, owing to a wound he received in his head, it became a prevailing fashion at court. Others on the contrary adopted fashions to set off their peculiar beauties, as Isabella of Bavaria, remarkable for her gallantry, and the fairness of her complexion, introduced the fashion of leaving the shoulders and part of the neck uncovered.

Fashions have frequently originated from circumstances as silly as the following one. Isabella, daughter of Philip II, and wife of the Archduke Albert, vowed not to change her linen till Ostend was taken; this siege, unluckily for her comfort, lasted three years; and the supposed color of the archduchess's linen gave rise to a fashionable color, hence called L'Isabeau, or the Isabella; a kind of whitish-yellow dingy. Or sometimes they originate in some temporary event; as after the battle of Steenkirk, where the allies wore large cravats, by which the French frequently seized hold of them, a circumstance perpetuated on the medals of Louis XIV, cravats were called Steenkirks; and after the battles of Ramillies, wigs received that denomination.

The Richmond Star, reports the following boarding scene:

"Mr. Squibb's is your tea strong enough?"

"Not quite ma'am—the butter is, however."

To Kill Bed Bugs.—Gum camphor and bar soap will effectually destroy the bed bug. Mix one ounce of the camphor, well pulverized, with two ounces of the soap; this mixture is easily applied to the crevices where the bugs harbor.

POPULAR TALES.

From the London Metropolitan:

MEMORIES OF GIBRALTAR.

Ceuta, anciently called 'Septa,' from its seven hills, is distant from Gibraltar about five leagues. Strabo calls it Abyla, and it is known as one of the pillars of Hercules. It commands the entrance to the Mediterranean on the African side, as Gibraltar does the European. It owes its corrupted name to the Arabs, and is celebrated as the seat of Count Julian's government when, in revenge for his daughter Florinda's dishonor by Roderick, he betrayed his country into the hands of his neighbor, Muza, the Saracen. Here it was that the remains of the heartbroken girl were interred, after her self-immolation at Malaga, where, to the grief and consternation of her parents, she threw herself headlong from a tower, and so ended the sufferings that had unsettled her reason.

At the period I write of, one division of our regiment was stationed at Gibraltar, the other at the citadel of Ceuta, under the command of a general officer, whom, for the sake of avoiding identification, I shall call St. Clair; and as my little records involve the adventures of friends, I shall disguise other names, in order that the scenes which I depict may cause no embarrassment to such of the party as still survive our trip. Alas! too many of those who might recognize resemblances of character are now numbered with the dead.

My friend Sophia was the young and ill-assorted bride of Colonel Macgregor, who boasted a genealogical tree that might have rivalled the oak; he was proud of his family, his name, his fortune, and of his girl-wife; not that he was capable of appreciating the higher qualities of her nature, but because upon his arrival from the Peninsula, he found her the reigning belle of the garrison, which determined him, nem. con., to make the prize his own.

Sophia was in the earliest blush of girl-hood, and had she been a resident of her father-land, proposals of such a nature would have been deemed preposterous; but in more southern countries such early marriages are by no means uncommon. It may be imagined that love, beyond that which she bore to her parents, was known to her only by name; and when she acceded to their command, it was without one feeling beyond duty, assisted by the youthful ambition to become the mistress of her own establishment, and to participate the honors and advantages, commanded as much by the colonel's stylish pretensions as by his rank and fortune.

The sudden transition, however by which Juliet is made to pass in a few hours from childlike simplicity to the passionate depths of woman's nature, and to the perfection of intellect, was scarcely more rapid than the transformation which marriage wrought in my friend Sophia. That which in some minds is a process of tedious accomplishment, seemed in her to have been effected in a few weeks.

If a symptom of girlhood remained, it consisted in the gay and buoyant spirit gushing out in frankness and sometimes irony; this she was flattered into indulging, until sometimes it fell irreverently even upon the colonel himself; but, to do her justice, this fault was one of thoughtlessness, not ill-nature; for she had a heart teeming with philanthropic kindness; and if it were a fault, it might be pardoned, for it was soon corrected, as the events of our "Visit to Ceuta" left her as sedate and self-possessed a woman of the world as though she had been ten years wedded—so sensitive are the lessons that we read in our own hearts.

Sophia and myself were early friends, of one age, had grown together and married nearly at the same period into the same regiment; and when General St. Clair came to Gibraltar upon his half-yearly inspection, he invited our matrimonial quartette to visit his lady at Ceuta, and the anticipations with which we contemplated our excursion formed the sole occupation of our conversation and thoughts until our departure.

It had been arranged that we should accompany the surgeon of our regiment, who was to follow the general in a few days, and by special favor our kind old governor gave us the use of his yacht, so that we left the garrison in gallant style; but as we stood on the deck of our little vessel, looking up at the gloomy tower which frowns over the harbor, and which then enclosed a mysterious state-prisoner most jealously guarded, most of our gay expectations were chased by certain misgivings as to the impressions we might chance to make upon our destined hostess, who, besides being the presiding deity of the place, was a personage of prodigious regimental importance, and was in that little circle celebrated by a thousand piquant anecdotes, all calculated to excite the curiosity, if not the apprehensions, of youthful guests. As if purposefully to increase these nervous trepidations, scarcely was the anchor aground before an express arrived alongside, to request that Dr. Smith would conduct the visitors to the house of the general's aide-de-camp, a command which seemed so out of course, that I believe, had it not been for the more wary judgment of the colonel, we certainly should have returned without landing; it was fortunate, however, that his national characteristic guided our inexperience, as it afterwards proved that our transfer was only for two nights, owing to Mrs. St. Clair's preparation for a grand ball.

The gentlemen of our party, like good soldiers, having decided upon obedience, and night, which in these latitudes falls in a few moments, having come suddenly upon us, we were forced to submit in silence to our destiny, and following the doctor, who enjoyed the reputation of standing high in court favor, through sundry dark and winding alleys, we soon arrived at our destination, where, finding the hall door open, we entered unannounced; but scarcely had we passed the threshold before a female voice saluted us in a broad northern accent.

'What's there Jenny? Is it ye Jenny?'

'Tis I, Mrs. Douglas,' responded our conductor.

'What, Smith? come up here—I'm brae glad to see ye back again, mon. Laws a mercy! Macgregor! I beg pardon—ye hae gotten the step since I saw ye, Captain Macgregor; troth, then, I'm glad to see ye, and the leddies too, but ye're amaisht like sisters—baith brides, I ken. But which am I to ca' Mistress Colonel Macgregor?' Then turning suddenly to the colonel with a bantering air, she added, 'Hoot awa, I always set ye down on the old bachelor's list.'

Now every one knows that most men have their antipathies; but what are cats, rats, squinting women, creaking paper, or even tight shoes, to the antipathy of an ancient bon-vivant to being reminded of his place amongst the untidiluvian fraternity, three months after marriage with a reigning belle? Conscious that he had passed the uncertainty of a certain age, and testily tenacious of personal freedom, the colonel, bowing coldly, presented his wife.

'Ye're welcome to Ceuta, leddies, troth, are ye—weel, weel, gin ye waited lang, colonel, ye hae got a bonny bride at last.' Macgregor winced. 'But come, lads, there's wine; and she unceremoniously heaped the table with refreshments.

'Make yersels comfortable—Mistress St. Clair will be wi' us shortly. The leddies must put on their best looks, for the honor of the regiment. It's the general that has a kind heart, and its Mistress St. Clair that's sae elegant and magnanimous.'

It was thus made pretty evident to our comprehension, that however we might be disposed to regard our general's wife as high priestess, she was worshipped by our worthy and outspoken entertainer as the voice of the oracle itself. This deference, however, was quite excusable, as Mrs. Douglas was a person who had raised herself from a very humble station, mainly through the force of her own benevolent nature.

We were not long in suspense, for scarcely had we re-entered the drawing room after the arrangement of our attire, before a loud and authoritative knocking at the hall-door announced visitors of no common importance. Mrs. Douglas started to her feet, the gentlemen broke off their conversation, the piercing screams of children issuing from the nursery ceased, the dog in court gave loud warning, and the cat that lay snugly on the rug, enjoying the genial warmth of a cheerful fire, rose with dignity, stretched herself lazily into the form of an arch, and took refuge under her mistress's chair.

'It is Mistress St. Clair,' whispered our hostess, and hurried from the room. Presently a loud masculine voice was heard. 'Well, and where are they? What are they doing?' We simultaneously rose as a tall bony woman, habited en militaire, in a close braided dress and regimental forage-cap, strode into the room, followed by Captain Douglas, and a posse of young officers, and roughly shaking the colonel by the hand, vowed, almost swore, that she was glad to see him. Upon Dr. Smith she bestowed the embrace Espagnole, greatly to the amusement of her attendants who grouped giggling behind, and no less to our edification; at last she turned to us, and having graciously signified her approval of the choice made by our worthy lords and masters, and felicitated us upon arriving in time to be present at her ball of the ensuing evening, she enjoined us to consider ourselves 'entirely at her command,' and informed us, that although she used the house of the obliging aide-de-camp as our temporary quarters, she considered herself as the abtress of our movements during our visit. All these preliminaries being satisfactorily settled, without more ado she took her seat at the card table, and was soon deeply lost in the anxieties of lansquenet.

It having been signified to us that a visit to the Spanish governor and his lady was indispensable, early the next morning we set out to pay our respects. The government house overlooks the bay, and is built in the usual way, with a large courtyard in the centre.—At the entrance lounged two lazy sentinels, and on the staircase lolled others, playing cards. Having passed these watchful guardians of official dignity, we found ourselves at the entrance of a suite of apartments, forming one side of the quadrangle, the scanty and mean furniture of which, uncarpeted brick floors, and uncurtained windows, strongly contrasted with the comforts of the government residence at Gibraltar.—One apartment alone was exempt from the desolation which chilled us in the rest; here the floor was cowered with a fine mat dyed in brilliant colors, rose-colored silk draperies floated round the windows, and the furniture of Brazilian wood was light and elegant.—This we also passed, and conducted by Captain Douglas, were admitted into a boudoir of most tiny dimensions, where, in a dishable perfectly inconceivable to English beaux and belles, we found the governor and his donna in conversation with their confessor; but whatever was wanting in costume was amply compensated by the graceful urbanity and unembarrassed ease with which we were received and entertained; and an hour's sprightly conversation sufficed to place us all on a footing of intimacy at the government house, and served to convince us that beauty is not requisite to render a woman agreeable, for perhaps few possessed so plain a face, and yet fewer a more fascinating manner than the gobernadora of Ceuta.

Perhaps it was a secret vanity that induced my friend to delay her entrance into the ball room until the guests were all assembled; and as, both by the precedence of rank and bridal honors, the duty of leading the dance devolved upon her, Mrs. St. Clair was thrown into considerable dudgeon by this coquetry; but when she entered, dressed with the most elaborate attention to English rules of taste, and looking the very queen of smiles, that lady, could not but feel proud of her country-woman; forgetting, therefore, her displeasure, and hurrying her to the head of the room without having been introduced to a single individual, Sophia found herself in a moment whirling through all the intricate mazes of a Spanish dance; but long before she had completed the figure, she became aware of being the object of general attention, and when she found herself undergoing the process of individual introduction, made doubly irksome by the embraces superadded by Spanish etiquette, she was not sorry to be relieved by the gobernadora, who now, sparkling with jewels, claimed her acquaintance.

'I wish,' said she, 'especially to bespeak your friendship for a young relative of mine,' and added more confidentially, 'who may require your kindness.'

As she spoke she led Sophia to another apartment, where, in seemingly earnest conversation with one of our officers, sat a young girl, whose voluptuous person, dark eyes, now languishing in liquid light, now sparkling with vivacity, jetty hair, white teeth, and clear brown complexion, presented a perfect specimen of Spanish beauty.

Patrisinia Vialli received Sophia's compliments with the most ingenious grace, kissing her on each cheek after the manner of her country, while Captain Weston, looking as though he wished the intruders at the antipodes, arose, and offering his arm to the gubernadora, with her left the room.

'Mercy, how tired I am!' exclaimed Sophia, sinking on the seat which had been so hastily vacated. 'I have undergone a round of salutations that would have wearied twenty prudes, and flatteries of all kinds have been showered so thickly upon me, that had it not been for the gubernadora's charitable extrication, I should have expired under the load. Your countrywomen, my dear, have criticized each article of dress, from my feathers to my shoes; my English corsets were a theme of supereminent admiration, while their astonishment at my fortitude in submitting to be strait laced exceeds all bounds; in short, they have twisted me about like a humming-top, and squeezed me until I have lost all sense of feeling.'

'This admiration, signora, should convince you of their good nature,' laughingly replied Patrisinia.

'Do not suppose that I am displeased,' said Sophia, 'for we easily forgive the inconvenience of being too much commended.'

'You are a happy woman, signora,' returned her companion, with a scarcely perceptible sigh.

'Am I? then the merit is entirely my own.'

'Possessed of beauty, rank, and riches, how could you be otherwise?'

'Beauty is a compendious word, signorella; a single good feature not unfrequently suffices to elevate a woman into a popular idol, especially if aided by wealth or position.'

'Then again,' added Patrisinia, 'what a fortunate fate, united to the man of your choice, the object of your fond affections!'

'The one worshiper,' pursued Sophia, 'selected from all to idolize me in my hours of mirth, and shed tear for tear in those of my affliction; is not that a pretty picture?'

The Spanish girl nodded.

'I think so too; but unfortunately, my dear girl, it is like all pictures, unreal.'

'Unreal!'

'Yes! the theory of marriage, is extremely beautiful, but the practice is, I assure you, tout au contraire.'

'You astonish me!' exclaimed Patrisinia.

'And Colonel Macgregor would be equally astonished if he heard you accuse him of the inconceivable barbarity of being in love with his wife.'

'And is it possible that he is not?'

'Your notions,' went on Sophia, 'are so exceedingly charming and natural, that it is almost a pity to spoil them; however, there is Colonel Macgregor: do you think he looks like the very interesting person you have been so prettily imagining?'

Now as there are certain feminine prejudices against diminutive stature, red hair, white eyes minus eyebrows, and a complexion where the rose blushes on the nose instead of the cheek, it must be confessed that the colonel did not come up to the beau ideal of an Adonis in any one's opinion excepting his own, and the contiguity in which he was placed, besides a very majestic and remarkably handsome Spaniard, did not contribute to the eclat of his appearance; the look therefore, with which Patrisinia scanned him, was perfectly intelligible to her companion, who, as tho' the opinion had been expressed in words, went on in her rattling way.

'No, no—give us English credit for more common sense than romance. The colonel selected me to please his vanity, and I took him to please those I loved more than all the world. He has no pride so great as seeing his wife an object of admiration, and considers the honor of his name as a receipt in full for personal attentions; and I am so amiably acquiescent to his views, that I never trouble my head about the goddess at whose shrine he may chance to pay his temporary devotions.'

'And you are yet a bride?'

'Lud, child, I have been married three whole months; and you have no idea how much knowledge a sagacious person may acquire that period of married life.'

'And is the colonel never jealous?'

Sophia laughed. 'No! that would be too amusing.'

'Yet flattery is dangerous.'

'It may be to those who seldom hear it; but when constantly buzzed in one's ears, it loses its influence.'

'And you are really happy?'

'If you mean contented, yes; but as to that exquisite bliss which young ladies so religiously believe necessarily to belong to marriage, I must confess that I have found no cause to become a proselyte to their faith.'

'I have been taught to think that marriage without love must be misery,' said Patrisinia.

'A mere girlish fallacy,' pursued Sophia, with a most matronly air; and if I might offer the results of my own observations, I should pronounce love to be rather destructive to the comforts of wedlock.'

'You have uttered an enigma.'

'Love,' said Sophia, 'has a thousand fears, jealousies, and caprices; it wastes its energies in petty contentions, and destroys its boasted bliss by endless anxieties. The life of a woman who loves is one continued disappointments. She enters marriage with all her expectations raised, all her enthusiastic hopes awakened; she lavishes on her idol all the treasures of her heart, and naturally expects to receive a correspondent return. He meanwhile, who as the lover had been all devotion; as the husband becomes all apathetic. Like the sportsman, whose ardor is sustained by the enterprise of the chase, he becomes listless and inert when the prize is won, and she, looking vainly for those delicate attentions which he had taught her to appreciate, grows surprised and shocked at finding them nearly all withdrawn. She consults her glass, and finds the beauty he extolled still bright as before; she examines her heart, it is full of affection; and when each hourly action is subjected to a critical scrutiny, they prove to be so many indices of that voluminous record which registers her thoughts. Bewildered and wretched, she weeps in secret over her lost happiness, nor dreams of looking into the metaphysics of nature for the solution of her difficult problem. Thus she becomes fretful, perhaps perverse; while he, provoked, abjures the tiny god, yet, with admirable inconsistency, demands from her increasing testimonies of affection, even though he find their exhibition wearisome. He demonstrates his power by groundless jealousies, construes her silence into coldness, her eagerness for his society into an attack upon his liberty, and, rather than yield an iota of those boasted rights which are unassailed except by the nervous fears of the sensitive despot, he rushes to dissipation for which he has no taste, and leaves the wife of his bosom to a solitude of tears. Perhaps time and the meekness of submission may rend away the chains that bind his reason captive; he returns in penitence to his victim; but, alas! she has learned to doubt him in whom she had confided, to fear him who was her idol. He then becomes sensible of the change, and finds that forgiveness is a poor substitute for affection, and fruitlessly mourns over the withered heart whose brightest blossoms his cruelty has blighted.'

'Really,' said Patrisinia, 'you argue most learnedly for one who is ignorant of the passion.'

[To be Continued.]

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

TRIALS AND PROOFS OF GUILT IN SUPERSTITIOUS AGES.

The strange trials to which those suspected of guilt were put in the middle ages, conducted with many devout ceremonies, by the ministers of religion, pronounced to be the judgements of God! The ordeal consisted of various kinds: walking blindfold amidst burning ploughshares; passing through fires; holding in the hand a red hot bar; and plunging the arm into boiling water: the popular affirmation,—I will put my hand in the fire to confirm this,—appears to be derived from this solemn custom of our rude ancestors. Challenging the accuser to single combat, when frequently the stoutest champion was allowed to supply their place; swallowing a morsel of consecrated bread; sinking or swimming in a river for witchcraft; or weighing a witch: stretching out the arms before the cross, till the champion soonest wearied dropped his arms, and lost his estate, which was decided by this very short chancery suit, called the judicium crucis.

The bishop of Paris and the abbot of St. Denis disputed about the patronage of a monastery: Pepin the short, not being able to decide on their confused claims, decreed one of these judgements of God, that of the cross. The bishop and abbot each chose a man, and both the men appeared in the chapel, where they stretched out their arms in the form of a cross. The spectators, more devout than the mob of the present day, but still the mob, were piously attentive, but betting however now for one man, now for the other, and critically watched the slightest motion of the arms. The bishop's man was first tired: he let his arm fall, and ruined his patron's cause forever! Though sometimes these trials might be eluded by the artifice of the priest, numerous were the innocent victims who unquestionably suffered in these superstitious practices.

An abbot of St. Austin of Angers in 1066, having refused to present a horse to the Viscount of Tours, which the viscount claimed in right of his lordship, whenever an abbot first took possession of that abbey: the ecclesiastic offered to justify himself by the trial of the ordeal, or by duel, for which he proposed to furnish a man. The viscount at first agreed to the duel; but, reflecting that these combats, though sanctioned by the church, depended wholly on the skill or vigor of the adversary, and could therefore afford no substantial proof of the equity of his claim, he proposed to compromise the matter in a manner which strongly characterize the times: he waved his claim, on condition that the abbot should not forget to mention in his prayers, himself, his wife, and his brothers! As the orisons appeared to the abbot, in comparison with the horse, of little or no value, he accepted the proposal.

If two neighbors, say the capitularies of Dagobert, dispute respecting the boundaries of their possessions, let a piece of turf of the contested land be dug up by the judges, and brought by him into the court, and the two parties shall touch it with the points of their swords, calling on God as a witness of their claims;—after this let them combat, and let victory decide on their rights!

In these times those who were accused of robbery were put to trial by a piece of barley-bread, on which the mass had been said; and if they could not swallow it they were declared guilty. This mode of trial was improved by adding to the bread a slice of cheese; and such were their credulity and firm dependence on Heaven in these ridiculous trials, that they were very particular in this holy bread and cheese called the corned. The bread was to be of unleavened barley, and the cheese made of ewe's milk in the month of May.

Du Cange observed, that the expression—'May this piece of bread choke me!' comes from this custom. The anecdote of Earl Godwin's death by swallowing a piece of bread, in making this observation, is recorded in our history. If it be true, it was a singular misfortune.

Amongst the proofs of guilt in superstitious ages was that of the bleeding of a corpse. If a person was murdered, it was believed that at the touch or approach of the murderer the blood gushed out of the body in various parts. By the side of the bier, if the slightest change was observable in the eyes, the mouth, feet, or hands of the corpse, the murderer was conjectured to be present, and many innocent spectators must have suffered death; 'for when a body is full of blood, warmed by external heat and a putrefaction coming on, some of the blood-vessels will burst, as they will all in time.' This practice was once allowed in England, and is still looked on in some of the uncivilized parts of these kingdoms as a detection of the criminal. It forms a rich picture in the imagination of our old writers; and their histories and ballads are labored pathos by dwelling on this phenomenon.

May we suppose that these ordeals owe their origin to that one of Moses, called the 'Waters of Jealousy'? The Greeks likewise had ordeals, for the Antignous of Sophocles, the soldiers offer to prove their innocence by handling red hot iron, and walking between fires. One cannot but smile at the whimsical ordeals of the Siamese. Among other practices to discover the justice of a cause, civil or criminal, they are particularly attached to using certain consecrated purgative pills, which they make the contending parties swallow. He who swallows them longest gains his cause! The practice of giving Indians a consecrated grain of rice to swallow is known to discover the thief in any company, by the contortions and dismay evident on the countenance of the real thief.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, August 14, 1841.

THE LATE MURDER, of the "beautiful cigar girl," is still the subject of great excitement in N. York.—No clue, has been, as yet, discovered, by which the perpetrators can be discovered. The Evening Tattler of that city, gives the communication of an anonymous correspondent, who says, that on the day which is supposed to be the one, Miss Rogers was murdered, he saw a boat land at Hoboken with a well dressed girl and six men cross from N. Y.,—that a short time after, another boat with three men, came from the city, and made enquiry of two gentlemen, who witnessed the crossing of the first boat, whether a girl had been that way, and whether any force had been used to detain her, &c. This is the substance of the Tatler statement, and we think it carries improbability on the face of it. It is no wise likely that six men would decoy a young girl from her home in open day light, to a place so public as Hoboken either for purposes of revenge or violation. As base as the human heart sometimes prove itself to be it can offer no motive why so dreadful a secret should be placed in the keeping of so many individuals. If revenge, or dishonor was the object, one or two villains could attain their end, as well as six, without half the risk of detection. Again; it is improbable that Miss Rogers would voluntarily accompany six men under the circumstances as related. If being in the boat was not her own choice, these two gentlemen would have had their attention called to it, as well as the hundreds of people, who are continually wandering about Hoboken and its neighborhood. Besides, the story is incredible from the fact as stated, that the second boat was but a very short time behind the first; and they immediately started in pursuit on the run. If the three men in the last boat were friends, pursuing the girl for protection, it is almost impossible that an outrage or a murder could have been committed, without their knowledge. If they were of the same gang (which is alike improbable) why were they left behind, only to add to the danger of detection. Our opinion is, that the statement, so far as regards the murdered girl, is inconsistent and improbable. If an All Wise Providence should ever bring this foul murder to light, we believe it will prove to be the work of but one man.

Since the above was in type, we gather the following additional information, which is corroborative of our opinion above. We think the probability stronger that she was both violated and murdered in the city of New York.

In reference to the account published yesterday, of a young woman having been taken out of a boat on the river, by a party of six men from another boat, who then rowed swiftly to the Hoboken shore and there handed, with the girl,—the N. Y. Com. Adv. of Wednesday, says "it has been ascertained—so we are informed—that the young woman was not Miss Rogers, and that no injury was done to her."

The Com. Adv. says further—"There is no evidence that we know of, that she went to Hoboken at all on that fatal Sunday, and many are of opinion that the murder was committed either in this city or upon the river, in a boat. Yet, on the other hand, we know that information, has been given to the police of a discovery upon the Jersey shore which perhaps may indicate the spot where the atrocious deed was perpetrated."

As far as we have heard (says the N. Y. Sun) the mystery is just as far from being in a train for dissipation, as it ever was—notwithstanding the thousand rumors that have found their way to the public.

THE DIFFERENCE.—In New York, where the Corporation ordinance has been enforced, 1200 dogs have been destroyed. In this city, where we have the same law, if each dog had bitten his man (provided he was mad; and that he is not so, is no fault of the constables) 1200 hundred human lives would have been "destroyed." The risk of a death by hydrophobia, is of no comparison with the death of a "favorite dog," (eight-tenths of whom are owned by negroes and dock-loafers.) Such appears to be the opinion of our city police officers.

WOODEN NUTNESS OUTDONE.—One of the hair-dressers of our city, the other day, exhibited to us a new species of "improvement in the arts." It was a cake of "Windsor soap," bought "very cheap," from a pedlar, made of some kind of bark, compounded with clay. It had been dipped evidently, in scented suds.—and was handsomely stamped, and looked and smelled like the "ginuine thing." It lacked nothing but the properties of soap, to make it an excellent article for shaving. Those of our readers who choose to buy a box of this improved soap for their own use, may never be under any apprehension of a shave by the purchase.

DREADFUL OCCURRENCE.—170 lives lost.—The Western Cars of Wednesday evening last, brought intelligence of the loss of the Steam Boat Erie, by fire, while on her trip from Buffalo to Chicago. The Erie took fire at about 8 o'clock, P. M. when she was 6 miles from shore, and 40 from Buffalo. The fire is said to have originated from a demijohn of varnish setting over the boiler! The boat had been recently painted and varnished, and the varnish not being dry, is said to have wrapped the whole boat in a flame in an instant. There were upwards of 200 souls on board, (principally German emigrants) and out of this large number only 27 were saved. Mr. Linés of Milwaukee, lost—wife saved, by a life preserver. Mr. Williams of Syracuse saved,—wife lost. Mr. Cobb, merchant of Buffalo, is said to be lost. The Boat was owned by Chas. M. Reid, of Erie.

AN EXAMPLE.—A black fellow, by the name of Fletcher, a porter on board the Swallow, was brought before our police for stealing the boots of a passenger the other day. It appears that Fletcher took the boots, only "according to custom," to clean, without leave, and in the morning some gentleman had taken the boots in question, and left a pair—not so good.—Fletcher was held to bail. This robbing passengers of their boots and shoes, while asleep in their berths, "according to custom," has long been complained of as an intolerable nuisance, and it is a matter of surprise, that the Captains do not forbid the waiters taking this liberty without asking leave. Two or three examples like the above, will satisfy these gentlemen waiters that passengers are not exactly "lawful plunder."

A number of the oldest cotton houses in New Orleans, have addressed circulars to the planters, stating that they have abandoned the "list" system, and will in future sell every man's cotton on its own merits.

A tradesman's wife at Peckham, England, has for a long time, fancied that she has within her a "ravenous rat," and she has lately determined to starve this internal tormentor to death, by starving herself.

A CURE.—Sir Astley Cooper once had a hypochondric patient who had taken it into her head, that she had swallowed a living mouse. Sir Astley told her there was no cure, but to let a Cat run down after it, which was done after she had been put to sleep by an opiate. In the morning the mouse was found dead on the table,—and if the cat didn't go down after it, we don't know who did. The same receipt will cure the rat case.

A CAUTION.—A Captain of a Canal Boat was recently held to bail, in the sum of $600, for bringing paupers to this city.

PRETTY FAIR REBUKE.—There are about 700 Cherokee Indians in North Carolina, who all belong to the temperance Society, except five or six, and they only drink liquor, when they get among the whites.

A FORBEARING HUSBAND.—The editor of the Susquehanna Register says, that if he had forty wives, and thirty-nine of them should run away, he would not advertise them.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.—The Pope has issued a bull against this "science." The papal thunders denounce it as irreligious and immoral. The pope is a very sensible man.

The Picayune says: "The ladies in Lafayette and Clay counties, Missouri, have adopted a rule, never to marry a man who owes the printer for more than one year's subscription."

[This will account for the WHOLESALENESSE of our subscription in that State.]

A black girl has been arrested at St Louis on a charge of throwing a white infant into the vault of a privy, to destroy it for revenge for being charged with theft by its parents.

Intelligence.

GLORIOUS NEWS FROM FLORIDA.—Co-a-coo-chee's whole band in—Close of the Florida War.—By the U. S. Steamer Gen Taylor, Capt. Peck, arrived here yesterday, we have the gratifying intelligence from Florida, that the war for the ninety-ninth time, may now be considered at an end. Wild Cat's whole band, men, women, children, and negroes, 160 in all, have come in at Tampa, and 40 more Indians of another band, were on their way, and expected at Tampa in two days. A gentleman who came on in the Genl. Taylor says that he does not think another rifle will be fired by the enemy.

When Co-a-coo-chee's family came in, Col. Worth told him he might go on shore from the schooner were he was confined and see them. He refused to go, saying that though he was anxious to see his family, he would not permit them to see him irons. The Colonel finally consented to let him go ashore without his shackles, and after a warm greeting with his family, he dined with the Colonel, and then returned on board the schooner. As soon as his irons were replaced, he told Col. Worth that he had but one request more to make, and that was, to allow him and his people to go west as soon as possible!—Savannah Repub., Aug. 7.

Strange Infatuation.—A lady residing in Moyamensing, Philadelphia, last week, went raving crazy in consequence of a slight which she received at the hands of a young man scarcely of age, with whom she had fallen in love. She was between 40 and 50 years of age.

The Bonaparte Family.—A letter written in Genoa, mentioning the arrival of Prince Louis Bonaparte in that city, says:—"All the male members of the Bonaparte family, except Prince Louis Napoleon, confined at Ham, are now assembled at Genoa. They have been received by the King with marks of friendship and esteem, and treated by all the inhabitants with great consideration."

Deaths in Milford, Conn.—In Milford, on the 2nd inst., Mrs. Content Smith, wife of Samuel B. Smith, while assisting her grandson, Mr. E. B. Smith, in preventing his oxen from strangling by the raising of the cart while loaded with hay, was thrown from the heap under the wheel, which passed over her, killing her instantly, aged 72 years.

In the same town, on Thursday morning, 5th inst., Mrs. Aurelia Smith, in company with another lady and her husband, Mr. David Smith, 3d, started on a visit to Derby, and had only proceeded a short distance, when the wagon upset, throwing Mrs. Smith upon her head with such violence as to break her neck, and of course causing instant death. Her age was 45.

Another Indian Fight.—The St. Louis Republican has information from Missouri river, that a fight had taken place between the Pottawattamies and Sioux in which five Sioux, (the whole party,) were killed, and three Pottawattamies killed and one wounded.—The party of Pottawattamies were about 25 in number.

After this, a party of about 30 Pottawattamies went out in search of Sioux, had been gone a considerable time, without being heard from, and it was supposed at Council Bluffs that an engagement had taken place, and that the Pottawattamies had either been entirely cut off, or captured,

Life in Illinois.—On the 26th ult. some sixty or seventy of the citizens of Illinoistown collected together and proceeded to a ten pin alley kept by a Mr. Mandeville, and after a long chase, during which Mandeville was fired at several times, succeeded in arresting him and his partners in vice—(gambling pickpockets and robbers,) and after deciding that they would not tar and feather them, put them on board the ferry boat and sent them to St. Louis. The crowd then returned to the ten pin alley, which they tore up, and afterwards completely gutted the house.

A Great Criminal.—The St. Louis New Era states that Wm. Dracoll, who was recently tried, condemned and shot by a self-constituted tribunal of citizens [a mob] in Ogle co. Ill., confessed, in the brief hour allotted to him to die, that he had in his time murdered five men, had been accessory to the robbery of several stores, and was privy to the murder of Mr. John Campbell, a few days previous.

Villainous.—A few days ago, two Germans, residing at the "Rising Sun," Philadelphia, induced a young man sixteen or seventeen years of age, to ply a little boy about seven years of age with a pint of whiskey. The effects of the liquor were dreadful; it was expected that the child would die, and it was only with unremitting attention that the child escaped death. A suit was instituted by the parents of the child against the instigators of this villainous outrage, but it was compromised.

Mr. Henry Evans, of New Bedford, has invented a machine for the manufacture of cordage. Ten of them may be operated in a room twenty-five feet by forty, and will produce 6000 fathoms of rope per hour.

Died on board steamboat Express Mail, on the Ohio river, about the 1st of July, a Mr. Bishop, of Massachusetts. He had no friends or acquaintances on board. He drank some ice water, which threw him into convulsions, and died in twenty minutes. There was found in his pockets $367 50, which awaits the order of his relatives.

The steamer New York from New Haven brought on Monday 325 passengers to New York for 12½ cents each.

THE AUTHOR OF "THE PRAIRIE," &c.—A new romance by that justly celebrated novelist, Cooper, is announced by Mr. Bentley for "immediate publication." It is entitled "The Deer-Slayer." The principal character in the forthcoming romance is understood to be Leatherstocking, of whom it presents us the early life. On this ground—the primeval forests and almost illimitable prairies of his native land—Cooper has always found himself unapproachable.—The new story abounds in exciting incident.—English paper.

A passenger in a steamboat a short time since bro't suit in St. Louis against the Captain for not starting at the hour he advertised, thereby creating a loss to him. The case went before a jury, who brought in a verdict of one hundred and ninety dollars damages.

Prodigious Falling off.—They say that at Lochmere Point, a thriving suburb of Boston, there is a store in which heretofore eighteen thousand dollars worth of spirituous liquors have been sold annually, and that the sales in the same store for the first half of this year amount to only $500; and that there is no other cause for this dreadful falling off but a great temperance reform which has taken place in the village.

Another Sacrifice.—Charles Hobby, a young man of about twenty-five years of age, was found dead in a field in the town of Newcastle, near the residence of his father Eno Hobby, having drank excessively of a jug of rum which he had taken with him to his work. He had been at work alone; had taken three quarts of the destroyer in a jug when he left the house, but when found by his brother he was quite dead, and but half a pint of liquor left.—Westchester Herald.

The wife of Mr. Joseph Whitmore, Franklin township, Lycoming co., Pa., killed a large bear on the 27th ult. Her only weapon was a broad hoe.

A Child Killed by Rats.—A small colored child was recently killed by rats at New Orleans, so says the N. Or. Crescent. The mother was absent a short time, and when she returned, her infant's throat was completely cut by these vermin, and a part of one of its arms eat into the bone.

Statue of Washington.—This statue, executed by Greenough, which has just arrived at Washington, is of such colossal size that it will be necessary to take away a portion of the capitol to introduce it.

An affray took place a few days ago at a store in Clinton, La., between two men, when one of them struck the other with a common ruler, causing his death the next day. The name of the deceased was Timothy Rambeter.

Peoples' Line Steamboats.

The boats of the Peoples' Line being now all in complete order, will continue to run between Albany and New-York, until further notice as follows:

The ROCHESTER, Capt. St. John, and SOUTH AMERICA, Capt. Brainard, will form a daily Night Line, one of them leaving the foot of Hamilton street every evening (except Sunday) at 7 o'clock, through without landing.

HALF DAILY NIGHT LINE, at 5 o'clock.

The NORTH AMERICA, Capt. Truesdell, will run a Half Daily Night Line, leaving the foot of State street, every other evening at 5 o'clock, making the regular landings.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the Pier, foot of Hamilton street. Jy 17.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED

THE Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 189 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families. Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams, &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old customers and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12 1-2 cents. Jy 19 A. W. STARKS

POETRY.

THE AMERICAN FOREST-GIRL.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Wildly and mournfully the Indian drum
On the deep hush of moonlight forests broke:—
'Sing us a death-song, for thine hour is come.'
So the red Warriors to their captive spoke.
Still, and amidst those dusky forms alone,
A youth, a fair-haired youth, of England stood,
Like a king's son; though his cheek had flown
The mantling crimson of the island-blood,
And his pressed lips looked marble. Fiercely bright,
And high around him blazed the fires of night;
Rocking beneath the cedars to and fro
As the wind passed, with a fitful glow
Lighting the victim's face:—but who could tell
Of what within his secret heart befel,
Known but to heaven that hour!—Perchance a tho't
Of his far home, then so intensely wrought
That its full image, pictured to his eye
On the dark ground of mortal agony,
Rose clear as day! And he might see the band
Of his young sisters wandering hand in hand
Where the laburnums drooped; or happy binding
The jasmine, up the door's low pillars winding;
Or, as day faded on their gentle mirth,
Gathering, with braided hair, around the hearth
Where sat their mother;—and that mother's face
Its grave sweet smile yet wearing in the place
Where so it ever smiled! Perchance the prayer
Learned at her knee came back on his despair;
The blessing from her voice, the very tone
Of her 'Good-night' might breathe from boyhood gone!
—He started and looked up:—thick cypress boughs,
Full of strange sound, waved o'er him darkly red
In the broad stormy fire-light; savage brows,
With tall plumes crested and wild hues o'erspread,
Girt him like feverish phantoms; and pale stars
Looked through the branches as through dungeon bars
Shedding no hope! He knew, he felt his doom.
Oh! what a tale to shadow with its gloom
That happy hall in England! Idle fear!
Would the winds tell it?—who might dream or hear
The secrets of the forests? To the stake [strove
They bound him; and that proud young soldier
His father's spirit in his breast to wake,
Trusting to die in silence! He the love
Of many hearts!—the fondly-reared—the fair,
Gladdening all eyes to see! And fettered there
He stood beside his death-pyre, and the brand
Flamed up to light it, in the chieftain's hand!
—He thought upon his God. Hush! hark!—a cry
Breaks on the stern and dead solemnity!
A step hath pierced the ring! Who dares intrude
On the dark hunters in their vengeful mood?
A girl—a young slight girl!—a fawn-like child
Of green savannas and the leafy wild,
Springing unmarked till then, as some lone flower,
Happy because the sunshine is its dower;
Yet one that knew how early tears are shed,
For hers had mourned the playmate brother dead.

She had sat gazing on the victim long,
Until the pity of her soul grew strong;
And, by its passion's deepening fervor swayed,
Even to the stake she rushed, and gently laid
His bright head on her bosom, and around
His form her slender arms to shield it wound
Like close Lianthes; then raised her glittering eye,
And clear-toned voice that said—"He shall not die!"

—"He shall not die!"—the gloomy forest thrilled
To that sweet sound. A sudden wonder fell
On the fierce throng; and heart and hand were stilled—
Struck down, as by the whisper of a spell.
They gazed—their dark souls bowed before the maid,
She of the dancing step in wood and glade!
And as her cheek flushed through its olive hue,
As her black tresses to the night wind flew,
Something o'ernastered them from that young mein—
Something of heaven, in silence felt and seen;
And seeming, to their childlike faith, a token
That the Great Spirit by her voice had spoken.

They loosed the bonds that held their captive's breath;
From his pale lips they took the cup of death;
They quenched the brand beneath the cypress tree—
"Away," they cried, "young stranger thou art free!"

From the Mohawk Mirror.

THE DYING BOY.

"The briefer life, the earlier immortality."—MILWIN.

Aye, Mother, weep! this hour that boy will die—
Your bright, your beautiful, and only one!
The wing of Death is o'er him—every sigh
Comes struggling fainter from his lip of stone;
A closing weight rests on his azure eye,
Like evening's folding touch on some blue flower;
Gaze there—while yet to thine it may reply,
And thou may'st thrill beneath its love-lit power!

Thou wilt not deem it so! though day by day
Thou'st seen, with all thy wakeful tenderness,
The smile upon his face more dimly play,
His look betray more pleading languidness;
Hast seen decay, with sacrilegious stealth,
His vermil cheek despoiling of its bloom,
His flowing ringlets of their lustrous wealth,
And flinging there the shadow of the tomb!

Ah! 't is no fantasy! the stricken thing,
That like a wounded bird lies quivering there,
Was late thy bright-eyed boy, whose spirit's wing
So much of gladness owned, and beauty rare;
Ay, part of his young self, delight so grew,
That Love became a trembler in thy breast;
And his strange loveliness so rich a hue
Lent round, earth seemed in Eden-newness drest!

Oh! the deep sense of rarest ecstasy
'T were vain to tell, that in thy heart had birth,
When he, a rosy creature, graceful, free,
Played at thy side and revelled in his mirth;
Or when mid starry silence thou did'st wake
To watch while pillowed on thine arm he lay;
And the lone vigil kept for his dear sake,
And heard his low and dove-like breathings play!

Wo! for thee, Mother, wo! the wildering bliss
Such moments gave thee, thine can be no more;
Like a sweet dream 'twill fade—yet Oh! thou'lt miss
The spell that ravished so thy bosom's core!
Years may roll on, and thou may'st linger here
When every blossom of the heart is shed:
Yet wilt thou mourn with many a burning tear
The early lost—the beautiful—the dead!

Yet cheer thee in this hour! his dwelling place
Will be in bowers where Sabbath stillness reigns;
Where on the flower dark change ne'er leaves a trace,
Nor Passion on the joy its serpent stains;
He is too pure—too bright—to languish where
The rainbow arches but to melt away,
And every lovely sound and vision fair
Swells but the dirge—the trophies of decay!

THE LAST HOME OF MAN.

Man's final home beyond the tomb
Exceeds earth's richest bower;
The glory of this lower world
Is lost to such a power,
No tears shall ever dull the eye;
In this last home of man;
No death shall ever break the link,
That binds affection's chain.

And sorrow's dark and dreary sting!
Ne'er this poor realm invade;
Nor sleep, death's sister, ne'er disturbs
Man's bright empyreal shade;
No heating sun's effulgent rays
Surround this calm retreat;
No placid moon, with silver light,
Overchange a Savior's seat.

Eternal day attends the place,
And Christ illumines the day;
Seraphic spirits wing around,
Love's accepted torch to sway.
Eternal ages roll around,
But man heeds not their flight—
A million years pass swiftly on,
But bring no gloomy night.

Can man, this base, polluted man,
Such scenes as these enjoy?
O yes! repentance wipes away

The sins which now alloy;
Repentance fits him for the skies—
It blots the deepest stain:
And Jew and Gentile, Greek and Turk
May meet, once more, again.

Transporting theme! O blissful thought!
That man may thus endure,
Through earth and all its fixtures mould,
We have a home secure.
As time, its varied course rolls on:
May we our frailty see—
So when the trump of God resounds,
We'll rise to immortality.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for the second best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons on Satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and each of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FIRST OF SEPTEMBER NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Fraternity, in the city of Austin, Repub. of Texas, 23th June, 5841.

BY COMP. BRANCH T. ARCHER, ESQ.

FRIENDS, FELLOW-SOJOURNERS AND BRETHREN:

We have this day assembled, as Free and Accepted Masons, with purpose to celebrate an anniversary of our fraternity and to acknowledge the claims and pay due homage to one of our patron Saints—a person distinguished in sacred history by the appellation of St. John the Baptist—whose character I trust is familiar to you all. He was distinguished through life for exemplary conduct and a refinement and purity of piety that will admirably compare, when contrasted, with any other individual known to us as having appeared on the little globe assigned for our residence; with the single and pious exception of the blessed Saviour of fallen man, who was, as we learn from sacred records, Deity in human form, with a susceptibility, while with us, to all the sufferings incident to frail humanity.

Although this patron Saint was, and is still, one of the idols of our fraternity, it is not our purpose, or is it at all necessary to bring him in contrast with his contemporary, the blessed Saviour of the universe.—St. John though his senior in age, as temporal beings, was his inferior in gifts; and, as spiritual agents, this supremacy of gifts and power was, by the faithful and inspired Saint, openly, frankly, and piously acknowledged.

When, my brethren, we recollect St John was one of us—a Free and Accepted Mason—who practised and taught all the virtues by which the Christian character is elevated and adorned, previous to the appearance of the Saviour on the earth; when we also recollect that he practised and taught all that was necessary to temporal as well as eternal happiness, the conclusion is irresistible—that the light by which he was guided, must have been shed from the fountain of all light, was the gift of the All-high, the great, the living Jehovah; whose name, as Free and Accepted Masons, we reverence and adore, and whose attributes we most devoutly and piously acknowledge.

Masonry, therefore, seems to have existed and flourished anterior to the christian era; and was a boon extended by a divine and benign Providence to benighted man;—yes, a beacon light, the gift of High Heaven, shining through time, in all its pristine brightness, four thousand years before the appearance of our Saviour;—a light penetrating with its bright and resistless rays the depths of moral darkness into which this under world was plunged by the fall of the first-born.

If sacred history did not clearly sustain our claims to divine origin, we have abundant evidence of the fact derivable immediately from the principles taught and practised from time immemorial, by this ancient and honorable association, known as Free and Accepted Masons. I have before remarked that Masonry inculcated all the Christian virtues and practised all the Christian duties revealed by the Saviour of the world, when he deigned to appear in human form among the creatures of the earth.

The first and most important of these duties is reverence and devotion to the All-High, the great God of creation, the Author of Life, the Giver of Light and the Dispenser of all Good. Without the moral and intellectual light dispensed to man from on high, it would have been infinitely better, for us frail beings, that chaos had never been called into order; better that the earth, in volcanic agony, yield up her bowels—the sun resign his lustre—and heaven with its bright galaxy of luminaries form one general chaos, rather than man, for whom these things were intended as blessings, should be deprived of the earth, his resting place, would be odious to his touch; the light of the sun offensive to his view; and heaven's multiplied and brilliant spheres oppressive to his soul, as by their alternate and relative motions he would be enabled to count the days, the weeks, the months, the years of his degradation, fall and suffering. This celestial light has been known to us as shining in all its effulgence, in every lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, for a period of five thousand eight hundred and forty-one years. It is the true light—the light by which we, as Masons, have been and are still guided. Piety, then, is our first care—our paramount duty. To do justice, to love mercy and to walk humbly in the presence of the Supreme Ruler and Architect of the Universe, recollecting that he is always present, are the principles of our action. Among the other Christian virtues for which, as a body we are distinguished, may be mentioned brotherly-love, forbearance, fidelity and charity; the Masonic order can boldly challenge comparison with any other human association, for the faithful observance and practice of these virtues. Humility and submission to the political and civil institutions under which we have been organized, is a distinguishing Masonic characteristic. Respect and esteem for those who worship the same God, and bow before the same altar, without regard to the forms of their worship, is proof conclusive of our charity. To every order and denomination of Christian believers have our portals been open many have entered, and none dissatisfied with the process of our labors, or offended with the work we executed. Then it is apparent there can be no material incompatibility between the Christian and Masonic devotions.

Though, my brethren, when we contemplate the period of our existence as an association of men, and contrast it with any other human association, we will find ample sources of pride and gratulation in the recollection that we are now, what we were in beginning, and ever will be, faithful servants of the Almighty Omnipresent and Omnipotent God, who reigns on high. When we look to the changes wrought within the Christian era, a period of only 1800 and forty-one years, we cannot fail to be struck with the uniformity, consistency, harmony and order, by which our course has been marked. While the Christian churches who are worshippers of our God, have been confounded, distracted and divided on doctrinal points, forming themselves into factious multitudes, and waging an impious and exterminating war of tenets, not principles, upon each other, meek and humble Masonry has continued to glide on in the even tenor of her course, unmoved by the fury of theological disquisitions, untouched by the virulence of party spirit, unscathed by the destroying violence of political revolutions. It is a fact, no less notorious than creditable, that religious and political discussions are not tolerated within our walls; there we worship the God of our fathers, after our ancient forms, in purity and truth. Our temples are open to all who believe in a Deity and whose moral character will bear the test of scrutiny; the domains of sectarianism prevail not there—none are excluded for opinion's sake—associated together may be seen around the same altar, Christian, Jew and Gentile, all united in the worship and adoration of the Lord God Almighty, He, who has proclaimed himself to be the Alpha and Omega—the First and the Last—the great, the eternal "I AM." It is thus that we are now able to present to the world, the example of a human association, observing the same forms and practising the same immutable principles of piety, brotherly-love and charity, which governed it in ages long since passed away. Principles so pure in themselves and a worship so chaste, that the most discordant human materials are united under them; and Masonry, thus fostered and protected, has flourished in all ages and in all climes, restraining the passions of the impetuous, sympathizing with the afflicted, comforting and assisting the distressed, and inculcating lessons of religion and morality.

Pure as Masonry is in principle, unoffending as we are in practice, humble and obedient, in our character as Masons, as we have ever been to the laws and the civil authorities of the countries in which we have lived, without regard to their forms of Government; these recommendations have not always secured us from attack;—No! The envious, the malevolent, the vicious, have exhausted their malice upon us; we have been assailed by the envenomed shaft of calumny, neither has the poisoned breath of detraction been wanting; but, through the protection of Divine Providence we occupy an eminence too elevated for the shafts of calumny to reach us, too pure for the poisoned breath of detraction to affect us: our vestibule has not been carried, our portals have not been entered, our temples remain unpolluted and inviolate. We stand erect, firm and unshaken upon our original foundation, defying the machination of man, and reposing our trust in Him who alone is able to build up and destroy, the great, the mighty Jehovah.

With this view presented to us of the institution of Masonry, it may, with seeming propriety, be asked—why are not your lodges thrown open to the world; and these principles extended over the surface of the earth, as the waters over the great deep? To this question the direct answer cannot, in this assembly, be given; though, if indulged in parable, a satisfactory one may be found. A fountain whose source is pure, its supply ample, its current extending through time and space, should be preserved uncontaminated from the admixture of noxious, turbid and doubtful streams. Again it may be asked—why the fair, the innocent, and the lovely, the pride and the boast of Masons—sweet woman—is not permitted to partake of the waters of this living fountain; be assured that she does partake thereof and drinks deeply of the limpid stream; for, by ordinance divine, they are made part of us—"flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone;"—like the innocent and lively vine, whose tendrils are extended for support and protection to the sturdy oak, so has it likewise been decreed that woman shall rest on man; she participates in his enjoyments and sufferings, and, like the tender vine, she clings to him for protection. It is his duty to sustain her, to breathe the tempestuous storms of life for her sake; not permitting her to divide his toils.—When storms lower or danger threatens, he should be to her what the oak is to the vine—a support and protector.

That these safeguards are necessary to the purity of our order is most true; yet, although every human effort is made to preserve our temple from pollution, it is a melancholy fact that the unworthy sometimes gain admission; but unless they repent of the evils of their ways, it avails them nothing; their own corrupt hearts resisting the influence of this divine light, condemn them to the fathomless depths of perdition, unpitied by their fellow-men, unmourned by their brethren, and spurned by their God.

THE TRAVELLER.

CHINESE CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.—There is scarcely a government gazette published at Pekin; almost daily, placards are posted at the principal places about Canton and its suburbs, giving accounts of murders and insurrections, robberies, shocking and unnatural crimes of kidnapping, infanticides, suicides, and of all the beastly and unnatural crimes of which the world ever heard or read. The various modes of punishment resorted to by the government, and the unequal distribution of justice, are revolting to humanity, and most disgusting and loathsome in the recital. I will relate one case to show, that, in modern times, the Chinese are not less refined in their cruelties, than when Tu-he, the queen of Chow, among many other horrible inventions, caused brazen rollers to be heated, and then smeared with an unctuous matter, so that she might have the supreme pleasure of seeing miserable culprits, fruitlessly endeavoring to pass this burning bridge, and continually slipping into a tremendous fire, there to meet with death horrible in the extreme. The case to which I have alluded, took place in the year 1813, when the Emperor of China convicted an eunuch of being concerned in a treasonable conspiracy. The victim had been a favorite servant of the Emperor's father, Keen-lung, who had conferred upon him many favors. The poor wretch was bound round with cords and canvass, to which was added a quantity of tallow and other combustible matter, so as to convert him into a gigantic candle, and he was slowly consumed at his father's grave; the wretched being died in tortures the most excruciating that imagination can conceive.

CHINESE MALEFACTORS.—A list is presented to the Emperor of all those who have been condemned by the supreme court of Peking, with their crimes specified at length. He marks with his own hand those who are to suffer death; the others are likewise conducted to the place of execution, and then taken back to prison till their fate be determined. The day previous to their execution the condemned have an entertainment at the expense of government.—Timkowski's Travels.

Miscellany.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF L. E. L.—In "The Life and Literary Remains of L. E. L." whose sweet poetry has often calmed the perturbed spirit, and charmed the pure and susceptible heart, is the following description of the personal appearance of the celebrated authoress McClean, better known as Letitia Elizabeth Landon, whose melancholy and premature death has been so recently deplored:—"Her hair was darkly brown, very soft and beautiful, and always tastefully arranged; her figure slight, but well formed and graceful, her feet small, but her hands especially so, and faultlessly white and finely shaped; her fingers were fairy fingers, her ears, also, were observedly little; her face, though not regular in 'every feature,' became beautiful by expression; every flash of thought, every change and color of feeling, lightened over it when she spoke earnestly. The forehead was not high, but broad and full; the eyes had no overpowering brilliancy, but their clear and intellectual light penetrated by its exquisite softness; her mouth was not less marked by character, and besides the glorious facility of uttering pearls and diamonds of fancy and wit, knew how to express scorn, or anger, or pride, as well as it knew how to smile winningly, or put forth those short, quick, ringing laughs, which not excepting even her bon mots and authorisms, were the most delightful things that issued from it."

Don Pedro D'Alcantara, a Patron of Rochester Mechanism.—Perhaps no branch of Rochester mechanism is more noted, at home and abroad, than that of Rifle making. Among those of our mechanics engaged in this business, are some who, for taste and ingenuity are not surpassed, we venture to say, in this or any other country. Not only are the Rochester rifles peculiar for their perfect finish and capability for execution, but improvements have been made in their construction, giving them signal advantages over the common article.

Mr. William Billinghamurst, of this city, has received an order to make a rifle for Don Pedro d'Alcantara, the young Emperor of Brazil, a programme of whose coronation, which is to take place some time during the present month, we published a few weeks since. The circumstances under which the order was received, are these:—A dentist by the name of Badell, left Geneva a few years since for Rio de Janeiro, the capital of Brazil. Becoming acquainted with the Emperor, the latter informed him, a few months since, that he wished to procure a valuable Yankee rifle for his own use, and desired to be directed to some ingenious mechanics who could furnish it. Mr. B. recommended to him Mr. Wm. Gardener of Geneva, as being the only gunsmith of much celebrity with whom he was acquainted. Mr. G. soon after received an order for three rifles—one for the Emperor, the cost of which, it was stated, was a secondary consideration, the only direction being to unite beauty and perfection in the manufacture of the article; one for Mr. Badell, worth $100, and one for another gentleman worth $40. Mr. Gardener readily consented to make the two rifles, the prices of which had been designated, but declined the execution of the order for the third, fearful that it might not be sufficiently perfect to meet the expectations of his distinguished patron; and he accordingly transferred the order to Mr. Billinghamurst. Mr. B. is regarded as one of the best gunsmiths in the country, and will, we doubt not, execute the order as satisfactorily to the Emperor as creditably to himself. The rifle will probably be finished in about three months, at which time we will give a full description of it. Its cost will be about $400.—Roch. Dem.

The Rev. John Breckenridge, D. D., died at the residence of his mother, in Kentucky, on the 4th inst. after a protracted and very severe illness.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

The following thrilling incident is extracted from a paper in Bentley's Miscellany for June, entitled Hours in Hindostan. The Cobra Capella is stated to be the most venomous species of serpents in the East its bite being attended with almost instant death.

We had been playing all the evening at whist. Our stake had been gold mohur points and twenty on the rubber. Maxey, who was always lucky, had won five consecutive bumpers, which lent a self-satisfied smile to his countenance, and made us the losers, look any thing but pleased, when he suddenly changed countenance, and hesitated to play; this the more surprised us, since he was one who seldom pondered, being so perfectly master of the game that he deemed long consideration superfluous.

"Play away, Maxey; what are you about?" impatiently demanded Churchill, one of the most impetuous youths that ever wore the uniform of the body-guard.

"Hush!" responded Maxey, in a tone which thrilled through us, at the same time turning deadly pale.

"Are you unwell?" said another, about to start up, for he believed that our friend had been suddenly taken ill.

"For the love of God sit quiet!" rejoined the other in a tone denoting extreme fear or pain, and he laid down his cards. "If you value my life move not."

"What can he mean?—has he taken leave of his senses?" demanded Churchill, appealing to myself.

"Don't start!—don't move, I tell you!" in a sort of whisper I never can forget, uttered Maxey. "If you make any sudden motion I am a dead man!"

"Remain quiet and all may yet be well. I have a Cobra Capella round my leg."

Our first impulse was to draw back our chair; but an appealing look from the victim induced us to remain, although we were aware that should the reptile transfer but one fold and attach himself to any other of the party that individual might be already counted a dead man, so fatal is the bite of that dreadful monster.

Poor Maxey was dressed as many old residents still dress in India; namely, in breaches and silk stockings. He therefore the more plainly felt every movement of the snake. His countenance assumed a livid hue; the words seemed to leave his mouth without the feature altering his position, so rigid was his look,—so fearful was he lest the slightest muscular movement should alarm the serpent and hasten his dreadful bite.

We were in agony little less than his own during the scene.

"He is coiling round!" muttered Maxey; feel him cold—cold to my limb! and now he tightens!—for the love of Heaven call for some milk!—I dare not speak loud; let it be placed on the ground near me; let some be spilt on the floor."

Churchill cautiously gave the order, and a servant slipped out of the room.

"Don't stir. Northcote, you moved your head. By every thing sacred I conjure you not to do so again! It cannot be long ere my fate is decided. I have a wife and two children in Europe; tell them I died blessing them—that my last prayers were for them—the snake is winding itself round my calf—I leave them all I possess—I can almost fancy I feel his breath: Great God! to die in such a manner!"

The milk was brought and carefully put down; a few drops were sprinkled on the floor, and the affrighted serpent drew back.

Again Maxey spoke:

"No—it has no effect! on the contrary, he has clasped himself tighter—he has uncurled his upper fold! I dare not look down, but I am sure he is about to draw back and give the bite of death with more fatal precision. Receive me, O Lord! and pardon me—my last hour is come! Again he pauses. I die firm, but that is past endurance—ah, no!—he has undone another fold, and loosens himself. Can he be going to some one else?" We involuntarily started. "For the love of Heaven, stir not! I am a dead man; but bear with me! He still loosens—he is about to dart! Move not, but beware! Churchill, he falls off that way. Oh! this agony is hard to bear! Another pressure and I am dead! No! he relaxes!"

At that moment poor Maxey ventured to look down; the snake had unwound himself; the last coil had fallen, and the reptile was making for the milk.

"I am saved!—saved!" and Maxey bounded from his chair and fell senseless into the arms of one of his servants. In another instant, need it be added, we were all dispersed—the snake was killed, and our poor friend carried more dead than alive to his room.

SATIRE.

Satire has no equal as a pungent weapon. It is keen as a knife. Its effect was fully illustrated in Chestnut street on Saturday. The French 'Blouse' has been introduced to some extent among the young men, but the fashion 'don't take' extensively. Except on a graceful and genteel figure, they are the most ungainly garment in which fashion ever entombed its victim. Some wags on Saturday equipped an uncouth Negro with a 'Blouse' cut in the most fashionable manner, but made of the roughest sail cloth. He was promenading that fashionable avenue at noon, to the infinite amusement of crowds of spectators. The 'Dandies' either escaped from sight or stood transfixed with horror. One pronounced it absolutely 'au-da-shus,' and another as he eyed the walking milliner with his glass, said, 'it is positively shocking.'—Phil. N. American.

WIVES IN LOUISIANA.—Louisiana guards the rights of her women with kind and parental care. The husband cannot alienate the property, even by consent of the wife; and even the money given by the parents, either before or after marriage, is as much the separate property of the wife as the land and negroes.—She can even make the husband her debtor, and sue him in a court of law. Dashing young fellows used to go and marry the beautiful creoles of the territory, and spend their property within a short period, leaving them to penury. It is said that it was to guard against this conduct on the part of unprincipled adventurers, that the enactment of this law was found necessary by the prudent and kind French creoles of that hospitable region. No matter what led to it, the example is worthy of all praise.—Philadelphia North American.

SEVERITY OF THE CHINESE LAWS.—The most rigorous punishments are inflicted on those who make an attempt on the life of the Emperor, rebels, traitors, who go over to another sovereign; those who murder their grandfather or grandmother, their father or mother, uncle, aunt, brother or sister; those who steal things belonging to the priests or the crown; and especially those who steal the seal of the empire; whoever does not perform his duty to his parents, whoever marries without wearing mourning so long as the law prescribes; those who during the life of their parents leave them without permission, or soon after their death give balls, parties, &c.; he who has killed, or invidiously betrayed a relation; a calumnious informer; a murderer or of his teacher or superior; he who has illicit commerce with the concubines of his grandfather or his father is punished with the greatest severity.

An unjust judge is beheaded. He who in time of war is guilty of embezzlement, or malpractices with respect to the supply of the troops, is strangled. Whoever embezzles a considerable sum belonging to the government is beheaded, whatever may be his rank. Whoever commits a robbery to the amount of more than three hundred rubles is strangled; the stealing of a smaller sum is punished by a severe bastinado, and the criminal is obliged besides to make restitution; if he has not the means, he is condemned with his wife and children, to hard labor for the government.

Mandarins, of a superior rank, convicted of neglect of their duty, are degraded two degrees and lose two years' salary. All sums of money that is stolen from the public coffers must be made good by the chiefs of the tribunals where the robbery was committed, and by those who are employed to discover the thieves, if their search is fruitless.

Deafness.—A subscriber has made use of the following prescription for the cure of deafness, and wishes us to copy it—which we cheerfully do for the benefit of others:

"By mixing musk with sulphuric æther and ammonia, and allowing it to stand for fourteen days, a solution is formed, that, if properly applied to the internal ear, will remove in almost every case the distressing sore which accompany deafness."

THE GATHERER.

Gen. Jackson.—It has been said, says the Philadelphia Chronicle, that the old General never drinks any ardent spirits. This was substantiated by his negro slave, who said that "Massa no drink rum, but then he drink his coffee strong enough to kill the debil."

ANECDOTE.—One evening an officer presented himself to Gen. Jackson, with the complaint that certain soldiers had got together in a tent, and were making a great noise. "What are they doing?" asked the General with some interest. "They are praying now, but they have been singing." And is that a crime?" enquired the General. "The articles of war order punishment for any unusual noise," said the officer. God forbid," exclaimed the hero, that praying should be an unusual noise in my camp."

Canada Thistle.—Wm. Chapman, of this city, writes in the Cultivator, that—

"If farmers will cut up the Canada Thistle, one and a half inches below the surface of the ground, and pull them up with the left hand as they cut them, in the full and old of the moon in May, June, July, Aug. and September, they certainly will destroy them; they may miss some in going over the ground the first, second or even the third time, but be sure to look over your ground every full and old moon till you know you have destroyed the whole. I have destroyed more than 50,000 the last two years, and now there is not one growing on the ground I have been cutting them from."

Beat it, Any Body.—One Jacob Earl, somewhere in Illinois, has recently built a frame house one and a half stories high, sixteen feet by twenty-four, has weather-boarded it, covered the roof, and ceiled all the lower story with boards; the whole, even the pins, from one oak tree! So says the Vandalia Free Press.

POLITICS.—"I say, Sam, wha's all dat are muss Mr. Adams are makin'?"

"Why, Cucumbershins, I tell you. If a child cry for de moon de fader haint no right to gin it to him, cause he can't. At de same time he no right to tell de child he won't hear it cry, 'cause dat would be interferin' wid de right ob petition."

"Dat ere's de ground, is it? Well, I guess dey can't drive old Boss Adams off ob it. Now, Bill, wha'ts dis physical agent?"

"De agent for selling Moffatt's Pills. Why don't you read de papers, nigaar?"

INTemperance.—Let woman beware of the intemperate. Let her shun their presence as the accursed of heaven; the smitten with that moral leprosy which is alike immedicable and unescapable. Let her remember that in uniting her destiny with that of a drunkard, she is drawing down upon her head the heaviest of curses. It were better to embrace the sepulchre, whose cold walls are haunted only by the spectre of decay. It is the wedlock of beauty and pollution; of purity and pestilence; the binding of the breathing form of life to the loathsomeness of death.

THE WAY TO DO IT.—A barkeeper in New Orleans sat paring his nails, and by some accident cut his finger. A disposition for fun, more beastly and practical than pleasant, induced him to plaster the face of an insensible drunken man with the scarlet fluid. Farther in pursuance of said fur he fired a pistol, and shouted suicide. In rushed a crowd, and a post mortem examination was only prevented by the dead man calling for a drink. The way the laugh and liquor went round was not slow, the Picayune says.

MEMORIES OF GIBRALTAR.

'I had a friend,' replied Sophia, somewhat mournfully, 'who was its victim, and I had the misfortune to be introduced into society when I ought to have been working tent-stitch in the nursery. But pray let us waive these gloomy topics—only take my advice, marry a husband for whom you feel a comfortable indifference, and let the little petted archie go to Jericho! You will be happier without than with him, depend upon it.'

'If your code be true, it is well worth consideration,' said Patrisinia.

'Still,' replied Sophia archly, 'I fancy that yonder Irish hero, who watches us so impatiently, will contrive to efface every word of my lecture before the end of the hour. But remember, men are sad deceivers! That is the first lesson that meets our ears, but it is the last that we will condescend to learn by heart. Our self-love prompts us to believe that we have a right of exemption from the misfortunes that befall the rest of the world, and we constantly expect that a miracle will be wrought for our particular advantage.—But here comes my liege lord, and smiling as though he were still a lover.'

'I could not endure my husband to be less than a lover,' said Patrisinia.

'National prejudices,' whispered Sophia, as the gentlemen advanced. 'Your countrymen are equally ready to serenade a mistress or stiletto a rival: now mine are, nine times out of ten, either mere humdrums, who care nothing about the matter, or else fashionable gallants who pique themselves upon a wife's beauty as they would upon that of their horse, and are equally flattered by the commendation of either.'

'Permit me to present Don Pedro Valdigo, governor of Seville, to the fair English woman whose charms he pronounces to be irresistible,' said the colonel; 'I have promised to use my influence for the next set.' Sophia curtsied assent, whilst her eyes sank abashed before the ardent gaze that was rivetted upon her.—The colonel contemplated her blushing face with a self-satisfied air, and, erecting his figure to about five feet nothing for a grand climax, turned to his companion—'Don Pedro, I have great pleasure in introducing you to Mrs. Macgregor!'

The Spaniard started, a flush crossed his cheek, a sudden frown shaded his brow, and, looking rapidly from one to the other, he nearly dropped the hand that had been placed in his own.

The colonel had produced an effect, but the pleasure of the jest was entirely confined to himself.

Don Pedro that day had arrived at Ceuta on a visit to the government house, and having been greatly excited by the gubernatorial praises of the beautiful Englishwoman, his first object on entering the ball-room was to secure an introduction. Accident led him into conversation with Macgregor, and, little suspecting that he was speaking with the husband of the lady, he poured forth his admiration, by which the colonel's vanity was so flattered, that he did not hesitate to carry on the jest until the moment of introduction.

There is in woman intuitive perception, which distinguishes at a glance the nature of the sentiment which she inspires, and it is only when her own heart becomes attached that love binds his fillet over the eyes of her discernment; so, though her husband failed to discover more than ordinary gallantry in the avowals of Don Pedro, she, more learned, shrank before the lustrous look that rested so passionately upon her.

Soon recovering from his momentary confusion, the Spaniard uttered a hasty apology to the colonel for the freedom of his remarks, and then led his partner to the ball-room; neither, however, attempted for some moments to break a silence more dangerous than speech. Sophia felt it to be impossible; Don Pedro, perhaps for the first time in his life, found it difficult, and, when he did speak, his voice trembled.

'Will Mrs. Macgregor condescend to pardon an involuntary error?'

'I were indeed to blame,' said Sophia, endeavoring to rally, 'to deem that offensive which is intended to compliment.'

'It were as impossible to compliment you, donna, as it were unwise to betray the sentiment which you inspire.'

'Cease to tax your gallantry,' replied Sophia, resuming her usual playful manner, 'for I promise you that I shall not accord any attention, until you find some other theme for conversation.'

They now joined the dancers, and Sophia found ample occupation in dispensing smiles and brief words among her new acquaintances, but ever as she turned to her partner, the expression of his look became too eloquent to be misunderstood. She was fond of conquest, but it was the conquest, of the hour, not the wreck of the heart's peace, that she delighted in, and the tale she now read was one that gave her sorrow.

Suddenly the dance ceased, a rumor rose, and then came a sad account of poor Doctor Smith;—he who but the previous evening had landed with us so full of activity and health, and who had been so conspicuously welcomed by Mrs. St. Clair, had fallen while preparing for the ball, and was soon after found dead.—On receiving the intelligence, Mrs. St. Clair had retired into an adjoining room, whither Sophia's considerate partner hastily conducted her, on perceiving the deadly paleness that overspread her countenance on being made acquainted with the lamentable catastrophe. They there found Mrs. St. Clair affectingly leaning on the shoulder of Colonel Macgregor, receiving the condolence of a group of her special favorites; and when Sophia advanced towards her, she exclaimed in a stentorian tone, 'So! Mrs. Macgregor, half dead I see! Is it not shocking? Horrible! frightful. Are they dancing in the next room? My ball will be completely spoiled!—a total failure! Did you ever know such a barbarism? I'll never forgive him!—never! Don't dance with him, Mrs. Macgregor—pray don't.'

'With whom, madam?' asked Sophia, completely mystified.

'With that wild man of the woods, Herbert. Was I not in the most charming spirits imaginable, when, like a raven, he came croaking his tale of death into my ears, and put all to flight. Every one knows my regard for poor dear Doctor Smith; but what service could I render him to destroy my cheerfulness by telling me of his death? I could not bring him to life again—and why spoil my ball?'

A change came over Sophia's spirit; she felt sick almost to fainting. 'And such,' thought she, 'is the world's attachment—that world for which I have sacrificed myself!'

'Come,' said Mrs. St. Clair; 'Don Pedro will take care of Mrs. Macgregor; do you, gentlemen, assist me in restoring the gaiety of my guests.'

'With your permission,' said Sophia. 'I will remain here for the present; the colonel will, I dare say, give me his company.'

'Impossible, my dear Sophia!' replied the colonel, curvetting after the general's lady; 'I am engaged, and would not on any account interfere with the duties of your partner; and with a smirk, and a nod to the don, he left the room.'

Sophia looked after him in momentary vexation; her companion stood with folded arms attentively regarding her, and, on perceiving a smile re-appear, he seated himself near her.

'And so, donna, your husband permits me the privilege, you would have ungenerously refused.'

'Which entitles you to my hand for another dance. Yet I must beg you to release me from the engagement. Seek another partner,' said Sophia, purposely misunderstanding him.

'The charms of your conversation exceed the pleasures of the dance, and should not be denied me, since sanctioned by the colonel, by whose decree I remain your shadow.'

'Methinks my own consent might be consulted,' said Sophia.

'That were a boon indeed,—say that you accord it, donna, and I will endeavor to deserve it. Show me but the way—nay,' he added, changing his earnest into a lighter tone, 'I will not be denied, and on this I swear allegiance, so I may be admitted your faithful cavalier.' As he spoke, his hand touched hers, which rested on a chair; but finding that she proudly withdrew it, he caught from her grasp the bouquet it enclosed, and pressed it to his lips, adding, 'this at least, I will forever preserve, as a remembrance of this moment's happiness.'

'See,' remarked Sophia, the roses fade, fit emblem of the vow they bear.'

'Donna, you do not think so,' said the Spaniard seriously.

Predetermined as Don Pedro appeared to be to monopolize the society of my friend, she had found means to escape him, and we were whisperingly conferring together when Macgregor, passing us hastily, as the company were bustling towards the supper room, found himself suddenly arrested.

'Upon my word, colonel,' said Sophia, 'I am greatly obliged for your generous carte blanche respecting the attentions and adulations of others, but I think it were as well if you exhibit some portion of your conspicuous gallantry towards your wife.'

'Sophy jealous?' asked the surprised husband.

'Of your honor sir,' replied Sophia, which it appears is guarded by my rectitude than by your vigilance.'

'I trust, madam,' gravely said the colonel, 'that there is no danger of your falling into the very vulgar notion of attaching importance to every common place compliment that is paid to your attractions. I should be deeply mortified indeed to find that you had enrolled yourself amongst those violently virtuous ladies who pass their lives in Quixotising against imaginary assailants.'

'The breath of flattery,' proudly retorted his wife, 'passes as idly into my ear as it does from your lips.'

'If so,' returned he, 'there is no need for my exposing myself to the risk of being lampooned as a jealous husband by dancing attendance, upon my own wife.'

'Colonel,' said Sophia impressively, 'let no such trifling fears expose that which you ought to value to real danger; be assured that I am not wholly heartless, and if among the idle crowd one tone of genuine tenderness should be breathed, perchance it might awaken a responsive chord in my bosom; then blame yourself if you are not ready to win me back to duty.'

Macgregor viewed himself in the mirror, and laughed incredulously, bade her secure her conquests, and assuring her that he should only consider them as so many proofs of his good taste and fortune, passed on.

Sophia sighed as he left her, but colored deeply when she perceived that Don Pedro was by her side, and must have heard their conversation. She felt that she had unequivocally betrayed her fear of his acquiring an undue influence, and, if feared, why? A secret monitor within responded to the question. The Spaniard had been dull indeed if not conscious of his advantage; he took her hand without a word, and led her to the supper room.

Not even a look was exchanged between them, yet each felt that the conventions of society were broken down, and that the occult mysteries of their hearts were revealed. Before the party separated, however, Don Pedro's new-born affection had to struggle with one terrible apprehension, which was awakened by overhearing a whispered request from Captain Westron for a private conference, followed by a quick appointment to escort her to the beach the following day, whither she was to accompany a party to gather shells. The national suspicion of the Spaniard was on the alert. Had his self-love deceived him? Was Westron, after all, the hero of her alarms?—and he could not help hazarding to her the remark that the captain was a happy man.

'I believe he is about to confide to my friendship a secret that he deems of some importance,' said Sophia; 'and I promise you that I shall not betray my trust.'

Don Pedro scrutinized her countenance doubtfully—it was guileless as a child's, and when she smiled adieu, he retired from her presence, convinced that the world held not another being so worthy of his homage. Alas! he forgot the sacred decree that forbade the offering.

And now for the secret, the great important secret, said Sophia to Captain Westron, as, true to her appointment, she stepped upon the battery from which they were to descend to the beach. 'There are no listeners here to tell tales, so don't keep me in suspense.'

'Well then, madame,' said Westron, coloring, 'in one word, I am in love.'

'Lud a mercy! is that all? I'll wager a pair of gloves that every man in the garrison between the ages of sixteen and sixty will plead guilty to the same misdemeanour. For pity's sake, don't call that a secret.'

'Pray don't laugh, madam; mine is a more serious case than you imagine,' pleaded Westron.

'Promise me a little adventure, and I'll listen to your confession with the gravity of a judge and the secrecy of a duenna; for I am certain that with the aid of those iron-barred birdcages yonder, we shall be able to concoct as pretty a little romance as ever provoked the appetite of the novel-loving public.'

'Those iron bars are the devil,' ejaculated Westron.

'So, so, my friend, it is as I suspected; an elopement, in which, while I enact the confidante, Patrisinia Villi is to perform the heroine.'

'Exactly; but how, my dear Mrs. Macgregor, could you have discovered what has never been confided to any one?'

'There's an old adage about lookers on seeing more of the game than those who play. That is my case. But, sincerely, where exists your difficulty?'

'Her uncle, by whom she has been educated, is a priest, and rejects me, partly because of my religion and partly because, since childhood, she has been betrothed to a man of superior rank and fortune.'

'In that case,' said Sophia, 'you may depend upon my best assistance.'

'A thousand thanks,' replied her companion; 'you have conferred on me an inestimable obligation. By your assistance I trust we shall be able to escape to Gibraltar; once there and our union completed, the governor will protect my wife. But were we to be discovered prior to that event, Patrisinia would be consigned to a convent, or to a fate she yet more dreads, a marriage with Don Pedro, the governor of Seville.'

'With Don Pedro?' exclaimed Sophia, greatly startled.

'The same.'

'You have a most dangerous rival,' she continued thoughtfully.

'I place every confidence in Patrisinia's affections.'

'And how will Don Pedro endure this interruption to his wooing?'

'What his feelings on the subject may be, it is not my province to inquire; they are not, however, supposed to be very violent.'

'I hope not; for I must confess that it would deeply grieve me were I in any way instrumental to his unhappiness,' said Sophia, as she prepared to follow her conductor, who had descended a few steps to seek a safe pathway down the rocks, when a voice from behind pronounced the single word 'Remember.' It was Don Pedro, who putting his finger to his lip to intimate the necessity of silence, disappeared, leaving on Sophia's mind the disagreeable conviction that he participated their secret; a participation which might be equally fatal to the lovers, if imparted or concealed. Trusting, therefore, solely to future circumstances to direct her in the difficult part she had undertaken, and endeavoring to banish every appearance of embarrassment, lest the captain should construe it into an indication of a repented promise, she quickened her steps, and soon joined the shell-seekers who had already assembled, but whose eager acquisition of marine treasures left them time to comment upon the new comers.

In a round of gaiety several days elapsed without any plan being arranged for the flight of the lovers, and as every day brought some new proof of the Spaniard's devotion to my friend, she found her position increasingly delicate. In this emergency she determined to confide the fact of Don Pedro's acquaintance with their project to Patrisinia herself; leaving her to determine how his interference with their plot could be most easily prevented. Accordingly, taking advantage of an evening when the gentlemen were all engaged at a grand mess dinner, we sallied forth to visit our young Spanish friend; and when we were turning from the court-yard into the gallery leading to the signoretta's apartments, a tall man closely enveloped in his cloak, and wearing his sombrero deeply slouched over his brows brushed quickly past us. We should have scarcely noticed so common a circumstance, but for the sudden stop and deep reverence which he made, upon recognizing the persons whom he had so unceremoniously encountered. That action, notwithstanding his mysterious muffling, betrayed the graceful Don Pedro, and accordingly we found Patrisinia in a most pitiable state of agitation; the quondam lover having just formally released her from her engagement, with a stern recommendation to correct her views respecting Captain Westron, whose intentions, he warned her in time, were not likely to be effected, and whose failure might consign her to a fate even more unfortunate than that of becoming his wife.—With this cold sarcasm on his lips he departed, leaving his astonished hearer a prey to the bitter apprehensions, which were destined to be still more heightened by the communication of my friend.

Throwing herself upon Sophia's bosom, she conjured her so pitiously personally to plead her cause with the Don, and seemed so completely helpless, and dependent upon the good offices which she invoked, that my friend was compelled, 'contrary to her better judgment,' to accede to the task of securing his Excellency's silence. To this promise she was the rather urged, since it was impossible for her to confide to any one except myself the true cause of her wishing to evade using her influence with Don Pedro.

Patrisinia was, however, so deeply impressed with the irresistible power of Sophia's eloquence, that having secured her promise, she passed from a state of absolute abandon to one of perfect elation, which good office being accomplished, we set out on our return home, where we were surprised to find a group of officers, 'all more or less elevated,' busily engaged in removing from a sort of bier an apparently lifeless body; we stopped and gazed at the group with consternation, and as the body was raised by the soldiers, we heard one exclaim, 'Fairly done up, by Jupiter!' 'Settled at last,' responded another; and then the military cap of the insensible falling to the ground, we recognized the features of Colonel Macgregor.

'O my husband! he is dead! he is murdered!' shrieked Sophia, darting wildly forward, and would have fallen to the earth, but rapid as light, a man sprang from the shadow of the archway, and caught her in his arms—it was Don Pedro!

The boisterous party stared in stupid astonishment but, before they could recover themselves, he had borne her up stairs to the apartment where sat Mrs. St. Clair and Mrs. Douglas at cribbage. 'Guid guide us, what's the matter wi' the puir thing?' exclaimed Mrs. Douglas, starting from her chair, whilst Don Pedro laid his burden on the sofa.

'What may be the meaning of this scene?' inquired Mrs. St. Clair, who, for some reason best known to herself, had latterly exhibited considerable rancor towards Sophia. The Spaniard was too much absorbed to hear her. May I beg the favor of a reply? I am not accustomed to incivility, especially in my own house; pursued Mrs. St. Clair, highly piqued.

He looked vacantly round, then in a tone that betrayed irrepressible agitation, answered, that 'he believed Colonel Macgregor was dead, or drunk,' he added in a low contemptuous whisper.

Mrs. St. Clair shrugged her shoulders and left the room as it to satisfy her curiosity; Mrs. Douglas ran for a restorative, whilst I was busily engaged in using the best means I could think of to restore the sense of my friend. Don Pedro pressed her cold hands passionately to his lips, and reposed her languid head upon his shoulder. She breathed, but so faintly that it could not have stirred the down of the thistle; twice he bent down as if to steal that soft breath from her lips, but each time drew back, as though respect forbade the freedom that love dictated; but as the current of life began to flow through her frame, his heart beat more wildly, and straining her fondly to his breast, he rivetted his eyes upon her countenance, and whispered in her scarcely conscious ears vows of imperishable devotion.

Approaching footsteps and loud voices on the stairs at last recalled him to recollection; and the next instant Mrs. Douglas entered with a whole cargo of smelling-bottles. 'The ne'er-do-weel chieft,' she exclaimed 'have made the colonel beauty fu', and put him to bed. But Mistress St. Clair has rated them soundly, the whole of them and sent off except Captain Westron, who won't leave the house until Mistress Macgregor forgives him; its nae use arguing wi' a tipsy mon, sae here he comes.'

At this moment Sophia slowly opened her eyes, and glancing wild around, screamed, 'He is murdered—I saw him; O how horrible!'

'Na, na! there's nae harm done!' said Mrs. Douglas, soothingly.

'It is a judgment,' murmured Sophia, some indistinct ideas floating through her brain.

'He'll be weel enough in the morning! urged Mrs. Douglas.

'He is dead! dead, madam; O horror! and I—' a smothered groan filled up the sentence.

'Be calm; be comforted, donna,' whispered Don Pedro, in a low sad tone; 'your happy husband is well.'

Sophia started; his voice recalled to her memory the vows which he had made when she was scarcely conscious; their import flashed across her mind, and fixing on him a piteous look, she hid her face in my bosom.

'I am astonished,' rebuked Mrs. St. Clair, upon her return, 'that you can be so absurd; a night's rest and soda-water will enable the colonel in the morning to appreciate his wife's overweening sensibility.'

Sophia was humbled and admonished by the crowd of feelings new and overwhelming that struggled in her bosom. 'Pardon me, madam,' she said, 'if I have not learnt to witness for the first time such human degradation unmoved. Blame me not; I shall doubtless grow perfect in my worldly lesson all too soon.'

'Ha, puir thing,' sympathized Mrs. Douglas; 'ye hae a great deal to learn yet.'

'Indeed, indeed, madam, I fear that I have,' she replied; suddenly burst into tears, and hurried from the room.

Terrified and vexed, Sophia paced her chamber, pausing to catch the faintest sound that might proceed from the lips of the drunkard. His ashy face, cold hands, and the death-like stillness that pervaded every limb, was so appalling, that it required the utmost exertion of her reason to assure her that he still lived. Sometimes she sought his pulse—it was oppressed and languid; then she bent over to ascertain that he yet breathed, but the fumes arising from his blackened lips disgusted her, and she threw open the casement to relieve the suffocating sensation that was stealing over her frame. Painfully waned the hours, unvaried except by the groans of the sleeper, who, as time went on, began to struggle with the sickness that succeeded insensibility. Still Sophia attempted not retire;—memories of the past, and anticipations of the future, crowded on her mind. She thought how bright the world's glories had appeared to her, how perfect she had believed the happiness of those who flitted amidst splendor and gaiety; she had attended the advantages once believed so valuable—and was she happy!—no! She remembered the joyous buoyancy of her unmarried life, and wondered whither had fled the contentment of her youth.

Macgregor was not a person to love or to be beloved; but she had ever laughed at the passion, and thought herself insensible to its power. He was not unkind, nay, he was considered a most indulgent husband, for he was always ready to escort her into public, and, on retiring, never failed to conduct her to her carriage. Was not that marvellous attention.—He neither circumscribed her expenses nor amusements, and what more could a reasonable woman desire? But Sophia, I suppose, was not reasonable, for, with all this, she felt that she was not happy.

Whilst absorbed in unenviable reflections, the notes of a guitar stole gently on the silence of the night. It sounded close under the balcony. She extinguished her lamp, lest its light should betray her to the musician, and it required not the throbbing of her heart to inform her that the stanzas, which gushed upon her ear, were breathed from the lips of the too fascinating Spaniard:—

She listened with eager interest to his rich mellow voice, utterly unconscious of the running bass accompaniment of Macgregor's nose. Breathless she pressed her hands upon her bosom, and tried to still its wild pulsation, whilst tears strayed unheeded down her cheeks. Involuntarily she stretched forth her arms, unconscious that she stood alone. She had forgotten the world—all! but when the last tone of the music had died away, and all was again silent, a sob, a heart-rending sob spoke the reaction of memory, and, shuddering, she sank upon her knees. Her clasped hands were raised to heaven, though she ventured not to lift her eyes from the earth—a prayer trembled upon her lip. The veil was rent from her struggling heart, and she felt herself a wretch, for it was now too plain that she, a wife, had dared to love, idolatrously to love a stranger.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, August 21, 1841.

TO SUBSCRIBERS AND AGENTS.

The next No. will complete the 2nd Vol. of the Register; and we hope that those subscribers designing to discontinue the paper, will promptly inform the agent residing in their neighborhood. Where there is no Agent, information given to the postmaster of such wish, will be communicated to us by him free from any charge. It is desirable, that those gentlemen assisting us as agents, will communicate with us, as soon as possible after the commencement of the next Volume. This is rendered necessary, in order to make provision for the extent of the edition to be printed, to provide for back Numbers. We intend to make several improvements in the appearance of the next Volume, and we solicit a continuance of the kind offices of our Agents, through whose exertions, the Masonic Register must mainly, be indebted for its support.

THE MASONIC FESTIVAL.—Our Masonic friends will perceive by the Programme, published on our first page, that the brethren of New-York, are intending to make the festival worthy of the occasion, which calls it forth. We hope we shall have the pleasure of extending the "right hand of fellowship" to many of our Southern friends to whom a little northern air, would be very grateful "about these days."

A FEMALE HUMBUG.—The Rochester Daily Advertiser, has an amusing piece of rascality practised on an "estimable young man," of that city, by a lady with blue eyes, brown hair, somewhat inclined to grey, and of the tender age of about 35. This young lady, it would appear had so wrought upon the feelings of this "estimable young man," by representing herself to be the widow of a rich gentleman, whom she had buried in Toronto, and heirless to certain other "moveables," that were continually falling to her by the deaths of her accommodating relatives, that the heart of the "estimable young man," was completely overcome. So after a six days' intimacy, the question was popped, settlements were drawn, very much in favor of the lover, and they were married much to the satisfaction of the lady as well as the friends of the husband. For six days of the honey-moon the happy pair, did nothing but ride from one store to another, selecting the choicest and best. But on the afternoon of the 6th day, the lady obtained permission from her lord to transact a little private business for an hour or two. Who could refuse a charming wife any thing during the honey-moon! So the "estimable young man" thought: and we are sorry to say, that this estimable lady so far abused her privilege, that her whereabouts cannot be distinctly ascertained, up to this time. The Advertiser, in conclusion says, "Mr. John Jones of Hunter street has a wife that he cannot get rid of; he is saddled with the most extravagant debts of her contracting; he and his friends find themselves stripped of all the ready cash they had. And last of all, and not least, and perhaps not undeserving, "mine host," where she stopped, unknown to any one, lent her about fifty dollars, which remains unpaid, together with a round tavern bill. The woman turns out to be utterly worthless and abandoned. The representation she has made, that she has money deposited in the bank of Rochester was entirely false, and the climax of her husband's disappointment was capped, when he presented a check for $1800, drawn by her, and found she never had any funds there whatever."

We feel sorry for this victim of an artful adventurer: although we must confess our sympathies would have been more active, were there not so much to censure on the part of the dupe to this transaction. Had the lady been "fat and forty," with all the attractions and virtues which belong to her sex, she might have wasted "her sweetness on the desert air." But rolling in anticipated wealth, the disparity in years—in dispositions, in every other thing, which render marriage rational, is lost sight of, and the victim only awakens from his golden dream, a martyr to his own cupidity.

DOMESTIC DUTIES.—They have a large Female Seminary near the banks of the Connecticut in Massachusetts, where they not only cultivate the minds of the pupils, but also teach them various domestic duties. In rotation, they all scrub, wash, bake, fry, and do every species of house-work. The minds of these young women are said to be invigorated by their physical efforts, and consequently as fast as they graduate from the institution, they are taken out of the market. The supply is not equal to the demand of this sort of Wives.—Daily Adv.

If some of the Female Seminaries in our own neighborhood, would pay more attention to making their pupils good "Wives," instead of instructing them, in those tinsel, popinjay accomplishments, which totally unfit them for the sphere of life they are to move in, it would be much better for society, we fancy, in the long run. To Girls expecting to inherit fortunes (which by the by, were made as much by the domestic economy, industry, and housewife knowledge of their mothers, as fathers,) it is of no material consequence; but to those who are to be the wives of the mechanic or tradesman, dependant on his industry and exertion, something more should be expected from them, than the gew-gaw instruction, which will avail them nothing in after-life, except to add to the embarrassments of some worthy husband. In this country property is only made (legitimately) by the untiring industry of the male, aided by the frugality of the equally instructed housewife. Do our girls learn any of these necessary qualifications at many of our fashionable seminaries? Parents are often more to blame than the children, in the manner in which they are educated. Instead of exercising common sense, in fitting the child for the station she is to move in through life, her domestic instruction is totally neglected,—she passes through some fashionable female seminary, acquiring at best but a superficial knowledge of that, which is in nine cases out of ten of no permanent benefit, and which is generally at the expense of the good wife and mother. This system of education brings other evils in its train. It infuses notions in the mind, that are at war with the sober realities of life. Perhaps our views are too old fashioned. But let any middle aged man sit and reflect on the marriages of the last fifteen years. Let him look about him and count up the ill-assorted wedlock of parties, who commenced "establishments" beyond their means, and who are now partaking of the brown bread of adversity to the very crust. In several of the cases we have noticed, we have personal knowledge, and we charge it to a fatal error in the mode of education. We admire young ladies, but we believe the God of nature did not intend the mass of them to talk French, thrum pianos, or pass half of their evenings in an opera-box. Woman, "heaven's best gift to man" was designed by her Creator as his "helpmate," the participant in his cares and toils, as well as the partner and partaker of his prosperity.--- When she incapacitates herself for this duty, she either becomes the plaything of an hour, or a grievous burthen to the man of her choice.

MISS ROGERS.—Nothing new, has been brought to light, connected with the murder of this unfortunate young lady. By the last advices, a man by the name of Morse had been arrested, who had left the city, under singular circumstances, the day after the murder. Among the thousand rumors and stories of the day, it is said that Morse was seen in her company on the day of her disappearance. Morse is a married man, and the probabilities are stronger for than against him. It is very strange that the authorities do not offer a suitable reward, for the discovery of the perpetrator. The Mayor of New York, and the Gov. of the State, are both behind their duty in this respect.

MORMONS.—Large numbers of Mormons are now on their way to the settlement in Hancock county, Illinois. A large number from Europe recently arrived there, and more are expected. The settlement is said to contain from 10 to 15,000 inhabitants.

MUSEUM.—The Misses Randolph, whose admirable personations were the subject of much commendation here, last winter, have been engaged at the Museum for a short time. The lecture-room of this establishment is admirably adapted to while away an hour or two, agreeably as well as profitably. Mr. Randall has every thing fitted up in fine style.

FIRE.—A fire broke out between 9 and 10 o'clock on Monday night, in one of the barns belonging to the Alms house premises, which destroyed that and other out-buildings, and a quantity of wood. The loss is supposed to be about $4000. It is supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

TOO HOT BY HALF.—They have had such intense hot weather in New Orleans, that, the Crescent City says, the people there, have been compelled to draw their breath with cork-screws.

The Sunday Mercury noted for its witty paragraphs, jokes, Patent Sermons and every thing interesting and amusing, let off this:

"Pa, are there any liars among Christians?"
"Not among true Christians, my son. Why do ask?"
"'Cause I heard uncle John say something about the 'Christian Lyre,' that they had in his church."

THE WILLIAM BROWN.—Notwithstanding all the explanations given by those interested to keep the truth out of sight,—there is yet much to come to light, in relation to the barbarous and inhuman treatment to a portion of the passengers of this ill-fated vessel. Sarah Corr, and Bridget M'Kee, have, by affidavit had Alexander William Holmes one of those concerned, arrested and committed on a charge of murder on the high seas. Sarah Corr, in her examination says:—

"I saw the black man, Henry Murray, the cook, catch hold of Frank Askin; I heard Frank Askin calling to a Scotch woman to speak to them to spare his life; he said he had five sovereigns, and he would give it to them if they would spare his life until morning; he was thrown overboard. The persons who threw him overboard were Henry Murray and Alexander William Holmes. Frank Askin's sister said if they threw him overboard, to throw her also. They threw over 16 of the passengers, including the two sisters of Askin. I heard my cousin Charles Coulson, go forward and say to Holmes—"Holmes, dear, I'll not have to go over." Holmes said, "Charley, you must go." Then a girl of sixteen cried out to spare him, for he was the last of a family of fifteen that had gone down in the vessel. I heard then the plunge of him in the water. It was Holmes who helped to throw him over."

Intelligence.

Melancholy.—A sad accident happened yesterday at the printing office of Mr. Trow, No. 114 Nassau street. An apprentice in the office, by the name of John C. Carson, seventeen years of age, was in the fifth story and attempted to run down through the scuttles upon the large rope by which goods are hoisted; unfortunately the rope was entirely unwound. His weight drew out the staple by which the end was fastened, and he fell to the lower floor upon his head, and crushed his skull in a shocking manner. He was a lad of intelligence and smartness, and well known and esteemed in the Sabbath School of the Brainard church in Rivington street, where he had been a regular attendant four or five years. He was taken to the City Hospital, where he expired after a few hours of unconscious suffering. Two years ago the same lad fell three stories through the scuttles and broke some of his bones; but from this he recovered under the faithful care of the same hospital to which he was yesterday carried to die. He is a brother to Mr. Thomas Carson, a clerk in the office of the Com. Adv.—Jour. of Commerce.

From Florida, the news continues to be encouraging. Small parties of Indians were continuing to come into Tampa daily; and strong assurances have been received that Sam Jones will come in soon. Expectations are also entertained that a portion of Halleck Tustenuggee's having become disaffected, will also come in. The whole of Wild Cat's band, it is believed, are, with their chief, on a vessel in the Bay, well guarded. Col. Worth is still pursuing the rigorous and summary policy which made him so successful in the gathering in of Wild Cat and his band; and he will give the Indians no rest till they all surrender.—N. Y. Sun.

Charles J. Lynde and Watts Lynde, lost in the destruction of the Erie, were sons of Hon. Tilly Lynde, of Homer, Cortland County, who many years ago represented the 6th Senatorial District in our State Legislature. They resided at Chicago, and had just visited their parents at Homer. We have these facts from Dr. Lilley, of Churchville, who was well acquainted with them, and travelled in their company only three days before their melancholy death. The wife of one of the young gentlemen, a very intelligent lady, was the only female saved from the ruins. It is said she evinced as much coolness and intrepidity as any one on board. Her presence of mind never forsook her for a moment.

We have been informed that Gen. Hamilton has removed all difficulties in the way of the sale of the loan bonds in Paris. The Subscription-books were to have been opened on the 5th June, under the sanction of the Government of France. The money will positively be available here by the meeting of Congress. The above information may be regarded as official.—Austin, (Tex.) Gazette.

Imprisonment of an American Consul.—Capt. Merriam, of the bark Iris, at this port, from Matanzas, gives information that Mr. Cross, the American consul at that port, had been incarcerated in prison, by order of the Governor General of Cuba. The cause is not stated, but whatever it may be, it is a bold move and one which cannot be passed over by our government without notice. We are informed by a gentleman, long a resident at Matanzas, that Mr. C. was remarkable for his mild and amiable disposition, and most unlikely to give offence to the authorities of the island. A former consul at that port (late Mr. Shoemaker) also met the same indignity in the early part of Gen. Jackson's administration, which was promptly taken in hand by him, and brought before the notice of the Spanish Government through its Minister at Washington, and resulted in a proper satisfaction rendered in the case. We take it for granted that what is necessary to be done in the present instance will be done well and publicly.—U. S. Gaz.

Unfortunate.—The National Intelligencer states, that a little boy named Collinson, residing in that city, lost an eye a short time ago under the following painful circumstances. He was amusing himself with looking at some boys who were playing near his father's house with bows and arrows. One of the boys shot an arrow, topped with iron, which pierced the eye of the little fellow, and totally destroyed it.

Suspended Free Banks.—We are requested to state that the bills of the suspended free banking associations cannot be redeemed, nor a dividend declared, until the stocks which have been left by the Comptroller in the hands of the President of the Merchant's Bank, N. Y., for sale, shall have been disposed of. Notice will be immediately given when a dividend is declared.—Eve. Jour.

Arrival of Missionaries.—Rev. J. Tracy and wife and Miss Brown, of the American Mission at Singapore, arrived at Philadelphia in the ship Washington on Sunday last. Two sons of the Rev. Dr. Scudder of Madras, came out under their care. The return of these missionaries was rendered necessary by the failure of health.

Murder at Crown-Point!—A man by the name of Winch, a revolutionary pensioner, was committed to jail in this county last Thursday, on a charge of murder, committed on a lad about fourteen years of age. The parties lived in Buck's neighborhood in Crown Point. The facts as we have learned them are, that the old man came up behind the boy in the morning, while milking, and struck him on the back of the head with a club, which knocked the boy down, when he exclaimed, "Oh! uncle Jed, you have killed me!" The old man followed up his blows till he had beat his head to a jelly. He manifests no penitence for the act and assigns as a reason for his conduct, that this boy or some other one, had thrown chips at him!

Profits of Agriculture.—Five thousand dollars' worth of green corn has been brought to this city already, this season, from Burlington co., N. J. Large quantities of vegetables are also sent to Philadelphia from that fertile country. A single farmer near Burlington last week received, in the Philadelphia market, near $700 for his week's marketing. This is better than working a gold mine, or speculating in morus multicaulis or fancy stocks, or politics.

Savannah, it is stated, will probably be the Southern depot of the steam packet which are to run between England and the West Indies, touching our coast. Charleston was first spoken of as the place, but the bar in the harbor appears to be an objection.

Married.

On Thursday evening, by the Rev. Mr. Rawson, Mr. David Fenner to Miss Elizabeth Walker all of this city.

On the 17th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Schneller, pastor of St. Mary's church, Mr. Daniel Gough, to Miss Margaret Doyle, all of this city.

At Canandaigua, on Wednesday, August, 11th, by the Rev. Mr. Thompson, Anthony Blanchford of this city, to Jane Ann, daughter of the late Bradley Martin of Avon.

At Syracuse, on Tuesday last, by the Rev. Dr. J. W. Adams, Gen. R. Lawrence, of Syracuse, to Miss Eureka Spafford of this city.

DIED.

In this city yesterday, Anna, daughter of William H. Russell of New York.

In this city, yesterday afternoon, Adaline infant child of James Gibson, aged 7 months.

On the 13th inst., Mrs. Cathlina Van Benthusen, aged 79 years.

Yesterday, 15th inst Mrs Martha Bromley, wife of Robert Bromley, aged 65 years.

At Baltimore (Md.) on the 11th inst., Abigail, relict of the late Matthew M. Cole, of Washington City.

NEW ENGLAND TAVERN REMOVED

THE Subscriber respectfully informs his friends, customers and the travelling public generally, that he has removed from his old stand, nine doors below, on the same side of the street, to the large and commodious house, heretofore known as the National Hotel, No. 159 Market street, and for a number of years past occupied by Mrs. Crosby as a Boarding House. His reasons for removing are, that he can better accommodate his customers, and more of them, without any additional expense on their part. The house is four stories high, with a proportionate depth. It is divided into a large number of rooms, admirably calculated for families. Men of business, or persons travelling for pleasure, travellers by rail-road, steamboat or stage, will find the New England well adapted to their accommodation; being within five or ten minutes walk of the rail road, and within sixty or seventy rods of three steamboat landings. Breakfast will always be prepared every morning during the season of navigation, at 6 o'clock, for those wishing it, and intending to take the 7 o'clock morning boat for New York. Also, one at 7 o'clock. An excellent stable is also attached to the house, and every convenience for those travelling with their teams &c. The subscriber embraces the present opportunity to return his sincere thanks to those who have so liberally patronized him at his old stand, and requests a continuance of their favors at the new one. His old customers and the public generally are respectfully invited to give him a call, and he pledges himself to do all in his power to make their stay while at his house both pleasant and agreeable. His terms will be as they have always been, viz. single meals 25 cents lodging 12-15 cents. jcl9-ly A. W. STARKS

Peoples' Line Steamboats.

The boats of the Peoples' Line being now all in complete order, will continue to run between Albany and New-York, until further notice as follows:

The ROCHESTER, Capt. St. John, and SOUTH AMERICA, Capt. Branard, will form a daily Night Line, one of them leaving the foot of Hamilton street every evening (except Sundays) at 7 o'clock, through without landing.

HALF DAILY NIGHT LINE, at 5 o'clock.

The NORTH AMERICA, Capt. Truesdell, will run a Half Daily Night Line, leaving the foot of State street, every other evening at 5 o'clock, making the regular landings.

For further particulars, apply to the captains on board or at the office on the Pier, foot of Hamilton street. jy17.

GENERAL AGENCY, for Foreign and Domestic Law, collecting and transacting business. Office Main street, opposite the "TELEGRAPH" office, Houston, Repub. of Texas.

The undersigned has made arrangements in the United States, England, France, Germany, and Mexico, for attending to claims of every kind, and to the settlement of the estates of deceased soldiers and others.

All kinds of documents, public or private, made out in original, in the English, French, Spanish, German, Russian, and Italian languages, or translated from either of them into any one required.

Old settlers will find the services of the undersigned useful in completing their land titles, in cases where any of the formalities of the Mexican laws are wanting; or the execution thereof by the authorities omitted, by procuring authentic copies of the same, from the Mexican records to complete the chain of titles.

New settlers and land speculators can avail themselves of his services, by having examined the Spanish titles to Texas lands, and consulting him in relation to the genuineness and validity of the same, previous to entering into final contract.

POETRY.

Mr. Editor—There is so much simplicity and beauty, in this poetical composition, that I could not refrain from copying it, and hope you will record it among the other valuable pieces of Poetry, you oblige us with.

F A I T H .

Faith is the Christian's prop,
Whereon his sorrows lean—
It is the substance of his hope,
His Proof of things unseen—
It is the Anchor of his soul
When tempests rage and billows roll!

Faith is the Polar Star,
That guides the Christian's bark;
Directs his wanderings from afar
To reach the holy Ark—
It points the course where'er he roam,
And safely leads the Pilgrim home.

Faith is the Rainbow's form,
Hung on the brow of Heaven—
The glory of the passing storm;
The pledge of Mercy given:
It is the triumphal Arch
Through which the saints to glory march.

Faith is the Mountien Rock,
Whose summit towers on high;
Secure above the tempest's shock,
An inmate of the sky—
Fixed on a prize of greater worth.
It views with scorn the things of earth.

The Faith that works by Love,
And purifies the heart;
A foretaste of the joys above,
To mortals can impart—
The Christian's faith is simply this,
A passport to immortal bliss.

HILLS.

THE WIFE.

BY ELENORA L. MONTAGUE.

Oh come, beloved! to yon grey wood,
Where oft in childhood's hour we strayed,
Ere yet with plighted hands we stood
Beneath yon bending willow's shade;
And I my early dream will tell,
And blush not, though thine eye behold me;
I feel thy voice's soothing spell,
Thy loved and loving arms enfold me.

Ah! little didst thou dream how long
I loved thee with a hidden heart;
When even amid some touching song
My sighs would breathe, my tears would start;
Thou could'st not deem that this weak breast,
Which in thy joy stood mute before thee,
Longed but to share thy soul's unrest
When sorrow's night was deepening o'er thee.

Oh! then the sullen years drew on
When thou must part, yet leave no token,
And I must hear, unshared, alone,
A grief which yet might not be spoken.
Oh, Love! it was a fearful time,
But all is past, forgotten now;
Yet something of its youthful prime
Hath fled from this devoted brow.

This grieves me not, for well I know
Thy spirit will not love me less,
Though Time upon my head should snow;
Or on my cheeks too rudely press:
I feel that thou wilt dearest be—
If ought to me can make thee dearer—
When the spring leaves of life's young tree,
Around thy brow are growing searer.

Years weaned; and thou rememberest yet
The hour which led thee back to me,
When sickened with the world, we met,
And each was changed—yet both were free;
Not changed in soul, but sadder grown,

And touched as by the wand of sorrow;
And doomed, like buds too early blown,
To greet, with wasted bloom, the morrow.

Then once again I dared to dream,
But now no more a dream of sadness;
Thy presence smoothed my life's rough stream,
And led me back to youth and gladness!
And something did our hearts subdue,
A yearning thought—a thought of home—
As though our soul's more closely drew
Ere yet the darker days should come.

Now let them come! I fear them not;
For art not thou, beloved, mine?
And is not this time-hallowed spot
The altar of a love-divine?
Oh, may the lamp which lights us now
Forever on that altar burn,
And ne'er through life our spirits know
One severed hour o'er which to mourn!

The following beautiful piece of poetry is taken from a work entitled "Weeds and Wild Flowers," a youthful production of the author of "Pelham," and "The Disowned."

KNOWLEDGE.

'Tis midnight—round the lamp which o'er
The chamber sheds the lonely beam,
Is wisely spread the varied lore
Which feeds in youth the feverish dream—
The dream, the thirst, the wild desire,
Delirious, yet divine—to know!--
Around to roam, above aspire,
And drink the breath of heaven below!--
From ocean, earth, the stars, the sky,
To lift mysterious Nature's pall,
And bare before the kindling eye,
In man, the darkest mist of all.

Alas! what boots the midnight oil—
The madness of the struggling mind?
Oh, vain the hope, and vain the toil
Which only leaves us doubly blind!
What learn we from the past?—the same
Dull course of glory, guilt, and gloom!
I asked the future—and there came
No voice from its unfathomed womb.
The sun was silent, and the wave;
The air replied but with a breath;
But earth was kind, and from the grave
Arose the eternal answer—Death!
And this was all; we need no sage
To teach us Nature's only truth.
Oh, fools! o'er Wisdom's idle page
To waste the hours of golden youth!
In science wildly do we seek,
What only withering years should bring—
The languid pulse, the feverish cheek,
The spirit's drooping on the wing.

Even now the wandering eyes survey
The glass to youthful glance so dear;
What deepening tracks of slow decay
Exhausting thought has graven here!
To think, is but to learn to groan,
To scorn what all besides adore;
To feel amid the world alone—
An alien on a desert shore;
To lose the only ties which seem,
To idler gaze, in mercy given;
To find love, faith and hope a dream,
And turn to dark despair from Heaven.

THE PARTED SPIRIT.

Mysterious in its birth,
And viewless as the blast,
Where hath the spirit fled from earth,
Forever passed?

I ask the grave below—
It keeps the secret well—
I call upon the heavens to show—
They will not tell.

Of earth's remotest strand,
Are tales and tidings known:
But from the spirits distant land
Returneth none.

Winds waft the breath of flowers
To wand'ers o'er the wave—
That bear no message from the bowers
Beyond the grave.

Proud science scales the skies—
From star to star doth roam—
But reacheth not the shore where lies
The spirit's home.

Impervious shadows hide
This mystery of Heaven—
But where all knowledge is denied—
To hope is given.

TO THE MASONIC FRATERNITY.—We are desirous of drawing out some of the Masonic talent of our brethren, which at present appears to lie buried among the rubbish; and to this end, we will pay TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS for the best original essay on the subject of Masonry—for these and best, two elegantly engraved Master and Royal Arch Aprons on satin, superbly got up, together with handsomely engraved diplomas of the Master and R. A. Degrees. For the third best, the FREE subscription of the Register so long as we shall have any control of it. The Essay must not be less than TEN PAGES of ordinary foolscap, and it is desirable that the writer should not exceed fifteen such pages. The writer will choose his own method of presenting his subject, in such attractive, useful and practical shape, as will be of interest to the fraternity. The manuscripts will be submitted to two competent and impartial brethren. Each MSS. to be accompanied with the name and residence of the writer, written in such manner as to be detached from the copy; and no person shall be privy to such name but ourselves. All such manuscripts coming to us, whether by mail or otherwise, must be free of charge. The MSS. received, will be our property, and such of them as may be considered worthy of publication, will have the name of the writer added, unless he shall express a wish to the contrary, which will be honorably observed. The time for receiving such Essays will be until the FIRST OF SEPTEMBER NEXT; addressed to "American Masonic Register, Albany." Those papers with whom we exchange, will oblige us, they will either copy the above, or notice the substance of it.

MASONIC

MASONRY

Enjoins on us our duty to God, to our neighbor, and to ourselves. To the Deity we owe reverence and submission; to man, love and good fellowship; to ourselves, temperance, prudence, and a judicious self-government. As members of society, masons are to obey the laws, respect their rulers, and live quiet and peaceable lives. To the honor of our institution be it mentioned, it admits not of distinctions of any kind. 'Though it taketh from no man that which he hath, but rather adds to his dignity: yet virtue and knowledge, in the royal art, are the only foundations of greatness, and the only steps to preeminence among the brotherhood. Every "good man and true," who conforms to the principles of our institution, is accepted of by us. It matters not whether he be Jew or Gentile, Greek or Hebrew, if his principles be pure, and his love sincere. The charity of a mason extends to the whole human race; it disdains the narrow contractions of sect or party, whose selfish and unfeeling hearts would exclude the rest of their species: but in imitation of our Most High Master, extends the arm of benevolence to all those, of whatever nation, language, religion, or politics, "who fear the Lord and work righteousness." The particular institutions, civil or religious, of different nations, it disturbs not. These it considers as but forms, with regard to which every man is free to act, without answering to any but himself, his own conscience, and his God. But the essentials of religion, the one thing needful, it expects and requires from all its members. By this judicious conduct our institution unites the whole family of mankind in bonds of brotherly affection. It teaches them to rise superior to ancient prejudices, hateful distinctions, and invidious jealousies; to expel ignorance, superstition, and bigotry from their breasts; and to unite their joint efforts in diffusing and enforcing those universal principles of virtue and morality which tend most to promote the honor of our Great Architect, and the happiness of the human race.

In a particular manner, masonry recommends charity and benevolence. As it is the highest honor, so it is the chief happiness of a mason, to pardon the errors and relieve the distresses of his fellow creatures. It is his glory and delight to sympathize with those that mourn, to relieve their wants, and soothe their cares. He pours the oil of joy into their bleeding hearts; and extends the arm of charity to raise their drooping spirits. O charity! thou heaven-born virtue, long mayest thou preside as the guardian genius of masonry! long mayest thou reign over the hearts of the brotherhood, inciting them to acts of charity and love, until the whole earth shall be gladdened by thy divine influence.

TEMPERANCE AMONG MASONS.

Temperance is among the most conspicuous and amiable of masonic virtues: 'tis the beautiful Angelina, the genius of masonry, that preserves the sacred vestibule from the pollution of cowards and eve-droppers. The disciples of Aetolus should be unknown among us: the pure air of masonry should not be breathed by the same lungs that eject the fœtid air of the drunkard:—Intemperance! 'tis the source of human woe, of misery, of wretchedness, of de-pair: 'tis the destroyer of every virtue; of the kindly feelings that ennoble the human heart; of all those qualities that enable man to approximate nearer, than any other species, the divine goodness of his creator: 'tis the leveller of all honorable distinction; the bosom that sweeps away character, principle and honor: 'tis the secret worm that knaws upon the mind; that lays waste the fair field of intellect, and plucks the fairest flower to "Waste its fragrance on the desert air."

Masons rightly regard Temperance as exercising a proper restraint on the affections and passions; as that power which renders the body tame and governable, and frees the mind from the allurements of vice. If then they are thus taught to regard it, is it necessary for us to say that, it should be the constant companion of every mason; that he, who disregards it, does violence to the institution at large; that he not merely prostrates his character as a man, but destroys his influence as a reputable mason? If, we say, he be thus instructed, and the consequences be thus appalling, what excuse can the intemperate brother offer in mitigation of his offence? Need we go further?—need we tell him that he is in danger of contracting licentious and vicious habits?—that the indulgence of such habits may lead him incautiously to make exposures, which he has sacredly promised to conceal, and which would inevitably subject him to contumely and dishonor?—need we tell him that the health of the body and the dignity of the species are mutually concerned in a strict observance of the virtue of Temperance?—need we say to him that an intemperate man is unworthy to hold communion with masons?—that he is a dishonor to the brotherhood, a discredit to the institution, an evil to society, and an abomination in the eyes of heaven? Yes! we tell him this; and if need be, we will tell him more: we will tell that he is an enemy to his God; to himself and to his species; an enemy to her, whom he has sworn to love and protect; to her, on whose spotless bosom he has found comfort and relief, and passed the blissful hours of his youth; to her, the soother of his sorrows, the innocent sharer of his miseries: we will tell him, and tell him truly, that he has paralysed the hand ever quick to administer the healing balm to his wounded spirit!—nor will we stop here: if he be a parent, we will call upon those pledges of his early love, nearest and dearest to his heart, to plead our cause; we will present them to him in their tattered garments, dirty and emaciated; ignorant and on the high road to destruction: they shall plead to him for bread! we will take him to the sick bed of the mother: she shall plead for them: she shall pray for him! we will then turn and ask him the cause of all this misery! and his discolored eye and trembling limbs and wretched demeanor shall furnish the answer! This is no idle picture; no sketch of fancy: it is sad reality! Go into the habitation of the drunkard; examine, judge of things as they exist, and then say if we have told half the truth!

There are other species of intemperance; all of which exercise an influence over the system more or less deleterious. Gluttony is a species of intemperance, the effects of which on the mind are not less harmful than excessive drinking, and the operations of which are not very dissimilar: it also destroys the natural functions of the body. Intemperate zeal commonly defeats the object we desire to attain, and produces contrary results. In fine, intemperance of whatever character, is to be discountenanced; no good can result from it, and much evil may. But as paramount to all others, let our forces be levelled against that source of all evil—intemperate drinking!—it is the bane of society—the curse of mankind!

AHIMAN REZON.

The Ahiman Rezon is a code of laws, which has existed from time immemorial, for the government of the craft, and is usually denominated the Book of Constitutions. The word Ahiman signifies "a brother prepared, or brother of the right hand." The word Rezon, is, literally translated, the "brother of the Lord." Rezon implies either learn, small, secret, or prince. These words, well known to the fraternity, were in use in the days of our Grand Master Solomon; and have descended, among many other things to the present fraternity of Free and accepted Masons.

Since the grand convocation at York, when these regulations were systematized, every grand lodge has the inherent right of forming an additional code for the better preservation of the lodges immediately under its jurisdiction. The ancient landmarks, however, including the primitive Ahiman Rezon, are preserved unimpaired.

MEMORIES OF GIBRALTAR.

It was the first time that Sophia had known the horrors of self-condemnation, and many a vow did she make steadily to shun the society of one so dangerous to her peace. But although that which was right, she well knew that her purpose could not be easily effected, because, apart from the pleadings of her own heart, and the Spaniard's ever-ready attention, she was aware that any marked change of manner would draw remarks either from her husband or others which could not but prove highly embarrassing. And her determination was destined to be put to a speedy trial; for, scarcely had she entered the drawing-room the following morning, before a party of officers made their appearance, his excellency of Seville along with them.

Passing him hastily, and without notice, she turned to receive the apologies of Major Hindesley, who was no sooner assured of forgiveness for their exploit, than he proceeded to banter Macgregor on Sophia's causeless alarm. The colonel turned on his wife a scowling frown, and muttered something about affectation. Her pale cheek reddened with vexation, and her eyes sparkled fire, while Mrs. St. Clair maliciously observed, that "Colonel Macgregor must feel highly flattered in possessing so exclusive an interest in the affections of his wife."

"The dignified love of some women, madam," said he, bowing to the lady, "is indeed flattering, that of others serves but to render a man ridiculous."

Sophia turned upon him a look of surprise—it was the first time that the colonel had committed himself in the presence of others. For a moment her better feelings struggled, then a smile of scorn curled on her lip, and, drawing herself proudly to her full height she turned one haughty look upon the colonel, and approached Don Pedro, who leant gravely against the window, and extended her hand towards him, which he appeared to accept as a mark of peculiar favor, and, after a few moments, he was seen darting from the apartment.

"Whither in such haste; whither, I pray, your excellency?" said Mrs. St. Clair.

"Mrs. Macgregor has consented to try the efficacy of the sea-breeze for headache;—perhaps you will honor my felucca with your presence?" said the don.

"Certainly, most gracious don," replied Mrs. St. Clair, whose spirits seemed to have reached the utmost point of vivacity. "But this is astonishing, absolutely wonderful!"

"What is wonderful, madam?" inquired Sophia, proudly, as his excellency left the room.

"Your consenting to a request of that most puissant don."

"And why, madam?"

"Why child! Because you are such a young prude?"

"It is better to be that than an old coquette," retorted Sophia.

"All in good time, child," added the hostess, provokingly; "she who is in youth the former is generally the latter in age."

"Experientia docet," rejoined the guest.

Mrs. St. Clair doubtless felt the point, but she concealed her anger, merely remarking, in an equivocal tone, that she never before saw Don Pedro approach Sophia without her seeming ready to cry out, 'Oh! hubby, hubby, take the naughty man away!'

'My introduction,' said the colonel, sullenly, 'might secure him from impoliteness.'

'I cannot conceive the reason of Mrs. Macgregor's dislike,' persecuted Mrs. St. Clair.

'I plead not guilty to your charge,' retorted Sophia, 'and I assure you that I am as conscious of his excellency's merits as even Mrs. St. Clair.'

As she turned, the Spaniard was by her side, and Mrs. Sinclair burst into a loud laugh, that had something more sardonic than mirthful in its sound.

'Upon my word I believe her,' whispered Major Hindsley to his companion, Captain Brown.

'And not without some apology,' said Brown, 'for how can she help "looking upon this picture and upon that?"'

'Hyperion to a satyr,' whispered the Major.

Meanwhile Don Pedro had grown so exultant that his gaiety became contagious, and Sophia found it impossible to resist the influence of the hour. So day followed day, diversion succeeding diversion.

It was vain for my friend to avoid the society of one so sedulously thrown into her way by the blind agency of her husband. He, indeed, was too much occupied by his own affairs to render that attention to his wife which her position so peculiarly required. To do him justice, the danger of her intercourse with the Spaniard never entered his head. Perhaps he thought too highly of himself, perhaps too highly of Sophia. He had, however, in the meantime, transferred his wavering admiration to Mrs. St. Clair, whose ready wit and independent manners suited his own aristocratic notions, and whose endurance of his attention rose partly from the pure spirit of mischief, partly from coquetry, and lastly from the ready supplies the well-stocked purse afforded to her somewhat scanty resources—supplies which her address in all games of chance or skill enabled her to transfer from the possession of her easy dupe. His gambling propensity, which, since his marriage, had laid dormant, now became fearfully developed to the amazement of Sophia, who secretly mourned over the mutual errors of herself and her husband. He, too, infatuated to perceive the perils which encompassed him, and flattered by Mrs. St. Clair's supposed preference, became daily more anxious to prolong the visit. Not so Sophia; she had painfully learned her danger, and many an anxious hour did she devote to the examination of her heart—a task more necessary since our departure was still constantly deferred. Sometimes she would remain whole evenings in her chamber, where vainly she tried to read or write—her thoughts were vagrant.

In such a mood, Sophia had declined joining a party to a ball given by Mrs. Holland, of the engineers, when the colonel, armed cap-a-pie for conquest, entered her dressing-room, and, greatly to his consternation, found that it was not her intention to accompany him, and, perceiving her in tears, inquired the cause: she muttered something about being ill, and dashed them away.

'Ill!' said he. 'How is it possible that a person so admired can be ill? I am never ill. Besides, it was my intention that you should have caused a sensation; but you always thwart my wishes, and impose upon my good-nature—instance your conduct to his excellency Don Pedro Valdigo, madam.'

'To Don Pedro Valdigo! How?' tremulously inquired Sophia, a bright suffusion overspreading her cheek.

'How, madam?' pursued the enraged little colonel. 'Is it not notorious to the whole garrison that your behavior is most indecorous?'

Sophia trembled violently, and covered her face with her hands.

'Yes madam, well may you be overwhelmed with confusion.'

'Confusion,' she echoed, vainly endeavoring to compose herself. 'Colonel Macgregor, really I don't comprehend.'

'Then madam, in one word, I consider it indecorous for my wife to treat a man of Don Pedro's station in the slighting manner which affect.'

Sophia breathed again.

'I insist upon knowing the reason that you so scornfully decline the attentions that his excellency offers in consideration of my introduction. Mrs. St.

Clair asserts that it arises from my jealousy and secret lectures; therefore I request, may I command, that you will free me from such a barbarous aspersion.'

'Colonel Macgregor,' said Sophia firmly, yet calmly, 'I am not ignorant of the mercenary arts to which your fatal love for play has rendered you a ready victim. I think and hope, however, that your attentions to the wife of your general are no more than courteous. That lady's views regarding me, I fear, are dangerous and malicious. She calls me a prude, others think me a coquette. You think that I only exist in the breath of adulation or glare of society, and I would have the world think so; yet, believe me, that you are all mistaken; still, colonel, you trust largely to my honor; suffer me also to exercise discretion, and he assured that you shall never find me capable of abusing your confidence.'

It was some time before he could find courage to break the awkward silence that succeeded, but at length in a somewhat timid tone he ventured to entreat that she would oblige him by joining the party, having promised her hand for the evening to Don Pedro, 'however disagreeable.'

'Disagreeable!' sighed Sophia, with an impatient gesture, as she paced the room.

'It is no use denying it to me, Sophia—I see you really hate his excellency.'

She stopped short, and looked fully in his face, for it was evident that he meant literally as he had expressed himself; and she felt as if she were acting a despicable deceit, yet she hesitated; her color went and came, whilst the confession of her heart's secret trembled on her lip; her eyes were fixed anxiously upon him, seeking but a word, a look of encouragement to support her in a frank avowal.

He kissed her hand, begging she would gratify his pride and redeem her promise. The action was gallant, but not affectionate. The tone of his voice was the most utter commonplace, and chilled the resolution which the warmth of his feelings had for a moment excited; therefore, changing her intention, she demanded if her present compliance would insure her future freedom of action? The colonel promised that it should. 'Then, sir,' said she, 'you shall be obeyed.'

'A thousand thanks,' said the gallant husband, and kissing her hand, after many injunctions as to her toilette, he departed.

'I fulfil my promise,' said the colonel, as he placed the hand of his wife in that of Don Pedro.

'Yes,' added she, 'I am bound to obey my liege lord; so here I am, despite headache, nerves, etcetera.'

'But colonel,' asked the Spaniard, 'has Mrs. Macgregor further honored me by complying with my other request?'

'No,' said the colonel, 'for that I must refer you to herself,' as he hurried away.

'May I inquire what that refers to?' asked Sophia.

'That you would visit me at Seville, donna.'

Sophia started.

'Mrs. St. Clair and the general have promised; the colonel, too, accepts my invitation. I venture, therefore, to hope that I shall not be denied where I could least endure disappointment.'

Sophia resolutely averted her eyes, as in a low voice she answered, 'It is impossible; I cannot visit Seville.'

'You are not serious, donna?'

'Most serious, your excellency; let us join the dance.'

The Spaniard coldly bowed an acquiescence.

Sophia saw that his feelings were wounded, but affected not to perceive the change in his demeanour, and endeavored to draw him into cheerful conversation; but receiving no response beyond monosyllabic replies, she in turn began to feel depressed, when observing the eyes of Patrisinia Vialli anxiously fixed upon her, she determined to seize that opportunity to secure Don Pedro's interest for the lovers, believing that at this critical juncture no undue hopes could be founded 'on his part' by her interference, and trusting that such proof of the conviction of his magnanimity might contribute to soothe his wounded pride. With a tremulous voice she therefore intimated a wish to stroll through the illuminated garden having a request to make that required privacy.

Pleased and surprised, her companion instantly conducted her from the ball-room.

'The fact is,' said Sophia, struggling to conceal her timidity under an appearance of gaiety, 'that your excellency possesses a secret which was only intended for me, and unfortunately you are the last person to whom that secret should have been revealed.'

'I will not affect to misunderstand that you allude to Patrisinia,' said he gravely.

'You have the power of destroying her dream of happiness—will you be so cruel?'

'And wherefore should Mrs. Macgregor feel interested in the question?'

'Patrisinia is my friend,' said Sophia, with naivete.

'She was my friend also donna; betrothed to me before she knew that Captain Westron was in existence.'

'Of which I was not aware until pledged to promote their views,' replied Sophia.

'And suppose I love Patrisinia?' archly inquired his excellency.

Sophia colored deeply, and spite of all her heroism a pang shot through her heart, whilst she faltered, 'I thought—I was told—it is believed that you do not love Patrisinia.'

'I swear that I do not,' he impetuously exclaimed, clasping the hand of his companion. 'No donna, well do you know that I do not love her.'

'Then promise you will not betray her.'

Don Pedro hesitated.

'Think of those who must be innocently involved. Think of the wretchedness to which you would doom two persons tenderly devoted.'

'It is indeed most sad to part from those we love,' said the Spaniard, as Sophia shrank from the meaning of his eyes. 'But in my official station,' he continued, as if recollecting himself, 'I am so connected, that passiveness becomes a breach of duty. Let Patrisinia forget the captain, and from my claims she is freed.'

'How,' pleaded Sophia, 'can you expect her to forget the being whom she fondly loves, by whom she is beloved?'

'There is but one invocation,' said Don Pedro, 'that can move me, and that you have omitted.'

'For—for the sake, then, of her whom you love,' faltered the petitioner.

Pressing her hand to his lips, he passionately exclaimed, 'Yes, for your sake, donna; for your sake, I promise.'

'A thousand, thousand thanks; let me hasten to my friend with the joyful tidings.'

'Not so,' said the Spaniard; 'I commit a breach of duty at your intercession, but that is a secret which must be confided only to your keeping. Pursue your plans cautiously, and let the lovers beware of Patrisinia's kinsmen: there are those amongst them that the tears of beauty could not soften, nor the power of love influence; and now that I have given so strong a proof of my submission, do not refuse me the pleasure of being near you. Why of late have I been avoided? How have I offended?'

Sophia was silent.

'At least pronounce my fault, that I may endeavor its expiation.'

'Your excellency has not committed one. Let us go; we shall miss the waltz.'

'Tis ever thus, signora; but I must be heard.—In three days you leave Ceuta, and I return to Seville, to be more wretched than language can express, unless you accompany Colonel Macgregor thither.'

'It cannot be—speak of it no more.'

'The colonel has promised.'

Sophia raised her eyes reproachfully, asked, 'Is your request a generous one, Don Pedro?'

His eyes sank beneath her scrutiny. 'Can you blame a wretch for seeking happiness?'

'I blame all who would betray confidence.'

'Do not think so meanly of me, signora.'

'Do not injustice to your honor, Don Pedro.'

'How, donna, have I incurred your contempt?'

'By believing it possible that I could deserve yours.'

'Is it too much for a captive to pray for the sun to shine when its rays may cheer his heart, yet lose none of its own brilliancy?'

'Don Pedro I am an Englishwoman, and perchance my notions on these points may differ from yours.—'

Convinced, however, that you would not intentionally offend my principles, I am willing to believe that your words mean no more than common gallantry. Let us return to the company.'

Sophia moved on, but the Spaniard took care that it should not be towards the house.

'I would not breathe a thought,' said he, 'to sully your purity, a wish that angels might not register.—Tell me but that you forgive—that you will remember me with pity—and I will live upon the recollection.'

'You shall have my kindest thoughts, but you must not forget that I am a wife.'

'Of one who values not the gem he possesses.'

'It matters not, he is my husband still.'

'And can you love a gambler and a sot?'

'I must abide my destiny.'

'So lovely, yet so cold!'

Sophia could not repress a sigh, for her heart told her that her lips were traitors to its anguish.

'But one word more,' said Don Pedro; 'were you free?'

A sigh quivered on her lip as she looked to heaven. Their eyes met as if in fascination for a single instant and Don Pedro questioned no more.

'Well, Mrs. Macgregor, I begin to have some hopes of you,' said Mrs. St. Clair, as she met the strollers re-entering the ball room.

'Why so, madam?'

'Because you have transgressed your code so far as to have indulged in a tete-a-tete of a full hour.'

'It appeared only five minutes,' said Sophia ingenuously.

'Better and better; then his excellency, I suppose, has prevailed with you to join our party to Seville?'

'In that, I regret to say that I have failed,' said the Don.

Preparations for our departure were at length making, amongst which those for the smuggling of the lovers formed the most onerous part, it being as requisite to conceal Captain Westron as Patrisinia, lest his presence might induce a scrutiny too rigorous to escape detection.

There was not an English vessel in the port, and the harbor was guarded by Spanish sentinels, who, however inart upon other occasions, were generally watchful enough of all English movements; while, as if to increase the difficulties of our undertaking, the colonel, in utter ignorance of the affair, had accepted for our party a passage in the Spanish governor's felucca, who, being about to visit Algeiras, proposed that, after landing there, his vessel should take us to Gibraltar. Several hogheads of accoutrements had been placed in the hall, destined to be shipped under Colonel Macgregor's orders, and it was thought not impossible to conceal our adventurers in them; but to effect this object the colonel's concurrence became indispensable, who, greatly to his consternation, learnt for the first time our perilous design; he was, however, too gullible as well as good natured to refuse as he said, a 'petition from the Graces,' and agreed to place himself for the once under petticoat government.

The vessel was to sail at day break, and a splendid parting entertainment at the government-house was to terminate our visit. From this we arranged that Patrisinia should retire early, on the plea of indisposition, and having amused her duenna, and enacted a little domestic farce, she was secretly to leave her home, and, while dark, to join Sophia in her dressing room, when the lovers were to be separately secured in hogheads pierced with holes, and thence to be shipped on board the vessel as military stores.

Sophia took the advantage of the confusion after supper to retire with the colonel, and with many injunctions to the tearful Patrisinia, and many earnest aspirations for success in their perilous enterprise she saw the captives securely packed in their respective hogheads; and scarcely was all completed, when a party of soldiers entered to carry them to the ship, and, with reiterated injunctions to be careful in their transport, colonel Macgregor marched them to the port.

The final moment was now come and Don Pedro advanced with an air that forbade denial, had denial been intended, but in truth it was not; so after many embraces from our Spanish friends, and after many lip-dear professions from Mrs. St. Clair and others, we took leave of our Ceuta friends, leaving none with more regret than the amiable gobernadora, and the homely but kind hearted Mrs. Douglas, the former of whom we had reason to believe, was not entirely ignorant of our plot. After our adieux had been completed, Sophia gave her hand to Don Pedro, who having placed it in his arm, proceeded to the pier, whether the governor and his suite had already gone.—Conversation on the way was wholly suspended, for their hearts were to full. But when he handed her to the boat, he significantly bade her not to fear the dangers of her voyage.

At this moment one of the sacred casks that was being hoisted on the felucca struck against her side, the hook slipped, the cask tottered, Sophia half shrieked and would have started from her seat had not Don Pedro held her firmly down. The men had caught the reeling cask in their arms, and guided it safely on deck. The governor and his officers were otherwise too busily engaged to notice the agitation, but it served to inform Don Pedro as to the manner in which Patrisinia had escaped.

Calm your agitation,' he whispered, 'I will watch over you.' A glance alone answered, and Sophia stood trembling on the deck, her hand resting on the cask that contained Patrisinia. Macgregor in seeming carelessness, leant on that which concealed Westron.

The little anchor was soon weighed, the pointed sails of our felucca were rapidly spread out to the favoring breeze, the vessel shot a-head, and Don Pedro, who stood silently watching the preparations of the sailors, now started forward, bowed courteously to the gentlemen, and grasping Sophia's hand with a fervent pressure, sprang without a word into the boat which awaited him alongside.

The sound of a gun from the citadel broke the silence of the morning. The next moment the course of our vessel altered, and in another, obedient to the signal, she lay like a log upon the water.

Patrisinia was already missed—we were suspected—pursued, and about to undergo a scrutinizing search a few moments would decide the fate of the culprits. Our hearts beat so violently that we could hear their pulsation, yet we feared to go on deck, lest our agitation should betray us. The silence of expectation reigned above; we tried to look towards the town, but the vessel had swung round, or was returning to it, for we could only see the mountains and the white aqueduct of Algeiras; presently there was a slight shock, and a low grating sound, as of a boat grazing the side of our vessel. Then we felt the heeling of the light felucca as she yielded beneath the sudden boarding of several persons at the same moment.—Then came the tramp of many feet, and a confusion of voices, and as the steps approached nearer, Sophia, conscious of her incapability to conceal her terrors, and the danger that awaited her betrayal, flung herself on the couch, and, burying her head in the clothes feigned sleep. We heard the voice of the governor expostulating, 'Impossible! Signor Vialli,' said he, 'I tell you it is impossible! The signoretta cannot be on board without my knowledge. There is no one here but Colonel Macgregor's party, and I request that you will not distress the ladies.'

'Pardon me, governor—I am convinced that she is here,' said a voice that we recognized as Patrisinia's brother, a man of overbearing temper and repulsive manners. Westron is likewise missing, and there is no other place of concealment; and the young cavalier impatiently flung open the cabin door. We both started up as he threw a searching glance around, muttered something between an apology and threat, and retired.

Greatly excited, we both rushed on deck, which we found crowded with priests and civilians, many of whom were recognized as members of the Vialli family; a weight, however, was removed from our breasts when we beheld Don Pedro leaning in a lounging attitude upon the cask in which Patrisinia was deposited, and the colonel still stationed upon that tenanted by Westron—a look from the former reassured us.

'Well, signor,' said the governor to young Vialli, as he returned from searching the hold, 'you have examined every part of our vessel, and must be satisfied that your sister is not here; therefore I have to request that you may not interrupt our voyage.'

'I must first see the contents of these casks,' said Vialli, bending an eye of suspicion upon Sophia.

'These casks, signor,' said Macgregor, 'contain property belonging to his majesty, my master, and it is my duty to preserve them untouched. Should you so far forget yourself as to demand their inspection—'

'I know my duty, colonel, as well as you,' said the other doggedly, 'and I am determined to have them opened before I quit the vessel.'

'Then, signor,' said the irritated Scot, 'it must be by passing over my body.'

'Tut, tut,' interposed Don Pedro, 'Signor Vialli does but jest. He is not so unwise as to waste time in tumbling out a parcel of soldier's belts, caps, and jackets, when he should be galloping into Barbary.—'Tis plain that the signoretta is not here, and far more probable that she has passed the Moorish lines by this times,' adding, with an admonitory glance to the governor, 'Colonel Macgregor is a guest here, and we are bound to protect him and his.'

The haughty nonchalance with which he looked around forbade reply, and the party slowly descended into the boats, the reverend fathers growing hints about excommunication and the inquisition; not however, before Don Pedro coldly intimated his intention to accompany the voyagers to Gibraltar.

After a pleasant sail, a boat with its crimson silk awning and gay rowers emerged from behind the pier of Algeiras, and shot alongside in order to take our hospitable host and suite on shore, after which we rapidly neared our homes.

Our felucca ran beneath the ports of the San Juan, the old seventy-four, which lay as a depot-ship in the harbor of the New Mole. The accommodation chair was lowered, and we ascended. A conference for a few minutes took place between the colonel and the first-lieutenant, who, laughing heartily, ordered that two particular casks, marked, 'This end up,' should be instantly brought to the state cabin.

The chaplain was summoned, Patrisinia and her lover were released from their imprisonment, and were forever united in the bonds of marriage ere they had well recovered from their surprise on finding their wedding honored by the presence of Don Pedro.

'Tis enough for you,' said he to Patrisinia's inquiry, 'that your safety is secured.'

'You have preserved us all from the inquisition,' said the colonel. 'Egad, my teeth chatter at the thought; so pray, Mrs. Macgregor, unless you have a design on my life, never again play the confidante in a Spanish elopement.'

'Westron, I give you joy,' said Don Pedro; 'be kind to your wife. Gentlemen, farewell! Patrisinia, sometimes speak of me to those you love; and he glanced at Sophia, which the penetrating Spanish girl was not slow to understand. 'May you always continue friends, and in your happiness remember that at Seville there lives one who can never forget you.'—He pressed their united hands to his lips, and when they looked up he was gone.

It may be expected that I should now wind up my story by dealing poetic justice to my heroines, and tell how Patrisinia's happy love refuted Sophia's arguments against a marriage founded on enthusiasm; but unfortunately for such a purpose, mine is a tale of real life, and truth compels me to confess that our Spanish friend's experience only too faithfully substantiated the justice of Sophia's lecture. She was not, however, destined to undergo all the ordeals of wedded life, for little more than a year had elapsed when she stood by the side of him for whose sake she had perilled so much—a grief-stricken widow; soon after which she bade adieu to her English friends, and returning to Ceuta, after due penance done, was again received into the bosom of her mother-church.

From that hour our friendship became a tale of the past; for, however satisfactory might be the English gold and widow's pension, which her marriage with poor Westron had secured, her reverend uncle found no inclination to permit further intercourse with heretics, whose acquaintance might lead to a second marriage in the corps.

Sophia was destined to a much more eventful life, but she and the Governor of Seville never met again; yet both survived their protracted separation, nay more they survived their passion, and lived to form new ties and new affections, so true it is that the object which constitutes our happiness of to-day seems like a fading dream when reason wakes upon the morrow. It is only when we yield without a struggle that passion conquers.

AMERICAN MASONIC REGISTER

Albany, Saturday, August 28, 1841.

OUR OWN AFFAIRS.

This No. closes the second volume of the Register, and we would earnestly call on those indebted to us, to remit without delay the amount due. We have fulfilled our part of the contract and it is but reasonable to expect from our patrons a corresponding compliance on their part. Many of our subscribers have not paid us a farthing since the commencement of the paper. Gentlemen, must upon a moment's reflection, be satisfied, that such patronage is worth nothing. We have no acquaintance, personally, with scarcely a subscriber out of our own State; and we can only judge of their friendly professions, by the manner in which they comply with their engagements. We speak plain on this subject, because we have cause for just complaint. Where there is any difficulty about current money, we will receive the notes on any solvent bank in the neighborhood, at par, if sent free of postage, which can be done through the post master.

It shall be our pride to make the Register worthy the support and countenance of its patrons; and in return we expect promptness on their part. We sincerely trust that those who are truly friendly to its interests will give us no further cause to complain of their remissness, which we honestly assure them is as disagreeable to our own feelings as it can possibly be annoying to them.

THE AFFAIR OF Miss ROGERS, remains enshrouded in as much mystery as ever. Morse, who was arrested as the murderer, and of whose innocence we express our belief, has been formally acquitted, and his discharge. The mystery of his absence was connected with difficulties between him and wife, together with a rascally attempt on the honor of a young female, whom he had decoyed from her home. He proved himself to be only the villain of another shade. The Journal of Commerce has some very sensible remarks, in relation to the case of Miss Rodgers. That paper says, that in all the stories connected with her case, there is no evidence of her leaving her home, other than her own assertion to do so. From this fact, that paper reasons, that she met her death in her own neighborhood, because had she traversed but one block, so well was she known, she would have been recognized. We have all along been of the opinion that the police officers of that city, have been on the wrong scent, in laying the scene of this tragedy at Hoboken. We firmly believe that she was murdered in the city of New York, and every probability goes strongly to show that it was not far from her home.

A HARD CASE.—Henry H. White, who was sentenced to the penitentiary in the District of Columbia for ten years, for being accessory to the burning of the treasury building; has been pardoned by the President, after an imprisonment of four years. Circumstances have come to light, which make it very doubtful whether White was guilty. White's residence is in Chicago, and the Globe says he started from Washington to that place, on foot with only $5 in his pocket. It was disreputable to the authorities.

In order to complete the interesting Tale, in this volume, commenced two weeks ago, we are compelled to omit our usual variety.

AN OLD STAGER.—The Boston Post says that Morse, the well known Cambridge omnibus-driver, has driven on that route 34 years, during which time he has driven a stage or omnibus, one half million of miles or nearly twenty-nine times around the globe.

MCLEOD.—The New-York Herald states that rumors are rife from Washington that Mr. Fox, the British Minister has been instructed by his government, to repeat his demand for the release of Alexander McLeod, before his trial in September, and if denied, to receive his passports. The demand will undoubtedly be promptly refused, and Mr. Fox can have his passports any moment they are asked for.

MATTHIAS.—We have always supposed until recently, that Matthias was an impostor, but if all the stories are true, he must be more than mortal. The Highland Messenger, published in North Carolina, states that he died in that State in July, 1840, aged about 60. The editor of the Albany Atlas declares that he saw the very identical Matthias within a few days on board a Hudson river boat, "beard and all."—Saratoga Sentinel.

If the editor of the Sentinel rests the prophet's immortality on the fact of his being alive, we will join with him as one of the "believers." Our neighbors of the Atlas probably saw "something like a whale," but it wasn't the real Simon Pure. Old Cloutie, foreclosed his mortgage on the Prophet about a year ago.

GLASS BELLS.—A glass bell for a church, was recently cast in Sweden. Its diameter is 6 feet, and its tone is said to be finer than that of any metal bell.

Samuel Cook, aged 25, engaged in the mine of Barytes at Cheshire, Conn. in lighting his pipe a few days since, dropped a spark into an open keg of powder, which exploded, causing his death on the 19th.

The Portsmouth Journal says that a little girl, eleven years of age, from a neighboring town, who heard Mr. Hawkins' lecture, when he invited those present to circulate temperance pledges, went home, and in a week obtained about 150 names. Try it, it is worthy of imitation.

WASHINGTON IRVING, is seriously ill at his cottage near Tarrytown. A remittent bilious fever, brought on by fatigue and exposure in a recent excursion to the coal region of Pennsylvania, is said to be the nature of his malady.

A SUCCESSFUL RAIL-ROAD.—The receipts of the Philadelphia and Baltimore rail-road, for July, 1841, amounted to $68,847 14.

THE ERIE.—From all the information obtained, the number lost on this boat, it is said will amount to two hundred and thirty.

The editor of the Chicago Democrat, who is a bachelor, is the author of the following:

"How much happiness does the old bachelor lose? No smiling angel to stand at the door to welcome him as he returns—'My dear, are you come?' No lisping cherub climbs his knee and in tones of love cries out, 'Daddy, give me thum thugar kitheth.'"

MUSEUM.—Mr. & Mrs. Greene, favorably known to our citizens, commenced a short engagement at this place on Thursday last.

Congress has passed the Bankrupt Bill.

Intelligence.

Thrilling Incident.—We learn from a gentleman who conversed with Mrs. Lynde, who was saved—and the only lady who was saved—from the Erie, that, when the fire broke out, she was lying in her berth.—Immediately upon the alarm being given, her husband ran to her assistance, inflated her life preserver, which she carried with her, and cast her overboard. As soon as possible he leaped over after her; but it was supposed that his life preserver was not properly inflated, and he was not afterwards seen! Another incident, which we learned from the same source, was this: Among the passengers was an interesting lad, about 14, named Beebe from Cleveland. He was placed in the particular charge of the unfortunate Gleason, the clerk. When the fire broke out, his friend G. took him by the hand and after in vain endeavoring to find some mode of escape for him, advised him to slide down the tiller chains. This he did, and G. accompanied him.—While thus hanging, the fire often poured over them in livid sheets; but they hung on, changing hands, and dashing water in their faces with the hand at liberty. The little fellow succeeded in holding on until rescued; but poor Gleason sunk a few moments too soon to be saved. The boy's face was a good deal burned, and his leg somewhat bruised by a burning timber which fell upon it. He describes, as the most fearful part of the dreadful scene through which he passed, the shrieks of those who were vainly struggling to press themselves through the windows of the cabin, which was filled with fire and smoke.—Detroit Daily Adv.

Sudden Death.—Henry Tillinghast, Esq., an old and respected inhabitant of Norway in this county, fell dead while at work in his hay-field on the 29th ult. A post-mortem examination proved his death to have resulted from disease of the heart. Mr. T. was a native of Rhode Island, and had resided in this county 48 years. He was twice elected to the Legislature of this State.—Ierkimer Journal.

THE CROPS.—The Camden Journal of 4th inst. says—From all we can gather from our exchange papers, the crop of the present year is likely to prove more abundant than for many years past. The wheat crop has, of course, been gathered, or nearly so, throughout the country and has proved very fine generally; and the growing crops of corn and cotton promise an abundant return to the farmer of his labor.
